

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

11

12

13

D W I G H T ' S

JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

---

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

---

VOLUME XXV

B O S T O N :
PUBLISHED BY OLIVER DITSON AND COMPANY, 277 WASHINGTON STREET.
1867.

STANFORD UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
MUSIC LIBRARY
APR 16 1976

ML1
D993
v.25/26

Reprint Edition 1967

JOHNSON REPRINT CORP.
NEW YORK—LONDON

ARNO PRESS, INC.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Library of Congress Catalog Card No. 67-24725

Manufactured in the U.S.A. by Arno Press Inc.

INDEX.

Abel, Mme. Louise.....143
 Abert, J. J. His Opera "Astorga".....276, 333, 402
 A Desideratum: the time-length of musical works.....351
 A Monday Evening in St. James's Hall, London: Joachim.....265
 Art of Musical Criticism made easy. Saturday Press.....226
 A Sentimental King. Philad. Bulletin.....264
 Astorga, Emanuel, and his Stabat Mater, by Riehl, 313; the subject of an Opera.....276, 333
 Austrian Nobility and Music, The.....217

Bach, J. S. His Fugues, 7, 14; Magnificat, 12; Toccata in F, arranged for Orchestra, 299; B.'s Works (by Hilgenfeldt), 385, 396, 403; his Chaconne for Violin, 167, 414; Aria "Erbarme dich" from his Passion Music.....414
 Bach "pure and simple," or with modern Accompaniments: his Preludes as treated by Moscheles, 249, 257
 Ballad Writing, The Art of. Lond. Orchestra.....116
 Beethoven's Letters: Köchel's collection (Lond. Mus. World), 99; Nohl's collection, reviewed by F. Hiller, 137, 146, (Mus. World) 170, 244, (Nation) 281, (A. W. T.).....296
 Beethoven: The Editions of his works (by O. Jahn), 3, 9, 18, 26, 35, 50; as a writer of Variations, 6, 14, 383; his Sonata, op. 53, 14; do. in A. op. 101, 15; do. op. 7, in E flat, 134; "Moonlight Sonata," by A. Kielblock, 185, 194; "Sonata Pastorale," do., 241, 250; 7th Symphony, 46; 4th Symphony, 171; 9th do. 358; Pastoral Symphony, 365; 5th Symphony, 407; 8th do. 414; "Ruins of Athens," 187, 207, 407; Variations with Fugue, op. 35, 383; Piano Concerto in G, 206, in B flat, 398; Violin Concerto, 414; Scena: "Ah! Perfido," 405; his relations to Weber, 20; New catalogue of, by A. W. Thayer, 49; Spohr's account of him, 233; Spohr & B. by Schindler, 234; portrait of, by Kriehuber (A. W. T.), 279; Life of, by A. W. Thayer, 288, 312, 359, 393, 407, 409
 "Beg"-ging the Question: a Scotch D.D. vs. Organs.....295
 Bennett, Wm. Sterndale; his Symphony in G minor.....67
 Berlioz, Hector: Letter to Liszt, 1; Marx on.....114
 Blind Tom.....316, 336
 Bonn, Music in, during the Last Century (A. IV. Thayer).....409
 Booth, Junius Brutus. N. Y. Tribune.....322
 Boston Music Hall Association, Annual Meeting.....263
 Boston: the musical year (ending July, 1865), 62, 69; Ditto (1866), 254, 262, 269; Music of the coming season.....310
 Brahms, Johannes: Waltzes by.....345
 Brass Band Question, The. (E. H.).....287, 303
 Brass Instruments, Marx.....114
 Bruch, Max: his Frithjof-Sage.....189, 197, 389
 Bülow, Hans von: at Munich.....235
 Burgmüller, Norbert: Overture to Dionysius, 207; Concerto in F sharp minor.....231, 374

Central Park, in New York.....64
 Cherubini: his Medea, 61, 91; Overture to Anacreon, 191, 358; to Der Wasserträger, 207, 398; to Les Abencerages, 391; his Symphony, 197; C. and his "Wasserträger".....324
 Chopin: his Barcarole, op. 60; Polonaises and Nocturnes.....94
 Cincinnati Harmonic Society, 280; New Music Hall in C.....397, 404
 Clapisson, M. Death of, in Paris.....228
 Cohen, Jules; his comic opera "José Maria".....293
 CONCERTS IN BOSTON:
 Boston Musicians' Union.....255
 Boston Theatre: "Sacred Concerts".....111, 119
 Carl Rosa's Matinée.....414
 Carlyle Petersilea: "Schumann Soirées" 375, 382, 391, 415
 Dr. S. P. Tuckerman.....206
 Ernst Perabo, 223, 231, 239, 247, 351; his "Schubert Matinees".....367, 375, 383, 398, 414, 415
 Great Organ.....14, 15, 23, 31, 87, 110, 151, 199, 262
 Handel and Haydn Society: Anniversary Festival, 7, 23, 30, 38, 45, 54
 Handel and Haydn Society: "Hymn of Praise," 39, 247; "Jephtha," 407; "Creation," 45, 127, 407; "Israel in Egypt," 47; "Elijah," 47, 166; "Messiah," 54, 166, 375; "Judas Maccabæus," 142, 158, 166; "St. Paul," 222, 351, 359; 42nd Psalm.....246
 Harvard Musical Association: Symphony Concerts, 150, 158, 167, 182, 190, 191, 199, 206, 214, 223, 229; Second Season, 311, 324, 351, 358, 396, 374, 383, 390, 398, 406, 414; Complimentary to Carl Rosa, 176, 182; For the Cretans.....383, 406, 416
 Harvard University: Mr. J. K. Paine.....253, 270
 Hermann Daum, 199, 223, 239; "Beethoven Matinees," 375, 399, 414

Master Richard Coker.....159
 Mendelssohn Quintette Club.....158, 175, 190, 207, 367, 382, 389
 Messrs. Kreisemann and Leonhard.....184, 143, 159, 174
 Miss Alice Dutton.....127
 Miss Annie Cary.....247
 Mlle. De Katow and Mr. Wehl.....7, 15
 Mr. Bateman's Troupe: Papea, Rosa, Dannreuther, &c., 118, 126, 159, 310, 318, 326, 335, 359
 Mr. B. J. Lang: Haydn's "Seasons".....206, 215
 Mr. Henry Carter.....255
 Mr. J. L. Hutton, Complimentary.....369
 Mr. Parker's Club of Amateurs.....7, 175, 239, 391, 399
 Mr. Peck's Annual Concert.....247
 Mr. Rudolphsen.....228
 Mrs. J. S. Cary.....391
 Orchestral Union.....7, 23, 175, 183, 191, 199, 207, 215;—407, 415
 Orpheus Musical Society.....63, 207, 247, 399
 Otto Dresel.....6, 14, 15, 23, 31, 39
 Public School Children.....78, 287
 Pupils of Institution for the Blind.....16, 319
 The Brothers Formes.....184
 William Schultze.....223, 231

Conservatoires, 233; at Paris, 132, 293; at Brussels, 177; at Providence, R.I., 352; at Naples, 361; two in Boston, 399; Royal Academy in London.....403

CORRESPONDENCE:

Baltimore.....398
 Bangor, Me.....32
 Berlin, Prussia.....5, 12, 52
 Bridgton, N. J.....181
 Carlsbad, Bohemia.....80
 Chicago.....61, 88, 96, 141, 158, 205, 349
 Cincinnati.....23, 35, 37, 75, 189, 397, 404, 412
 Concord, N. H.....384
 Dayton, O.....141
 Dresden.....140
 Farmington, Conn.....199
 Hartford, Conn.....112, 168, 253, 384
 Louisville, Ky.....295
 Montreux, Switzerland.....140
 New Haven.....13, 157, 357, 405
 New York, 14, 29, 111, 140, 148, 156, 168, 180, 207, 231, 246, 263, 349, 357
 Philadelphia.....5, 30, 157, 208, 253, 390
 Providence, R. I.....61
 Rochester, N. Y.....13, 112, 127, 157, 189, 398
 Springfield, Mass.....61
 Washington, D. C.....405
 Wheeling, West Va.....405
 Costa, M.; his "Naaman" at Cincinnati.....349
 Counterpoint, Simple. W. S. B. Mathews.....273

Dannreuther, Edward. (See Concerts):
 "Der Freyschütz," Anecdote of.....178
 Dresden; a musical season there; the "Tonkünstlerverein".....267
 Dresel, Otto; his Concerts in Philadelphia.....37
 Dutton, Alice, Miss.....127

Encores; their Abuse.....147, 191, 367, 374
 English Cathedral Music; Dr. Cutler's lecture in N. York.....246
 Ernst, Heinrich Wilhelm, the Violinist; Obituaries.....138, 147

FINE ARTS:

Academies, pro & con; Dr. Rimmer's lectures.....3
 Allston Club Exhibition.....231
 Ames's portrait of Lincoln.....23
 Philosophy of the Fine Arts. North Am. Review.....362, 370, 378, 387
 Senators in Council on the Arts; Speeches of Mr. Sumner, &c.....292, 299
 Flotow, von: Sketch by "Spiridon".....188
 Franz, Robert: 21 of his Songs, with English words, 303; his labors in Halle.....381
 French Theatre in Boston.....151
 Friend of German Music, A. N. Y. Weekly Review.....66
 Four-Hand Piano Readings.....345

Gade, Niels W. His "Comala," 175; his first Symphony, in C minor, 214, 398; Cantata, "The Crusaders".....261
 Gluck: his Iphigenia in London, 258, 309; his Alceste in Paris.....340
 Goethe as a Manager.....153
 Goldbeck, Robert.....352
 Good Music: Contribution to musical Aesthetics. W. S. B. M.....106, 130
 Gounod, Charles: his "Médecin malgré Lui," 22; his life and works.....203
 Grand Opera in Paris: Salaries of Artists.....272
 Grand Review, the: from a Sermon of Rev. W. H. Channing at Washington.....49
 Gunter, E. W. Death of, in Louisville.....264
 Halle, Germany, and its Music.....381

Handel & Haydn Society: Annual meetings, 56, 58, 251, 255

Handel: his "Israel in Egypt," J. S. D., 33, 41; 47, 73; Judas Maccabæus, "142; "Acis and Galatea," 316; "Alexander's Feast," 373; "Jephtha," 407; his Organ accompaniment, 210, 228; his statue in Halle.....381

Harvard Musical Association. (See CONCERTS).

Harvard University: "Commemoration Day" and its Music, 79; Memorial Building, plan of, 154; Mr. Paine's concerts, 255, 270; Commencement "parts" on music.....279

Haydn: his "Creation," 45; "Seasons," 204, 215; Characteristics of his Music.....294

Henselt: his Concerto in F minor, 255, 366; 'Trio in A minor.....367

Herold: his Zampa.....375

Herr Engel Abroad. Lond. Mus. World.....92

Hiller, Ferdinand, 57, 245; his Oratorio "Saul" 382

Hullah, John: his Lectures on Musical History.....401

Humboldt about Artists.....372

Hummel: his Piano Concerto in A minor.....406

Italian Language. F. D......195, 202

Joachim, Joseph: in Paris, 31; in London, 265, 411

Jingling Pianos.....364

Kahlenberg, The, and Mozart.....340

Katow, Mlle. Helene de.....8

Köhler's "Classical High School for Pianists".....94

Leipzig: the Music of a Season in, 53; Boston students there, 53, 221; musical life in, 121; a visit to, described by "Agindcs," 143; historical concerts there, 220; Gewandhaus concerts, 237; "L'Africaine" there.....238

Levy, J., the cornet player.....126

Lincoln, Abraham: after his assassination, 22; portrait of, by Ames.....23

Liszt, Franz: The last of him; becomes an Abbé, 44, 54; the Abbé in Hungary, 114; his Oratorio, "St. Elizabeth," 116, 235; his "Graner Mass" at Paris, 221; the Abbé L. and his "Legends" (Hanslick).....353

London: "Monday Popular Concerts," 265; Royal Academy of Music, 403; Opera Season summed up.....309

Lorini, Mme. Virginia Whiting: her death.....8

M. Bach's Dream. Nation.....274

Madrigal, Zellner's remarks on the.....20

Martezek, Max: his letters to the Herald.....88, 93

Marx, Adolph Bernhard, Prof.: Obituary.....278

Mehul's "Joseph".....317

Mendelssohn: Life of, by Lampadius, Gage's translation, 7, 56, 143; Reminiscences of, by J. Schun-bring, 259, 266; M. as a power (Orchestra), 306; his "Hymn of Praise," 39; his Greek music (Marx), 113, 395; Melusina Overture (Schumann) 171, 367; his Violin Concerto, 167, 390, 406; Rondo for Piano and Orchestra, op. 29, 414; his "St. Paul" (from Lampadius), 211; do. in Boston, 222, 359; do. (Schumann) 275; 42nd Psalm, 246; his children, 88; Unpublished Letters of, to F. Schneider.....385

Meyerbeer: his "L'Africaine," 25, 40, 108, 148, 179, (in Boston), 183; (Leipzig), 238; Punch's version of, 48; "M. and his times," by M. Blaze de Bury (Lond. Athenæum), 100; what Marx says of him, 105

Modern Church Music. Doesticks.....72

Modern Instrumentation. Marx.....114

Moscheles, I.: his "Melodie-Contrapuntal Studies" on Bach's Preludes reviewed, 249, 257; feted in Leipzig, 276; Concert by, in London, 310; his "Les Contrastes".....407

Mozart's Letters, (Lond. Athenæum), 161; (Eve. Post).....169; 176

Mozart's Last Days, Nohl, 185; Funeral.....196

Mozart: his "Seraglio" in London, 282, 289; his Letters about it, 283; M. and the Kahlenberg, 340; Overture to "Magic Flute" (Oudbirchhoff), 563, 374; E-flat Symphony, 374; "French" Symphony in D.....406

Munich: Court Opera at, 108; "Music of the Future" in, 235; Sacred Music there.....268

Musical Forms. W. S. B. Mathews.....81, 90

"Grammar," ".....177

Musical Histories, A German view of, 284; Hullah's Lectures.....401

Musical Education in Prussia, 148; in England, 285
Musical Festivals: Boston Handel & Haydn Society, 7, 23, 30, 38, 45, 54; in Cologne, 57; Handel, at Sydenham, 65, 73; German Sängerkunst in N.Y., 70, 76; at Dresden, 86; at Providence, R.I., 271; at Louisville, 283, 290, 295, 296; at Gloucester, Eng., 123; at Düsseldorf, 268; Hamburg, 275; Worcester, Eng., 324; Norwich, Eng., 341, 356
Musical Institutes: in Florence, 122; Milan, Naples, 123; Berlin, 148; Leipzig, 233; Mr. Tourjee's in Providence, R.I., 352; Royal Academy in London, 403

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE. See also Correspondence:
Baltimore, 216
Baugor, Me., 16
Brooklyn, N.Y., 291, 298, 350, 376
Buffalo, 120
Cambridge, Mass., 79, 256, 279
Chicago, 11, 16, 88, 143
Cincinnati, 32, 152, 192, 216, 248, 280
Cleveland, O., 284
Columbus, O., 103
Concord, N.H., 343, 390, 394
Farmington, Conn., 7, 199, 256, 400
Hartford, Conn., 120, 394
Keene, N.H., 312
Kingston, C., 128
Louisville, Ky., 294, 298, 299, 295, 296
Milwaukee, 119
New Haven, 152, 222, 283, 293, 308
New York, 64, 70, 76, 108, 104, 123, 130, 163, 224, 240, 256, 256, 290, 304, 310, 328, 356, 376, 383, 392, 400, 406
Northampton, Mass., 88, 216, 328
Oxford, O., 192
Philadelphia, 37, 72, 152, 176, 200, 208, 216, 232, 240, 248, 336, 344, 380, 388, 394, 391, 408, 416
Pittsburgh, Pa., 178
Pittsfield, Mass., 16
Portland, Me., 120
Poughkeepsie, N.Y., 8, 192
Providence, 216, 248, 271, 352
Rochester, N.Y., 184, 224, 240, 280, 368, 376, 392
San Francisco, 280
Saratoga, N.Y., 72
Springfield, Mass., 143, 408
St. Louis, 15, 32, 143, 152, 192, 216, 300, 384, 400
Washington, D.C., 218
Worcester, Mass., 64, 103, 110, 120, 143, 184, 224, 240, 336, 380, 408, 416

Musical Literature, recent, 102, 284

MUSIC ABROAD: (See also CORRESPONDENCE):

Basil, 109, 197, 389
Berlin, 148, 150, 179, 180, 192, 294, 326, 337, 352, 389, 413
Bern, 197
Bremen, 156, 165
Breslau, 366, 373
Brussels, 177, 296
Carlsruhe, 296
Coblentz, 197, 373, 389
Coburg, 180
Cologne, 57, 109, 156, 165, 172, 189, 197, 221, 367, 395, 373, 382, 404
Copenhagen, 261, 326, 389
Darmstadt, 172, 295
Dresden, 78, 88, 221, 237, 267, 294, 310, 373
Düsseldorf, 229, 268
Erlangen, 226
Florence, 122, 180, 206, 373
Frankfort, 295, 365, 373, 389
Gloucester, 116, 123
Halle, 276
Hamburg, 276
Hannover, 126, 229, 261, 296
Jena, 173
Königsberg, 78
Leipzig, 21, 63, 62, 121, 139, 143, 149, 156, 164, 180, 197, 220, 237, 247, 272, 276, 296, 340, 356, 357, 363, 381, 399, 404
London, 6, 22, 44, 61, 63, 65, 67, 78, 85, 91, 93, 109, 125, 136, 165, 173, 180, 188, 213, 219, 223, 236, 258, 260, 266, 288, 270, 282, 285, 298, 295, 301, 309, 312, 317, 338, 341, 355, 356, 371, 373, 380, 388, 408, 411, 413
Magdeburg, 326
Manchester, 404
Mayence, 78
Munich, 62, 84, 101, 165, 173, 180, 198, 221, 235, 268, 277, 295, 326, 340, 366, 389, 391
Naples, 220, 333, 361
Norwich, 356
Paris, 14, 81, 40, 108, 117, 124, 132, 136, 150, 173, 179, 189, 205, 221, 228, 239, 245, 269, 277, 293, 296, 310, 317, 325, 333, 340, 343, 354, 364, 373, 395, 396, 414, 417
Pesth, 114, 173
Stockholm, 295
Strasbourg, 366
Stuttgart, 276, 296, 333, 373
Trieste, 101
Venice, 410
Vienna, 101, 109, 149, 180, 197, 277, 294, 340, 345, 353, 358
Wiesbaden, 102, 126, 306, 389
Worcester, 817, 324
Zurich, 197, 365

Music after War; Vienna. G. Hanslick, 345, 353

Music among the Blind, 319

Music among the People. A. B. Marx, 129

Music: An Academy of. Ece. Post, 290

Music Hall: the new one of Steinway & Sons in N.Y., 224, 255, 355; in Cincinnati, 397, 404

Music in Bonn, under the last Electors, 409

Music in England; the year 1866, 380

MUSIC IN VOL. XXV.

No. 1-16. Haydn's "Creation," concluded, page 85-143.

"16. Song, "Mother, oh! sing me to rest," by R. Franz.

"17-26. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"....1-40

MUSIC IN VOL. XXVI.

No. 1-26. "St. Paul," continued, 41-144

Music in Germany; How will the war affect it? 320
Music in Italy: Naples, 333; Venice, 416
Music in its Larger Meanings (J. S. D.) 302
Music in Paris; the year 1866, 395
Music in the Open Air; need of a Civic Band, 279, 286
"Music of the Future," in Munich, 235
Music: Present State of (A. B. Marx), 89, 97, 105, 113, 129, 137, 145; among the Austrian nobility, 217; unparalleled diffusion of, 137; in the Public Schools of Boston, 174, 198, 287; of Worcester, 360; on the Common, 286, 303
Music Schools. Orchestra, 232
My Experiences of England and the English. Orchestra, 163

Naples, Low State of Music in, Le Menestrel, 333

Conservatory at, a Visit to, 361

New Instrument for the Drawing Room, 51

New York Academy of Music, burnt, 256; rebuilt, 408

Nicolai, Otto: from his Biography by Mendel, 298, 306, 314, 321, 329, 337, 346

Nilsson, Mlle. Christine, 325

Opera East and West (in America), 133; English (J. Eichberg) in New York, 263; Season in London, 309; Italian in Paris, 348, 354

OPERA IN BOSTON:

Grover's German Company, (Mmes. Johannsen, Dziuba, Rotter, Mlle. Naddi; Herren Habelmann, Himmer, Hermanns, Steinocke, Lehmann): La Dame Blanche, 175; Martha, 175; Robert le Diable, 183; Fidelio, 191
Maretzek's Italian Company (Miss Kellogg, Mme. Zucchi, Bosio, Sig. Mazzoleni, Irfre, Bellini, Antonucci, M. Dubreuil. — Miss Kellogg, Mme. Testa; Mlles. Poch, Hauck, Ronconi, Bonheur, MM. Mazzoleni, Baragli, Ronconi, Testa, Bellini, Antonucci): Lucrezia Borgia, 175, 350; I Puritani, 175; Ione, 175; L'Africaine, 183; Crispino e la Comare, 183, 350; Sonnambula, 350; Trovatore, 350; Ernani, 350; L'Elisir d'Amore, 350; Fra Diavolo, 351; Etoile du Nord, 351
Parlor Opera, (Miss Riddell, Dr. Guilmetto, Messrs. Farley, Rudolphsen, Whitney, &c.): Don Pasquale, 351, 359; Lucia di Lammermoor, 359

Opera House: new one in Chicago, 11; at Dayton, O., 141; New Academy of Music in N.Y., 408

Operas in Vogue in European Theatres, 294

Organs and Organists of Westminster Abbey, 331

Organs: at Church of the Advent, 128; at Church of the New Jerusalem, by the Messrs. Hook, 144;

Plymouth church, Brooklyn, N.Y., 227, 244, 291, 296; Trinity Church, New Haven, 323

Organ Music in Boston, 262

Organ, the, in Handel's Oratorios. Orchestra, 228

Ortigue, Joseph Louis D': Obituary, 349

Paine, J. K. His Concerts at Harvard University, 255, 270; his Mass in D, 303, 413

Parepa, Mme. Euphrosyne (See Concerts in Boston)

Paris: the Musical Year 1866, 395

POETRY:

On the Death of Abraham Lincoln:
In Memoriam. C. P. Cranch, 17
Sonnet. Edmund C. Steadman, 17
Good Friday Evening. Tribune, 17
Our President. Martha Perry Lowe, 17
The Lost Chief. C. G. Halpine, 17
The Star and the Rose. Frances M. Raymond, 20
Lost. Frances M. Raymond, 49
The Telegraph. C. P. Cranch, 73
Ode to Sons of Harvard who fell in the War of the Rebellion. ("Integer Vitæ" &c.) J. B. Dwight, 78
Paxton. Long Man. World, 97
Cleopatra. W. W. Story, 97
The Violin and Violoncello. Miss E. A. Starr, 113
Ad Utimum. A. A. C., 118
Christmas, 1864. (Longfellow to Agassiz), 121
A Farewell to Agassiz. O. W. Holmes, 129
The Minstrel. From the German of Geibel. Fanny Raymond Ritter, 145
Five Songs from Heine's "Buch der Lieder." Translated for Schumann's music by J. S. D., 158
Three Songs, from Heine. J. S. D., 161
Slumber Song, from Tieck. J. S. D., 161
Expectation, from W. Ostendahl. J. S. D., 161
Darling is here! From J. Schorer. J. S. D., 161
Hills Coming. From Rückert. J. S. D., 161
Song: "O maiden with the pale blue eyes." * * *, 169
Praise of Music. Fanny Raymond Ritter, 177
The Old Cathedral Organist, 185
The Song of Colin Muscat. Fanny R. Ritter, 201
Cavalry Song. From the German of Herwegh. J. S. D., 278
The Sword of Freedom. From the German. J. S. D., 275
Germania. G. C. Swayne, 281
The Singer's Greeting. From the German. J. S. D., 289
Song of Union. From the German. J. S. D., 289
The Bobolinks. C. P. Cranch, 297
Sonnet to C. F. D. A. A. C., 297
The Ballad of the Weaver. A. Abernethy Cowles, 329
Class Songs. (Class of 1832). C. T. Brooks, 337
The Old Street Singer. Fanny R. Ritter, 346
In a Gondola. Cornhill Magazine, 348
The King and the Singer. Fanny Raymond Ritter, 369
The Nightingale. Imitated from the Italian. Fanny Raymond Ritter, 383
What the Piano said to Perabo, 409

Pasta, Judith: Obituary of, 27; life of, 27, 28
Pastoral Symphony by Knecht, a prototype of Beethoven's, 365
Perabo, Ernst, 143, 184, 230, 231, 264, 414
Perelli, Natale; Obituary, 416
Petersiles, Carlyle, 165, 221, 232, 246, 247
Philosophy of the Fine Arts. N. A. Review, 362, 370, 378, 387

Piano-Fortes: Awards at Mechanics' Fair, 135, 139, 143; of Chickering & Sons, 135, 339, 367

Piano-forte Music: its present tendencies. Marx, 145

Pianos: H. W. Beecher's Discourse on, 155

"Causes of their jingling, 364

Provence, the Music of. Orchestra, 331

Punch and Polyphemus at the Crystal Palace, 316

Rachel and Ristori. (G. W. Curtis), 308

Rational Recreation; "Blind Tom." Pall Mall Gazette, 316

Reed Organs; Mason & Hamlin's. (Home Journal), 51

REVIEW:

Musical Publications, 31, 49, 94-5, 151, 303, 415

Books, 7, 102, 159, 176, 393, 401, 409

Rhythmic Symmetry of Melody, The. W. S. B. Mathews, 297

Ricci Brothers; their Crispino e la Comare, 124

Ristori, Adelaide, 295; compared with Rachel (G. W. Curtis), 308; 320; in New York (Nation), 332; in Boston, 335, 342

Rondo, The. By S. B. Mathews, 81

Rosa, Carl, 167, 406, 414. (See Concerts. Bateman)

Rossini; (from the Oneida Circular), 125; R. and his "Barber" and "Othello", 305

"Royalty" System, The, in England; Singing on Commission, 312, 388

Sale of a Comic Singer. London Era, 213

Santley, the English Baritone, 288

Saran, A. His Variations, (op. 1), 14, 18

Schubert, Franz; his Symphony in C (by Schumann), 34; do. 47, 230; his Overture to "Fierabras," 214;

Overtures in Italian style, 345, 374; his Sonatas, 247, 367, 375, 383, 398, 414, 415; his "Rosamund" music, 345, 355; Fantasia, op. 15, 382;

his Piano Trios, 414

Schumann, Clara, 411

Schumann, Robert: his "Paradise and Peri," 21, 213, 219; his four Symphonies, 193, 206, 366, 390;

Piano Concerto, 358; Overture to Genoveva, 207, 366; his Liederkreis and other Songs, 303; Toccat for Piano, 367, 369; his early Piano works (by Wassielewski), 369, 377; "Etudes Symphoniques," 375; S. in England, 371; his Fantasia, (op. 17), 382, 398; String Quartet (op. 41), 382

"Schwindel," 372

Servais, Adrien Francois; Obituary, 372

Seville, 148

Singing on Commission; "Royalties," 312

Sonata, The. W. S. B. Mathews, 90

Spohr, L. his Autobiography, 10; his account of Beethoven, 233; S. & Beethoven (Schindler), 234

Spontini; his Operas (Marx), 105

Sullivan, Arthur, his Crystal Palace Symphony, 219

Sunday Concerts, 286

Tausig, Karl, the pianist, 389

Thayer, A. W. His new Beethoven Catalogue, 49;

his Life of Beethoven, 288, 312, 359, 393, 407

Thayer Eugene; his organ performance in Berlin, 192

The famous Quire of Eardale. Cornhill Mag., 107

Thomas, Ambrose; his Opera "Mignon" &c., 364

Tocata; meaning of the term, 229

Tonic Sol-Fa System. London Athenæum, 308

Upham, Dr. J. B. His Address at the Inauguration of the Musical Festival of 1865, 42; Annual Reports to Handel & Haydn Society, 59, 251

Urso, Camilla; her playing of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, in Paris, 245; in Boston, 390, 406

Variations; the art of, by J. Schaffer, 14; Beethoven's 32 on a theme in C minor, 6; Saran's Var. (op. 1), 14, 18

Verdi; description of, 212

Very Shabby Worship. Presbyt. Standard, 76

Violin; a freak on the. All the Year Round, 242

Vogler, the Abbé, compared to the Abbé Liszt, 353

Wagner, Richard: Letter from; "Tristan & Isolde," 81, 83, 87; W. in Munich, 235; his "March of Homage," 346

Wallace, William Vincent; his career & death, 131

Weber, C. M. von; his relations to Beethoven, 20, 209, 210; his operas (Marx), 105; Euryanthe

Overture, 167, 391; how he composed Der Freyschütz, &c., 201, 209; extracts from his Biography by his son, 209, 225; W. as Dncal Secretary, 225

Wolff, Carl; his Beethoven Sonata Matinee in Philadelphia, 152

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 626.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 1.

Translated for this Journal.

A Letter from Hector Berlioz to Liszt. (1843)

(From "Musikalische Wanderung durch Deutschland.")

On my return from Hechingen, I remained several days in Stuttgart, exposed to new embarrassments. * * * I had written to Weimar, but received no reply, and this I was obliged to await before I made a decision.

You know not, dear Liszt, this trouble of uncertainty; it is all the same to you whether you can count upon a complete orchestra in any city, which you think of visiting, or not; whether the theatre is closed, if the intendant will place it at your disposal, and other like contingencies. Proudly you can exclaim, like Louis XIV.: "I am the orchestra! I am the chorus! At my grand piano I sing, dream, rejoice, and it excels in its rapidity the nimblest bows. Like the orchestra, it has its whispering flutes, and pealing horns, and without any preparation can, like that, breathe the evening breeze from its silvery clouds of magic chords and tender melodies. It requires no scenes, no decorations, no spacious stage; I need not weary myself with tedious rehearsals; I want neither a hundred, nor fifty, nor twenty assistants; I need not one, and can even do without music. A large hall, a grand piano, and I am master of a whole audience. Applause resounds through the room." When his memory awakens brilliant fantasies under his fingers, shouts of enthusiasm welcome them. Then he sings Schubert's Ave Maria, or Beethoven's Ade-laide, and every heart bounds to meet him, every breath is hushed in agitated silence, in suppressed amazement. Then, high in air, ascends the thundering strife and glittering finale of these mighty fireworks, and the acclamations of the admiring public. Now, amid a shower of wreaths and blossoms, the priest of harmony ascends his golden tripod; beautiful maidens approach, to kiss with tears the hem of his garment; to him belongs the sincere admiration of earnest minds, as well as the involuntary homage of the envious; to him bend noble forms, to him bow hearts, who do not comprehend their own emotions. And the next day, having poured forth the inexhaustible treasure of his inspiration, he hastens away, leaving behind him a glittering train of glory and enthusiasm. It is a dream! One of those golden dreams which one has when he is named Liszt or Paganini.

On the other hand, what trials, what unthankful labor, what recurring annoyances must the composer undergo, who travels to produce his own works. Does any one comprehend what torture the rehearsal is to him."

First, he has to bear the cold looks of the musicians, who hate to be troubled on his account, and to be obliged to practise more than usual. "What does the Frenchman want here." "Why doesn't he stay at home." So they show their ill-will. However, they take their places; but, at the first glance at the orchestra, the composer observes empty seats. He asks the reason of the leader. "The first clarinet is sick; the 'cello has the croup; the bassoons are on parade, and forgot to ask leave of absence; the drum has sprained his wrist; the harp does not come to rehearsal, because he must have time to study his part." &c. Then they begin; the notes are read, as well as they can, and in time twice as slow as that of the composer. Nothing is so horrible for him, as this dragging of the rhythm! At last his instinct gets the upper hand, his enthusiasm carries him away, he hastens the tempo and reaches unintentionally the right movement of the piece; now what disorder breaks loose! What frightful discords rend his ears and heart! He must stop and resume again the slow time, going through the long passages piecemeal, whose free and rapid course he had so often directed elsewhere. But even this is not enough. Notwithstanding the slow time, the wind instruments make the greatest discord; he tries to discover the reason.

"The trumpets alone! if you please. . . Well what is the matter? the third is written, and you play the chord of the second. The second trumpet (in C) has D. Sound the D.—Very well. The first has C, and then F. Your C, if you please! Horrible! You are playing B!" "No, I am playing as it is written." "Not at all; you are playing B." "I am playing C." "In what key is your trumpet?" "In E flat." "That's where it is, the F trumpet is directed." "So! It is clear enough, I beg your pardon."

"Now! what a devil of a noise are you making, Mr. Drummer?" "I have a fortissimo, sir!" "By no means! a mezzo forte. There are not two F's, only M and F. Besides you are using wooden drumsticks, and you must exchange them for covered ones. That is as different as day and night." "We don't know what you call covered drumsticks, said the leader, we have no other than the ordinary ones!" "So I thought, I brought some with me from Paris, you will find a pair on the table. Now are we in order? Heavens! that is twenty times too loud, you have no mutes on." "We have none. The leader forgot them; but we will have them to-morrow," etc.

After three or four hours of similar worrying, not a single comprehensible effect is brought out. Everything is ragged, stubborn, false, lifeless, flat, out of tune, horrible! And under this impression the eighty musicians are released, tired and dissatisfied, telling everywhere that they do not understand the meaning of such music; it is like a chaos, an infernal noise, such as they never heard before. The next day shows no appreciable progress; but, on the third, it begins to be more apparent, and then the poor composer begins to breathe more freely. The fundamental harmonies stand out in bold relief; the rhythms clear up; the melodies sound sportive or lamenting; the united mass gets more interested; after all the tottering and stammering, the orchestra is more self-reliant, grows bolder, firmer, gives the true expression, and goes on in steady ranks like an army of brave soldiers.

With comprehension, comes courage to the astonished musicians. The composer requests a fourth rehearsal. His assistants, the best men in the world, at heart, cheerfully assent. Now, fiat lux! "Take care of the signs!" "Have you no farther anxiety?" "No! only give us the right time." Via! and it is light! the idea shines out, the work is understood. The orchestra rise and loudly applaud the composer; the leader congratulates him; the inquisitive come out of their hiding places, and approach under cover of the confusion, to look at the foreign master, whom they at first took for a wild, or crazy man.

Now the poor man needs rest; but at this time care and attention are doubly necessary. Pencil in hand, he must journey from desk to desk, and, instead of the French marks of expression, substitute those written in German; in the wind parts, instead of, en r $\grave{e}$ , en r $\grave{e}$  bemol en fa di $\acute{e}$ ce, he must write, in C, in D, in Des, in Fis. A solo for the English horn must be transposed for the oboe, because they have not the former instrument in the orchestra, and the oboe player cannot trust himself to transpose. He must hear the choruses, and singers again separately, if they were not reliable. Then the audience assembles, and the hour arrives. Worn in soul and body, he ascends to the conductor's desk, hardly able to stand, until the applause of the public, the excitement of the playing, and his love for the work inspire him. Then success follows. In such a moment as this, I maintain, the composer lives a life in his musical creation, which is wholly unknown to the mere performer. With what passionate enthusiasm does he give himself up to play the orchestra! How he presses, hurries, subdues this huge, roaring instrument! His attentiveness is redoubled; he has his eye everywhere, his voice commands the entrance of voices, and instruments; up, down, left, right; his arm hurls out formidable harmonies, which, like glittering fire-balls, vanish in the distance, then suddenly, at the pause, he stills the excited waves. All eyes are fixed on him, arm and breath suspended, they await the signal. . . . he listens a moment to the silence. . . . then again lets loose the raging tempest, which he for a moment had controlled.

*Luctantes ventos tempestatesque sonora
Imperio premit, ac vinolis et carore frenat.*

And, in the great Adagios, with what delight does he rock on the waves of smooth harmonies! How he listens to the hundred united voices, singing the hymn of his love, his laments over the present or grief for the past, which he had confided only to night and solitude! At such moments, and only then, the composer entirely forgets the audience; he listens to the music, criticizes it carefully; and with him, his assistants about him, are affected by it; the public is too far removed to share his feelings. Does his heart beat under the poetical influence of the melody? does his eye moisten; and does he see near him sparkling teardrops of emotion? Then the goal is reached, the celestial region of art is opened: earth is now open to him!

And at the close of the concert, when the triumph is won, a hundred times greater is his happiness, which all share, who have stood and fought beside him.

But you great virtuosos, who are princes and kings, by the grace of God, are born to sit upon thrones; whereas the composer is obliged to obtain the mastery by earnest combat and conquest. But, indeed, the hardships and dangers of the struggle enhance the glory and splendor of the victory; and perhaps he would be happier than you, but that the forces are not always at his command.

This was a long digression, dear Liszt, and I almost forgot the continuation of my travels in thus chatting. Here it is. During the two days that I remained in Stuttgart, waiting for letters from Weimar, there was a brilliant concert given in the dancing hall, under Lindpaintner's direction, in which I had an opportunity of remarking the coldness with which, in general, the German public regard the greatest compositions of Beethoven. The Overture to Leonora, a truly colossal work, was performed with wonderful precision and effect, and hardly applauded at all; and in the evening at the hotel table, I heard a gentleman complain that they did not give a symphony of Haydn, instead of such frightful music, without any melody!!! Truly we have no such "old fogies" (Philistines) any longer in Paris!

When, at last, I received a favorable answer from Weimar, I set out for Carlsruhe. I would have given a concert there, but the conductor, Strauss, told me, I should have to wait eight or ten days, on account of an engagement which the direction had made with a Piedmontese flutist. So I hastened to reach Mannheim, out of respect to the great flute.

Mannheim is a quiet city, very level and regularly built; but I do not believe that a passion for music disturbs the slumbers of the inhabitants. There is a large singing academy, a good theatre, and a small, but efficient orchestra. The direction of the singing academy, and of the orchestra, is confided to the younger Lachner, brother of the composer, a quiet, timid man, and a modest and talented artist. He soon arranged a concert for me, but I have forgotten the programme. I only recollect that I wished to perform my second symphony, "Harold," and that in the first rehearsal, the finale "L'Orgie" had to be omitted, because the trombones were not able to execute their part in this movement. Lachner was greatly disappointed, as he said he wished to hear the entire representation; but I assured him that it would be idle to persist in it, on account of the incapacity of the trombones, and with such weak violins the finale would have no effect. The first three movements of the symphony went well and made a lively impression on the public. The Grand-duchess Stephanie, who honored the concert with her presence, was delighted with the characteristic points of the "Pilgrim March," and especially with the "Serenade in the Abruzzi," in which she thought she could recognize the quiet repose of the beautiful Italian nights. The viola solo was skilfully performed by the orchestra viola player, whose modesty will not permit him to make any pretensions to virtuosity. I found in Mannheim a very good harpist, an excellent oboist, who played the English horn pretty well, and an expert violoncellist named Heinefetter, a relation of the well known singer, and also good trumpet players. There was no ophicleide. To supply this instrument, so necessary for all new great compositions, Lachner had substituted a tenor valve-bassoon, which reached down to the low C and B. In my opinion, it would have been more simple to have procured an ophicleide, and it certainly would have been more appropriate, since these two instruments so little resemble each other. I was able to attend the rehearsals at the singing academy but once; the members generally had very good voices, but they are not particularly musical, and do not read well.

During my stay in Mannheim, Mlle. Sabine Heinefetter appeared in Norma. I had not heard her since she left the Italian Opera in Paris. She still possessed a powerful voice, and a certain facility in singing; but she sometimes forced her voice, until the tones were unpleasant to the ear. But even with these faults, she met with few rivals among the Germans, for she was an accomplished singer.

The time passed very heavily at Mannheim, notwithstanding the kind attention of a Frenchman, Mons. Desiré Lemire, whom I had met eight or ten years before in Paris. It strikes one, how foreign to an artistic life are the manners of the people, and the looks of the place. And music is regarded only as a pleasant pastime, in which to dispose of idle hours. Besides, it rained steadily; in the neighborhood of my dwelling, the tower clock sounded in minor, and from the tower a shrill sparrow-hawk pierced my ears early and late. Then I longed for that poet-city whither I was called by letters from my honored countryman Chêlard, and Lobe. (Lobe, that type of a true German artist, whose worth and sincerity you, as I know, have had opportunities of proving.)

And now I am on the Rhine again—I met Guhr.—He swore.—I took leave.—In Frankfurt, a moment with Hiller. The performance of his "Destruction of Jerusalem" is about to take place.—Away I went with a bad sore throat.—I fell asleep on the road.—A horrible dream . . . which you shall not hear.—Weimar! I arrived, quite ill.—In vain Lobe and Chêlard tried to set me right. Preparations for a concert.—Arrangements for the first rehearsal.—Ill humor vanishes and I am well again.

Here it is quite different. Here I am delighted. I find in the air something of literary feeling, of artistic life. The look of the city equals all my expectations; repose, light, air, and dreamy contentment, enchanting neighborhood, beautiful streams, shady hills, and smiling valleys. How my heart beat at every step! Here is Goethe's dwelling; here the summer-house where the Grand-duke shared in the learned conversation of Schiller, Herder and Wieland. This Latin inscription, graven on the rock, is by the hand which wrote "Faust!" Can it be possible! Through those two little windows the light came into the garret room, where Schiller dwelt! In this miserable place the one who sang of all noble human emotions, wrote his "Don Carlos," "Maria Stuart," "Robbers," "Wallenstein." There he died, like an ordinary student! How it grieves me to think that Goethe could have permitted it. He, the wealthy minister of state, should have prepared a happier fate for the poet and friend.

Or was there nothing in this vaunted friendship! I fear it only lived in Schiller's breast. Goethe loved himself and his infernal Mephisto too much; he was cruel to Gretchen; he had lived too long and was too much afraid to die.

Schiller! Schiller! Thou wert worthy of a less selfish friend! I cannot turn my eyes from those small windows, this dark house, this miserable, black roof. It is one o'clock in the morning, the moon shines brightly, the cold is piercing. All is still, all are passed away. My heart swells, a shudder thrills through me, oppressed by that mournful admiration and undying love with which the spirits of immortal men fill us inglorious ones, this side the grave. I fall on my knees with reverence and sorrow, on that sacred threshold, and cry involuntarily, Schiller! Schiller! Schiller!

. . . Chêlard helped me in obtaining my object. The intendant, Baron von Spiegel, entered very cheerfully into my views, and placed theatre and orchestra at my disposal. Nothing was said of chorus, and his courage might well fail him at mentioning it. I had had an opportunity of judging in Marschner's "Vampyr." Of such squalling nobody can have any conception. Out of politeness, I will say nothing of the women singers. A bass, named Genast, sang the Vampyr; he is an artist, in the fullest sense of the word. Besides, an excellent tragedian. I regretted extremely not being able to remain longer in Weimar, to see him in a Shakespearian tragedy; as King Lear, which was to be performed at the time of my departure. The orchestra is very well arranged, and out of regard for me, Chêlard and Lobe collected all the stringed instruments they could find, and there was a body of twenty-two violins, seven violas, seven violoncellos, and seven contrabasses brought together. The wind instruments were complete, and I observed among them an excellent first clarinet, and Sax-trumpet. The English horn was wanting, and a clarinet substituted. A worthy young man, Herr Montag, a pianist and skilful musician, had the kindness to arrange both the harp-parts for piano, and to undertake playing them himself. A bombardon took the place of the ophicleide, and was in good hands. Now that the vacancies were all filled, we continued the rehearsals. The musicians of Weimar expressed a decided predilection for the Francis Juges Overture, which they had so often played, and left me nothing to desire in regard to its performance. So it was also with the "Sinfonie fantastique," which was successful in every way. I still remember the impression made upon the leader and some amateurs, at the rehearsal, by the first movement, "Reveries-passion," and the third, "Scène aux champs." After the latter they were much affected; and when at the concluding solo of the forsaken shepherd, after the last peal of thunder, the orchestra again commences and then ceases, as with a deep sigh, I heard around me real sighs, as from oppressed hearts, and an outburst of deep feeling and sympathy. Chêlard expressed himself mostly in favor of the "March to the place of execution"—but the public preferred the "Ball" and the "Scène aux champs." The Francis Juges Overture was hailed as an old acquaintance.

Ah! here I am on the point of saying farewell again. I say nothing of the full house, the applause, and callings out to receive congratulations in the name of his highness; of new friends embracing me at the door, and, nolens volens, staying with me until three or four o'clock in the morning: if I should write all these fine things, you would take me for a vain, puffed up — Truly, this upsets all my philosophy, and frightens me, so I will be silent, and say farewell!

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

BY OTTO JAHN.

(Continued from Vol. XXIV., page 411.)

In connection with the collective edition, Beethoven cherished another project, the non-fulfilment of which we might, at first, feel rather inclined to regret. It was his intention, as Schindler again informs us, to determine, by headings and short hints, the "poetical idea" of various compositions, in order to facilitate the correct comprehension and execution of them. He used to say complainingly, when questioned as to the sense and significance of expressive compositions, the time in which he wrote most of the Sonatas was more poetical than the times which came after it, probably because people then gave themselves up simply to the music; being satisfied with the impression produced by it, and, allowing the sentiments excited by it to die away on their minds, they did not experience the necessity of enquiring after thoughts and ideas for the purpose of fixing with precision the object which interested them by facts having nothing to do with music. "Every one," he complained, "felt in the Largo of the Sonata in D major [Op. 10], the state of mind of a melancholy man therein depicted, with all the various gradations of light and shade in the picture of melancholy." This is what every one endowed with musical taste most certainly feels at present and always will feel on hearing the Sonata; but with this the questioners were not contented; their prying souls desired to learn further what had been the individual and personal occasion for such a frame of mind, and that, too, if possible, in the composer himself, whom people are only too fond of identifying with the work of art. But supposing the composer to answer such questions, would his doing so really be of any advantage to us? One day, when Beethoven was in good humor, Schindler asked him for the key of the Sonatas, in D minor [Op. 31, 2], and F minor [Op. 57]. Beethoven replied: "Just read Shakespeare's Tempest." Schindler was evidently somewhat disappointed, for he continues: "There then it is to be found; but in what place? Enquirer, read, reflect, and guess!" It is probable that the Enquirer will gather from his perusal the firm conviction that Shakespeare's Tempest affects him differently from the manner in which it affected Beethoven, and does not, in his instance, produce D minor and F minor Sonatas. That it was precisely this drama which could excite Beethoven to produce such works is a fact which we certainly do not learn without interest, but any attempt to gain a comprehension of them from Shakespeare would only be to prove the incompetency of our musical conception. Even when Beethoven, on a particular occasion, cites more definitely, we are not assisted in our comprehension of his productions. His intimate friend, Amerda, has informed us that Beethoven said the Grave Scene from Romeo and Juliet was floating before his mind when he was composing the Adagio in the F major Quartet; yet if any one turns to his Shakespeare, and after a careful perusal, endeavors to realize this scene to himself when he listens to the Adagio, will he increase or spoil the true enjoyment of the latter? According to Czerny's statement, corroborated by others, Beethoven said the idea of the Adagio in the the E minor Quartet [Op. 59, 2] struck him at the spectacle of the starry heavens; it is asserted that, after he had been sitting out of doors in the dark for a long time, the sight of lights glistening on all sides inspired him with the motive of the Scherzo in the D minor Symphony; a rider galloping past, with the theme for the last movement in the Sonata in D minor [Op. 31, 2]; and the impatient knocking of some one in vain seeking to be let into his house late at night, the motive in the first movement of the Violin Concerto. It is possible that a pregnant impression at a favorable moment may have called forth, with the rapidity of lightning, a characteristic motive; it is possible, also, that the impression remained fixed in the composer's mind; but with the artistic development, with the creative organization of the work of art, this material incentive had nothing further to do; the artist's action is exercised in quite a different sphere, and whoever believes a work of art can be constructed out of an accidental material motive, has no idea of the process of artistic creation. Were any one, for instance, to take it into his head to deduce and explain the first movement of the Violin Concerto, in conformity with its psychological development and external structure, from the above situation of the man knocking in the night at his door, in heaven's name let such a person knock away in his turn; the door leading to a right comprehension of the subject will not be opened to him.

Headings and notices, though authentic and emanating from Beethoven himself, would not have greatly assisted us in penetrating the sense and significance of his works—so much we may say without detracting too greatly from the interest they would have derived from many explanations of a personal nature; there is rather cause for apprehending they would have occasioned mistakes and blunders, just as those did which Beethoven really published. The beautiful Sonata in E flat major [Op. 81] is headed, as we are all aware, "Les adieux, l'absence, et le retour," and is, therefore, confidently interpreted as an undoubted specimen of programme-music. "That it portrays passages from the life of a couple of lovers, is a fact we pre-suppose," says Marx, who does not take upon himself to decide whether the lovers are married or not—"but the composition furnishes the proof."—"The lovers open their arms as birds of passage their wings," says Lenz at the conclusion of the Sonata. Now, upon the original of the first part, Beethoven wrote:—

"Farewell on the Departure of his Imperial Highness, the Arch-Duke Rudolph, the 4th May, 1809."

And upon the title of the second:

"Arrival of his Imperial Highness, the Arch-Duke Rudolph, the 30th January, 1810."

We can easily understand that, when he published these outpourings of sentiments which were altogether of a personal nature, he desired to preserve the reminiscence of the cause that gave rise to them, and yet not name his Imperial friend. But how would he have protested at being made, when writing of the Arch-Duke, to depict this wing-flapping She "in the flattering caresses of heavenly delight." Here, we see, the motive and situation are given by Beethoven himself, but he must have made a mistake in the tone he adopted—unless, indeed, his interpreters have done so.

As we know, Beethoven complained, often and bitterly, of those who expounded him, and he had good cause for doing so. There is no doubt he would perfectly agree with Mendelssohn when the latter wrote to Souhay: "What any music I like expresses for me is not thoughts too indefinite to clothe in words, but too definite—If you ask me what I thought on the occasion in question, I say: the song itself precisely as it stands. And if, in this or that instance, I had in my mind a definite word or words, I would not utter them to a soul, because words do not mean for one person what they mean for another; because the song alone can say to one, can awake in him, the same feelings it can in another—feelings, however, not to be expressed by the same words." For this reason we may be contented that Beethoven, too, has not uttered words, for they would have seduced too many into the error of believing that he who understood the heading would understand the work of art as well. Beethoven's music says all he desired to say; it is and ever will be the clear spring from which every one who possesses susceptibility may draw.

The negotiations for a collective edition were, probably, the reason of Haslinger's having a copy made of all Beethoven's compositions. This copy might have served as the basis of a printed edition. At a subsequent epoch, uniformly and beautifully executed by a professor of writing, and containing every work by Beethoven, it was purchased by the Arch-Duke Rudolph, and, in a long series of stately folios, constitutes one of the principal attractions of his library, which he bequeathed to the Society of the Friends of Music at Vienna. Unfortunately, however, when the works were copied out, caligraphy was the sole end kept in view, and no care was taken to insure correctness, so that, as far as affording critical assistance, this copy has proved of no use.

As no collective edition was brought out by Beethoven himself, K. Ph. Dunst, of Frankfort, made an attempt to bring out one. But being undertaken without an appreciation of its importance, as well as without the necessary preparations and means, this edition,—which certainly brought to light some few things that were unknown or had been forgotten, but was recommended neither by careful editing nor by the way it was got up—soon stopped.

(To be Continued.)

Fine Arts.

The Pro and Con of Academies.—Dr. Rimmer's Lectures.

It has often been debated in the critical world whether academies can assist genius; whether that heaven-illuminated faculty depends upon instruction for its perfection, or is purely intuitive. We think the question is decided if we reflect upon the painful striving all early periods exhibit to express the idea which haunts the sensitive gifted man, and possesses him like his shadow, which yet the imperfect knowledge of his age prevents him from completely embodying. The earnestness of feeling is there, the training is wanting. Nothing is finer than the dramatic, Dante-like conceptions of Giotto, or the terrible imaginations of Orcagna, the fair spiritualities of Angelico, which are purity and aspiration itself. But the uncultivated beholder is repelled so strongly by the technical imperfection of the work, the vacant atmosphere, the flat area, the pitiable perspective, the rude symbolisms that do duty for nature, that the effect upon him is one more of pain than of pleasure. There is undeniable genius in early art, as in old books, but it is quaint and archaic, to rudeness and repulsion. In our own country the art instinct or idea seems native and strong, as is proved by the numbers who have sprung up so unexpectedly (many in mature years) in obscure places and Western States, where one would least expect it, as sculptors and painters. Yet the simply passionate interest and love, which rises to a certain level of prettiness and mediocrity, (as in poetry), is not to be mistaken, as it commonly is, for genius, and all the newspapers set wild in fulsome puffs to hail a new wonder, a rising star, a perfect paragon.

We know of nothing better adapted to correct this crudity and conceit, to give a tone to taste, a foundation to knowledge, a modesty to genius, than such solid and thorough instruction as is to be met with in this city. Men of genius are here, gathered by the opportunity—a golden one—of these lectures. Men upon whom the future of American art rests; upon whom the mantle of Allston, Leslie, Newton, Stuart and Cole has fallen, if upon any.

If the petty towns of Germany can lead the world in the paths of theology and criticism, shall not Boston become the centre of an academy which shall raise the standard and elevate the purpose of American art, and better its instruction?

Since the days of the old Italians, those great schools, the envy and despair of succeeding times, and the great teaching of Rubens and Rembrandt, perhaps there has been nothing better calculated to stimulate genius than the fugitive drawings, happy accidents of moods and times, fragments as they are, of an undeniable genius which here vanish with the lesson. It is a rare art to teach. Some possess this genius. In others their own faculty is frozen in, and cannot impart itself.

In Dr. Rimmer's classes, we but give voice to the judgment of his best scholars, -men of European education and acknowledged genius, when we say, that his manner of teaching is not excelled in our day, for thoroughness, for science, for its ease of comprehension, exhaustive method and suggestive inspiration.—It may be doubted whether so much anatomical knowledge, such complete and perfect mastery of drawing in its most difficult departments, and so much art-feeling, fertility of conception and fancy, have ever been surpassed in the palmiest days of academies, if equalled; in those days which turned out the hosts of men of genius in the great periods of Italian art, and later, the wonderful Flemish school, to which Rubens imparted his freedom and exuberance of style and Rembrandt his concentration and power, the schools of mighty painters which produced such men as the Carracci, Guercino, Spagnoletto, Luca Giordano, in Italy; Jordaens, Both, Ferdinand Bol, and scores of others in Europe, who seem as giants to the dwarfed, feeble, uncertain genius of a later day.

That academies will not create genius, may be allowed; but that they will educate it, that they may foster it, and bring it out, will be conceded.

In our own days are seen two schools of opposite tendencies, which illustrate the excellence and defect of academic methods. While in France art has returned to nature, as, in England, Wordsworth led back her sister muse, poetry, to the wells undefiled; while the genius of that sensitive people is smitten with nature's love, and follows her, docile and adoring as a child, selecting all her wayside beauty, casual grace, unexpected felicity with unerring taste, unstudied feeling, and a method which is simplicity itself, full of purity of love as it is profound with depth of apprehension: in Germany is a school vitiated with academies, oppressed with learning, stilted in composition, false and forced in style, meretricious in color; displaying no deep sympathy with nature, no subtle perception, no simple love, though pleasing in subject and romantic in aim—having in this the German genius, which can still write ballads in an age of stocks and railroads—ballads which have gone out ages ago in England and France, snuffed out in an atmosphere of prose, politics, and commercial development. The modern world may well ask itself what will bring back the poetry of the past.

The French mind, so clear, clever, brilliant, compact; master of all its faculties, and little led astray by the temptations and discursiveness of genius, the hauntings of solitary feeling—the idiosyncrasy and isolation—would not have achieved a result so splendid as we see accomplished in our day, were it not for a resolute and thorough course of instruction continued through many schools and phases of development.

The emancipation from frigid classicism, stilted and insipid in its achievement, as it ever must be where it is slavishly imitative—academy-taught and not nature-inspired—which took place under the reforming, inspiring influences of Decamps, de la Croix, de la Roche, Bonington and the English Constable, has, under the guidance of a sure knowledge, and with the aid of a patient, perfect training and practice, resulted in putting France on a pinnacle;—in producing a nation of artists surpassing all that has preceded it in many essential respects; artists never before equalled for their simplicity and depth of feeling, their tender and true sympathy with nature and their nearness to the spirit of her forms; a nation as far before our own in this respect, with all its vain conceit of its own performances, its boasted achievements and over-ambitious and inflated designs—works which are never criticised and always puffed—as the poetry of Wordsworth, and Keats, Shelley and Tennyson is superior to the stilted diction and artificial heroics of the last century—to which it bears a similar and corresponding relation.

It would appear to be the destiny of this country to have many centres and no overgrown capital. If so, Boston, as she has had a distinguished history in the past, may look forward to a future of no less fame and honor. In literature and intellectual culture she holds the first place. Without any provincial conceit, we may say the palm will be easily allowed her; nor is it needful to enumerate her great names; men who, from her own centre or neighboring towns, have risen to widespread or universal fame. The intellectual life of New England and the North finds its home here, and the best intellects and most cultivated travellers are best pleased here to linger and reside.—If we exert any intellectual reaction on Europe, it is from New England it is to be traced.

Republics have favored Art. The Greeks will never be excelled. The Italian States sent forth the greatest school of painters the world ever saw. Our people possess arays for proportion, which nature has gifted and trained. Their manufactures are the neatest, compactest in form and material of any in the world. The carpentry nowhere equalled; the ships unsurpassed. Tools, utensils, under our mechanics' hands, assume a fineness not before known. Let the clumsy houses in the Provinces be compared with the trim proportions of our villages, to show the innate fineness of the American workman's hand. But we lack taste, and our exuberant fancy everywhere displays itself in fulsome and tawdry decoration—in furniture, in houses, hotels, steamers, railway-carriages. Yet the love of ornamentation, the willingness to expend for it, is much. There is a great fondness for richness and beauty, but it wants education, wants fineness, direction and taste. Instruction will furnish this natural eye with some true models and certain principles. No one can draw much from the human figure, which is the prime of nature's works, or from the world of landscape about us, and not unconsciously imbibe the principles of true taste and knowledge, founded on nature herself,—gained from her ministrations and caught from her forms,—as the northern forests gave birth to Gothic architecture, not through palpable or direct imitation, or vain attempts at reproduction, but through the rare atmosphere breathed in her presence and inspired by her love.

Thus may this instruction flowing from the fountain head be let down, applied to domestic uses, and availed of for common purposes, that so we may be surrounded with objects of beauty to dwell upon and admire:—be made of use to enrich staples, give taste to designs, improve chintz patterns or improvise carpets. The Technological Institute, if it is true to its purpose, may accomplish this. The effort making in England, to equal English taste to French elegance, well assisted by such men as Ruskin, Layard and others, and the daily growing collections at Kensington, with its lectures to working men, has resulted in making one manufacture in England quite surpass the world. The British glass, for style and quality, a remarkable, delicate and exquisite beauty, and purity, fairly eclipsed all others in the great exhibition in London in 1862. As to music, which is the glory of Germany, our city is second to no other in America in knowledge and appreciation.

It now remains to be seen, if, with such a rare opportunity afforded in the extraordinary talents of one of her own children, she will allow herself to drop behind her sister cities in the cultivation of art, one of the truest adornments of civilized life; one of the sources of Grecian perfection, Italian greatness and French eminence; a subtle accomplishment and beauty which is scarcely second to literature in elevating the taste and habits of a whole people, too much given to the practical, the political, the prosaic—the poetic seeming sometimes to be left out of their composition—a people intellectual, eager, earnest; introverted at the expense of the æsthetic; impassible; deficient in sentiment;—a people deep in its conscience, and intense in its pursuits, to whom the fair dalliance with the beautiful would happily unite with its stern pursuit of the good and uncompromising love of the true.

We have now among us, by as rare and happy an opportunity as not often occurs, a teacher who in his capacity, and felicitous method of instruction, his extraordinary knowledge, seems indeed to revive the glorious days of Italy, and the incomparable mastery of the old Italians. Such an opportunity to found an Academy, if not availed of here, will surely be secured to New York, to whom indeed it would do infinite good. Academic instruction, mastery of drawing in its most difficult field, is to art and arts of design what discipline is to the soldier, experience and training to the sailor, gymnastics to the athlete, without which, natural aptitudes are often worse than vain, giving birth to monstrous, or perverted performances, to which in our time the whole country so readily and eagerly runs. Self-made men are sometimes transcendent, and often great, seemingly able to dispense with all instruction—Heaven-taught:—but it would be hard to prove, that superior opportunities do not commonly give a vantage ground from which to start; that universities are not better for knowledge than lonely students, self-relying and self-centred; that genius may not be thus assisted in its difficult career, and many an obscure virtue and latent talent dragged to light and made to shine and give forth its beams to benefit and delight the world.

It is current conceit, that we should be independent of the past, and other countries, that so we may preserve our originality undimmed, and, the uncorrupted genius of the land—indigenous, unalloyed—may tread forth into realms yet unconquered and unexplored, enslaved to no foreign modes and bound by no foreign models. A worthy ambition, but concealing a subtle fallacy, and originating in a state of mind crude as vain. We cannot strip ourselves of the past, any more than we can fly from our own skin, creep out of our own constitution. It is our inheritance, and a part and parcel of ourselves, and all we have of literature, art or knowledge is built on its foundation—derived—the result of slow accumulation, gradual processes, the trained and practised faculties of ages. It is, as if one determining to pursue literature, should refuse to study the classics, Shakespeare or Milton, Chaucer or Gray, for fear of having his originality compromised, his genius repressed. True genius assimilates all instruction, benefits by all opportunity, knits up into its life and takes on all results. Further progress and new combinations are its very soul. It subordinates knowledge, gained in the schools, or the great training ground of galleries and academies—the university of the world—foreign countries and past ages, and infuses it with the instinct and impulse of to-day, the life of the hour, the demand, the quick sympathy of the people and the land.

If men of genius and highest promise can be drawn here to attend these lectures, Boston will soon cease to be provincial in art, but be what she is in science and literature; assume the rank which belongs to her intellectually; live over again in idea, and regain the great days of Allston and her happier auspices and with a more solid result. That great painter himself, full of imagination and refinement and ideal feeling, as he was, would probably have been benefited by such a course as is now afforded to the present generation. He would not have left us works, which, with all their genius, show an imperfect training, trying to secure the largest and most generous results—as conspicuous, sometimes, in this, as in their beauties and elevation, and hence repelling the uneducated, who cannot detect genius under the mask of incompleteness, faulty methods and parts neglected or ill drawn.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 19.—Messrs. Cross and Jarvis gave their third soirée last evening. Those visiting the Foyer on their nights, would almost feel warranted in concluding that classical music had, at last, become popularized in Philadelphia. The ardent lover of the divine art might hail the large audience as an evidence of numerous conversions to his creed, and would fain flatter himself with the solacing conviction that one of his fondest hopes had been realized.

May we be forgiven if we express a doubt in this regard. The large audience is a fact, and, as such, must be accounted for. Well then, could there be a better reason for its existence than the personal and professional popularity of Messrs. Cross and Jarvis? We are forced to assume that there is no other, since the efforts of other artists, equally as earnest, meet with no such success as theirs.

It has already been remarked that the programmes of these soirées are uniformly excellent. We must congratulate Messrs. C. & J. on this since they are thus enabled to address a larger public, which cannot but be improved by their well-directed efforts.

On this occasion, Beethoven's "Gister" Trio began the programme. It is so well-known, that nothing need be said of the composition. Mr. Gaertner always plays with feeling; generally, with truthful conception; frequently, with correct intonation. In the forte passages of the Adagio, we noted a slight tendency to exaggeration on his part. Mr. Charles Schmitz surprised us by his unwonted warmth. Mr. Jarvis's piano playing was, as usual, excellent. There is no longer a doubt regarding the artistic position of this gentleman. He is a conscientious artist and, of course, always improves. With such a man, to be idle is to be retrogressive. We almost fear, however, that his lessons demand too much of his time; for there is no one of our teachers more en vogue than he. He undoubtedly owes it to himself and the public to winnow his class, that he may devote greater attention to his own studies.

The Concert-Stück, by Weber, formed the middle portion of the programme; and an Otello, by Spohr, concluded the performance. On first hearing, I find this last-named work the least interesting of Spohr's chamber compositions. There is correctness, grace, prettiness and proportion, almost provoking a smile between it and some of the cold, finished productions of the classic Everett. Of passion there is not a trace. The third movement, (an air, by Handel, with variations) received an encore.

We have had another WHEEL concert lately. Mr. W. is a pianist of wondrous digital dexterity. His compositions, which, in the main, consist of popular operatic, or of national airs, interwoven with a flimsy tissue of old-fashioned Prudent and Thalberg difficulties, are uninteresting. They require fine playing, however, and receive it at his hands. His manner is characterized by perfect self-possession, and is void of aught that might savor of affection.

A Mlle. DE KAROW is a member of the same troupe. She is announced as the great violincelliste, and, as such, is presumed to be the great card of Manager Strakosch's enterprise. It were ungallant to say that she plays "very well for a woman;" so we shall content ourselves by remarking that we should require better playing than hers from any man who claimed even moderate acquaintance with the difficulties of that instrument. She has but little execution, but gives the cantabile passages with much sentiment and delicacy.

We have the promise of Verdi's Forza del Destino, and of Auber's Fra Diavolo, to be given by the Italians from New York. We trust that the two nights of opera may be so successful as to induce a second visit of the Maretzek troupe.

The Grover troupe presented us with an apology for an operatic season, at the end of which it was agreed, by all who were well-informed, that we had been dreadfully taken in. The only question in doubt was whether Mr. Grover had done the victimizing or had been a fellow-sufferer.

We confess to great interest in the playing of Mr. CHARLES KUNKEL, of Cincinnati, whom we had the pleasure of meeting, in company, with some of our leading pianists.

BERLIN, FEB., 1865.—An unexpected pleasure to me was the announcement of a concert by CLARA SCHUMANN and JULIUS STOCKHAUSEN. Clara Schumann, whom for years it had been my great wish to hear, and Stockhausen, of whose singing a friend had given me a most glowing account just before I left America, advising me by no means to miss any opportunity of hearing him. With expectant delight I took my seat in the hall of the Sing-Akademie, and can assure you that all my anticipations were fully realized. The concert was opened by Mme. Schumann with her husband's D-minor Trio,—familiar and dear to me through repeated hearings in America. But I had never heard it so played before!

Here was one twin soul interpreting the language of another, from which it was severed; and the tones told the story both of blissful communion in days gone by, and of lonely longing and yearning for reunion. As I looked upon the sweet, mild, patient face, how the whole life of the woman rose up before me! Her artist childhood and youth, under the guidance of a capricious parent—to use the mildest term—her artist love, betrothal and marriage—that marriage so true and perfect in every way! And then that fearful trial—tenfold heavy because of the pure happiness it broke in upon,—that most terrible of sorrows, the darkening of the light of reason in the heart's idol, in comparison to which death is a blessing! Since then, too, the care and the training of her many children, with means so limited as to make a constant effort on her part necessary!

And not even yet does fate spare her, for her hearing is said to be gradually failing, and an accident like that I mentioned in my last, was a most cruel one for her. I will say here, however, that she appears to have recovered from the effects of her fall, for she has commenced playing in public again.

But not only through all these associations, and my warm interest in the artist, did I enjoy her playing, but also for its intrinsic merit. If I had known nothing whatever about her, her rendering of the Trio, as well as of the "32 Variations on a Theme in C minor" of Beethoven, one of the "Momens Musicaux" of Schubert, Chopin's lovely G-minor Nocturne, and Mendelssohn's Scherzo and Capriccio, would have delighted me beyond measure, both for its technical perfection and its artistic truth and fire. In addition, she manifested equal excellence as an accompanist to Stockhausen's singing of her husband's "Liederkreis von Eichendorff." This was two-fold perfection: Stockhausen, with his beautiful, rich, velvety, unwavering barytone, his wonderful ease and clearness of intonation and enunciation, his soulful rendering of the lovely music, and Clara Schumann's playing, which she made so entirely subordinate to the voice, and which yet was so characteristic of her. The "Liederkreis" consists of twelve short songs, quite independent of each other, but yet forming an exquisite whole, like lovely flowers enhanced in beauty by being bound in a wreath. Besides these (sung in two divisions), Stockhausen gave us a couple of the less known songs of Schubert: "An die Leyer," and "Waldesnacht," less effective than many of the more familiar ones, but rendered attractive by the excellent rendering.

You will not wonder that I was among the first to secure tickets for a second concert of these artists, which was to take place a week later. My disappointment was great when Mme. Schumann's accident made it impossible for her to appear; but further sorrows awaited me. A Frau v. Bronsart was announced as substitute, and, in Beethoven's last Sonata, did neither the composition nor herself justice, for in some smaller pieces she appeared to much better advantage. Stockhausen was advertised to sing six of the "Schwanengesang" songs and "Der Harfner" by Schubert, and Beethoven's song, "To the distant Beloved." The first he accomplished; but only the Serenade to my thorough satisfaction; the others lost either by transposition or by his not being in good voice. He commenced his second number, the ballad, in a very ineffective manner, and in the midst of it stopped suddenly, exclaiming, "A sudden hoarseness!" This was so entirely unexpected, that the audience seemed quite stunned. His fellow artists used all their persuasive powers to induce him at least to make the attempt to sing again, but in vain. Frau von Bronsart played her remaining number; a young man who had acted as accompanist, volunteered the information that it would be utterly impossible for Herr Stockhausen to sing any more, and the audience, the greater part of whom had paid a Thaler and a half, none less than a Thaler for their tickets, were left to find their way home, and swallow their disappointment as best they might. Not a word of excuse was offered, no proposal made to refund the money for the tickets. I must say that the public took the matter very meekly; whatever indignation there was, was not loudly expressed. In America, Herr Stockhausen would have been hissed under similar circumstances, or made to feel the displeasure of the audience in some way. The papers came out very severely subsequently, and a card appeared from him, in which, in a very haughty tone, he expressed his willingness to indemnify his hearers by another concert, as soon as his engagements in Hamburg, etc., would permit; but, to this date, nothing further has been heard about the matter, except that those present that evening have been requested to send in their names and the numbers of their tickets. To do the gentleman justice, however, I must say that he has been really ill or at least unable to sing for part of the time since, so that he could not fulfil an engagement of long standing with the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde" here.

Of two concerts of the Dom-chor that have taken place since I last wrote, I give you the programmes, to show how exceedingly interesting they are, not only through the marvellous singing of the choir, but also through the great variety of the music they produce, both in point of style and date. I doubt if their equal can be found anywhere in the musical world of the present time. The programme of the first was this:

- 1 Crucifixus (8 parts).....Lotti. [1700].
  - 2 Chorus for men's voices.....Vittoria. [1580].
  - 3 Chorale (Sopr. Alt. 2 Ten. Basses).....Eccard [1600].
  - 4 Motet, (double chorus).....J. S. Bach.
  - 5 Aria, "Liebster Jesu".....Bach.
- Fritzelein Decker.
- 6 130 Psalm.....Gluck.
  - 7 Offertorium.....Meb. Haydn.
  - 8 Aria, "Dixamus Dominum".....Hase.
  - 9 Kyrie (2 Sop. Alt. Ten. Basses).....F. Schneider.
  - 10 43 Psalm (8 parts).....Mendelssohn.

Of these the first two numbers and the last were the most beautiful—particularly the Crucifixus of Lotti, which seemed like a revelation. Fr. Decker has a remarkably sweet voice, without much force but peculiarly suited to the style of music which she sang. In the second concert the following was the programme:

- 1 Agnus Dei.....Palestrina.
- 2 Motet.....H. Schütz.
- 3 Motet (double chorus).....J. Christ. Bach.
- 4 Aria, (Tenor with chorus) from the St. Matthew Passion.....J. Seb. Bach.

Herr Rudolph Otto.

- 5 Motet.....Homilius.
  - 6 Chorus from Esther.....Handel.
  - 7 Ave Verum.....Mosart.
  - 8 Rec and Aria from Samson.....Handel.
- Herr Otto.
- 9 Graduale.....Nicolaï.
  - 10 Chorus.....Mendelssohn.

To my great disappointment I was prevented from attending this concert, but from all accounts, it was quite equal, if not superior, to the other.

"The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde," a society called into life by HERR VON BUELOW, and, since his departure for Munich, carried on by HERR HANS VON BRONSART, has continued its series of concerts, which have, on the whole, been very attractive. The performances consist of compositions both new and old for orchestra and chorus, as well as both vocal and instrumental solos. At the last concert were given Berlioz's "Flight into Egypt," a Psalm by Liszt, an Aria from Lohengrin, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony:—a juxtaposition of the "Future" and the "Past" in which, in my humble opinion, the former suffered considerably by the contrast, notwithstanding that the performance of the Symphony left much room for improvement.

In the Opera, several novelties have been brought out: "The Star of Turan," by Richard Wuerst, and "Catharina Cornaro," by Lachner. Both are favorably criticized, but appear to present nothing extraordinary. I had the pleasure of hearing a very beautiful performance of Figaro not long ago, with the three principal female parts excellently filled. Fräulein De Ahna, a beautiful woman, with a pure, sweet, mezzo-soprano, looked and sang the part of the Countess superbly; Susanna was charmingly rendered by Frau Harriers-Wippert, who, as some one aptly remarked, "sings like a nightingale," and Lucca as the page, was quite bewitching, and made the part much more important than it really is, by her beautiful voice and singing. The male parts were well filled by old stand-bys of the Berlin opera, Krause and Salomon; as were also the minor parts, so that the ensemble was excellent, and the whole performance thoroughly enjoyable.

For some weeks past Mlle. DESIRÉE ARTOT has been singing here in French and Italian operas, such as L'Ambassadrice, Le Domino Noir, the Barber, La Traviata, etc. I have not yet been able to hear her, but her singing and acting are generally praised, though her voice is said to be rather worn. Faust is one of the standing pieces of the repertoire, with alternately Harriers-Wippert and Lucca as Margaret; and recently the Huguenots was revived, with Lucca as Valentine, which is pronounced her best part.

Once only, since I have been in Berlin, has WAGNER-JACHMANN re-appeared in Opera, and that in a part the right to which, in leaving the operatic stage, she reserved for herself—that of Orpheus. Of course, I did not miss hearing it, and I doubt whether she would have impressed me much more deeply in her palmiest days. Through long care and rest, her voice had regained much of its old quality, and, with the exception of a few middle notes, was fully equal to the part. And her acting, her whole appearance, were grand beyond description! Every pose, every motion was classical, the play of her features marvellous, and her singing so full of soul! The first lament and the "Che farò," how inexpressibly touching and beautiful her rendering of them! And the whole of the music! Words cannot give an idea of it. The parts of Venus and Euridice, I regret to say, were poorly filled, but the orchestra and choruses were good, and Wagner could make one forget all the rest. She frequently appears in the drama, and in some parts is said to be superb, particularly so in Goethe's Iphigenie, for which part she must look exceedingly well. M.

Music in London.

The season for Philharmonic Concerts and Italian Opera has not yet come; but there has been the usual London wealth of oratorios, chamber music, Crystal Palace concerts, English opera, &c., &c.

The most interesting record is that of the "MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS," which since the middle of January have gone on weekly, with programmes of the choicest music, rendered by the best of artists. The string quartet party (Messrs. Strauss, Ries, Webb and Paque) have played quartets by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 10, and in B flat, Op. 18; by Mendelssohn in E flat, Op. 12, and by Haydn, in C, Op. 23; also Mozart's Quintet in A (with clarinet), and in G minor; and Spohr's in G, No. 1.

Other concerted pieces have been: Mozart's Divertimento for string quartet and two horns; the Septets by Beethoven and by Hummel; Beethoven's Serenade for violin, viola and cello.

The pianists have been Herr Pauer, who played Mozart's C-minor Fantasia and Sonata, and in Mendelssohn's early Quartet; Herr Charles Hallé, who played Beethoven's Sonata in C, Op. 53, his Pastoral Sonata in D, his Sonata in G with violin, and in Hummel's E flat Trio; and Mme. Arabella Goddard, who played for the first time, and on three successive evenings, Dvornik's Sonata called "Invocation," which the Musical World thinks comes the nearest of all other Sonatas to Beethoven's ideal; Beethoven's last Sonata (Op. 111); the "Kreutzer" do. with Strauss, Hummel's Septet and Mendelssohn's D-minor Trio.

Herr Strauss has played Tartini's violin Sonata, "Didone abbandonata;" Sims Reeves has sung Adelaide, with Arabella Goddard accompanying; and Louisa Pyne and others have sung songs classical and popular.

One of these concerts was purely a Beethoven feast.

The next concert, March 6, was marked by the return of the great violinist, Joachim, who led the quartets—Beethoven in C, op. 59, and Haydn in G, op. 64,—and with Hallé, played a Sonata-duo in E minor by Mozart. The Quartets must have gained also by the return of the most classical of violoncellists, Sig. Piatti, to his old post. "Never," says Davison, "has the grandest of the 'Rosomowsky' quartets been played with more effect." The same critic remarks that, "like all who appreciate genuine art, Herr Joachim has a strong predilection for 'Papa Haydn,' and we believe would lead any one of the 83 quartets with enthusiasm." Mr. Hallé played also at this concert Schubert's very long, but very interesting, Sonata in B flat (op. 140). Miss Banks sang songs by Mendelssohn.

ORATORIOS.—The Sacred Harmonic Society have performed this season: Spohr's "Last Judgment," the "Hymn of Praise," "Elijah," and "Israel in Egypt"—the last with Sims Reeves.—The national Choral Society (Mr. Martin's Choir), have sung the "Creation" and "Judas Maccabæus," with Sims Reeves, chorus and orchestra amounting to 700 persons. The rehearsals for the Great Handel Festival in June are in progress under Costa.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 1, 1865.

Concerts.

MR. OTTO DRESEL's new series of eight concerts of piano-forte music began last Saturday afternoon, when Chickering's Hall was filled with the most appreciative of Boston audiences. Mr. Dresel's programmes are so excellent, made up so exclusively of things choice and rare, the truest poetry of music, and the several numbers so artistically arranged with reference to natural sequence, mutual relief and contrast, giving the whole concert the unity as it were of a Symphony, that it must be interesting to have them all placed on record. Indeed no other musician among us has his tact in programme-making; with him the programme is a work of art; in each of them you feel a fine poetic instinct, the nicest sense of musical relationship, and a remarkably wide acquaintance with the really valuable music written for the piano. This time the selection was as follows:

32 Variations, op. 36.....	Beethoven.
Fugue, G minor [from the "Well-tempered Clavier," No. 2, Part I].....	J. S. Bach.
Fantasia, op. 17, [last movement].....	Rob. Schumann.
Barcarolle, op. 60.....	Chopin.
Sonata, G major, op. 58. Allegro, Adagio quasi Introduzione, Rondo.....	Beethoven.
Fugue, F minor, ["Well-tempered Clavier," No. 12, Part II].....	J. S. Bach.
Fantasia, op. 49.....	Chopin.
Prelude, D flat.....	Chopin.
Presto Scherzando.....	Mendelssohn.

Beethoven was a great master of the art of variation writing and was very fond of it. Many movements in his Sonatas and Symphonies are simply subjects reproduced, developed, through a series of variations, whether they bear the name or not; for instance, the Andante of the C-minor Symphony. But with him variation is not the trivial, mechanical proceeding to which the common virtuosos have accustomed us; it is no mere breaking up of chords into arpeggios, no torturing of an air into breathless runs and skips, bedizening it with senseless curls and filigree, merely to show off execution. Beethoven's variation is, in the fullest sense of the term, development—a vital process of creation, whereby latent meaning, beauties, wonders, are unfolded out of some seemingly little germ-thought or subject. You forget all about the ingenuity, the science, in the poetic inspiration of the thing; you go on sounding all the depths and heights of feeling; you meet continually new forms, new moods, of beauty and of power; for he has taken you into a wonder palace through this little door of a theme, where you wander on as by fate unlocking chamber after chamber which concealed new wonders. Beethoven was not alone in this power; all the great composers have had more or less of it; and he, like them, has often exercised it in a small way, upon Bagatelles and lighter Variations, and sometimes in a serious and great way. Thus, he composed in the latter part of his life a set of 33 Variations on a Waltz by Diabelli, a work of formidable length and difficulty, and really one of the most remarkable and characteristic products of his genius. J. S. Bach's piano works contain an Aria (original and very beautiful, with all its quaint old manner), with 30 Variations, in every form of canon, and yet such as will reward the poetic sense of one who will really study them. Then, too, there are the "Variations Serieuses" of Mendelssohn, which have been heard in our concert rooms, and rank among his best piano works. All these, and more things of the kind, it would be very instructive to hear from Mr. Dresel; but the best of audiences is made up to a small extent of students. In larger works, Sonatas, &c., if not in Variations so called, he will give us abundant illustration of Beethoven's mastery in this art.

The "32 Variations on a Theme in C-minor" were a revelation to most of that audience. He seems to have made the theme for the variations, or found it with the variations in it. It is but a single strain of eight bars, a spasmodic, fiery succession of chords and phrases, quite a little storm of harmony; and the variations, which flow, or rather fly, right on without break or pause, observing always the same exact length, and essentially the same chords in each measure, seem to exhaust all its passionate phases. At first it grows more melodic in a simply graceful arpeggio treatment; another begins so, but ends so mystically that you marvel what next. Some of the variations are subdued and soothing; some are tender, some are fiery, even angry; some full of hope, some of despair; some murmur low and mystical; for a time, in the middle of the journey, they enter the sunshine of the major mode; and the whole flight has been so swift, so uninterrupted, that you hardly believe it when you find yourself set down upon the earth again; nor have the swiftly passing novelties distracted or dissipated you, for you feel that you have and hold them virtually all with you in the unmistakable impression of the same ground tones that have been ringing their own changes all the while.

Without pause there then followed the little C-minor Fugue of Bach, which, like the other one in F minor, is one of those fairy-like, poetic little plays of fancy, in which Bach's contrapuntal art sometimes hides itself; they are sure to please, when played so exquisitely as they were. Again without pause, came the Fantasia by Schumann, which seemed only a deeper, richer, broader unfolding of the same poetic journey. How full of soul and warmth the earnest, rich tones sounded, under that vital touch, marking each note with the right accent! and how well the player was seconded by the sympathetic, full tone of that Chickering Grand! The most wonderful of Barcaroles is that of Chopin, a rare accession to our fund of musical impressions. The water seems so cool and deep; the broad tone-masses mirror and suggest so much; the motion is so free and buoyant, and at times so energetic and possessed. Sometimes the melodic figure is so limpid, it reflects the dimple of the water, and your fingers play with the liquid element.

The Sonata, op. 53, dedicated to Count Waldstein, has not before been played in public here, that we are aware. It is as different from any other Sonata of Beethoven, as any play of Shakespeare's is different from another. Marx places only two of the thirty-two Sonatas beyond it in point of difficulty of execution. It is essentially romantic in its tone, rather than sentimental or impassioned. The rustling pianissimo deep down in the bass, with which it opens, excites strange expectation, and the rushing crescendo passages seem to bear you away on strong wings, somewhat rudely, to regions of enchantment. You are surprised to find how soon you are in a new element; how the key is changed and ever changing; soon far away from the original C, and in fact very seldom in it; already in the second subject you are in E, marvelling at a delicious flow of fresh, rich, magical chords, which is repeated in variation as it deserves to be, and again you are caught up in the same irresistible mysterious manner and are transported to still new wonders. It seems a sort of German Märchen; in the Rondo you can think of nothing but fairy fêtes and dances; as unlike as possible to Mendelssohn's fairies, these are full as fascinating and poetic, and probably less soon cloying. The single page of Adagio, serving as introduction to the Rondo, is of most rare beauty; one of those soulful, profound reveries, in which a moment is a whole life. Mr. Dresel interpreted the Sonata, both technically and imaginatively, with such fine mastery that it held all listeners spell-bound.

This afternoon Mr. Dresel will play two of the latest Sonatas of Beethoven, neither of which has before found its way into our concert rooms.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER's singing Club again treated their friends, last Tuesday evening, at Chickering's, to a feast of choruses (with solos), and partsongs, admirably selected and admirably sung. His choir of nearly forty voices, all fresh, musical and telling, have been trained to excellent ensemble and they all sing con amore. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, one of his latest compositions, which was sung in a very singable English version. The choruses, full of grandeur and dramatic power, came out nobly; the two soprano solos were simply, sweetly, clearly sung by a pure soprano voice, and the quartet was beautiful. A brace of part-songs followed: "Autumn Song" by Gade, and "Vale of Rest" by Mendelssohn, both sung to a charm. Then came Schubert's Psalm: "The Lord is my Shepherd," for four female voices, a right refreshing thing to have revived again. Then the wonderful Prisoners' Chorus from Fidelio, in which the male voices were very effective, the voluminous deep bass of one of the gentlemen supplying a grand sixteen-foot ground tone (to speak in organ dialect). Two more charming part-songs: "Water Lily" by Gade, and Heine's "The sea hath its pearls," set by Mr. Parker; and then the concert closed with selections from St. Paul: the soprano aria, "Jerusalem," sung by Miss Houston in her best style; the chorus, "How lovely are the Messengers;" the alto recitative and air, "But the Lord is mindful," so truthfully and nobly sung, and with such substantial, rich tone, by Mrs. Cary, that it had to be repeated; and finally the startling, splendid chorus, "Rise up! arise and shine!" and the Chorale, "Sleepers, wake!" It is a privilege to listen to such amateur singing as that; how much greater privilege to take a part in it!

THE ORCHESTRAL UNION has excellent audiences of late for its Afternoon Concerts, and it labors well to deserve them. Last week, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was played again, besides the Overture to La Gazza Ladra, Beethoven's Turkish March, &c. This week we had Bennett's genial and poetic "Naiads" Overture; a new Concert Waltz by Strauss, called "Morgenblätter"; one of the smaller Symphonies of Mozart, in D, consisting of Allegro, Andante, and Finale Allegro, delightful indeed to hear; the favorite Nocturne from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; and Liszt's Les Preludes, in which there is always something to learn and something to relish from its fine traits of instrumentation, although the ideas sound common.

MRS. DE KATOW, MR. WENZL, and party, left us last week, after giving four or five more concerts in different halls: one at Chickering's, one at the Boston Theatre ("Sacred"), and finally one at the Melodeon. This last was on the whole the most interesting. The Russian violincelliste continued to charm by her generous and noble manner, and by the real feeling and delicacy with which she wooed simple airs and cantabile passages from the strings; her execution in bravura is quite limited, and the forzando strokes of her bow are often answered by a pigmy, stringy apology for tone. It is a pity, too, that she will waste the real musical feeling which she evidently has upon so many trashy compositions.

MR. WENZL confined himself mostly to show pieces, operatic fantasias, &c., of his own putting together; varying the programme now and then by a waltz of Chopin, or a "Song without Words" by Mendelssohn, of which his rendering was facile, clear, and elegant, to be sure, but in no wise remarkable except for that perfection of manipulation which he has been running all his life to overtake; whether it is more than a shadow in his grasp, the public have as yet no opportunity to know. Taste (in the external sense), quiet ease in the overcoming of difficulties, refinement, we can give his playing credit for; not depth of feeling, not a spark of genius, nor any profound inward sympathy with genius. The most remarkable and most interesting as well as amazingly difficult of his fantasia pieces, was the last one he played, on themes from the Huguenots; the effort elicited immense applause.

THE MUSICAL FESTIVAL of the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, to celebrate their 50th anniversary, will be inaugurated on Tuesday morning, the 22d of May, probably with the "Hymn of Praise" and an orchestral Symphony, and close on the following Sunday evening with the "Messiah." The chorus will be augmented to some 700 voices, and the grand orchestra, including the principal members of the Philharmonic orchestra in New York, will number at least 80 instruments. There will be four oratorios ("Israel in Egypt," "Elijah," "Creation" and "Messiah"), and four grand orchestra concerts, so distributed between mornings and evenings as to leave fair chances for rehearsal, the chart whereof will be announced in due season. The Society are in treaty with some of the world's great solo singers; but even should they fail in this, there will be no lack of resources. And we take it everybody, at that time, will be in the humor of great and continued choral jubilation.

THE "LIFE OF MENDELSSOHN," from the German of Lampadius, translated by the Rev. W. L. Gage, is just published by Frederick Leypoldt, New York and Philadelphia, and is for sale here by Urbino and at all the bookstores. It is a most attractive little volume, of 270 pages, in the tasteful style which has distinguished Leypoldt's publications, and indeed is a fit companion volume to his edition of Mendelssohn's delightful Letters. It should be read in connection with the Letters, and for that purpose it was greatly needed, to supply many a connecting link and furnish outward unity and background; for inwardly, essentially, we have the man's life in his music and his letters. Lampadius, a clergyman in Leipzig, was an enthusiastic friend and admirer of Mendelssohn. He wrote this brief, and yet quite circumstantial narrative of him, within a year after his death, and entitled it "A Memorial, for his Friends." It has not, on the musical side of it, all the critical accuracy and discrimination of a musician, and it appeared before the time had come for a final, satisfactory biography, such as we may expect in the indefinite future at the hands of the son or some other relative of the great composer. But is by far the fullest account of him that has yet appeared, and it is full of data with regard to his compositions and his activity as conductor, performer, founder and professor of the Leipzig school, his relations with the King of Prussia, with all the artists of his time, and all the relations of his many-sided life. With the Letters for illustration, it will be impossible for any musical person to read it without interest. Mr. Gage has given a bona fide translation of all that is essential in the original, and has furthermore enriched the volume with personal sketches and reminiscences of Mendelssohn by Chorley, Benedict, Rellstab and others. No book (except the Letters,) tells so much about its subject as this little volume.

THE musical Philadelphians have made a vigorous subscription to draw Mr. OTTO DRESSEL thither for a few piano-forte concerts. He will probably gratify them in the latter part of the month, and we wish them joy of it.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—The annual feasts of Classical Chamber music at Mrs. Porter's Young Ladies' School, with Mr. KLAUSNER, their music teacher, for presiding genius, the choicest programmes, the best artists from New York or Boston for interpreters, and the young ladies aforesaid for audience, are getting to be famous. The persistency of the thing speaks well for it. The programmes of the Soirée and Matinée of the 8th and 9th inst. are headed "Sixteenth Season, the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Concert." This time the artists were our Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with Mr. J. C. D. PARKER as pianist; and these were the selections:

Quintet in C, Op. 29..... Beethoven.
Capriccio in B minor, Piano with Quintet Accompaniment..... Mendelssohn.
Fantasia for Clarinet..... T. Ryan.
Meditation on Bach's First Prelude—Violin Obligato, Gounod.
Canzonetta from Quartet in E flat, Op. 13, and Song without words, No. 4, 5th Book..... Mendelssohn.
Quintet for Piano and Strings in E flat, Op. 44..... R. Schumann.

Quintet.—No. 2 in B flat..... Mendelssohn.
Andante and Rondo from the Piano Sonata "Le Retour à Paris"..... Dusek.
Saltarella for Violin..... Alard.
Sonata for Piano and Violoncello in A minor, Op. 69..... Beethoven.
Larghetto and Tema Con Variazioni from the Clarinet Quintet in A, Op. 108..... Mozart.

MRS. ADELINA MOTTE, formerly Miss Washburn, of this city, and one of the best of our native singers, has joined Gröver's German Opera company, and has been singing in Washington and elsewhere very successfully, as Siebel in Faust, among other characters. In a concert between the acts of Stradella, she sang a Cavatina from Semiramide, of which one of the local papers says:

An audience which has just been enjoying the singing and the orchestra of the German Opera Tronpe would naturally be reluctant to listen to any singing to the simple accompaniment of a piano, but Mrs. Adelina Motte fairly took the audience by storm by her clear and sweet voice and her brilliant execution. She was enthusiastically encored.

VIRGINIA WHITING LORINI. The rumor of the death of this prima donna is confirmed. She died at Santiago de Cuba, Feb. 28th, of hemorrhage. Madame Lorini was the daughter of Mr. Whiting, a well-known comedian, for many years connected with the Tremont Theatre. She was educated at the Boston public schools, and was highly esteemed by all the young ladies of her acquaintance. As an artist she enjoyed a wide reputation, and was always welcomed to the concert room or lyric stage, wherever she appeared. Some fifteen years ago she sang at Castle Garden, New York, and elsewhere, and a few years later went to Europe, where she studied faithfully, and soon won an enviable position as a lyric artist and as a vocalist of the best school and method. Her voice was a pure high soprano, trained with careful skill, and reminded one of Laborde. Though not a great lyric actress, says the N.Y. Evening Post, Madame Lorini has played such tragic parts as Norma and Lucrezia with much acceptance. Obliging and courteous, managers always liked to have so kindly and efficient a prima donna in their troupe. During the past summer and fall Madame Lorini travelled through the West; and a few months ago went, as prima donna of Mr. De Vivo's opera troupe, to the West Indies, expecting to return to New York in April.—Transcript.

During our stay in Berlin, in the winter of 1860-61, Mme. Lorini was the sole prima donna soprano of the Italian troupe whose performances alternated with the German at the royal opera house. There, all that winter, in the Italian nights, she sustained the leading soprano roles, sharing the honors with the then new and admirable contralto, Trebelli, in such Rossini operas as Semiramide, Tancredi, Matilda di Shabran, &c. The New York Weekly Review says of her:

In Paris, London, Vienna, Milan, Berlin, Barcelona, and all the capitals and important cities of Europe, Madame Lorini sang with success, her beautiful voice and admirable method being universally admired and extolled by the most exacting critics and audiences. In South America she was immensely successful; in Havana the hard-to-please habitués of the Tacon were enthusiastic in her praise. In New York, in Philadelphia, Boston, Washington, and in all the larger Western cities, this American artiste was exceedingly popular.

Aside from her rare musical talent, Madame Lorini possessed a degree of cultivation seldom met with in any country. She was a most accomplished linguist, speaking some five or six languages perfectly. Having traveled so extensively, her knowledge of the world was indeed unusual, and rendered her a most interesting and charming companion. She was generous to a fault, kind and courteous to all, endearing herself to her fellow artists by invariable good humor and an ever readiness to confer a favor or render assistance. Managerial interests never suffered from her caprices or whims. As modest as she was talented, Madame Lorini would undertake any role to oblige an Impresario, and in this country, where operatic enterprises are so precarious, she rendered incalculable services to different managements. Her repertoire was immense—she knew forty or fifty operas, was ready at a moment's notice to sing any role a soprano is ever called upon to undertake, and did this with a kindness and good humor rare in any profession.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y. A concert, in aid of the "Ladies' Relief Association," was given on Feb. 28th, by the ladies of Cottage Hill Seminary (Rev. G. T. Rider, Rector), of quite a classical character. The programme included a Quintet by Beethoven, the Octet by Mendelssohn (arranged for piano, four hands, and strings), a Quartet by Haydn, a violin solo from a Concerto by David, played by Mr. Apelles, who, with other members of the West Point band, made up the quintet of strings; also vocal pieces from Bellini, Neukomm, Kücken and Bishop.

Mlle. HELENE DE KATOW.—The Play Bill furnishes a short biographical sketch of the lady violoncellist, of which this is the principal portion:

She is the granddaughter of Prince de Potkin, Minister of the Emperor Nicholas, who was exiled with his son, the father of this lady. The latter changed his name and assumed that of Katowitz, the name of an ancestral estate in Poland. Mlle. de Katow's title is the Countess Polowna Potkin.

She was born in Riga, Russia, but at an early age went with her parents, who were exiled for political reasons to Paris. It was at Elsas, and at the age of eleven years, that she took her first music lesson from Brant, the nephew of the celebrated Carl Maria von Weber, and received instruction also in French literature from Massé, the well known author. Devoted enthusiastically to the study of art, Mlle. de Katow was able in March, 1860, to make her first appearance before an audience in the Hôtel-de-Ville, Paris, for Société des Beaux-Arts. After the concert, at which she was the principal attraction, and where her success was marked, she was honored with a diploma of membership, signed by all the members of the society. Her services on this occasion were gratuitous, the concert being for the benefit of the poor. Nevertheless, she was rewarded with a handsome present—a violoncello and bow inlaid with precious stones. Encouraged by the favor which she had thus obtained, she subsequently gave a grand concert at the Salle Herz, assisted by several of the musical celebrities of Paris.

Mlle. de Katow, at an earlier period had played at the Exposition in Brussels. After her performance the Duc de Brabant presented her with a magnificent diamond brooch, as a token of his esteem; and Servais, the great master of the violoncello, was so surprised at her genius and technical ability that he at once offered her his professional assistance. Ever desirous of an opportunity of improving herself, she entered the Conservatoire, and for two years devoted herself exclusively to study. At the end of the second year she received the first prize, although amongst her competitors were pupils who had been already five years in the establishment. The piece performed at the Distribution was "Le Désir," by Servais, and on the occasion the Duchess of Brabant, who had taken much interest in the young artist, decorated her with the Golden Medal of King Leopold, and placed on her brow a crown of laurel. It was during her stay in the Belgian capital that she became acquainted with Victor Hugo, who was then engaged in writing "Les Misérables"—or that portion at least which describes so wonderfully the great days of Waterloo. He would frequently request Mlle. de Katow to play for him, and would even indicate the mood to which his literary labors required to be attuned. In recompense for her kindness the distinguished author, on leaving for his island home, presented her the first copy of his immortal work, with these words inscribed on the first leaf:—

"Hommage au beau et charmant talent de Mlle. Helene Katow.—Un admirateur enthousiastique," "VICTOR HUGO."

From the period we have indicated to the present time Mlle. de Katow has performed almost incessantly in public, and with unvarying success. At Berlin, after a brilliant series of concerts she had the honor to be appointed virtuoso to King Frederick William. She was also made honorary member of several Philharmonic societies—associations that are not prodigal of their favors.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Der Deutschman's Philosophy. John Schmidt. 30

One of the funniest of funny songs. We may not like honest Yohn's philosophy, but we cannot help being amused at it. Singers should be careful to observe the direction as to the tempo, "Let us go pretty vast!"

The Orphan's Prayer. O speak gently to me now. H. W. Luther. 30

A plaintive song with chorus. Melodious and easy.

What joy thus to know. (Tua grazia, O Dio.)

"La Forza de Destino," by Verdi. 30

Verdi's new opera has been given in New York, and will, probably, be heard, ere long, in our principal cities and towns. The above is one of the favorite songs.

Father of all, whose circling arm. T. Bissell. 30

An excellent hymn, by J. B. Adams, with appropriate music.

O fly to her I love. F. Abt. 30

Many persons have an idea that German songs are of a dark, mysterious character, pleasing only to those who like music minor, sad, and bordering on the discordant. This is true but to a limited extent. Most of the best songs are bright and cheerful, and as adapted to the popular ear as others. The above song is sweet and melodious.

Our Grandfather's days. Tony Pastor. 30

Tony here carries out his pastoral character by admonishing us of the degeneracy of the present days as compared with old times. That is not so, but the discourse is just as funny for not being true. Very pretty tune.

Instrumental.

Parting. (Scheiden Waltzer.) E. Weissenborn. 60

One of the prettiest sets of waltzes that has been published. The music is at once elegant and brilliant. Of moderate difficulty.

The Wanderer. By Schubert. Transcribed by B. Richards. 40

This is one of the best of "Songs without words" and, for merit, is above the average of Richards' usually excellent transcriptions.

La Chateleine. Valse de Salon. E. Ketterer. 75

A piece of medium difficulty, and excellent, both for practice and performance.

Union League March. A. Birgfeld. 30

New Year's Grand March. R. L. Salem. 30

Two pretty pieces by good composers.

Books.

MERRY CHINES; A new Juvenile Music Book, containing Elementary Instructions, Attractive Exercises, and several hundred popular songs. By L. O. Emerson, Author of the "Golden Wreath," "Harp of Judah," &c. 50

Those who glance at the crowded index page of this book, will agree that there is no stinting in the number of songs. A large proportion of them are new, and there is an attractive character of brightness in the words and melodies. The reputation of the "Golden Wreath" will probably secure to its successor an extensive sale, but it is believed that the merits of the new work are sufficient to render it an equal favorite with the other.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 627.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 2.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

BY OTTO JAHN.

(Continued from page 3.)

The Thematic Catalogue of all the published Works of Ludwig van Beethoven (Leipzig, 1851), if somewhat attentively examined, will alone be sufficient to convey an idea of the extent of a collective edition, as well as of the manifold difficulties to be overcome. Of a truth, the task of carrying out such an edition requires means and vigor, no less than prudence and strength of will, in no ordinary degree. In November, 1861, when the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel issued the advertisement and prospectus of the first complete edition, authorized everywhere, of the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, the public were justified in expecting a publication in every respect well-prepared and promising to prove a certain success; at present, when after the lapse of fully two years, nearly the whole of the toilsome journey has been performed, a somewhat more minute examination of what was promised and what has been effected enables us to see clearly the highly gratifying results which have been obtained, by means of this edition, for the musical public.

That this edition is one which can be distinguished as "authorized everywhere," is a fact that may be regarded as one which concerns the publisher more than it interests the public. The latter do not generally inquire into the former's right, because they consider themselves justified in assuming it as a matter of course; but however confused people's ideas may be about the system of piracy—which, in the case of music at the present day we hear actually extolled as a patriotic and meritorious act, as it once was in the case of books—it yet will be satisfactory to every person not to have his interest in a grand and important enterprise diminished by any doubts as to the just basis of it. The difficulties—and it is but fair that we should take this into consideration—were, it is true, considerably increased by the fact that, in the first instance, an agreement had to be concluded with a large number of publishers. Even a person not intimately acquainted with the wonderfully intricate circumstances connected with the publishing laws, and not aware how, at various times and in various places, they have become rather more complicated than the contrary need only cast a glance over the numerous publishers of Beethoven's works, as exhibited in the Thematic Catalogue, to perceive that it is frequently a matter of difficulty to know where the right of publication really exists. It certainly needed no slight amount of investigation and negotiation, as well as a great deal of accommodating spirit, to satisfy all claims, and we have reason to rejoice that it has been possible—and it is especially difficult to do such a thing in Germany—to obtain for a great enterprise of general interest, not to be carried out without compromise, the adhesion of so many individuals concerned, each of them exercising sovereign power in his own sphere.

The question of completeness is naturally of the greatest importance. Appended to the prospectus is a list of those compositions which, having been already published, are available for, and will accordingly be included in the new edition. This list displays in four-and-twenty series a stately row of two hundred and sixty pieces, some of considerable importance. Whatever is to be added in the way of unpublished works is, at present, a matter for more searching investigation and for negotiation. One thing, however, may be asserted with all certainty, namely, that all Beethoven's unpublished compositions put together constitute but a small number compared to those already known, and moreover, that among them there are only a few of such importance for their publication possibly to add any essentially new and original traits to the already complete picture of the great master. That this is the reverse to what is the case with the old masters, whose unpublished works greatly predominate over their published, is a fact that ought not to astonish us. It was a consequence of Beethoven's nature as an artist as well as of his position that, on the one hand, he did not write as much as they did, and it resulted, on the other, as a matter of course, from his position towards the public and the extension given to the music-trade, that whatever he did write was at once engraved. It may, indeed, be asserted without hesitation that the compositions which distinguish Beethoven as a composer, and form the basis of his position with the public, were given to the world during his lifetime.

The most important of Beethoven's yet unpublished works, and one which has justly been included in the catalogue ascertain to appear with the published ones, is Ungarns erster Wohltät, Hungary's first Benefactor (King Stephen), an inductive piece, with chorus, by Kotzebue. It was produced, with Die Ruinen von Athen, at the opening of the new theatre in Pesth, on the 9th February, 1812. The overture alone subsequently became known; the beautiful choruses, several of which were for male voices, and a long and interesting melo-dramatic scene, afford fresh proofs of Beethoven's mastery in dramatic characterization, by means of especially original dramatic coloring, a mastery so astoundingly prominent in Die Ruinen von Athen also. In the autumn of 1823, when the music to Die Ruinen von Athen was performed with new words, by C. Meisl, at the inauguration of the Theatre in the Josephstadt, Beethoven composed, in addition to an overture, which was printed at the time, and has since become very well-known (Op. 124), a grand "Chorus with Ballet," never published. Another chorus, too, "Ihr weisen Gründer," composed in the autumn of 1814, for a patriotic drama, has never been published.

There exists also, for orchestra, a fine "Interlude," in the style of a march, very characteristically treated, and evidently intended for some particular piece, perhaps Kuffner's tragedy of Tarpeia, for which Beethoven composed the "Triumphal March," already engraved.

There are a number of dances and marches, most of the last composed on various occasions, in Baden, at the request of the Arch-Duke Anton; but they are of little importance.

Very remarkable, however, are three pieces composed for a patriotic drama, Leonore Prohaska, laid in the time of the War of Deliverance. They consist of a chorus of soldiers, a romance, and a melo-drama with harmonica accompaniment, unfortunately, like the rest, extremely short.

Of little importance, on the other hand, are certain occasional pieces: a "Marriage Song" for Gianastasio del Rio, of January, 1819, and, of an earlier date, a very merry "Italian Cantata," with pianoforte accompaniment, for the birthday of his doctor, Malfatti, as well as a "Farewell Cantata," for three male voices, in honor of a friend, Herr Tüscher, a Magistratsrath. Their publication would simply prove, what is already so well known, that Beethoven was not happy as a writer of occasional pieces, in so far as the mere absolute occasion did not suffice either to inspire him, or render his task an easy one. It is worthy of notice that for these pieces, not very edifying either in purport, form or extent, he put down a mass of plans and sketches, just as for his great works. On the other hand, it is characteristic that the beautiful and deeply feeling "Elegischer Gesang" (Op. 118), in honor of the "transfigured wife of his respected friend, Pasqualati," was written at the same time, the year 1814, as the above occasional pieces, from which it differs, however, so much because when Beethoven composed it his heart was in his work.

Belonging to a somewhat later period is another series of short compositions, which, also, are interesting. The revival of Fidelio, in the year 1814, once more excited Beethoven's inclination to write operas. It is an error to suppose that the unfavorable reception of his first opera had so annoyed him that he had definitely renounced working for the stage. On the contrary, very soon afterwards, as well as still later, he drew out, on several occasions, more or less serious plans for operas, the subject for the libretto being settled more than once. At first, Treitschke's Romulus was to come next to Fidelio, but, in the meanwhile, Beethoven conceived the notion of writing an Italian opera. To prepare for the task, he determined to begin by rendering himself thoroughly acquainted with the spirit and manner of Italian poetry and music, and by going through a course of training, which should teach him how to restrict his style to the most innocent simplicity of musical expression, and to what might easily be sung. For this purpose, he borrowed on the 26th July, 1814, Metastasio's Works, and set a series of that author's graceful strophes, as they struck him in perusal, for two, three, or four voices, without accompaniment. Most of them he set several times. These little songs, which are concise in form, and of which a considerable number were thrown off, display a pervading plainness and simplicity of which we could hardly have believed Beethoven capable; we should, too, despite many original and charming turns occurring in these same songs, which are based more especially on pleasing melody, have some difficulty in recognizing Beethoven. But it is this very fact that endows them with a peculiar interest. Belonging to this period is, also, the grand Trio "Tremate" (Op. 116), not performed in public until the year 1824. This Trio, grandly planned and carried out, produces, it is true, a very different impression to the Canzonets mentioned above, but, if we place it side by side with the aria: "Ah, Perfido," composed in the year 1796, we shall feel the difference between the time when Beethoven, in all good faith, employed Italian forms as the natural vehicle of expression for definite passions, and that when he used them as artistic means for bringing about certain effects.

Two grand Italian vocal pieces, one, an air: "Primo amore piacer del ciel," and a duet: "Nei giorni tuoi felici," of the existence of which we have certain testimony, have been mislaid, and, up to now, not discovered again.

Beethoven, as is well known, was induced by Thomson to arrange Scotch and Irish melodies with accompaniment for pianoforte, violin and violoncello. He took so much interest in the task that he displayed great zeal in arranging the national melodies of other countries also in the same manner. Of these only a comparatively small number have been published, either in England or Germany: but more than 150 of them thus arranged have been collected through the instrumentality of Herr Franz Espagne, who traced them out with great industry.

We have now, probably, given a complete enumeration of all Beethoven's published compositions, belonging to the period of his maturity, when he was that Beethoven whom the whole world knows and appreciates; how few are there still left for the gleaners, in comparison to those we possess! There is, moreover, a number, also not very great, of youthful works by Beethoven, before he had reached his prime, and which, for reasons easily understood, have never been engraved.

In a little note book, used by Beethoven on his journey from Bonn to Vienna, as well as in that capital during the next few years, there is the following touching entry in his hand:—

"Courage! despite of all bodily infirmities, my mind shall reign supreme!—Five-and twenty years are reached; this year must decide the complete man."

And this year did decide; with the Trios, published in 1795, the complete man stood before the world, the man who, during the whole of his artistic career, proved that his mind reigned supreme over all the infirmities of his body. So perfect does the composer appear in this Opus I., with such certainty does he proceed, his own way, with each new work, that we entirely lose sight of the question how he became what he was. That it was not till the age of five-and-twenty that Beethoven first appeared in the character of a composer, and that, in Bonn and Vienna, he must have studied much and made many essays, is a circumstance which, seemingly, has not, as a rule, been taken into consideration; at any rate, it is a striking fact, that, in the case of such an artist above all others, youthful works and the development of the composer's powers have formed the subject of so little research.

Such youthful works certainly exist. Three Sonatas for Pianoforte, with an affected dedication to the Elector Maximilian Friedrich, a dedication subsequently highly distasteful to Beethoven, were published in 1786; there appeared at the same time, also, Variations on a march by Dressler, and, in Bosser's Anthology, a small Rondo for Pianoforte, as well as a Song. There were subsequently printed, having been found among the papers he left, three Quartets for Pianoforte and stringed instruments, composed as far back as the year 1785; a Sonata and Variations, written for his fair youthful friend at Bonn, Eleonore von Breuning; while among the first Songs published by himself, there are some few that date from the time of his residence in that town. Have these works, which, of course, all find a place in the collective edition, weakened, perhaps, the interest for his early productions? This would not be really astonishing, for we scarcely find in them, even here and there, signs of the later Beethoven. They rather create astonishment that such great things could have followed such beginnings, than enable us to perceive the germs from which those great things could be developed.

But many other youthful productions, of various kinds, some dating from Bonn, and some from the first Vienna period, exist in manuscript. Among them is a complete orchestral score of a Knight's Ballet (Ritterballet), containing a march, German vocal pieces, a Hunting Song, a Love Song, a Drinking Song, and a German Dance, composed probably by Beethoven in honor of his great patron, Count Waldstein, who, on the 17th June, 1788, "was dubbed a knight of the German Order, with the usual solemnities, by the Elector of Cologne, as Grand and German Master," and who, then in Bonn, was believed to be the composer of the ballet. There is, moreover, a bass air from Claudine von Villabella, "Mit Mädchen sich vertragen," composed, probably, as an interpolated piece, in full score. In later years, Beethoven was not disinclined to publish this air, as well as, it appears, Metastasio's capitata; La Tempesta, which he had composed, in the form of a regular scena and aria for soprano with a quartet accompaniment, as an exercise, probably under Salieri's direction, and the score of which is also in existence. In addition to several songs, there are some few curiosities, such, for instance, as a "two-part Fugue, composed by Ludwig van Beethoven at the age of eleven;" a Sonata for Mandoline; a duet for Two Flutes; a Duet for Tenor and Violoncello, with the facetious heading: "Duet with two obnoxious eye-glasses;" a Sonata for the Pianoforte and Flute; a Romance for the Pianoforte, Flute, and Bassoon; Variations for two Oboes and the English Horn, on "La ci darem la Mano," and several other pieces. Then there is a tolerably large number of sketches, rough plans, and uncompleted fragments of an early period, some of them more interesting and instructive than the completed works of his youth, but, as a matter of course, not at all adapted for publication in a collective edition.

How much of these youthful productions, completed, it is true, but never published, should be included in an edition of his collected works is a question on which opinions will differ. There will not be wanting persons who would desire to exclude everything not belonging to the mature master, everything, at least, which might lower his reputation among the uninitiated, or obscure that picture of him which is present to us all. On the other side, some will insist on the greatest possible completeness of all that was written and preserved by Beethoven, and in addition to the satisfaction of our æsthetic feelings by rich and perfect creations, desire to see satisfied our historical interest for such works as are calculated, at least in some degree, to characterize the progress and improvement of his powers. Practically, it will, in all probability, not be possible to avoid a compromise, if only because it is a question whether all the youthful productions known to exist can be obtained for publication. At all events, it is an advantage for the undertaking, that, supposing it possible and practicable to incorporate every hitherto unpublished piece in the new edition, the number of such pieces is not so considerable, in comparison to those already printed, as sensibly to impede the task of carrying out the whole; on the other hand, if it be necessary for the publishers to limit themselves to a moderate selection from the unprinted works, it is an advantage that the artistically historical importance of the new edition as a collective edition cannot be called into question by such a course. This is the case, because apart from works, mentioned above, which must not be the omitted from a collective edition, if only out of respect for the name of the great master, because they date from the time when he was exercising his full powers, the rest will satisfy our just curiosity chiefly by the fact that they may be inspected, though they do not afford any explanation we may desire of serious questions concerning the gradual development of the composer's mind.

Apart from the music to König Stephan, and the hitherto unpublished Cadences which Beethoven himself added to his pianoforte Concertos, and which are now printed as an appendix to them, the published works will, as a matter of course, appear in unconditional completeness. The list accompanying the prospectus will scarcely suffer any sensible augmentation or rectification, even should zealous collectors find much that is rare and new, though of course not in the way of great works. It is seldom there can be a question of the genuineness of what should be received into the new edition; Beethoven's strongly marked individuality afford us so well defined a standard, that no attempt to introduce anything spurious would have a chance of success. Two or three trifles, published under Beethoven's name, but without either internal or external evidence of their authenticity, and not generally acknowledged or extensively circulated, have, therefore, not found a place in the new edition.

The Arrangements are, perhaps, the only compositions offering any difficulties. Of course, I do not mean those, which, as piano-forte selections or arrangements for four hands, are intended to adapt to the executive capacity of amateurs music they could not otherwise perform, but those which, from being thoroughly recast to suit different instruments from those for which they were at first written, lay claim to be original, or, at least, independent compositions, and which, therefore, if authentic, can emanate from the composer alone. Beethoven energetically protested, on repeated occasions, against what may be assumed to be the wilful deception of offering arrangements, by no matter whom, of his compositions as original works, and none such have any right to be included in a collective edition of what he wrote. But Beethoven himself was the author of some arrangements of the kind; following the example set by Mozart, out of an Octet for Wind-Instruments (Op. 108), subsequently published by him as such, he formed and published a Quintet for Stringed Instruments (Op. 4); he arranged his Second Symphony (Op. 36) and likewise the well-known Septet (Op. 20) as a Pianoforte Trio, (Op. 38), considering the last good enough to be dedicated to his medical man, Schmid, after a serious illness; he worked up into a Pianoforte Quartet the Quintet for Pianoforte and Wind Instruments (Op. 16), and into a Quartet for, Stringed Instruments a Pianoforte Sonata. He re-wrote, moreover, his Violin Concerto as a Pianoforte Concerto. Such of these versions as can be proved, beyond a doubt, to have emanated from Beethoven have a right to a place among his collected works, and many of them justify this by an original interest of their own. But on this point there are still doubts; it is not proved that we really possess all the arrangements notoriously written by Beethoven himself, nor has it been determined, with perfect certainty, how far those which we do possess are really authentic.

(To be Continued.)

Spohr's Autobiography.

[From the Orchestra.]

The greater portion of this work is a reprint of concert bills, puffs in the newspapers, descriptions of places written in imitation of Murray's Hand-books. It professes to be the life of a man who spent his days in the orchestra. He had a happy time of it, for in the closing scene he says "he had enjoyed to exhaustion all that life could give; his music was more loved and esteemed than he ever hoped for, and now he wished to die, as he could no longer be doing." His ruling passion through life was that of a wife who could accompany a pot-pourri for the violin, and admire her husband's compositions. At the age of 22 he marries such a woman, who after passing nearly 30 years in incessant hard work as wife, mother, governess, harpist, pianiste, passes away, and is succeeded by another, "with whom," says Spohr, "I felt unspeakably happy, and lived again in my accustomed domestic manner, for she took the same lively interest in my works as my departed wife had done." But she was a better player, and suggested "many new things in piano accompaniment, which I had not previously known." He had a weakness for playing duets: liked being described in the plural as "the artist couple," and conducts "my Lord's Prayer," led to the orchestra treading on roses, decorated with laurel, and a huge plaster of Paris bust before him "crowned with laurel, and on which were the words 'LOUIS SPOHR' in gigantic letters composed of roses and laurel artistically interwoven." A strong contrast this to the "miser et pauper sum," and the "comædia finita est" of Beethoven. But then Spohr could record that Neukomm's choruses were fine, and that he was greatly gratified by the Chevalier's fugues; the "Sacred Psalmody" of Westminster Abbey was "like the voices of angels from the realms of bliss," a psalmody only exceeded on earth by the "heavenly music" variously interspersed in the service of the Norwich Cathedral, where "the choir, robed in white, with their tender tones made an irresistible impression," and where he heard "music and execution so perfect" that "I could scarcely imagine a finer worship of the Deity in heaven itself." And then follows an account of how Spohr and his wife passed through the spacious nave, "the masses of people arrayed on either side to permit their passage looking at Spohr as something wonderful."

Beethoven, it may be surmised, did not like Spohr's music; he heard the "Faust," supped with the composer, but not a word could be got out of him about "Faust" or Spohr as composer. Spohr in return did not altogether like Beethoven. The Symphony in C minor was not a "classical whole," its first theme "wanting in dignity," the adagio "wearisome," the trio "much too rough," the concluding movement "unmeaning noise." Beethoven's 9th symphony Spohr could not "relish." The first three themes are "worse than all the eight previous symphonies," the fourth theme "monstrous and tasteless," "trivial beyond conception." In fact Beethoven "was wanting in æsthetic feeling and in a sense of the beautiful." For a long time the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart was a failure with Louis Spohr; the four themes of the finale could not be heard by even a practised ear. But in this he lived "to be convinced of his error." Spohr is enchanted however with Richard Wagner. "The Flying Dutchman" is an opera written "with true inspiration," "a great deal of the fanciful," "a noble conception," good for singing" and "full of new effects." "Wagner," he says, "is the most gifted of all our dramatic composers of the present time." "His aspirations are noble." Of the "Tannhäuser" Spohr writes, "there is much that is new and beautiful in the opera, but much that is distressing to the ear," and at times a "downright horrifying noise." He confesses however to have become reconciled to "unnatural modulations," and moralizing on this fact observes, "It is astonishing what the human ear will by degrees become accustomed to." Relishing "The Flying Dutchman," and disapproving of the 9th Symphony of Beethoven is a singular state of mind for a musician; but what may not be expected from a man who described the choir in Westminster Abbey as "the heavenly music of angels," and the dissenting service in Norwich Cathedral as equal to "the worship of the Deity in heaven itself?" Brunswick must be a strange place, Cassel one still more strange, and Protestant music among the Germans a marvel. Although delighted with the chants and choruses in Norwich Cathedral, Spohr "was not altogether quite pleased" with Mendelssohn's "Paul." "It was too much in the style of Handel." He forgot his first oratorio, which he confesses contained huge slices out of the "Creation" and the "Zauberflöte." The courtly Jew paid off the huge Brunswicker. He professed himself delighted with Spohr's new "Potpourri," and its staccato passage: "Play it again, my dear Spohr," "Begin it once more." "Let us have another repeat;" then turning to his sister, says, "See, this is the famous Spohr-ish staccato; no violinist can play this like him." And in this way Louis Spohr forgot his disappointment in the "St. Paul," and made himself happy in encores of his Potpourri in E major, and Mendelssohn's eyes flashed; and the corners of his mouth quivered, and he did not pull out his hankerchief, nor did he gasp it or swallow it, seeing that he was trotting out this harmonical Leviathan of humanity in one of what the composer terms "his humorous passages."

Spohr commends Cherubini, who still had his defects. The Patronaster has a finale which is absolutely profane. His masses exhibit bad example, and a theatrical style; such music cannot be enjoyed without forgetfulness of place, scene and subject. The style is "extremely disagreeable and annoying." In return, Cherubini says to Spohr, "Your music in its form and style is so new to me that I cannot follow it properly," nor would he hear a second quartet before he had heard the first three times. He did the same with the second quartet, which, however, he liked better, remarking of the adagio, "it is the finest I ever heard." The Viennese critics were not so patient or urbane. Mosel, reviewing Spohr's Quartet in G, remarked: "this eternal re-chewing of the theme in every voice and key is to me just as if one had given an order to a stupid servant that he cannot understand, and which one is obliged to repeat to him again and again in every possible shape of expression. The composer appears to have considered his auditors in the same light as the stupid servant." Spohr was not the man to stand this patiently. Mosel had himself written and published, and Spohr retorted, "prodigal in side thrusts at 'Salem,' and the censorship had to forbid the editor any further discussions on the 'Quartet' and 'Salem.'"

We must now say a few words of Spohr as a musician. Spohr was a composer, rather than a creator of music. Early in life he wrote music, to play it, and it was so much large finger music. Always conducting his orchestra, his music was original only in mechanism. Always at home in the bosom of his family, an honest German Protestant, his music has one strong color. It has been called melancholy, Spohr thought it not only lively, but humorous. He began too late in his church music, and had no recollections of childhood to help him in this school. He was never more than a concert musician.

Who taught Spohr? He commenced as a boy to learn the Violin of Defour, a Frenchman, from whom he passed to Kunisch of Brunswick, then to Mancourt, then to Ferdinand Eck, who at once convinced his pupil that he was without a bow-hand, and unable to play three bars with respectability. The pupil next hears Rode, and makes him his model, practising his compositions, and adopting all he could see of his "captivating style of playing." From this time Spohr taught himself. As a composer, Spohr must be called self-taught. When a boy he received some lessons in counterpoint from Hartung of Brunswick, but the old man becoming an invalid, the lessons were brought to a close. "These," says Spohr, "were the only lessons in theory that I ever had." Fortunately, there was no doctor Rinck, to turn him into vinegar, no Schnyder von Wartensee to teach him how to write the ugliest music the world has ever seen, no Dr. Marx to prove that everything was wrong, and there was no rule for right. At Hamburg, our hero falls in love with a Fräulein Latgens, but his fever is held in hand by Herr Latgens's incessant lectures on "the resolution and combination of sounds." He writes a concerto, but confesses he did not understand "how to work a piece." Still his "twitt's" satisfied him, some even surpassing his expectations. "He tried" opera, "but found he was wholly wanting in the practice and experience requisite for that kind of composition," notwithstanding he put his opera "upon a par with those of Mozart." He tried "song composition;" in this he failed, and succeeded no better with the instrumental quartet than with the song. In the adagio "he worried the motivo to death," and confesses his "scientific interweaving became monotonous." In the second opera, he admits the forms were Mozart, the designs Mozart; but, in no wise appalled, he commences his oratorio. Here he found he was "too deficient in counterpoint and fugue;" so he borrows Marburg from a pupil, writes "half a dozen fugues according to his instructions," and, the last being "very successful," resumes and completes the oratorio. He then writes a mass, but finds he has used "too great an abundance of modulations and difficult chords in succession." As a preparatory to his second oratorio, he again studied "counterpoint and the ecclesiastical style," and now felt convinced "he had found the proper style for that kind of work." Such is Spohr's own account of his musical education. It is plain he made himself what he was by incessant practice, hearing all the best artists, reading all the best scores, and writing daily under all circumstances.

Spohr worked from a corner of the Mozart-field. He could not, and did not, take in the whole, for he saw only a corner. Spohr, therefore, put a limit upon that which was already limited. As quantity of tone was his first thought, every voice and instrument was weighed, and put into its best place. Purity of harmony was his next thought; and on this he insists greatly throughout his diary. He is for the most part pure; and wrong only where he mistakes his sound, misled by his notation, and the distance he made on his violin. His third point is truth in feeling and expression, which includes his great fortes, light and shade. His first desire mechanized his phrase, and kept him in a straight jacket. True, the jacket is beautiful, always exquisite in shape, gorgeous in color, but the shape is always the same, the color never varies, and we turn sick gazing upon such harmonical perfection. It is soon seen he has only a corner to move about in; he has some "artful dodges," but then, they are nothing more than art, and the understanding soon grasps "the effect," and ceases to interest itself in the matter. The feeling and expression are charming, but this wears out, and a strong desire arises to move the composer out of his corner, and place him in the centre of the great system.

His school on the Violin has died with him. His school in composition died before him. He had himself exhausted its resources.

The New Chicago Opera House.

PLANS FOR THE OPERATIC SEASON.

[Correspondence of the Evening Post.]

CHICAGO, April 2, 1865.

Our fashionable public are all in a state of decided excitement about the new opera-house and the forthcoming operatic season. The edifice is built entirely by Mr. Crosby, a young man who has suddenly made a magnificent fortune in business, and who devotes a large share of it to the cause of art.

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE.

The new edifice, which is one of the most elegant and commodious opera houses in the world, is situated in Washington Street, midway between Randolph and Madison Streets and State and Dearborn Sts.—the very centre of the fashionable part of the city, and easily accessible by street railways. The style of the exterior is modern French, with dormer windows in the roof, and was designed by Mr. Volk, the well-known sculptor. It is four stories high, and is faced with Athens marble. The centre of the front, for a width of twenty-three feet, projects in a semi-circular form—a feature which also exists in the new theatres of Antwerp and Mayence.

THE ENTRANCE.

The grand entrance is of marble, seventeen feet wide by twenty-five high. The spandrels are elaborately carved and crowned with tasteful medallion cornices, surmounted by a parapet containing pedestals for four statues of the Muses, from the chisel of Mr. Volk.

The lower part of the building will be devoted to music and confectionary stores; and in the second story there will be accommodations for artists' studios.

THE OPERA-HOUSE.

The auditorium and stage occupy the entire rear of the building, and cover eighty-six feet wide by one hundred and fifty feet in depth, and sixty feet from parquet to ceiling. Access to the auditorium is gained through the opening in the centre of the front, up a flight of stairs with quaint carvings on either side, then through the corridor or passage above mentioned and three large door-openings. In connection with this corridor are two spacious rooms, with apartments for the toilet and wardrobe of visitors. The means of egress are ample, not only through the doors for ingress, but also through openings prepared specially for that purpose, and leading into State Street.

THE AUDITORIUM.

is eighty-six feet wide by ninety feet in depth, and is divided as follows: First, the orchestra, parquet, and the dress circle on the main floor. Second, the balcony circle, with private boxes in the centre and open sofa seats. Third, the family circle. The orchestra is ten feet wide by thirty-six feet in length. The parquet and parquet dress circle are composed of sofas made of solid black walnut, and a number of orchestra chairs of large dimensions and of unusual elegance and comfort, occupy the front. The balcony circle is marked by its division into fifty-six private boxes near the centre of the house; these are furnished with elegant carpets and chairs. The balcony and family circles are supported by light iron columns with ornamented capitals, whence spring finely carved brackets, supporting the extended balcony. These brackets are carved with grotesque faces and quaint devices of various kinds. The main cornice of the auditorium is supported from the walls by projecting corbels, ornamented with carved mouldings and medallions. The ceiling is panelled with heavy ribs, diverging from the central dome, which is also panelled and ornamented with rich cornices.

THE PROSCENIUM.

The ceiling over the proscenium is formed of a single large panel, on which is frescoed an Aurora, copied from the original fresco of Guido Reni in Rome. On the right and left of it are two other panels frescoed—the one with an ideal representation of Comedy, the other with an idealization of Tragedy. The three frescoes were executed by Schubert. The ribs and panel intersections are wrought with ornamental pendants flowing from the ceiling.

LIGHTING.

The auditorium is lighted with Fink's patent reflectors, which are located in carved panels encircling the base of the central dome, containing altogether three hundred and fifty gas-jets. They are lighted from above, and the illumination is deflected upon the audience below. This system of lighting is far superior to that of any opera-house in the country, since it throws a brilliant yet subdued and mellow radiance upon and throughout the auditorium, with the exception of the galleries, which are illuminated by brackets projecting from the walls. The usual objection preferred against the illumination of large halls is obviated.

VENTILATION.

The plan of ventilation is very extensive and perfect in details. In addition to the windows, there is a large ventilatory shaft upreared from the ground floor, and lifting itself like a vast turret far above the roof. This flue is constructed in connection with the steam and smoke flues. Then there is a large air duct that surmounts the parquet and leads directly to the main shaft, thus forming a lower draft, to be opened at all times. There are other ducts over the gallery circles, and in the dome a skylight twelve feet in diameter.

HEATING AND WATER.

The heating is effected by means of Gould's automatic steam apparatus. In case of alarm from fire, there is also a complete apparatus on the stage, fitted with hose and other appliances, by which jets of water may be immediately directed to any part of the building. In addition to the usual modes of egress there are means of exit from the upper tier to the roof of adjoining buildings. In fact, nothing has been overlooked which can tend to the safety or comfort of the audience.

THE DECORATIONS.

The fresco painting is admirable. Besides the Aurora, there are sunken panels in the ceiling containing portraits of Beethoven, Mozart, Auber, Verdi, Weber, Wagner, Gounod, Gluck, Bellini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer and Rossini. Messrs. Jerne and Almira are the principal fresco painters engaged on the work. The decorations of the proscenium and its boxes and of the grand entrances are rich in stucco, gilding, carving and statuary.

THE SCENIC DEPARTMENT

is composed of a large stock of entirely new scenes painted by Arrigoni, Calyo and Voegtlin. Besides these there are many set pieces, painted to complete the scenery for the extensive repertoire of operas to be brought out. Among these scenes are eighteen pieces by Signor Arrigoni as follows: A full set of "tormentors" and drapery borders; tormentor wings, with statues of the Muses and figures emblematic of music and drama, in drapery; the Roman amphitheatre; grand Roman street; modern Roman street; illuminated Gothic palace; illuminated Gothic interior; Pompeian chamber; rustic chamber; chamber of Louis XIV.; Byzantine chamber; glory scene of Faust; royal gardens; village; prison; grand canal at Venice; Moorish interior and Gothic ruins by Moonlight. Signor Calyo, of the New York Academy of Music, has five pieces: view of Paris by moonlight; triumphal arch; encampment; battle field of Alcazar and tower of Lisbon by moonlight. Mons. Voegtlin has six fine landscape scenes: dark wood; mountain scene; cave; landscape; horizon and the garden of Marguerite by moonlight.

THE UPHOLSTERY

designed and executed by Mr. E. H. Akass, is of the best kind, and the decorations are exceedingly costly. The seats, which are two thousand five hundred in number, are covered with blue damask of elaborate pattern, manufactured in Europe expressly for this palace of music, and imparted by A. T. Stewart of New York. The draperies of the proscenium boxes, which are comprised in three tiers on each side of the stage, are of brocatelle velvet, the trimmings and fringes of original design, the lower tier being festooned with gold brocatelle, intermixed with crimson silk velvet lambkin. The second tier is draped with gold velvet, with trimmings to correspond, and the third tier is hung with gold brocatelle, variegated with blue velvet. The three tiers together are all gorgeously decorated with the latest styles of Honiton lace curtains, imported expressly for the purpose, the whole showing a harmony of design and combination of taste unsurpassed by any opera-house in the United States or in Europe.

THE STAGE AND MACHINERY

are under the charge of Mr. Wallace Hume, the successful constructor of many stages in this country. Mr. Hume has spared no pains to make this stage the most elegant and perfect in America. In machinery and rigging he has fully attained this end. The stage itself is most beautifully laid and arranged, and the accessories are all of the most convenient description. There are two smaller rooms and one large special room under the care of Mr. A. S. Snell, the property-man. The dressing-rooms are partly on and partly under the stage. These are seventeen in number, furnished with carpets, wardrobes, drawers, marble washstands and all other conveniences. Each of these rooms is ventilated and heated by the same means as the auditorium.

THE ARCHITECT AND DESIGNER.

The main credit for the designing and erection of this grand and useful structure is due to Mr. William Boyington, of Chicago, who has superintended the work in its minutest details, with the exception of the stage work and scenery.

THE BUILDERS.

The mason work has been executed by Messrs. Wallbaum and Baumen, masons and carpenters. The stone-cutting was done by Mr. L. H. Boldweck. Messrs. W. F. Mulligan & Co., had charge of the painting and glazing. Mr. John Hughes was the plumber, and Mr. W. H. Wilmarth superintended the gas fitting.

THE OPERA.

For the above details I am chiefly indebted to the architect of the building. But from another source I am enabled to obtain in advance a copy of the manifesto which Mr. Grau will shortly fulminate through the Chicago papers. It is a magnificent production—an essay in fact on operatic art and the duties which the citizens of Chicago owe to it.

Grau's company is admirable. Carozzi-Zucchi, Moreni, Massimiliani and Bellini will appear on the opening night in "Trovatore." Kellogg and Lotti will next be heard in "Fra Diavolo;" and the repertoire for the twenty nights will also include "Traviata," "Ernani," "Il Ballo," "Rigoletto," "Sicilian Vespers," "Forza del Destino," "Poliuto," "Linda," "La Figlia," "Lucia," "Lucrezia," "Don Sebastian," "Norma," "Puritani," "Sonnambula," "Il Barbiere," "Moses in Egypt," "Robert le Diable," "The Huguenots," "Deborah," "Martha," "Don Giovanni," and "Faust." This makes twenty-two operas in all; and how they are all to be given in twenty nights I do not exactly understand; but probably the matinees will made up the difference. During the season

Miss Kellogg will make her first appearance as Dinorah, a part hitherto played in this country by only two singers—by Patti in New Orleans, and by Cordier in New York.

Mr. Grau will charge the same prices of admission as at the New York Opera House.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, MARCH, 1865. Since my last, I have had an excellent opportunity to compare the respective merits of the two rival vocal societies of Berlin, the Sternsche Verein and the Sing-Akademie, in two of the finest concerts which this winter has brought us. In point of execution, it would be difficult to give the preference to either; but in quality of material I would award the palm decidedly to the Sternsche Verein, its chorus consisting of far younger and fresher voices than that of the Sing-Akademie, of which it was said ten or fifteen years ago, that sundry of its members had recently celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their membership. These have naturally since been replaced by younger singers, but a large portion of the performers are rapidly approaching the same honorable period.

The concert of the Sternsche Verein formed, as it were, the culminating point in this year's uncommonly rich array of musical entertainments. With the exception of the first piece, a Requiem for a Child, by Ehler, in which the music partook of the sentimental affectation of the poem by Tiedge, which formed its text, and which, though well executed, was sung as if it went against the grain with the performers, the whole was one uninterrupted enjoyment. The Requiem was followed by Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, which, in its warmth and vigor, and truth of expression, as well as the spirit and good will with which it was sung, afforded the most agreeable contrast to its predecessor. Next followed the Magnificat of J. Seb. Bach, performed for the first time in Berlin, and looked forward to with great impatience by the musical world of this city. Of the existence of this work there was for many years merely a rumor extant, and even its publication in 1811 did not serve to make it more widely known. A few years since it was republished, more correctly, by the Bach Gesellschaft, a society formed for the publication of all the works of the great master. Soon after, Franz, in a most interesting and valuable pamphlet, gave to the world an analysis of this, one of the choicest compositions of Bach. If I am not mistaken, it was first performed in Halle, a year or two ago, under his direction, and has been repeated there this winter. I considered myself most fortunate in being able to hear it here; particularly so after I had listened to it, with constant regret, after every number, and at the close, that it was so short. Unlike many of Bach's works, its beauties are so palpable and seizing, that even the uninitiated must be struck by them at first hearing, and the musical hearer can penetrate at once, in a measure, to the depths of meaning hidden beneath the surface, though a mine of wealth will still be left for him to discover. I wish I could do justice to the work by a description of it; but I feel that this is beyond my power. So I cannot do better than to give you an extract on the subject from the National Zeitung, which is noted for its excellent musical criticisms.

"We owe to the Sternsche Verein our first acquaintance with the Magnificat of Bach, one of the noblest legacies of his genius, which henceforward, like the two Passions, the Mass in B minor, and the Christmas Oratorio, will undoubtedly take its fixed place in our public musical life; for in depth of substance, as well as power of expression, it will yield the palm to neither one of those creations, and brings before us, in closest frame, the entire artistic personality of its originator. As the fundamental feature of the master's creations, we take the immeasurable fulness, not only in a spiritual, but also in a material sense, to which we are here again and again called upon to look up admiringly. In the whole, and in detail, in the un-failing strength of the most original invention, as well as in the unbounded power of the moulding and forming, we everywhere discover a mind which holds unlimited sway over the entire world of tones, and which calls forth from every material which it touches, a thousand springs of life.

"The text of the Magnificat is taken from the Gospel according to St. Luke. It comprises the words of Mary, in the forty-sixth and subsequent verses of the first chapter. As could not be otherwise expected, its musical treatment and interpretation is carried far beyond the limits of a special Marianna worship; it rises to a universal significance, embodying the innermost being of all Christian doctrine, sentiment and belief. Indeed, the extent of the outward means would admit of no doubt of this. A five-part chorus, four solo voices, the orchestra, and the organ are called into requisition. Still more convincingly the substance proves that the composer had in view far other things than the mere enthusiastic adoration of the Virgin, whose person is brought forward only in a few arias, especially in that for Soprano: 'Quia respexit humilitatem.' In this, the expression of insinuating mildness, softness, and humility shows that fervent mixture of the realistic and the idealistic, which could only be at the command of the most simple, child-like faith. In the first chorus, 'Magnificat anima mea Dominum,' which is partially repeated at the end of the work, in the adjoined doxology, all Christendom raises its voice to a jubilant song of praise to the Lord. A dazzling brilliancy pervades the whole movement from beginning to end. But it is only in the two choruses, 'Omnes generationes,' and 'Fecit potentiam in brachio suo,' that the master raises us to the entire power and fulness of his tones. The first follows immediately upon the above mentioned aria for Soprano, taking, as it were, the words from Mary's lips. The Virgin disappears behind the structure of the Christian church, suddenly uprising in shining glory; the church, which thousands of generations shall make their dwelling place. All peoples and all times here unite in an eternal covenant.

Splendid is the repeated recurrence of the theme in the bass (the execution of which deserved the highest praise on this occasion); overwhelming, after the general pause, the renewed outbreak of a jubilee which seemed reluctant to end. In the following chorus, the voices are scattered, on the word 'disperant,' in single groups, hovering about uncertainly, as it were, until, with the 'superbos,' they are again united to a compact mass. Here, too, a most pregnant effect is produced by the general pause, which is broken by all the voices setting in together upon the tri-chord with the superfluous third. According to the grammatical sense of his Latin text, Bach has understood the 'mente cordis sui' as referring to God, while the original as well as the German (and English) translation: 'in the imagination of their hearts,' brings it in close connection with 'superbos.'

"We must resist the temptation to particularize the treasures which are hidden in every measure of this tone-language. We will merely mention the close of the duet 'Et misericordia,' so admirable in its harmonic effect; the Tenor aria 'Deposuit potentes,' rendered so characteristic by its two opposite motives: the ecstatic Alto-solo, accompanied by two flutes, in which the word 'inanes' stands out most significantly; and finally the chorus, 'Sicut locutus est ad patres nostros,' in which the voices roll on like majestic ocean billows. For the choice of this work, as well as its excellent performance, most carefully prepared, even to the smallest details, the Society, as well as its able leader, are entitled to our warmest gratitude. Miles. Strahl and Pressler, and Messrs. Otto and Putsch deserve high credit for their rendering of the solo parts. The place of the organ was supplied by a comprehensive Harmonium, the best of its kind. As is well-known, most of the compositions of Bach need, on many accounts, to be specially prepared for public performance. According to our text book, Franz, Ulrich and Stern have undertaken this work for 'the Magnificat. The piano score by Ulrich proved a valuable guide to us. In conclusion, we would proffer an urgent request for the speedy repetition of a work which, through its comprehensive brevity, as well as the clearness and transparency with which it comes to meet the musical understanding, is, before all others, highly adapted to familiarize the public in general with the genius of Bach."

To this I must add that the one drawback to me, in this performance, was the want of an organ, the rather thin Harmonium being by no means a satisfactory substitute. The solo voices were not remarkable, with the exception of the Alto, which was one of the softest, richest, most flexible, and altogether most beautiful voices of its kind I have ever heard. Besides the numbers mentioned in the above notice, there was a fine Bass aria; a most beautiful chorus, merely for 1st and 2d Soprano and Alto voices, in which the melody of the ancient Catholic Magnificat or Benedictus forms a Cantus Firmus, played by Oboes in the accompaniment, around which the voices are twined and woven in exquisite melodic figures; and a Gloria Patri chorus, which makes a fit ending to this glorious work. For some reason, a very beautiful aria for 2d Soprano, which immediately succeeds the first chorus in the score, was left out in the performance. All I can say in conclusion is, that ever since I heard the Magnificat, I have been longing to hear it again. I have tried to make myself more familiar with it through the piano score, but I find no end yet to the beauties which crowd upon me whenever I hold communion with it, and I can wish my musical friends nothing better than a speedy opportunity to make acquaintance with this, one of the grandest works of one of the grandest masters.

In the concert of the Sternsche Verein, the Magnificat was followed by Beethoven's lovely Fantaisie, for piano, chorus and orchestra, in which the master assembles around him, in light, cheerful play, as it were, the same tone-spirits who at a later period were to erect the 9th Symphony for him. They are all there awaiting his summons, but each one wears a wreath of blossoms upon his brow. The piano part was admirably performed by Herr Rudolf Willmers.

A week or two later, the Sing-Akademie performed Mendelssohn's St Paul at their last concert. This, too, was a thoroughly enjoyable occasion. The music must be familiar to most of your readers, so I need not enter into particulars about it. The performance was exceedingly good. Herr Otto, as Stephen, and subsequently as Barnabas, filled both these parts to general satisfaction. His rendering of the death of Stephen was inexpressibly beautiful and touching. Fräulein Decker, with her remarkably pure, clear voice, sang the Soprano part; the Alto was a most peculiar one, more peculiar than beautiful, in my opinion, something like a man's falsetto. Herr Krause undertook the part of St. Paul; he does everything well which he undertakes, whether on the stage or in concerts, but his voice bears unfortunate marks of his being one of the musical veterans of Berlin.

Two Symphony Soirées of the Royal Orchestra have taken place within the last month. They bore the usual stamp of excellence. At the last one, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and one by Taubert were played, as well as the Overtures to Coriolan and Les deux Journées.

In the Opera, Mlle. Artot continues to appear in her usual parts, as in the Domino Noir, l'Ambassadrice, Il Barbiere, Traviata, Fille du Regiment, etc. Lately she has added to these the part of Marguerite in Gounod's Faust, but does not please as well as Lucca. The latter I recently heard in the Huguenots, and was surprised at her superb and earnest rendering of the part of Valentine. She had seemed to me much better fitted for light rôles. In a small, childish body, she has a powerful, pure, rich soprano voice. Harriers Wippen, too, sang the part of Marguerite de Valois most brilliantly. The Raoul was Herr Stöckel, tenor from Dessau, who sang and acted well, but whose exterior, as is so often the case with tenors, was by no means that of a hero. Last week, Verdi's Rigoletto was brought out in German, with your countryman, Mr. Adams, in the chief tenor part. It seems to have been somewhat of a failure, the German singers, with a few exceptions, not having been able to enter into the spirit of Verdi's characters and music. In my humble opinion this is only to their credit.

Stöckhausen is still in debt to his disappointed audience of Jan. 14th. He is announced to sing at the last concert of the "Gesellschaft der Musik-freunde" (date not yet fixed); perhaps he will take the opportunity of his coming to Berlin for that occasion, to redeem his promise. Holy Week will bring us the annual performance of one of Bach's "Passions" by the Sing-Akademie; the Sternsche Verein are practising Beethoven's Grand Mass; two Symphony Soirées are yet wanting to complete the series, and single miscellaneous concerts take place every few days: so that the musical prospects are by no means dull for some time to come. For the present, I close, hoping for such ample material for my next letter, as fortune has yielded me for this one.

M.

NEWHAVEN, March 29.—The musical season (!) here is not, as usual, to terminate with the winter, falling into the "sear and yellow leaf" at the first approach of spring—on the contrary, it appears to have just begun. We have had, during the winter, the usual oratorio and one or two virtuoso concerts; but now is announced a series of four concerts, ("grand," of course,) under the auspices of the Young Men's Institute. The array of talent thus brought to bear upon the public is quite formidable, comprising, among others, the names of Camilla Urso, Mlle. de Katow, Miss Kellogg, Madame Varian, and Messrs. Hoffmann, Mollenhauer and Wehli.

The first concert of the series took place in Music Hall, March 23d, Max Strakosch's two "foreign importations" presiding. The programme is hardly worth mentioning—suffice to say it, that the compositions of Mr. Wehli figured prominently upon the list, and that these, in our opinion, have not even the doubtful merit of being good show-pieces. We must not, however, forget to mention one piece by Chopin, (Grand Duo Concertante in C), a selection in which Mr. Wehli showed much tact, abounding as it does with technical difficulties.

Mr. Wehli's faculty of execution is undoubtedly wonderful, but such exhibitions as his left handed fantasy seem to us mere jugglery—suggestive of the mountebank, rather than of the artist. We do not assert that Mr. Wehli is a purely mechanical pianist, of the line and plummet order, nor will we deny that he plays with much delicacy and grace; but there is a distinction between poetry and mere "expression;" his performances are finished, elegant and, therefore, to those who find in these qualities all that the soul can desire, satisfactory; but to the few who have their idealistic notions of the "unspeakable, unimaginable best," and who believe that "Spirits are not finely touched, but to fine issues," they are the reverse.

We were charmed by the playing and appearance of Mlle. de Katow; she rendered the Duo Concertante with good effect, and a lovely Chopin-like ballad (encore) delightfully.

We are pleased by this endeavor, on the part of the Institute, to secure the services of the best marketable talent—particularly as New Haven has not, hitherto, sustained a musical reputation in keeping with her size and social standing.

A. A. C.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., MARCH 15.—To chronicle the musical doings and undoings of "our place" (which, like every other, has its famous soprano, tenor, basso, as well as pianists, organists, fiddlers, fluters, Gideon's ram's-horn-brass-bands, &c.), is a task of superlative felicity; the more, that one is so certain the sensible people (such as all the readers of "Dwight" are supposed to be), having been treated, ad nauseam, to such reading in times past, have put themselves under a vow to forever eschew it in the future. But from what has fallen under my observation thus far here, I think Rochester musicians regard themselves and are regarded as quite human, and will be quite satisfied to be treated humanly by the pen of such a scribbler as the present.

There exists here an institution with chartered privileges called the "Rochester Academy of Music and Art." Mr. J. S. Black is Musical Director, and Mr. S. N. Penfield, Pianist. The number of members is about seventy-five. They occupy a Hall in a Savings Bank building, rent free. Imagine the wall at the platform end of Chickering's Hall to be semi-circular, with amphitheatrical seats for one hundred performers, and you have an idea of this.

In February a Concert was given by the Academy in Corinthian Hall, for the benefit of Mr. Black. The vocal portions of the programme consisted of the four-choir hymn in "David," a patriotic song and chorus by Blessner: Quartet and chorus from Sonnambula; a Von Weber chorus with Violin (Blessner) obligato; the Chi mi frena Sextet in Lucia, and the Hallelujah Chorus. A very good looking man tried to sing a song from Travatore. But as a man is not to be condemned for not doing things to him impossible, I will only recommend that the next time he appears it be in something from the "Barber of Seville;" his profession being the tonsorial one, he may succeed better than this time.

The Orpheus club (eight gentlemen) sang "The spring is coming" and the Faust Soldier's chorus, which last needed not the farcical prelude of marching in to the sound of a couple of fiddles and trumpets, a flute and contra-bass.

Mr. O. S. Adams (pupil of Mills) and Mr. I. M. Tracy played piano-forte solos. The latter gentleman, being a Leipzig graduate, upon a natural supposition should have selected otherwise than from Herz. The Wedding March (A Wedding March, as one of the papers had it) was performed upon five pianos, by Messrs. Tracy, Penfield, Kalbfleisch, Wilkin and Fenn. Mr. Blessner (now at Canandaigua) performed some original "Variations Fantastiques" for the Violin, Mrs. B. accompanying. He gained an enthusiastic encore from the crowded auditory.

Gottschalk was here two nights last month, farewell-ing: (as usual) the first time at one dollar, the second, fifty cents, per capita.

Yesterday evening the Academy commenced a series of monthly soirées at their Hall. Choruses from "Messiah," "Creation" and "David" were sung, besides various lesser selections. Mr. Rhoades, an amateur Tenor with a grazia voice, sang a Rossini air and was encored. Mr. Tracy performed Beethoven's op. 13; also selections from Mendelssohn, Liszt and Herz. He has good technical ability, but says of himself that he is not enough accustomed to public playing to feel at ease before an audience. He is, no doubt, a conscientious instructor.

Mr. Black is devoting himself to private vocal teaching principally, and has charge of the music at the 2nd Baptist church. Mr. Penfield is organist at the Central Presbyterian church, by which society he is so highly esteemed, that they furnished their edifice with a six thousand dollar instrument from the Messrs. Hook's establishment. Judging from one or two hearings, he is well worthy to preside at an instrument of such ample resources.

T. E. A.

NEW YORK, April 10.—The concert season is rapidly drawing to a close, and our concert-givers are as rapidly seizing every opportunity to give their farewell entertainments. Gottschalk has left us, after a few concerts d'adieu, which were of course highly appreciated and largely attended by his admirers. Accompanied by Signor and Madame Muzio, he proposes making a visit to California, British India, the Mauritis, Polynesia, New Zealand, China, Japan, and who knows where? Let us hope he will find more appreciation in those regions than did Mr. Charles Wehle, the German pianist, whose spirituelle letters from thence were so instructively, interestingly, but by no means (to musical voyageurs) inducively written.

The Italian opera troupe has closed the regular season, but will give an extra performance this week for the benefit of Mr. Maretzek.

The German company is announced to re-appear shortly at the Academy again, but particulars are as yet not fully forthcoming.

Since my last, Mr. Theodore Thomas has given his two final "Symphonie Soirées." In that of Saturday we had as novelties Bach's Pasacaglia, arranged for orchestra by Esser; a Symphony for Violin and Viola, with accompaniment of Orchestra, by Mozart; and Schumann's overture to the "Bride of Messina." I will refer more fully to these works in my future review of our whole musical season. Mr. Kreissmann's absence, caused by illness, was very much regretted by many who think they hear too little of the celebrated Schumann and Franz songs.

The Philharmonic Society is rehearsing Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," by Schumann, for their last concert of the Season.

LANCELOT.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 15, 1865.

On Variations.

In our allusion to Beethoven's fondness for Variations, speaking of Mr. Dresel's first concert, we were reminded of some excellent remarks by Julius Schäffer, which appeared in the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik in 1860, and from which we are now moved to translate, for the better understanding among many of our readers of what Variations can and should be. He says:

"The Variation form, though cultivated with especial partiality by the masters of musical art, is always terribly abused by bunglers and mere bod-carriers. So much so that we avoid it, when we come across it, or we meet it with distrust; and into such general discredit has it fallen, that even famous theorists and æsthetical writers scarcely recognize its title to a modest place among the legitimate Art forms. Without reason, as it seems to us.

"If we exclude the bravura Variations, as not worth considering, the various forms of proper Variation may be divided into three main classes. In the first, which we may appropriately designate as the decorative kind, all the interest lies in the theme. This veils itself as it were, with every variation, under a new dress; but it does not entirely disguise itself thereby; though it changes its gait, bearing and humor, and dissembles its speech in accordance with each mask which it successively assumes, yet it lets its original form shine through clearly all the while, and even presents itself in it again without dissimulation at the close. It is commonly a well-known melody, and its repetition clad in perpetually new charms is the only object of this kind of Variation.

"In the second, which we call the contrapuntal kind, the point lies in the form of the Variation itself. The different sorts of artificial counterpoint: Imitation, Canon, Fugue, &c., here form the problem of production. The theme here is only the ground plan, upon which various architectural structures are reared. Without individual form—for this it only gains in the Variation itself—it consists for the most part of a mere series of simply modulating chords (for instance the Chaconne of Bach, Beethoven's 'Thirty-two Variations on a Theme in C-minor'); often only of a bass, as in the Pasacaglia of Bach; and where it does present itself in a distinct melodic form (as in Bach's 30 Variations on an air), it is not the theme itself, but the series of harmonies which serve for a bass to it, that is worked up into variations. This class stands higher than the first, for we no longer have to do, as we did there, with an outward change of dress of the theme, which in its inner character remains unaltered, but with the creation of independent forms upon the ground of given harmonic relations. If there the composer merely studies charming diversification in dress, here his task is to represent the progress from the more simple to the more developed.

"In the third class, the point lies neither in the theme alone, nor in the Variations alone, but in the psychological relation between the two. That is the germ, these the developing phases of what goes on within. That the theme here is commonly a sentence or musical proposition invented by the composer himself—an original theme so-called—lies altogether in the nature of the case. The single variations will have to show their connection with the theme, as well as with one another, the latter naturally by the fact that one leads immediately into another (although this is not strictly necessary). Moreover, with their new-born motives, they will also bring with them new laws of development, and so develop into independent art-forms; indeed they will frequently draw into their domain related passages, or Intermezzi, not derived directly from the theme,—as in Schumann's Variations for two pianos. While the Variation form in this kind reaches its highest significance, it has at the same time arrived at its extreme limit; it strives to overstep this and pass out into the domain of free Fantasia. Hence it seems not inappropriate to give it the name of Phantasia-Variations, just as we say, Sonata quasi Fantasia, Polonaise-Fantasia, Impromptu-Fantasia, &c."

The writer (Julius Schäffer) adds, that he first applied the name to his own "Phantasia-Variationen," Op. 2, and then proceeds to illustrate by a more recent example not unknown among our own cultivators of the higher kinds of piano-forte music, and one which deserves to be and will be more widely known. Indeed the above remarks occur in his review and introduction to the readers of the Neue Zeitschrift of the Op. 1 of A. Saran, the gifted young pupil of Robert Franz, whose few published works thus far (Mr. Dresel and Mr. Leonhard have played them in our Chickering Hall concerts) give finer promise than any piano compositions since Schumann. This too is called "Phantasia-Variationen für Piano-forte," Op. 1. Leipzig, F. Whistling, 1859. (An excellent example, by the way, which it is high time that all music publishers should follow, this of putting the year upon the title page!). This analysis of Saran's work we hope to translate and give in another number; it will make a useful study on the Variation form.

Concerts.

The first half of the month has offered a fair share of good music. Let us take the concerts as they came along.

April 1. Saturday noon. Great Organ, as usual; this time played by Mr. J. K. PAINE, who gave two admirable pieces by Bach: The first was a Variation on the Choral: "In great need I cry to Thee," for full organ, in six-part harmony; two parts of which are played on the pedals;—of course, a rich, impressive work. The other, called Canzona, was new to us; a fine example of a strictly wrought Fugue with a long and interesting subject, followed by another Fugue, which is a variation of the first, in condensed form and changed tempo. The Sonata in A by Ritter, which is always acceptable, and the lovely Andante from Mendelssohn's sixth Organ Sonata came between the two Bach pieces. The remainder of the programme consisted of three of Mr. Paine's own compositions: his Variations and Fugue on "Old Hundred," which wears well; a "Reverie," showing a poetic use of soft stops with swell; and his brilliant Fantasia in F major, which is one of his earlier Berlin efforts. We need not say that the execution of the whole programme was clear, firm, tasteful, masterly.

Saturday Afternoon. OTTO DRESEL's second Concert; Chickering's Hall filled of course. Programme of the rarest and choicest:

Prelude and Fugue, C sharp minor.....J. S. Bach.
Sonata, A major, Op. 101.....Beethoven.
Allegretto espressivo. Tempo di Marcia. Adagio quasi Introduzione. Finale.

Polonaise, F minor.....Chopin.
Masourkas, (G major, Op. 50. A minor, Op. 17. F major, Op. 6.).....Chopin.

PART II.

Prelude and Fugue, E minor.....Mendelssohn.
Sonata, E major, Op. 109.....Beethoven.
Allegretto vivace and Adagio. Presto appassionato.
Theme con Variationi.

Notturmo, B major, Op. 9.....Chopin.
Valse Caprice, after Waltzes by F. Schubert.....Liszt.

The points of chief importance in each part were the two Sonatas from Beethoven's last period, never before played in public here. Each Sonata was appropriately ushered in by the Prelude and Fugue played before it. That by Bach, in C sharp minor, is not one of the playful, fairy little Fugues such as Mr. Dresel played before. It is one of the deepest and grandest in style and feeling of all those in the Well-tempered Clavichord; the Prelude, deeply musing, full of feeling and of beauty; the Fugue, in five parts, with a grave theme of only four long notes, afterwards enriched by two accessory subjects, and all together wrought up with immense power.

Then came the Sonata in A, with its delicious Allegretto, the subject stealing in like a breath of spring, tender and delicate, in four-part harmony as clear as a violin quartet: just such a mood, tender, loving, happy, and yet restless, full of longing and of sweet hope, as might follow that which sought expression in the Bach fugue. We find nothing more beautiful in all the Sonatas than these two pages of Allegretto espressivo; how the feeling swells up into rich chords, which surprise you with a sort of new-born purity, as if they never had been heard before, never profaned by uninspired association, as if they belonged to higher spheres which only the best souls know and in the best moments. Then the March, in F, or rather march-like movement, so rapid, impatient, nervous, the short, fiery phrases shooting and leaping through octave and more than octave intervals with vigorous and jerky movement, the mood of one possessed with a certain divine furor, finely imaginative mood of passion, in which the manliest strength and the most delicate sentiment unite,—in short such a mood as nothing but just this music can describe—therefore it is idle for us to waste vague words upon it! The Trio of the March, in B flat, is equally interesting.—The short Adagio in A minor is a wonderfully beautiful, serene, deep, pregnant introduction to a return of the first snatches of the opening Allegretto, which fitfully linger and repeat themselves, then sweep impatiently through a series of trills, broken by quick flashes of chords, out of which a vigorous little phrase, eagerly imitated in the other part, develops into the theme of a wonderful finale, full of imitation and echo, bits of fugue and canon, yet also full of charming episode, and revelling in glorious freedom.

Readers of Mendelssohn's Letters will remember his account, in the first volume, of a visit at Milan to the Baroness Ertmann, a lady who had enjoyed Beethoven's friendship in Vienna, and with whom the young Felix spends now a few rich days in talks about Beethoven and in playing over together a great deal of his music. It is to this lady that this Sonata, op. 101, is dedicated. Mr. Dresel's reading of the Sonata was thoroughly well-considered, entering into the spirit of it, and bringing out all its shifting moods with sympathetic, masterly hand. The Chopin Polonaise, and the exquisite string of Mazourkas, formed the best possible relief after it.

Part II opened with Mendelssohn's fiery and impassioned Prelude and Fugue in E minor, the most marked of all his efforts in that kind, which carried the whole audience away with it. And this heralded in the Beethoven Sonata in E major, op. 109, the last but two of the two-and-thirty Sonatas. Its form is exceptional; the proper first movement, that is, the one worked out in Sonata form, is here the middle one, the Præto appassionata (in some editions Prestissimo), which is in E minor; while the actual first movement is in fact a long Fantasia-like introduction, in which a Vivace passage alternates with an Adagio; the former an airy play of little winged answering phrases; the latter starting in rich, full stream of harmony, and presently dissolving into delicate and sprayey passage work, florid enough for our modern fantasie-virtuosos, but instinct with finest poesy. Then the Prestissimo, 6-8, in the most compact and interesting manner, fully developing and exhausting its stock of motives, ends with a broadening, diverging series of chords, springing from a single note in the bass. Then follows one of the loveliest of Andantes, sweet, calm, full of heavenly comfort, as a theme for half a dozen wonderful Variations, which may be said to belong equally to the two higher kinds described in Schäffer's classification in a preceding article. There are passages in them which hold the listener in a state of rapt, untroubled bliss; and when at the end of all, after the thing has worked itself up unconsciously into a tempest of all sorts of difficulties, the sky is suddenly clear, and the theme, clear and peaceful, reappears in its simple, original form and sings itself once through, ending the Sonata, the effect is as lovely as the re-appearance of the green hills and meadows, rainbow-spanned, on the clearing up of a summer rain, when all the world smiles fresh and lovingly at close of day. This was music that went to all hearts.

The familiar Notturmo of Chopin always lives again in Dresel's playing. The little Schubert waltzes used by Liszt in this "Caprice" are of the most captivating, and the fantastic wreath he made of them is very exquisite by Mr. Dresel's showing.

Sunday Evening, April 2. Mr. G. E. WHITING at the Great Organ, in whose firm mastery of means and adventurous, often striking combinations of stops we can well believe that we are listening to an expert pupil of Best. This was his programme:

Fantasia Eroica in F minor. Op. 20. .... F. Kuhlstedt
Larghetto. Op. 108. .... Mozart
Air. "Cujus Animam." Transcribed. .... Rossini
Pastorale in F major. .... J. S. Bach
Two Etudes, in C minor and F major. .... Martini
[French Organ music of the 17th century.]
Caprice. .... G. E. Whiting
Selections from a Vesper Service by. .... Donizetti

Tuesday Evening, April 4. A very interesting Concert by the advanced class of pupils of the PERKINS INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND, under the direction of their teacher, Mr. F. J. CAMPBELL, at the Melodeon. The goodly audience would have been much larger, had our music-lovers known or suspected what excellent results in the musical culture of these sightless pupils have been achieved under their present teacher, who is blind himself. We were attracted also by a peep at the remarkable programme, in which the name of Robert Franz occurred four times, that of Mendelssohn seven times (once in a full Concerto), besides Weber, Hauptmann, &c. This surely indicates a higher direction in musical school education, and of the blind too, than has been common hitherto. We suspect it is without precedent in the history of such institutions.

It also showed the presence of a controlling mind, of higher taste and more earnest purpose than is common in class music-teaching. When Mr. Campbell felt his way to the Grand Piano and sat down and played the G-minor Concerto, through, from memory, in a clear, connected, finished style, one could not but be surprised at the talent shown, and the devoted culture thereof under difficulties; nor could you help exclaiming to yourself: Here is the influence of Dresel manifest in this! If this, through a sightless medium, can be conveyed down through the musical studies of all those blind girls and boys, is it not a fine thing? Giving it all this praise, it still was not in the nature of things that the rendering of the Concerto could be entirely satisfactory. It lacked decided accent, individuality of touch; it was as if done in something like a somnambulous and dreamy state; all level, nerveless, rather shadowed forth than realized. And this was the case with all the instrumental performances of these blind ones; the same spell was over all. The young lady, Miss BLACK, who played the orchestral accompaniments on a second Grand Piano—a still more remarkable exercise of memory—did it with faultless precision and certainty, the ensemble of the two, from the start, seeming to be instinctive. Other piano pieces were: Wm. Mason's "Silver Spring," by another pupil, Miss AMES, showing fluent, florid execution in a high degree, yet somewhat painfully laborious; a Mendelssohn "Song without Words," very well done; and Weber's "Invitation" by eight hands on two pianos, which seemed a marvellous achievement without eyes; this last piece came out more vividly than the others.

But the real success of the evening and best fruit of the teaching was the singing of the Part-Songs, some of the freshest and finest by Mendelssohn and Franz and Kreutzer. Here the twenty or more mixed voices rang out with pure, well-blended tone, true in pitch, prompt, buoyant, delicate in movement, and no lack of life and expression. It was done with certainty and with a will. We seldom have heard better part-singing. As there could be no time-beating addressed to the eye, the teacher led by pianoforte accompaniment.

Our German "Orpheus" friends also contributed a couple of part songs, in their fine style, Mr. KREISSMANN leading. And Miss HOUSTON sang "Mother, oh! sing me to rest," by Franz, (taken a little too slowly), and Mendelssohn's "Spring is returning," with great acceptance. Miss MARKHAM, also a volunteer, sang another "Spring Song" by Mendelssohn, and "Evening" by Franz, quite sweetly. And a duet: "The winds are up," by Nelson, was sung with spirit and good style by two of the blind pupils, with good voices, Messrs. SMITH and KENDALL.

No one could have heard this concert, without being thankful that Art and culture, prompted by wise philanthropy, can do so much to make good the absence of the priceless sense of sight.

Wednesday, April 5. At noon, Mr. WHITING at the Great Organ: Mendelssohn's Overture for a wind band, in C; Andante from piano-forte Duo, by Dussek; Prelude by Brossig and Fugue by Bach; Air, for Vox Humana; transcriptions from Beethoven's 1st Symphony, and of the "Tell" overture.

Afternoon. Tenth concert of the ORCHESTRAL UNION: Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture; a Strauss waltz; Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Mozart's Turkish March, instrumented from a piano sonata; German air by Reissiger; Overture to Zampa.

Friday Evening. Return of Mlle. DE KATOW and Mr. WEHLI to the Melodeon, with Miss ADDIE RYAN as vocalist, who sang such nice things as Mozart's Voi che sapete and one of Franz's Burns ballads; also with Sig. POULICCHI, PAOLICCHI, or what not, as before, as a basso singer of the Verdi school. The most novel feature in the bill was Mr. Wehli's definitive setting of his foot—only one foot—upon classical ground; he actually played one movement, the first, of Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, putting it at the end of the programme, after all minds were weary with the medley of virtuosos things, and announcing it with the following precious bit of printed information:

This belongs entirely to what is termed the classic school, and, as a composition, ranks foremost in Beethoven's Sonatas. It is full of deep thought—it is energetic and brilliant. It gives great scope to Piano players—Beethoven being well acquainted with that instrument, as he himself was a splendid performer. But the public must not expect any great display of execution, as the reading of this work is the principal consideration. It should be rendered passionately, and the wild character of the subject should be maintained throughout.

Saturday, April 8. At noon, Mrs. FROHOCK played the Great Organ; this the programme:

1 Prelude and Fugue in G. .... Bech.
2 Andante from 1st Symphony. .... Beethoven.
3 Fantasia in F minor. .... Mozart.
4 Jeu Bons Pastors. .... Mozart.
5 Wedding March. .... Mendelssohn.
6 Andante from "William Tell". .... Rossini.
7 Sonata No. 4. .... Mendelssohn.

Afternoon. Mr. DRESSEL's third concert, of which we have only room now to record the admirable programme, reserving comments till hereafter:

Prelude and Fugue, F minor. .... J. S. Bach.
Sonata. A flat, op. 110. .... Beethoven.
Allegro moderato. Seberno. Adagio and Finale.
Fantasia. .... Chopin.
Etude, C sharp minor. .... Chopin.
Prelude and Fugue, E minor. .... Mendelssohn.
Allegretto in form of a Canon, op. 56, No 5. Rob. Schumann.
Sonata Pathétique. .... Beethoven.
Introduction. Allegro con brlo. Adagio Rondo.
Etude, (Kindermährchen). .... Moscheles.
Etudes. G flat and E flat. .... Chopin.

Evening. Second and last KATOW & WEHLI concert. Senza Sonata this time; "Left Hand" foremost. Grand display of sinister dexterity.

Here we must stop and resume the thread next time

St. Louis, Mo. The Philharmonic Society gave its thirty-third concert—the fifth of this season—on the 23d ult., Mr. Sobolewski conducting, as usual. It opened with Boieldieu's overture to Jean de Paris, followed by Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" entire—at least the vocal part entire, for the printed bill leaves it doubtful whether the introductory Symphony was played. Immediately upon the grand final chorus of the Cantata came (most remarkable non sequitur) a Liszt-ian piano fantasia from Belshazzar,—and this ended the First Part. Part Second offered the first movement of Schubert's great C-major Symphony; a song, or ballad, by Loewe (a composer, by the way, who should be better known among us), called "Die Uhr" (the clock); Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," as arranged for orchestra by Berlioz; and Quintet and Finale from 1st act of Bellini's Romeo and Juliet."

CHICAGO, ILL. To be sure, the grand new opera house, which is to set the keynote for music in the West (to judge from the way they write about it in the newspapers) is to be inaugurated with the Trovatore (I); yet there are those who cultivate a more classical and sterling class of music in the "Lake City." Witness the following programme of Mr. Paul Becker's concert given at Smith and Nixon's Hall, on the 16th ult. Mr. Becker, as pianist, was aided by Mr. Lewis, violinist, and an orchestra; and this was the music performed:

- 1 Overture—Foot and Pantaloone.....Suppe.
- 2 Polonaise—Posthume.....Chopin.
- 3 Concerto in F minor.....Chopin.
- 4 Concerto for the Violin.....Mendelssohn.
- 5 Quartet for four Horns.....Mendelssohn.
- 6 Septet Militaire.....Hummel.
- 7 Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven.

Here is a rare chance to immortalize yourself. Read the call, walk up and take a share in Herr Schubert's grand complimentary immortality gift enterprise, and make yourself a part of "History!" Read:

"THE SINGING ASSOCIATIONS, CONSERVATORIES, BOARDING SCHOOLS, etc. OF THE U. S. OF AMERICA, are respectfully requested by the undersigned, who intends to write the History of Music of North America, to send

"1. A statement of the history and members of their institutions, embracing the names of the founders, the board of directors, the members, the date of organization, etc.

"2. A statement of the names of the principal of every school in the U. S., where music is taught, together with the names of the teachers of music, in the different branches of music.

"These statements should be directed to J. Schubert & Co., Music Publishers in New York. All musical directors, principals of boarding schools, etc., will be mentioned in the above named book, and they will obtain a complimentary copy of the book.

"All editors who interest themselves in this work and will insert the above notice gratuitously in their papers, in aid of advancing the good object aimed at, will receive a complimentary copy of the history, upon sending the No. wherein published to

JUL. SCHUBERT.

PITTSFIELD, MASS. A Sacred Concert, under the direction of Messrs. Ensign and Feder, was given here in the First Congregational Church, March 13. Part I included an Overture (by Rossini!) on the organ; Chorus from St. Paul: "How lovely are the messengers;" "Hear my prayer," not Mendelssohn's, but an English anthem (duet and chorus) by Kent; song: "Consider the lilies," by Topliff; Selections from Elijah (chorus: "Lord, bow thine ear;" Duet, "Zion spreadeth her hand;" tenor rec. and air, "If with all your hearts;" Choral, "Cast thy burden"); "O thou that tellest," from the Messiah; and Thanksgiving Anthem from a Mass by Haydn.—Part II opened with Beethoven's Hallelujah Chorus played on the organ; followed by Solo and Chorus, "As pants the hart," from Spohr's Crucifixus; Air, "O God, have mercy," from St. Paul; the angel Trio and Chorus, from Elijah; Air, "On mighty pens," from the Creation; and Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. The concert seems to have been carefully prepared, and was musically successful. Mr. Ensign's organ solos and accompaniments are mentioned with great admiration by a local paper; as also the chorus singing, and several of the solos, particularly "On mighty pens," by Miss Campbell. Another speaks of "the wonderful voice of Miss Grace Campbell, and the passionate, magnificent singing of Professor Feder."

BANGOR, ME. A circular, signed by Solon Wilder and F. S. Davenport (managers), invites all the singers of the State to unite in a "Grand Choral Festival" at Norwobega Hall, on Tuesday, April 25, at 9 A. M., for the practice of Oratorio music; the festival to last four days; the daily sessions to be devoted to practice of choruses, and three evenings to public concerts, at one of which the "Creation" will be given with three or four hundred voices and "orchestral accompaniment" by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, whom the circular pronounces "the best association of Artists in America." The club will also play at the rehearsals and concerts "choice selections from classical and modern composers." Two of them go doubly armed, with flute and clarinet besides viola; if they could only manage to play both instruments at once, the grand orchestra would consist of seven.

MUSIC IN PARIS. "Spiridon" writes (to the Evening Gazette):

There never was so much favor shown to music as at present. To say nothing of the musical cafés (which are now to be found in every portion of Paris) which are making a great deal of money. The proprietor of the Alcazar, where Mlle. Theresa sings, is said to clear some $40,000 or $50,000 a year after paying his prima donna $14,400 a year—for he has increased her salary to this amount of money for the three songs she sings an evening. After she ends her performance here, she goes out to some private mansion and sings. There is quite a passion for her, and every evening, Sundays included, she is said to be promised until the 1st of June. These private performances put another $14,400 into her pocket. Such is the power of fashion in a great capital where the inhabitants, like Panurge's sheep, follow the leader! To say nothing of these musical cafés, there are now an unusual number of musical societies giving their concerts regularly, and a hundred and seventy concerts are threatened during the concert season which began on Ash-Wednesday. Every Sunday the immense winter circus—the Cirque Napoleon—which contains 4000 seats, is thronged to hear Mons. Paderloup's orchestra execute works of great masters. The Jacobi Society gives concerts periodically throughout the winter. It deserves mention for the organization of its quatuor, which is really formed of sixteen musicians, each of the four parts being composed of four musicians with their instruments in unison. In this way "chamber music" may be heard distinctly in a very large concert room. Another quatuor society gives nothing but classical music, being even more strict in its exclusions than the Conservatory Concerts. The Wekerlin Society labors to bring forward the music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and willingly runs still further up the stream of Time. They have recently given scores dated from the crusades and from other mediæval epochs. Their delight, however, is the XVI and XVII centuries whose airs à valser, quatuor brunettes, voix de ville, madrigals, drinking songs, psalms and noels they revel in. It is gratifying to hear they meet with satisfactory encouragement. The leader and founder is well known by more than one publication of archaic music, among which we may mention his collection of the songs of the French provinces. He married the daughter of the late Mme. Cinti-Damoreau, who has appeared on the scene of her mother's brilliant triumphs, but without the maternal lustre.

And who is Mlle. Theresa? Let the Tribune's correspondent answer:

Town talk runs chiefly in these days on Theresa and her Memoires, "written by herself," and on the Life of Caesar, composed by the Emperor. Theresa is a queer girl with a queer alto-soprano-grenadier's voice, who sings broadish songs with bold, broad comic gestures, and has risen within two years from being a favorite with the habitués of a popular café-concert to be the celebrity of the day, and from an annual salary of a few hundred francs to twice an Imperial Senator's income. This winter she has been invited to sing at soirées in the high fashionable world. Next winter, if she be not mean time quite forgotten, you need not be surprised to find her at the Lenten concerts of the Tuilleries. The other night she was the guest of one of the first-class clubs here, the Cercle Impérial. After she had sung her most latitudinarian pieces with great applause, and earned her 500 francs, she was asked to sit at cards with some of the members, who graciously won for her and let her win—partners and opponents—6,000 francs more. Her memoirs, more or less adorned by a prefixed portrait and autograph dedication to the public, are in their fifth edition. A few days before the death of the Duke de Moray, whose malady was a perfect enigma to the doctors till after the post-mortem examination, it was stated in the newspapers that "the Duke de Moray is recovering; he has received Mlle. Theresa." He, too, it is said, wrote biographical memoirs, which are not to be published until ten years after his death.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Ela, the Pride of my Heart. Song and Chorus. F. Wilmarth. 30

Move my arm-chair, dearest mother. " 30
Two pretty ballads with chorus, the last patriotic, having for its theme, the re-appearance of "Old Glory" on the Tennessee river.

Smile, and be contented. Ballad. B. Covert. 30
Mr. Covert has here adapted fine music to a ballad with an excellent moral. The singing of the pretty melody will do something toward bringing about that state of smiling contentment, so much recommended by the poet.

Jenny of the Mill. Ballad. A. Leduc. 30
Bear in mind that this is a wind-mill, quite a new thing in the ballad line. The water-mills have already been thoroughly sung. Jenny is a gay young lady, who sings bewitchingly, especially when there is a brisk breeze blowing. Words by Linley. Very pretty melody.

The Poacher's Widow. E. Philp. 50
This song, to which Chas. Kingsley contributes the poem, is of great power and pathos, and will be effective for public performance.

Sweet vision of childhood. Vocal duet. S. Glover. 40
A decidedly good duet, which makes a timely appearance, as really "singable" duets are not plenty.

Instrumental.

Morning Bell Galop. J. P. Clarke. 50
Mr. Clarke's compositions unite, in an eminent degree, brilliancy with simplicity. This galop is uncommonly pretty, and has little bursts of singing in it, in the English style.

The Campbells are coming. Brinley Richards. 50
Ingenuous variations on the old air, giving it a new life and freshness.

The Partridge. Polka Characteristique. C. Kappitz. 30
This is indeed very "characteristic" and original. It has already been successful as an orchestral piece, and will be, probably, equally taking as arranged for the piano.

Welcome Polka. Robert Hall. 30
Quite brilliant.

How so fair. From "Martha." C. Grobe. Op. 1574. 40
A favorite melody from the opera, varied in Grobe's best style. Capital piece for pupils.

Ave Sanctissima. Evening song to the Virgin. B. Richards. 60
One of Richard's best. The well-known air itself is of a high order, and the rich harmony of these variations, sets off the canto to advantage. Rather more difficult than the average of his pieces.

Books.

THE EXCELSIOR GLEE BOOK. A collection of the best Glee, Choruses, and Operatic Gems for Mixed Voices. $1.00

The "Chorus Wreath" has already been introduced to the public, and has been found to be a wise selection, and a good collection, of sterling Choruses and Glee. As many may desire the Glee by themselves, the present book is issued. It contains quite a number of pieces of the highest classical merit, some of them difficult, but many not so. The music will not disappoint you.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 628.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 3.

A. L.

IN MEMORIAM.

I.

But yesterday—the exulting Nation's shout
Swelled on the breeze of victory through our streets.
But yesterday—our banners flaunted out
Like flowers the South wind wooed from their retreats:

Flowers of the Nation, blue and white and red,
Waving from balcony and spire and mast;
Which told us that War's wintry storm had fled,
And Spring was more than Spring to us at last.
To-day—the Nation's heart lies crushed and weak;
Drooping and draped in black our banners stand.
Too stunned to cry Revenge, we scarce may speak
The grief that chokes all utterance through the Land.

God is in all. With tears our eyes are dim,
But strive through darkness to look up to Him!

II.

No, not in vain he died—not all in vain,
Our good, great President! This people's hands
Are linked together in one mighty chain,
Drawn tighter still in triple-woven bands,
To crush the fiends in human masks, whose might
We suffer, O too long! No league, nor truce
Save men with men! The devils we must fight
With fire! God wills it in this deed. This use
We draw from the most impious murder done
Since Calvary. Rise then, O Countrymen!
Scatter these marsh-light hopes of Union won
Through pardoning clemency. Strike, strike again!

Draw closer round the foe a girdling flame.
We are stabbed whene'er we spare—strike, in God's name!

C. P. CRANCH.

April 18, 1865.—Tribune.

Abraham Lincoln.

ASSASSINATED GOOD FRIDAY, 1865.

"Forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

He said, and so went shaven to his fate—
Unknowing went, that generous heart and true.
Even while he spoke the slayer lay in wait,
And when the morning opened Heaven's gate
There passed the whitest soul a nation knew.
Henceforth all thoughts of pardon are too late;
They, in whose cause that arm its weapon drew,
Have murdered MERCY. Now alone shall stand
Blind JUSTICE, with the sword unsheathed she wore.
Hark, from the eastern to the western strand
The swelling thunder of the people's roar:

What words they murmur—FETTER NOT HER HAND!
SO LET IT SMITE, SUCH DEEDS SHALL BE NO MORE!

EDMUND C. STEDMAN.

April 15, 1865.—Tribune.

Good Friday Evening.

'We trusted that this had been He who should redeem Israel.'

Thank God they chose this sacred day
To seal the covenant with blood,
We might not else His wondrous way
Through waters deep, have understood.

They said of old that "this was He Who Israel should redeem, we thought;"
Nor saw in death the mighty key
To all a Saviour's life had wrought.

Man's wrath but praised his Maker's power,
And worked the will it would defy.
"Oh fools and slow of heart," this hour,
Who do not see deliverance nigh!

The stroke that aimed at Judah's heart
Shall set a nation fully free;
This death shall do its noble part
In the great work of liberty.

Oh! Easter, glorious Easter morn,
I see thee on the world arise;
When mighty nations yet unborn
Shall lit their lamps to the skies!

And thank Thee, Lord, for every drop
Of patriot blood this day has shed;
And for the trumpet-stirring voice
That loudest speaks, "He being dead."
Tribune.

Our President.

The grass is growing green upon the hills,
The Spring is waking all the little rills,
A tender bloom is on the willow tree,
But where is he?

Will he awake to-morrow with the day,
And turn his face the way the battle lay,
And thank the Lord that he has lived to see
The triumph of the free?

Oh, God! have pity on us, he is dead!
The foul assassin aimed at his dear head!
He never spoke a word to let us know
How hard it was to go.

To leave us at the crowning of our joys,
When we were praising gallant men and boys,
And shedding happy tears of sweet relief,
And thanking him, our Chief!

Weep, weep, ye dark-faced children of the sun;
He gave his blessing to ye, every one;
That blessing was a throne to all the earth,
Emancipation's birth!

Weep, oh misguided wretches, comfortless,
And wash away your gall of bitterness!
Have you not lost a noble friend and true,
As ever stood by you?

He would have gathered you unto his breast,
Even as a bird doth fold her young to rest,
And wiped from his remembrance every blot,
But ye would not—would not!

Weep, mighty nation,—who shall dare to say,
That we are cowards for our tears to-day?
But let the drops be mingled with a fire
That burns all low desire;

The fire that flashes light upon our path,
And purifies from vengeance and from wrath,
The fire of resolution high and strong
To grapple with the wrong.

Farewell, beloved father, sleep in dust,
But rise thou in the kingdom of the just,
Beyond the traitor's breath, the battle scars,
And shine among the stars!

MARTHA PERRY LOWE.

Boston Daily Advertiser.

The Lost Chief.

BY CHARLES G. HALPINE.

He filled the Nation's eye and heart,
An honored, loved, familiar name;
So much a brother, that his fame
Seemed of our lives a common part.

His towering figure, sharp and spare,
Was with such nervous tension strung,
As if on each strained sinew swung
The burden of a people's care.

His changing face what pen can draw—
Pathetic, kindly, droll or stern;
And with a glance so quick to learn
The inmost truth of all he saw.

Pride found no idle space to spawn
Her fancies in his busy mind;
His worth—like health or air—could find
No just appraisal till withdrawn.

He was his Country's—not his own!
He had no wish but for her weal;
Nor for himself could think or feel
But as a laborer for her throne.

Her flag upon the heights of power,
Stainless and unassailed, to place—
To this one end his earnest face
Was bent through every burdened hour.

* * * * *

O, loved and lost! Thy patient toil
Had robed our cause in Victory's light;
Our Country stood redeemed and bright,
With not a slave on all her soil.

Again o'er Southern towns and towers
The eagles of our nation flew;
And as the weeks to Summer grew
Each day a new success was ours.

'Mid peals of bells, and canon bark,
And shouting streets with flags abloom—
Sped the shrill arrow of thy doom,
And, in an instant, all was dark.

* * * * *

Thick clouds around us seem to press;
The heart throbs quickly—then is still;
Father, 'tis hard to say, "Thy will Be done!" in such an hour as this.

A martyr to the cause of man,
His blood is freedom's eucharist,
And in the world's great hero-list
His name shall lead the van!

And raised on Faith's white wings, unfurled
In heaven's pure light, of him we say:
"He fell upon the self-same day
A GREATER DIED TO SAVE THE WORLD."

On Variations.

A. SARAN, Op. 1. Fantasie-Variationen für Pianoforte. Leipzig, F. Whistling, 1859.

We translate the conclusion of the article by Julius Schäffer, of which the introductory portion, classifying Variations under three heads, the decorative, the contrapuntal, and the fantasia kind, was given in our last. The author proceeds to illustrate by a recent instance of the third kind, named above.

"It is understood of itself that Saran's Variations belong to the third class. The Theme of course is one of his own invention. Its deep, inward melody is full of secret yearning; it would fain break forth, and yet it does not venture; it expands and then shyly draws itself back again; the song is as it were bound to the initial phrase:

which recurs constantly intensified. The first four Variations give nothing more than the Theme set in a new light, and marked with more impressive emphasis; they raise the feeling to that point, where the pressure from within bursts its chains and streams forth free and broad. Particularly noteworthy here is the first Variation, in which the harmonic body of the Theme unfolds itself into free polyphony, and the song of the Tenor opposes an expressive counterpoint to the melody. The second Variation decomposes the Theme into gently oscillating figures accompanied by simple chords; the third reproduces it simply, with a rapid figure playing about it; in the fourth the melody lies in the Bass, accompanied by impetuous on-rushing chords. On its final chord an airy motive suddenly springs forth:

"Born upon triplets of eighths, this new motive traverses the wide æther with elastic wings, revelling in new-won boundless freedom, till at last, as if gradually floating downward from the giddy height (mark here the tread of the Basses, step by step, through two octaves), it tranquilly breathes its last upon the organ-point of the Dominant.

"The following Variation, the sixth, (in C major, 3-4 measure) moves along in gentle echoes. Here the feeling, after having thus explored the width of its domain, withdraws into itself in blissful self-contemplation. Inner voices:

weave now wider, now narrower circles round the softly tremulous organ-point of the Dominant which holds all through the Variation. But in this ecstatic consciousness the feeling still finds no satisfaction. It gathers itself up with energy once more to try its inward power. This takes place in the seventh Variation with the following combative motive:

"And verily the power grows with every step, and the eighth Variation portrays to us the feeling in its consciousness of victory in a broadly executed march-like movement.

"Here is the climax of the whole work and to this point every one, who plays it, will follow the artist with admiration and forget, that it is an Op. 1, which he has under his fingers—it is the finished master meeting him everywhere. At the same time many a one will feel concerned about its further progress, when he sees that he has got through little more than half the work, and will ask himself, what more can follow upon such imposing climax, that will not appear tame after it.

"But let us look along: In the midst of the proudest joy of triumph (conclusion of the eighth Variation) the tones suddenly collapse, as if hit by a deadly stroke, their movement is disturbed, their energy broken, and it is as if they would utterly expire. The ninth Variation, in itself a very charming two-part song, remains unintelligible to us, in point of connection, in this place. As if nothing had passed in the mean time, it continues the mood of the sixth Variation. As we cannot discover any other place more fitting for it, we frankly confess, that we could wish it omitted for the good of the whole work. It seems to us as if the tenth Variation had a far closer psychological connection with what goes before. This again retreats within the limits of the Theme, but its gait is unsteady, its song full of accents of anguish, its inner harmony disrupted.

"The eleventh Variation makes an attempt to restore the Theme in its original form; but a painful question follows close upon its heels:

and, before it comes to a point of rest, it is dumb, and, after a few spasms, a cadence with unsteady haste, as if driven by a sudden resolution, plunges precipitately into the wild whirl, which forms the close of the whole. This piece, called Finale, is a sort of Burlesque in Rondo form and made on us the same impression as that verse in the 'Win-terreise':

Lustig in die Welt hinein,
Gegen Wind und Wetter,
Will kein Gott auf Erden sein,
Sind wir selber Götter!

"Now here, now there it [sounds, like a still sigh, like a religious warning; on mighty wings of memory, the Theme flashes on us once again—in vain!—this peace is gone forever!—and away we whirl into the wild vortex!

"Whether this tragical end was implied in the whole course of the work, or whether the first half did not rather warrant expectations of a happier dénouement: these are questions about which opinions will differ. If the present reviewer declares himself frankly for a triumphant close, with or immediately after the eighth Variation, yet must he on the other hand point to the ripeness of feeling, the well-considered form, and the absolute mastery of technical means which announce themselves everywhere in this work. Excellences enough to banish every doubt, that the author, in giving this development to the work before us, proceeded with a well-weighed purpose. Be that as it may, the young artist by this firstling of his productive talent will surely win the sympathy of the noblest minds."

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

BY OTTO JAHN.

[Continued from page 10.]

As contributing to the completeness of the edition we may, to a certain degree, consider also the fact that everything appears in its complete form, that is to say, all part-compositions are published in score, a form which exhibits the whole work as the composer bore it in his mind and wrote it down. It likewise enables the musician, when reading it, to reproduce the work vividly in his mind, and, when studying or performing, to have the work clearly present to his view. Many works, even long ones, such as the ballet of Prometheus, appear in this edition* for the first time in this form; the scores of others have been, it is true, printed, but have become rare. Their form, too, and the style in which they are got up vary exceedingly. It is a praiseworthy feature of the new edition that they will all be given complete, and in the same form. The publication of the parts will proceed hand in hand with that of the score, so that by the latter, the execution, and by the former, the study of the various works will be facilitated.

But the most important improvement consists, probably, in the fact that the publishers of this edition vouch for the authenticity of its contents as resulting from, and established by, a critical revision of each separate piece, aided by every accessible means. As is usual in the case of much-read and largely circulated authors, what we wanted, above all things, was the utmost care in establishing a pure and trustworthy text. But this required great preparations, and, merely for the collection of the vast and scattered materials, even supposing the enterprise favored by fortune and patronage, vast attention and sagacity, zealousness and perseverance. Even these could achieve important results only when combined with practical experience and devotion to the task. In fact, what had to be done was nothing less than to collect and consult, in as perfect a state as possible, for the revision of the text of the various compositions:—

Beethoven's own Manuscript;

Copies made under his supervision and correction;

Parts used at the performances under his direction; and Editions prepared by himself for the press.

That the editors could not often succeed in combining all these means for their guidance is a truth requiring no comment; but that, despite of every difficulty, only a few isolated works have been, exceptionally, printed without the possibility of referring to at least one of the above bases for criticism, is a highly gratifying result, due to zealous exertion on the one hand, and a readiness to oblige on the other. The directors of public collections—those charged with the custody of the Archives of the Friends of Music in Vienna having especially distinguished themselves by their liberality—and private individuals possessing manuscripts or first impressions—no other of whom can, by the way, be compared with A. Artaria of Vienna, for the number and importance of manuscripts in Beethoven's own hand—willingly granted the use of their treasures. Furthermore, there has been no lack in the supply of information and references of all kinds; nay, there are gentlemen who made it their favorite occupation to hunt up materials for the new edition and prepare them for use. Herr G. Nottebohm of Vienna, in particular, undertook, with indefatigable zeal, continuous researches, which have brought forth a rich and gratifying harvest; being master of his subject, he considerably increased, by his trustworthy information, the critical resources at the disposal of the editors. All the preparations of this description, not exactly usual in the case of musical publications, have, despite the time, trouble, and expense they demanded, been undertaken and promoted by the publishers in a manner affording evidence how high a notion they entertained of their task, and how well they understood its nature and importance.

To turn to proper account, however, the critical materials, critical editors were required. The question was to find men who, to a thorough musical education and an intimate acquaintance, even down to the minutest details, with Beethoven, such an acquaintance with him as we may presume all sterling musicians to possess now-a-days, united generally æsthetical feeling, tact and instinct for what is right, conscientiousness in observing, and fixing tradition, scientific interest in the methodical solution of each separate part of their task, and, in a word, those essential qualities on which the successful exercise of criticism is dependent. Such men have been found. The grand instrumental and vocal compositions have been undertaken by Dr. Rietz, the Capellmeister, who, by his part in the publications of the Bach and Handel Societies, and by his editions of Haydn's Symphonies and Mozart's Concert-Airs, has already proved his vocation as an editor and shown that we have lost in him a philologist, which would be much to be deplored, had he not been a musician. The editorship of the Chamber-Music has been undertaken by Herr David, the Concertmeister, and that of the Pianoforte Works, by Herr Reinecke, the Capellmeister, while the Songs have been divided among Herr Richter, Musikdirector, Selma Bagge, and Franz Espagne, all musicians known as not merely musicians, but in any particular case, should the nature of their task and the authorities at their disposal absolutely require it, well prepared, also, for philological criticism.

* That of Breitkopf and Härtel, Leipzig.

III.

Whoever connects with the expression "philological criticism" a dark notion of dusty parchments, and old impressions; of a drear expanse of useless readings, of unedifying splitting of words and carping about syllables; whoever considers it the duty of philological criticism to draw a hedge of thorns around the works of poetry and art, rendering the access to them more difficult than it otherwise would be, and interfering with the enjoyment of them—such an individual will not feel exactly comfortable at the prospect that this sort of criticism is now going to be applied even to Beethoven. Many a person, entertaining more moderate views, will feel doubts as to what there is important for criticism to perform in connection with the works of a composer who lived down into the present generation and published his works himself, and likewise, as to what use a vast apparatus of manuscripts and printed editions can be. We may here remind these persons of the case, so near us, of Schiller and Goethe. It was not till recently that philological exactness and method could begin to busy themselves somewhat with the works of our great poets, and even up to the present time—thanks to the want of conscientiousness on the part of those whom honor and duty should urge to bestow every care upon a proper restoration of the text—they have not done so to the extent requisite to achieve effectual results. Already, however, has it been demonstrated that copyists, composers and readers for the press have gained a far more extensive and deeper influence upon the form of the texts in general use than people would be inclined to think; that not only have typographical errors distorting the sense, and the omission of verses through negligence, become stereotyped, but that arbitrary alterations, under the deceptive semblance of pretended emendations, have set aside the original text. Everyone possessing a somewhat clearer idea than usual of the instances of want of sense and of the absurdities which even educated readers will pass; of how irksome for the careful reader, when he stumbles on something which strikes him as peculiar, is the uncertainty whether he has to do with a real difficulty, or with a typographical error; of how often he is compelled to indulge himself in conjectural criticism—for every emendation of a typographical error is a philological conjecture—of how terrible is his disappointment, when well-known passages, which have perhaps become favorite ones, are proved to be spurious and not emanating, in the shape they bear, from the poet—whoever has an idea of and reflects on such cases, will agree in thinking it a noble task for philological criticism to give us trustworthy texts of our great German writers, an undertaking which, if successfully carried out, will not remain without the approbation of even unphilological readers. The case is not different with musicians. How many a player and listener is embarrassed whether he has to see an Oulibischeffian chimæra in a chord, a passage, or a note, or to correct an error of the press; how disagreeable it is to be informed that an especially favorite beauty is founded upon a fault of the engraver, and that what we look upon as an indisputable improvement of some insupportable instance of harshness is nothing more than a piece of over-correction. That such cases are of daily occurrence is a well-known fact; that, moreover, the various editions of Beethoven's works contain much more than was supposed calculated to reduce the public to doubt and despair is a fact that has been demonstrated by careful examination. Our thanks are, therefore, certainly due to the labors of those who undertake to restore in its primitive purity what the composer wrote, and to hand it down to us in a trustworthy form—and such are precisely the labors of philological criticism.

To the question: What is the task and what is the method of philological criticism? the answer is easy. Its task consists in restoring to the shape in which the author conceived it, the work of a writer—or of a musician—which, multiplied by mechanical means, copying or printing, circulated and spread abroad, has, necessarily, in consequence of its repeated multiplication, become, accidentally or purposely, more or less disfigured. Its first duty, therefore, is to test tradition, and to discover the source, or the sources whence the work in its original form may be taken with the greatest certainty. Whenever it is possible to consult the author's first original manuscript, that, of course, is the most trustworthy guarantee of correctness. But even that is not always to be unconditionally relied upon, for the most carefully written one is not secure against clerical errors, and accidental faults of inattention, and it is very possible that ameliorations, intended to be valid, may have been made after the original manuscript was completed, and not to be included in it. For the purposes of criticism, therefore, copies, written or printed, made under the inspection of the author, possess a significance of their own, a significance outweighing that of aught else, because such copies are sometimes the last that enjoyed the author's revision. In the case of a musical work, parts written for a performance under the direction of the composer occupy a similar position, because it is reasonable to presume that, when the parts were used, the mistakes which may accidentally have found their way into them were carefully corrected. When these various means of tradition are subjected to mutual control, the supposition of faults arising from accidental error is reduced to the very narrowest limits. But it must be expected that such faults will never be quite wanting; we may correct them by the aid of the authorities handed down to us when the latter agree perfectly with each other, and we are able to do so with the less hesitation, because the faults are generally palpable, and the emendations self-evident. But when the authorities differ from each other; when either each authority contains something different from the rest; or certain ones agreeing among themselves are at variance with others, a decision may, in the first place, be pronounced upon essentially external circumstances, such for example, as the fact that a reading in the written or printed copies is evidently based upon a misunderstanding of the characters of the original manuscript, or that a fault evidently caused by haste is corrected in the copies. But in most instances of a discrepancy between the authorities, a decision as to what is correct can be formed only by an examination of internal evidence. This presupposes, in the first place, a thorough knowledge of, and the ability to apply, the general laws, according to which the means of artistic expression can be employed in a manner corresponding with this aim, logic and grammar; for even the mode of expression adopted by music, as by the plastic art, becomes an organized language, inasmuch as it follows the fixed laws of logic and grammar, though we are not accustomed to call them so. By these means, we acquire, in the first place, the standard by which to decide what is generally possible, and what impossible; what is absolutely false, or what correct. But when the question is to apply general principles to a work belonging to a certain definite time, and produced by a certain definite individual, under certain definite conditions, general knowledge must, by minute historical study, be educated up to a clear insight into, and a sure feeling of, what a given age and a given individuality are able artistically to conceive, and the form in which they are able to produce what they have conceived. If any one now, possessing a glance thus sharpened, sure tact, and an acquaintance with his master, proceeds to test those passages in which the reading of the various authorities is not the same, such a man will be competent to decide what could not possibly emanate from the author, and what he might have written; in many cases, what he must have written, and in most, what he probably did write. In fact, as the matter under consideration is a work of art, in the creation of which the intellectual subjectivity of the artist works as a component element to an extent incalculable, so that the last efforts of criticism depend essentially on weighing against each other laws generally valid and the legitimate peculiarity of the artist, and as, moreover, it is only by means of peculiar natural gifts that the critic can acquire that culture and that tact which are the conditions whereby he exercises his vocation, there is always about these operations some amount of subjectivity, which, especially for more delicate tasks and results, does not produce that certainty which, so to speak, is mathematically cogent. But whoever, on this account, regards the method employed by criticism as playful caprice, and its results as fortuitous fancies, forgets that the general laws, in conformity with which, as a rule, the human mind works and creates, exercise on the artist and his work, just as over other persons and other things, a compelling organisational power, and may, therefore, be acknowledged as valid norms; that, by means of conscientious historical research, it becomes possible to recognize even the free elements of the individualistic in periods and persons, and that, within such certain outlines, in this too the influence of certain laws may be pointed out; and that, by carefully regulating both powers a critical method is formed by the aid of which the critic is enabled to compress within the narrowest limits what is uncertain and ambiguous, or, at any rate, decisively to distinguish it from what is certain and clear. It is evident that, the more difficult and the more defective the historical investigation is, and the more uncertain and vacillating the tradition, the more strongly must the subjective element in criticism stand out, and the more problematical must be the result. When we no longer possess any original manuscript, and when copies, written and printed, have not been made under the supervision of the author, but, for a tolerably long period, multiplied in conformity with different principles, or even with none at all, at one time with rather more care, at another with rather more negligence than usual, the task of testing the credibility and trustworthiness of the authorities becomes more and more involved; external circumstances can seldom be turned to account, and, when they can, not with perfect certainty, for the purpose of determining separate doubtful cases, so that more and more reliance must be placed upon internal evidence. But the most difficult problems for criticism are not occasioned by the corruptions arising from accidental oversights and errors, however much these may, in the course of time, through negligence and ignorance, increase as it were at interest, but from the corruptions attendant on well-meant but mistaken corrections. There is never any lack of copyists and correctors who, though perhaps capable of observing that a fault has crept into a work, from a want of sense and penetration, look for the fault in the wrong place, the consequence being that their corrections either do not hit upon it at all, or change what is right at the same time that they alter what is wrong, and thus substitute the deceptive appearance of something tolerable in itself but untrue for what was evidently wrong. If with such unskilful correctors, who are accustomed to spin out their business with self-satisfied zeal, are associated the over-clever, who do not hesitate about occasionally correcting even the author himself, so that everything shall quietly assume the appearance which best suits their own taste, there is the utmost danger of a false coating of paint being spread over the genuine and original work of art. In many of these cases criticism finds it difficult to gain a footing sufficiently firm to be able to remove the disfiguring whitewash of restoration, and once more expose to view the old faults and deficiencies, the correction of which it dares to approach only with every possible precaution and care.

(To be Continued.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Star and the Rose.

The balmy twilight was closing,
A light wind stirred in the bowers,
The stars were awaking from slumber,
And closed were the eyes of the flowers.

One star of wide heaven grew weary;
He fell through the deeps of blue,
And sank in the rose's bosom,
A droplet of golden dew.

He lay there, so lightly cradled,
No longer he cared to soar;
The rose felt a thrill within her,
Unknown and unfelt before.

She wished her sweet leaves were winglets;
She strove from her stem to rise;
She yearned for a voice, to utter
The sense of her silent sighs.

She broke her rich heart with longing;
For passion she paled away;
Like a silvery shroud about her,
The mist of the morning lay.

From the cheeks of her sister roses
Tears rained on the green parterre;
And one white lily leaned o'er her,
Pure as an unbreathed prayer.

Katharine Frances M. Raymond.

The Madrigal.

At his recent Historical Concert, in Vienna, Herr Zellner prefaced the evening's programme by some remarks on the Madrigal. As they are highly interesting, we condense them for the benefit of our readers. In speaking of the Madrigal, a musical art-form which during a period of about a century and a half was almost the only one holding sway in the domain of secular music, we mean a part-song which is set to a short and pithy poem, and which, treated with more or less contrapuntal skill, possesses as its essential distinguishing characteristic freely invented melody, in contradistinction to the harmonized folk-songs, or the sacred compositions of the time, which were raised up on a given melody (the tenor) mostly borrowed from the Liturgy or the simple songs of the people. At a period when instrumental composition was in its infancy, performers were restricted exclusively to vocal productions. The impulse to find a common source of amusement in these productions set musicians harmonizing the folk-songs, which up to that time had been monodic. In consequence of the continually increasing demand for compositions of this description, musicians invented new ones on the same model. Thus arose the first steps towards the Madrigal in the shape of the Frottole, Strambotti, Canzone, Sonnets, Odes, &c., which formed essentially a category of their own. Like the Villanelles and Villottes subsequently, these are, it is true, artistic vocal compositions, though still fashioned after the folk-songs. The growing skill in counterpoint, however, yearned also to find employment in this branch of art. As such, it could not make use either of the primitive or the refined folk-song. It required, for its polyphonic efforts, short and pregnant phrases; it required characteristic motives, moulding themselves to the separate strophes of the verses. All this was not furnished by the folk's melody, which, at most, mirrored only the general sentiment of the poetry, but constituted a musical whole not capable of being resolved into separate parts. Such material had to be invented with special reference to the artistic object in view. The results of this process was the Madrigal, of which imitation must be considered as the musically technical fundamental form. This remained fixed, though, with time, extraordinarily extended as regards expressive fashioning of the melody; of richness of harmony; and of florid contrapuntal polyphony.

As the art of playing, especially the lute and harpsichord, grew more and more perfect and general, and, as on the other hand, the melody continued to become more and more singable and important in its purport, the vocal parts of the Madrigal kept diminishing in number, until at length only the uppermost one was sung, the next being given to the accompanying instrument. Thus did the Madrigal lead up to Opera, to Chamber-Cantatas, to Airs, and lastly to Songs, and herein consists the significance and importance of this form in the history of art. Its mission was now fulfilled; the Madrigal was gradually supplanted by the new art-forms which had sprung from it, and which proved more adapted for individual amusement, or better suited for the display of individual skill. But though, from the second half of the seventeenth century, the Madrigal lost its former popularity, it was still cultivated by many composers, on account of its form, down to the most recent times. Cherubini and Donizetti made essays in it.

The invention of the Madrigal belongs to the commencement of the sixteenth century. Its cradle was Italy, whence it soon made its way through the whole civilized world. The Netherlands were the first who learned how to move with graceful skill in this new form. In France it did not take deep root; the national composition, the chanson, retained the upper hand. Germany adopted the form, but on the whole, remained faithful to the essential attributes of the folk-melody. The Madrigal was cultivated most assiduously, and most in conformity with its original spirit, in England. Here it was also practiced longest, for even at the end of the last century there were numerous Madrigal Societies.

Before concluding this hasty sketch, we would direct attention to an interesting circumstance springing from the consideration of the historical position occupied by the Madrigal. We are enabled to deduce from it the most trustworthy possible conclusion as to the general condition of musical education in the fifteenth and sixteenth century. The enormous numbers merely of the madrigals which were printed, on the one hand, and, on the other, the great amount of artistic skill necessary to execute them, prove how wide-spread musical education was among all classes of society, and how solid it must have been. Indeed, at that period, no one could lay claim to being socially educated who could not sing a part of a madrigal at sight. This art, of which now-a-days not many professional singers can boast, was looked upon as something that was quite a matter of course, though the difficulty of a vista reading was then far greater than it is now, because there were no scores, no bar-lines, or minute guiding signs, and no hints as to the time and style.—Lond. Mus. World.

Personal Relations of Great Masters to Each Other.

WEBER AND BEETHOVEN.

That the professors of music (composers and virtuosos), and those of the dramatic art (operatic singers and performers of the spoken drama), are approached more than the members of any of the other branches of art with impatient and envious egotism, is a certain fact, and as a rule, the charge is not, after all, unfounded. We have not many examples of composers expressing themselves concerning a rival to their fame as Haydn did concerning Mozart, when the Estates of Prague asked him to write an opera for their Theatre. He declined complying with their request and wrote thus: "You have the great Mozart. Could I impress upon the soul of every lover of music, but especially of the great, as profound an appreciation, as much musical comprehension, and as great a love of Mozart's incomparable labors as I myself feel, nations would rise with each other for the possession of such a treasure. Let Prague hold fast to the dear man, but let her also reward him, for without this the history of great geniuses is a sad one, and this is the reason why so many men of promising genius succumb. It makes me angry to think that a man standing alone like Mozart is not yet engaged at some Imperial or Royal Court!" How often, in the contrary case, ought our indignation to have been excited, and to be so, still, on seeing at present every one consider himself as a rule, the very best person for filling every post!

The greater, therefore, is the obligation we are under of making a stand against the calumnies—which have become traditional—asserted against great composers in their personal relations to each other. To the category of stories believed without investigation belongs, for instance, among others, the story of the misunderstanding between Carl Maria von Weber and Beethoven. Weber is certainly not quite innocent of having given rise to this legend, since he was guilty of a youthful offence against the Sinfonia Eroica, which he handled rather roughly in a kind of humorous account of a journey. This was, indeed, incomprehensible in so highly gifted, though young, a composer as Weber, but he was excited probably only by a desire to be smart, and soon manifested in so plain a manner his high admiration of Beethoven, that we perceive how much he regretted his youthful indiscretion. As we have already said, what was bad in his conduct, however, went on increasing by report, while what was good was made known to no one, if known, disregarded and forgotten. What was good was as follows:—

Scarcely was Wilhelmine Schröder engaged at Dresden through the instrumentality of Weber, when the latter urged the production of Beethoven's Fidelio, which, by the way, he had already brought out at Prague. He put himself, accordingly, in communication with Beethoven, to whom, as his diary proves, he wrote concerning that work, on the 28th January, 18th February, 7th April, and 6th June, 1823, receiving letters from him on 16th February, 10th April, and 9th June. To the great loss of art, all trace of this correspondence between two masters of the first rank, concerning a work of the greatest importance, has disappeared through the carelessness of those intrusted with the preservation of Weber's papers. Only a fragment, the beginning of Weber's first letter to Beethoven (of the 28th January), remains in the rough draught. These few lines are, however, sufficient to exhibit in the most charming manner one of the noblest traits of Weber's heart, his child-like, unenvious admiration of what was great, and his high veneration for the first of German composers. He writes as follows:

"The production of this work; a mighty testimony of German greatness and depth of feeling, under my direction in Prague, afforded me an intimate knowledge, as in spiring as instructive, of its inward nature, and, with the help of that knowledge, I trust, assisted by every possible resource, to be able to introduce it, in all its effectiveness, to the public here also. Every performance will be a festival at which I shall be permitted to offer your lofty mind the homage existing for you in my inmost heart, where veneration and love struggle for the mastery."

The great master, not insensible to such genuine admiration, appears to have answered Weber in as friendly a manner as it was possible for him to do, for there resulted from this correspondence such friendly relations between the two, that the rough Beethoven, who was incapable of aught approaching hypocrisy, could, in a letter of the 17th July, 1823, addressed to Könnert, and containing a receipt for the forty ducats he received for Fidelio, employ the words—"according to the description of my dear friend, Maria Weber," &c. These friendly relations were still more consecrated and cemented by the personal acquaintanceship of the two composers. All the stories told by Schindler and others, about antipathy, nay, differences between Beethoven and Weber, are consequently maliciously or unconsciously invented fables.

Weber received the score of Fidelio from Beethoven himself, on the 10th April, and produced the opera on the 29th, with Wilhelmine Schröder in the part of the heroine, after fourteen rehearsals, conducted with the greatest care. The fair young singer surpassed the expectations formed even of the daughter of the Schröder. Though she was then far from giving the grandiose picture—distinguished for such genuine artistic finish—of the heroic wife, which we all so often admired, still she contributed essentially to the immense success of the opera.

When Weber, afterwards, late in the summer of 1823, went to Vienna, for the production of Euryanthe, he was told that Beethoven had said to Steiner, the music-publisher: "I am glad that you publish a German work again. I have heard a great deal of good of Weber's opera. I hope it will produce him and you abundance of money and honor." When Weber's Freischütz was making the great sensation it did, Beethoven read the score through, and said in the presence of some of his friends:

"What an idea! I should never have believed it of the little man, who is generally so mild! Weber must now write operas; regular operas; one after another, and without bestowing too much trouble on them! Caspar, the monster, stands out like a house. Whenever the Devil puts his claws in the business, you feel them, and no mistake!"

On being reminded by some person present of the second finale, and of the previously unknown musical effects it contained, he said:

"Yes, that is certainly true; but it has a strange effect on me. I certainly see what Weber means, but he has put in some devilish queer stuff! When I read it—for instance the part with the wild Huntsman—I am compelled to laugh—yet there is no doubt it is the right thing."

Having got Haslinger previously to announce his coming, Weber drove with him and Benedict, on the 5th October, to Baden, where Beethoven resided. The three men were moved, on entering the desolate and almost poverty-stricken room inhabited by the great Ludwig. It was in the utmost disorder. Music, money, and wearing apparel were strewn upon the floor, while linen was heaped upon the dirty bed; the open grand piano was covered with thick dust, and some broken coffee-things stood upon the table. Beethoven advanced to meet them. Benedict says:

"It was thus that Lear or the Ossianic Bards must have looked. The hair was thick, grey, and standing up; in some places, however, it was quite white; the forehead and skull were wonderfully broad, arched and lofty, like a temple; the nose was square like that of a lion; the mouth was nobly formed and soft; the chin was broad, with those wonderful folds, depicted in all the portraits of him, and formed of two maxillary bones, which seem to have been made on purpose to crack the hardest nuts. Over his broad pock-marked face was spread a dark red tinge; beneath his bushy eyebrows, sternly contracted, small, sparkling eyes gleamed mildly on us as we entered; the Cyclopean, square-built form, only a little taller, however, than Weber's, was clad in a shabby dressing-gown, torn at the elbows."

Beethoven recognized Weber before the latter was named, and folding him in his arms, exclaimed: "So here you are, eh? You are a devil of a fellow, that you are! May Heaven bless you!" He then immediately handed him the celebrated tablets, and a conversation sprang up, during which Beethoven first flung the music off the sofa, and then, without any ceremony, dressed himself in the presence of his visitors to go out. Beethoven complained bitterly of his position; abused the managers of the theatre; the getters-up of concerts; the public; the Italians; public taste; but more especially the ingratitude of his nephew. Weber, who was deeply moved, advised him to tear himself away from such a disgusting and discouraging state of things, and make a professional tour through Germany, when he would see what the world thought of him.—"Too late!" exclaimed Beethoven, seizing Weber demonstratively under the arms, and dragging him off to the "Sauerhof," where he used to dine. Beethoven was here all cordiality and warmth towards Weber. The latter writes:

"—We spent the middle of the day with each other, very merry and well-pleased. This rough, forbidding man absolutely paid court to me, waiting on me at dinner with as much attention as if I had been his lady. In short, this day will always be a memorable one for me as well as for every one else present. I felt it a peculiar distinction to be overwhelmed with such affectionate respect by a man of so great a mind," &c.

Beethoven turned the conversation to Euryanthe, but Weber avoided the subject. Hereupon Beethoven said to Haslinger, across the table: "What sort of a libretto is it?" and, while Weber was writing down: "Very respectable; full of fine passages," Beethoven, who had seen Haslinger shake his head, burst into a laugh and exclaimed: "The old story over again! German authors cannot knock up a good libretto!" "How about Fidelio?" wrote Weber. "That was originally French," said Beethoven. "translated first into Italian and then into German." "And which libretto do you consider the best?" inquired Weber. "Vestalin and Wasserträger!" (Les deux Journées), exclaimed Beethoven at once.

When his visitors were about to leave, Beethoven embraced and kissed Weber several times, and held the latter's small hand in his own fist, exclaiming: "Success to the new opera! If I can, I will come to the first performance." Weber returned to Vienna deeply moved and edified.

Unfortunately, owing to the propagation of certain gossiping stories, among which Weber's youthful offence, of which Beethoven appears previously to have known nothing, against the Eroica, was used against him, the intercourse of the two great men was so far broken off that they no longer corresponded. Never, however, did they in any way run counter to each other.—Niederheinische, Musik-Zeitung.

Music in Leipzig.

The eighteenth Gewandhaus Concert was devoted to one work, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," which had not been performed for five years. It is undoubtedly Schumann's best vocal work; indeed all his compositions which were written about the same time with this cantata are more complete, calmer, and happier in tone than those produced before or after it. The period of painful suspense which had preceded the marriage was over; the door of the paradise for the opening of which he had been waiting so long was unbarred, and a time of quiet happiness commenced—as quiet, that is, as was possible with his nature.

Great and many as are the beauties of this cantata, it is not as a writer for voices that Schumann will be longest remembered. Fascinating as are his songs, it is not so much as vocal compositions—not by the beauty of their melody—that they so charm; it is rather from the wonderful variety and depth of feeling they reflect; his own feelings were so strong that they at once excite the feelings of those to whom he sings. The shortness, too, of most of his songs, as is also the case with his smaller pianoforte pieces, forces him to concentrate his ideas, thus saving him from the uncleanness and over-elaboration which characterizes too many of his larger works.

Schumann and his followers have tried with all their might to displace the usual form of recitative, substituting for it an arioso style. They think thus to make their compositions more interesting; they would give a picture of every passing idea, nay, of every word. The result is that the attention is as strained as in passing through a long gallery of cabinet pictures: perpetual diversity can be as monotonous as perpetual sameness, and is even more fatiguing. The followers of the Liszt-Wagner school go still further; they not only discard recitative, but would even banish the regular "air," substituting arioso for it.

But with all drawbacks "Paradise and the Peri" is a work to be enjoyed when well performed; it has a rich poetic coloring throughout, and a noble tone, and with all its faults, there is an entire absence of vulgarity. Unfortunately the performance this evening was not good; music of this airy, poetical description suffers more from a cold and careless execution than any other. Fräulein Alveleben (the Peri) was far too matter of fact and frigid; nor was her voice entirely in her command. The chorus, as usual, was unsatisfactory; the quality of tone, especially among the ladies' voices, was harsh, and the intonation frequently imperfect, nor did orchestra and voices always go together, it was evident that there had not been a sufficient number of rehearsals. Elaborate accompaniments, broken up into many bits, are far more difficult to give smoothly than to play through a symphony. The general badness of choral singing in Leipzig is a crying evil; but until a room is provided in which a choral work can be given and listened to with comfort there is not much chance of a radical reform.

Frau Schumann has given a concert this week. Her playing of the piano-forte part in Beethoven's magnificent trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1, was beautiful, both technically and musically; there was no exaggeration, no subordination of end to means—all was purely artistic; her associates, the Herren David and Lubeck, supported her as she and the music deserved. Frau Schumann also played her husband's "Carnaval," a curious piece, founded on the four notes, A, E flat, C, B (in German musical nomenclature A, S, (Es), C, H), which together form the name of a town in which lived a lady, to whom the composer was once warmly attached. It is more a clever burlesque and squib for the home amusement of those who can master the great technical difficulties, than for the general public, who, for the most part, were vainly trying to make out which was which of the many pictures indexed in the programme. Besides this, Frau Schumann also played smaller pieces by Schubert, Hiller, and Mendelssohn; to the last named ("Scherzo Capriccioso") she hardly did justice; in the music of the other two she was excellent, and was encored in Hiller's impromptu "Zur Gitarre." At the very general request of the public, Mozart's "Divertimento" in D, Op. 61, which had created so much interest at the last chamber music concert, was repeated this evening. Herr Seuff, of Leipzig, is publishing two new editions of this charming work—one in score and parts, the other with the first violin part as in the original, and the other instruments arranged for the pianoforte by Herr David, who also provides the violin part with fingering, signs of expression, &c. Such a work cannot be too well known.—Corr. of Orchestra, March 17.

The first of the yearly Fast Days falling last week, we had no Gewandhaus concert. Herr Riedel, as usual, took advantage of the day to give a performance in St. Thomas's Church, his choral society being thus able to have the assistance of the Gewandhaus orchestra. He selected for this occasion "John the Baptist," an unpublished oratorio by Herr Leonhard, a professor of the pianoforte in one of the Dresden music schools. The work has, I understand, been written several years, but had never previously been performed. The oratorio is in two parts, and is further divided into a series of pictures, representing the Baptist in various periods of his history.

It is difficult to speak of the music. Were correctness the only requisite for a great work, this oratorio would deserve great praise. From beginning to end the workmanship is entirely according to rule; there are no sins against form or grammar; and the parts seem to be all flowing and singable. But having granted this, it cannot but be asked, does mere correctness justify the production of a work occupying between two and three hours? Is what would satisfy a harmony master, if presented to him by a clever scholar, sufficient to interest the hearer? The answer must be decidedly in the negative. A work more thoroughly without life or character I have rarely heard; there are reflections of every composer from Bach and Handel to Mendelssohn—nay, even to Wagner. Number after number comes in the same painfully proper style, and vanishes without having left any impression. Herr Leonhard shows in some places that he has conceptions which, were his genius equal to his industry, might have been worked out effectively. One of these especially is No. 5, in the scene of the Preaching in the Wilderness; it is a double chorus for the repentant people (mixed chorus) and the self-righteous Pharisees (male chorus): here was an opportunity for musical contrast of which a great composer might have made striking use; but with Herr Leonhard it remains but a suggestion, albeit one of the best numbers of the oratorio. The Overture in which the choral "Nun komm' der Heiden Heiland" is introduced, is also above the average; the fugal writing is really good.

Throughout the oratorio great use is made of the choral, both in its simple form and as a cantus firmus for figurative contrapuntal treatment; the work is always respectable and grammatical, although not inspiring. It is impossible to avoid a feeling of regret that so much honest, painstaking labor should have been so thrown away; for an oratorio with so little original life in it a long existence is neither to be expected nor desired. The solo singers were Frau Dr. Reclam and Herr Schild, of Leipzig, Fräulein Baer, of Berlin, and Herr Weiss, of Dresden. Herr Schild acquitted himself the best. The choruses went fairly; but, as I have said before, good and precise choral effect is almost impossible in St. Thomas's Church.

Herr Gustav Schmidt, the excellent Capellmeister of our theatre, has just had his benefit, upon which occasion his opera "Prinz Eugen" was revived. The music is pleasing, taking a position somewhat between that of Lortzing and Flotow. It is unfortunate that there is only one female part, that of the brave Visandjère Engelliese. There is thus too little relief to the male voices. Fräulein Karg played and sang her part with capital spirit. The valiant, love-sick, poetical Wachtmeister, who cannot win his bride till he has written his song of praise of Prinz Eugen, der edle Ritter (the well known Volklied which runs through the whole opera), and Conrad, the clock-maker of the Black Forest, were given by the Herren Hertzoeh and Schild; the former both sang and acted well; the latter is very stiff as an actor, but his pure, expressive singing was highly appreciated. His song in the first act, "Als ich vom Schwarzwald zog fürbass," which if it be not founded upon a Volklied, has the true popular stamp (the German word Volk- thümlich is a better expression), and the song in the last act, "Jetzt kommt, ihr Uhren, müsst mit fort," were charmingly sung. The long-continued applause with which Herr Schmidt was greeted upon his entering the orchestra, and the enthusiastic call at the end of the opera, testified to the respect with which the public regard the man and the musician.

Frau Janner-Krall, of the Dresden Theatre, has been giving a series of representations in the opera; her performance as Marie in "The Daughter of the Regiment" and Susanne in "Figaro" are spoken of in the highest terms. I can myself record her entire success in the amusing operetta "Der Schauspieldirector," to which such charming Mozart music has been adopted (although it must be admitted that it is a shame to use his own music to put Mozart in a ridiculous light, especially when there is no historic ground for the incident), and in Offenbach's sparkling operetta "Le mariage aux lanternes." In the former she was well supported by her husband, Herr Janner, who was the very image of Mozart, and Herr Hölzel, late of the German Vienna opera, who gave a most humorous representation of Schikaneder, that forerunner of Barnum and tormenter of Mozart. In Offenbach's piece, Frau Janner-Krall and Frl. Karg were most amusing; the "scolding duet" was admirable. Frau Janner-Krall is a charming opera soubrette, acting and singing with brilliancy and with sparkling fun.—Ibid, March 24.

Gounod's New Opera.

The composer of Faust has become a celebrity whose career will be watched. Thus does the London Examiner speak of the production of a comic Opera from his pen:

At Covent Garden, happy in the Christmas success of an attractive pantomime, the English Opera Company has just been importing from Paris what will be one of its stock operas as long as it remains a company, Molière's "Le Médecin Malgré Lui," with M. Gounod's apt and delightful musical touches. They are very charming, and the humor of Molière shines even through the obscuring dulness of two interposed librettists. We never have understood, and we shall never understand, the pains that seems to be taken at opera houses to prevent good music and good literature from coming together. There must be a notion that, as they are next of kin, marriage between them is immoral; for sometimes, as in this case, extraordinary pains seem to have been taken to keep them apart.

The play, with its interspersed music, is given to us as the "Mock Doctor," and under that very name we have Molière's play Englished by Fielding, as great a humorist as himself. Fielding's "Mock Doctor," as a "ballad farce," which was acted at Drury Lane in 1733, with interspersed songs, (just as it is now acted, only with better music and worse words, at Covent Garden,) has credit in theatrical tradition as the first play in which—in the great room over St. John's Gate—Garrick performed in London. Nothing would have been simpler, easier, cheaper, or better than to have taken Fielding's version of Molière, omitting only the words for music originally introduced into that, and substituting those required by the new music of M. Gounod. Less trouble than has been taken to produce dialogue miserably spoilt, would have made this "Mock Doctor" perfect at all points, one of the most thoroughly delightful entertainments of our stage. As it is, we have, in an English version of the French libretto, the good flesh of Molière's shrewd, simple prose fishified by Mr. Kenney into what we suppose that gentleman to consider elegant verse.

We strongly advise the management of the English opera at Covent Garden to ameliorate the sad condition of the libretto of the "Mock Doctor," and promote to the office of translator of Molière, Henry Fielding, vice C. L. Kenney, resigned. As it is, however, the incidents being all repeated and even the dialogue reproduced, though in a wishy-washy way, there is enough of the ghost of Molière in the spoken libretto to make it more pleasant than one half the stuff that the ill-fed play-goer is content to swallow for his entertainment. And wherever M. Gounod strikes in, Molière seems to live again, and Louis XIV. himself to be sitting in state behind us, although M. Gounod wrote the music only seven years ago.

The music is quaint, piquant; exquisitely dramatic, where—as in the opening quarrel between Sganarelle and his wife, it touches Martine's back with the cudgel, and plays into her strain of wrath—it is following the spirit of Molière's dialogue. And when the little entertainments that Molière introduced into his plays by a company of musicians or otherwise are to be represented, we can't help fancyng that we hear Lulli revived, and that "les petits violons du roi" are in the Covent Garden orchestra. "Fais nous rire, Baptiste," Molière used to say to Lulli, and M. Gounod provokes laughter and smiles while he delights the ear with melody that, genuine as it is, probably was not written without a little previous study of the music of Lulli, Charpentier, and Cambert. Then, too, the piece has the advantage of Mr. A. Harris's genius for stage management. Well arranged little troops are poured on the stage, in old pastoral groups, to blend song and dance in that most exquisite finale of woodcutters resting from labor, and woodcutters' wives bringing them victual and companionship, which blends in unison tenors and basses with sopranos and trebles, interweaving them both with a third theme in a minor key.

The melody of that finale recurs with admirable effect at the close of the opera. Lucinda's lover appears bright with ribbons when he comes as chief singer in the entertainment of musicians, and the musicians carry antique instruments as if from the old family chest of viols, trebles, tenor and bass, guitar sort, viol da gamba sort, rebeck, theorbo, or whatever other antique instrument there be. Every morsel of the music is delicate in itself, and deliciously in character with the work to which it is wedded. It is well sung, too, at Covent Garden. Every part seems to be duly valued by its representative, Mr. Corri making much of Sganarelle; Miss Poole of Martine; Mr. Aynsley Cook of Geronimo; Mr. Dussek of Valère; indeed, there is not a part ill sung. The entertainment would be pretty nearly faultless if it were but purged of the Mock Poet, and Molière were left to speak for himself through Fielding's English.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 29, 1865.

During the past fortnight there has been but one theme for all of us to think about. Music itself instinctively made pause and listened to the very voice of God in the great national bereavement which suddenly fell upon us in the midst of a great general joy and gratitude the like of which no people ever knew before. These two experiences, making one little week so long, flashing the clearest light across the whole dark struggle of the past four years, fusing all hearts in one great solemn joy, and then in one great grief which only puts the seal of certainty upon the victory of Right, have made a Nation of us. Those were both great days, though one brought us the best news that a whole loyal people's heart could crave, that of Rebellion put down, its armies routed, captured and its leaders fled, and the other felled us to the ground, with a bewildering grief and horror, at the incredible announcement that our loved and honored President had fallen by the miserable hand of the assassin! They were great days, both, for they lifted us above all selfish thoughts or interests into a common consciousness in which we knew that we were one people, the children of the common Father, and that all mere individual concerns are petty and impertinent compared with that in which we all strive and wait, rejoice and mourn as one. In the experience of that one week, that Passion Week, we touched the heights and depths of feeling—but through all felt that we were one people, as we had never quite so fully felt before.

For so grand a victory a typical and crowning sacrifice was needed, to set the seal upon it before all the world; and he, who had so wisely, firmly, reverently, humanely, guided us through the long struggle,—he who had lived down all criticism and all opposition by patient, self-forgetting perseverance in the most trying, sublime work to which Providence had called him,—he, who had "borne his faculties so meek" and "been so clear in his great office,"—he who could say such touching words without any rhetoric,—he, who by manifest simplicity and goodness, by plain, unpretending, solid virtues, by absolute integrity and a patriotism that knew not self, by sincerest sympathy with the people, the nearer to all that he was not brilliant, but only full of the true life and purpose, had won the heart of all this people to a degree scarcely suspected by itself,—he, our good, great President, became the Nation's martyr! Now is our cause consecrated, now is our joy solemnized, now is our victory, which God hath given us, complete. This blow, no worse than so many deeds of the Rebellion, all prompted by the foul genius of Slavery, has that typical character that flashes its meaning instantly upon the minds of all the world: it sums up the whole story in itself; all these evidences were needed to convince mankind of what was so incredible, the fathomless infamy and villany of this Slave Power which has been trying to throttle a free government. It has extinguished the last spark of sympathy with the Rebellion, while it has made us so sad and sober, and yet so assured and strong as it is perhaps not possible to feel in gladder hours of triumph or in any mood less solemn.

This awful event, too, has flashed upon our minds and hearts and engraved there forever such a living likeness of the great example that we mourn, that we may well bless God that he has brought Abraham Lincoln, even by this mysterious means, so very near to every one of us henceforward. Our Nation has had its fathers, its great men, its heroes: now we have our Saint. Never was such sainting, so sincere and real, so sanctioned in the holy of holies of each honest heart of all the millions, as that of Abraham Lincoln on that wonderful Wednesday, the 19th of April, that day when the whole nation held funeral solemnity, spontaneous, unanimous, without need of pomp or form, or even of the bodily presence, "in its simplicity sublime!"

But we may not discourse on this great theme. On all sides are said better things than we can say. We had no hope to add anything—only we could not sit coolly down to write of music and Art criticism, as if nothing else had happened. Music, as we have said, was dumb when that blow fell. We were to have assembled in the Music Hall on Easter evening to find voice for our joy and gratitude in the great anthems of victory. The Handel and Haydn Society would have sung to us the "Hymn of Praise" and the great Handel choruses. But who could raise a voice, or lift a hand to conduct, in such an hour? Who had any ear or heart for music?

Every concert was of course suspended,—nay forgotten; every theatre was closed; there was but one thing that man, woman, child could think of; in spite of ourselves, all were religious then. We wanted to confer with one another, we sought comfort in extemporized meetings, where speech was reverent, earnest and inspired; but Silence was the only music great enough to satisfy. The spontaneous abstinence from all shows and amusements on that day, and after, was most beautiful and touching, and worthy of a great free people. We chanced once to witness the funeral of a king, and we wondered that the most musical nation on the globe could be restrained by proclamation and authority for several weeks from operas and concerts. But here it did itself, it was spontaneous and instinctive; for we loved our President, and we knew that the blow which bowed his precious head, was really aimed at the heart of the whole Nation and of Freedom.

Music in Boston.

Very briefly, and hardly more than perfunctorily, can we continue the record begun in our last. For want of room we only brought it down to Saturday night, April 8th. We would fain go back and dwell upon Mr. DRESSEL's third concert, of which we only gave the programme, but we must pass on.

On Sunday evening, 9th inst., Mr. WHITING played the Great Organ; his programme consisting of a Sonata in G, op. 38, by Best, of Liverpool; a slow movement by Beethoven; the overture to "Samson;" something for the Vox Humana; an Etude by Martini (old French organ music), and Handel's chorus: "Fixed in his everlasting seat." This was on the eve of the great news of victory and Lee's surrender, and the next Organ opportunity (Wednesday noon) was improved by Mr. LANG for the performance of patriotic pieces: first, Handel's chorus: "But as for His people" (Israel in Egypt); then improvisations on the "Star-spangled Banner," and the English national hymn, absurdly nick-named "America" by our psalm-book makers; then Bach's peace-breathing Pastorale in F; more improvisations, and finally the Gloria from Mozart's second Mass.

Wednesday afternoon, 12th inst., the ORCHESTRAL UNION gave its eleventh concert, and a very interesting one. We were glad to hear revived for once Mr. Franz Kielblock's Overture to his "Miles Standish" opera. It more than confirmed the favorable impression of the first and only hearing here five years ago. Mr. Henry Suck played the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto; with skill, grace and refinement, but with too little fire and vigor, as before in the case of the Mendelssohn Concerto. This was preceded by a good Strauss waltz, and followed by the stately march finale of the 2nd Act of Tannhäuser; and Liszt's "Preludes" closed the concert.

On Thursday, Fast Day, there was jubilant thanksgiving music, of a popular kind, at Tremont Temple, in which Miss Houston, Miss Ryan, the boys of the "Advent" church, Mr. Henry Carter, and others, took part, amid unfurling of the starry banner, &c.

On Saturday, 15th, came the lightning stroke out of a clear sky, and that suspended Mr. Paine's Organ Concert, with fine things of Bach and selections from his own new Mass; also Mr. Dresel's Concert in the afternoon: the Handel and Haydn national and Easter jubilation announced for Sunday evening; and turned the following Wednesday into a national funeral more eloquent than any music, because never was a people's mourning so sincere, and the universal feeling was itself a Symphony more deep and grand than any sounds could utter. There were, of course, solemn chants and anthems in the churches, and solemn dirges in the streets, but none great enough for the occasion.

Saturday, 22nd, the Organ was again opened, when Mr. WHITING played; Overture to Zampa (!); Andante from Mendelssohn's B-flat Sonata; Kulak's Pastorale; Prelude and Fugue by Brossig and Bach; Rossini's "La Carita" trio; and Mendelssohn's military band Overture, arranged by Best.

Saturday, 3 P. M. Twelfth and last Concert of the ORCHESTRAL UNION, largely attended, and listened to with great interest, for all the pieces were substantial favorites, such as wear well: Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Schubert's "Elegy of Tears;" the immortal Fifth Symphony, in which all the struggle and the victory, whether of the private soul or of a nation, tells its story; the Bridal Procession from Lohengrin; and the Funeral March by Chopin.

One is not easily reconciled to the thought of no more orchestral concerts. These twelve have been remarkably well managed in respect to programmes. In quality and quantity just right, with good variety and contrast. A larger orchestra, to be sure, is still always a desideratum with us, but the Orchestral Union and its leader may feel proud of the pleasure they have given, and the love of good music they have stimulated in such large and miscellaneous audiences. Let us just count up some of the solid wealth of the twelve programmes:

SYMPHONIES: Beethoven, Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6 (Pastoral), and 8.—Mozart, No. 3, in E flat, No. 10, in D.—Mendelssohn, No. 3 ("Scotch"), No. 4 ("Italian"), twice.—Gade, Symph. in B.

CONCERTOS: Mendelssohn for Violin, in E minor; Beethoven, do. in D.

OVERTURES: Bennett's "Naiads" (twice); Rietz, Concert Overture in A (twice); Rossini, La Gazza Ladra (twice); Herold, Zampa (twice); Auber, La Sirene (twice), Fra Diavolo (twice); Weber, Oberon; Beethoven, Fidelo; Mendelssohn, Ruy Blas and "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Kielblock, "Miles Standish."

To which add Liszt's "Preludes," arrangements from Wagner, Chopin, &c. Certainly rich enough for cheap and popular concerts. Let us hope that the return of Peace will bring us more musicians, plenty of strings, and especially a couple of fagottos, so that the Orchestra next year may be reinforced for still better service.

OTTO DRESSEL gave his fourth concert last Saturday afternoon (his visit to Philadelphia having been postponed by the national bereavement). Naturally, in those distracting weeks, he had not studied up so many new and weighty things for us, as in the preceding programmes, but wisely fell back upon good things in which he is always at home and which he has played before. To-wit:

Sonata, E flat, Op. 51.....	Beethoven.
Allegro.....	Scherzo.....
Scherzo, B flat minor.....	Minuetto.....
Wagner's Stammer Song, transcribed by.....	Finale.....
Rondo, Op. 16.....	Chopin.
Organ Prelude and Fugue, (A minor).....	J. S. Bach.
Etude, C minor.....	Chopin.
Song by Robert Franz, transcribed by.....	Liszt.
Valse Caprice, (No. 6), after Waltzes by Schubert.....	Liszt.

Never perhaps did the artist approach a public task in more reluctant, self-distracting mood; but the reaction came at the right moment to make the whole performance seem inspired. The fine, poetic, quaintly individual traits of that Sonata were reproduced with the most delicate yet strong vitality of touch. The Scherzo especially, and the Finale, were brought out with a beauty and consistency, a sharp precision of outline, a suffusion of one poetic sentiment throughout the whole, and a perfect distribution of emphasis, of light and shade, that made it charm more and mean more to us than ever before in many hearings and perusals. And so of the whole programme, the execution was so perfect, so poetic, that it was all a true refreshment to the soul after those long days of almost intolerable sorrow, wherein—was it not good for a people to learn that a public grief may be even keener, nearer, than one merely individual and private?

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.—We had hoped to have the full announcement and programme, for this number, of the great musical week in preparation for us. We are able, however, to give the number of performers who will take part in it somewhat more closely than we did before. The chorus will number about six hundred voices, and the orchestra one hundred instruments, including nearly all of the old "Germanians" and the best musicians in New York. The Festival will open, as we said before, on Tuesday, the 23d of May, with Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," than which nothing can be more appropriate to the times, and will end on the following Sunday evening with "The Messiah." Oratorios ("Israel in Egypt," "Elijah," "The Creation"), and grand concerts of orchestral and vocal music, will occupy the days and evenings intervening. The Society have been most earnest and assiduous in their rehearsals, and all the signs betoken a right glorious Festival, such as we trust every American who has any music in his soul will be at that time in the best mood to enjoy, albeit with a solemn joy.

PORTRAIT OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.—During the past week, Mr. Joseph Ames, the well-known artist, has piously devoted himself to the reproduction upon canvas of the vivid impress which he carried in his mind of the lamented President. It was time we had some likeness of the great and good man, other than the scare-crow photographs and lithographs (some of them sentimentalized after a most Byronical ideal of how a great man ought to look!) which meet us so discouragingly in every shop window. Mr. Ames had seen and loved the President, had talked with him and studied his features well, and his character in the features; he had also the best photograph that has been taken of him, and for which he sat expressly. With this impression vivified and fixed as by a lightning flash upon his mind by the late terrible event, he seems to have painted with a certain inspiration, giving his picture something of that same kind of melancholy interest which attaches to the Cenci picture, making it a portrait which one cannot help feeling, though he never saw the person, to be true. At all events, the character is there; it is the man whom we revere and love. Inevitably homely, it is yet a winning, trust-inspiring, noble face. The beauty of the soul shines through it. We may read there the qualities that have endeared him to this nation, and that bring him nearer to us personally now than when he moved and acted among men. The brow is fine and noble; the eyes full of mild, benignant light and unmistakable insight; the mouth good; and a warmth of wide-awake intelligence and quick, genial sympathy glows through the dark complexion. It is a face full of firmness, of clear, honest, noble purpose, of kindly, sweet humanity, with a slight play of humor, of self-forgetting simplicity, of superiority to all meaner motives than the love of truth and right, of God and Man. So should look our nation's saint and martyr, our second Washington, though nearer to us in a tenderer sense and not in time alone. We cannot help believing that every sorrowing patriot who shall look upon this picture will find a melancholy gratification, and will thank the artist or the good genius that inspired him to perform this work. As a work of Art it is one of the most, perhaps the most, successful product of his pencil.

Oliver Ditson & Co. have in press a convenient edition of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the oratorio complete. They have lately issued Costa's "Eli." The study of the Paulus is an excellent preparation for that of Bach. We hope that, by another year, they will be induced to publish Bach's Magnificat and set the Handel and Haydn folks at work upon it. Read our Berlin letter in the last number.

MILWAUKIE, APRIL 22.—Business has been suspended in our city, more or less, during the past week, on account of the recent national calamity. Wednesday was observed in an appropriate manner, and on Friday evening our Musical Society performed Mozart's "Requiem" in honor of our lamented chief magistrate. The day and evening were unfavorable, there being more or less snow and rain; but a very fair audience were in attendance at the performance of the funeral mass of the great composer. The Hall (the Society's new Music Hall) was appropriately draped in mourning, and the male and female singers were tastefully dressed—the latter in white, with black sashes. The performance occupied less than an hour, (several choruses being omitted on account of the necessarily limited number of rehearsals—) and reflected much credit on the Society's musical director, Mr. ABEL. Orchestra and chorus, for the most part, executed their parts well; but the soli were less acceptable, with the exception of the Benedictus, which elicited considerable applause. Mr. Rosenthal, I am glad to notice, was again heard to advantage by the audience, after a retirement of several years; and we hope he will continue to favor us with his magnificent baritone voice. The Misses B— and K—, sopranos, acquitted themselves well; while the alto gave but little evidence of study and progress. The tenor of the first quartet, Mr. J—, was not in good voice, and rather frequently out of time. The tenor in the Benedictus sang more agreeably.

We are to have two operas here, on the 1st and 2nd of May, by Grau's troupe, now in Chicago. They will give us "Trovatore" and "Martha."

Yours, &c.,

TENOR.

MUSICAL ACCENT.—At a trial in the Court of King's Bench (June, 1833) between certain publishing Tweedledums and Tweedledees, as to an alleged piracy of an arrangement of "The Old English Gentleman," T. Cooke was subpoenaed as a witness. On cross-examination by Sir James Scarlett, that learned counsel rather flippantly said: "Now sir, you say the two melodies are the same, but different. What do you mean, sir?" Tom promptly answered: "I said that the notes in the two copies were alike, but with a different accent."—Sir James: "What is a musical accent?" Cooke: "My terms are a guinea a lesson, sir." (A loud laugh).—Sir James (rather ruffled): "Don't mind your terms here. I ask you what is a musical accent? Can you see it?" Cooke: "No."—Sir James: "Can you feel it?" Cooke: "A musician can." (Great laughter).—Sir James (very angrily): "Now pray, sir, don't beat about the bush; but tell his lordship and the jury, who are supposed to know nothing about it, the meaning of what you call accent?" Cooke: "Accent in music is a stress laid on a particular note—as you would lay a stress on any given word, for the purpose of being better understood. If I were to say you are an ass, it rests on ass; but were I to say you are an ass, it rests on you, Sir James." Reiterated shouts of laughter by the court, in which the bench joined, followed this repartee. Silence being obtained, Lord Denman, the judge, with much seeming gravity, accosted the chopfallen counsel: "Are you satisfied, Sir James?" Sir James, deep red as he naturally was, had become Scarlett in more than name, and, in a great huff, said: "The witness may go down."

"Music," says Burney, "may be applied to licentious poetry, but the poetry then corrupts the music; not the music the poetry. It has often regulated the movements of lascivious dances; but such airs heard, for the first time, without the song or dance, could convey no impure idea to an innocent imagination; so that Montesquieu's assertion is still in force, that 'Music is the only one of all the arts which cannot corrupt the mind.'"

THE first regular Italian troupe was brought to this country by Signor L. Da Ponte, the composer of the libretto of "Don Giovanni" and many other plays. He was a companion of Mozart, and at one time manager of the London Opera-House, but for many years a resident of New York. Signor Montessor was the leader and primo tenore. Signora Pedrotti was the prima donna. The first representation was given at the Old Richmond Hill Theatre, and one or two representations at the Old Bowery. The Opera-House, corner of Leonard and Church streets, was built afterwards; but to Signor Da Ponte belongs the credit of attempting to make Italian Opera in this country a success.

THE rehearsals of "L'Africain" are to be as thorough as those of Meyerbeer's previous operas when under his personal supervision. A march in the opera was rehearsed at first with every instrument singly and separately, and when each player was considered to have mastered the music, the piece was rehearsed by the whole band.

A new lady violinist has appeared at Milan. She is a Signora Arditì, a sister of the well-known orchestra director.

Fidelio, thanks to Mr. Grover's German troupe, has been having a triumphant career westward. Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, have acknowledged its power; and in Pittsburg, a glowing account of its performance, in one of the papers, winds up thus:

None who object to its scarcity of arias, can ever have heard it performed as it was by this company last night, and no one, we feel assured, can hear the depth of earnestness and soul, with which it is imbued, without forever after entertaining a lurking disgust for the roudades, trills, tremolando and caprices of the Italian school of music, for which the great author of "Fidelio" cherished so magnificent a contempt.

THE success of the Marchisio sisters has induced other musical relatives to follow their examples; and the sisters Doria are now attracting attention by their singing in Genoa, where the great name they bear was once so powerful. They have also sung at Milan, Turin, Florence, Bergamo and Reggio. Duca Doria, the elder of the sisters, is a soprano; and Rosamond, the younger, a contralto. Both voices are said to be of excellent quality, unusually pure, full and liquid in tone, and possessing great flexibility, their singing invariably true and thoroughly musician-like, while their unaffected lady-like demeanor and strict propriety of conduct have won for them golden opinions wherever they have sung. These girls only assume the name of Doria, for they are really daughters of the English composer Barnett.

We remember the Misses Barnett and their brother as pupils in the Leipzig Conservatoire three or four years ago. They were accomplished pianists as well as singers.

ALBERT LAVIGNAC, a French musician, who gives classical soirées in Paris, has just revived there a famous sonata by Porpora, published in 1754. The readers of "Consuelo" will remember with affection the old music master Porpora.

At one of the minor theatres of Vienna a whistler named Piccolini is whistling his way to public favor. A correspondent writes that "he is a man of middle height and an elegant exterior. He whistled, with accompaniment of piano-forte, the serenade of Schubert, and the cavatina Casta Diva, from 'Norma.' He whistled double notes with great distinctness, and his shake was irreproachable; the sound is of the most agreeable quality, as well in the medium as in the highest part of the register. His intonation was never at fault, and one might be led to suppose that he was listening now to the song of the nightingale, now to the full and sonorous voice of the quail, and anon to the trill of the lark as it soars into the higher regions of the empyrean. The success of the whistler was emphatic."—Eve. Post.

A MUSICAL note-book of Beethoven discovered! Yes, Mr. Dwight, genuine! It has just been published at Leipzig. The original is an oblong folio of one hundred and ninety-two pages, bound before used, quite perfect, and contains twenty-five studies of works subsequently completed, and some ideas that were never matured. The date is supposed to be from October, 1801, to May, 1802, and as a record of Beethoven's thoughts it is invaluable.—London Correspondent of Commonwealth.

THAT was a fine touch of the Herald critic in which he described Gottschalk as receiving the silver crown presented to him on Friday with "Eolian murmurs." When he reaches San Francisco we guarantee that the modesty of "the great American pianist" will not prevent him blowing hard about it.—Play-Bill.

At the first representation of "La Flûte Enchantée," in Paris, this season, two ladies of the court, who were seated in a private box, talked so loud that even the orchestra began to manifest evidences of impatience. They paid no attention to the fact and continued the annoyance. Presently a lady, who occupied the adjoining box, came to their loge, and, getting the usher to open the door, said to them: "Excuse me, mesdames, but I love Mozart, and I have come from the country expressly to hear him." She then slammed the door, leaving the offenders agape with astonishment and the neighbors amused. It was Rosa Bonheur.—Play-Bill.

Dr. Carl Mendelssohn, son of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, is writing the Life of his Father.

Frl. Stehle, from Munich, has made her début at Vienna, and although possessing few aids to popular favor, has succeeded in pleasing the good-natured Viennese by her artistic singing and acting. Her most striking rôles are those of Margareta, and Elizabeth (Tannhäuser).

Mlle. A. Patti has quitted Paris for Madrid. Her last appearance in the French capital was in the character of Linda; and the favored artist had the gratification of singing before a most crowded and enthusiastic audience.

Mlle. C. Patti's tour in Germany continues to be one of the greatest triumphs. After a series of most crowded concerts at Hamburg, the Ullmann-Patti company were last heard of at Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

A nephew of Beethoven, Herr L. van Beethoven, was married on the 28th ult. to Frl. Marie von Nitsche, at St. Stephen's Vienna. Director Hellmesberger, a friend of the bridegroom, received on the occasion a magnificent cameo pin, formerly worn by the great composer.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Come o'er the sea. Song with chorus.

A. E. Winnerstedt. 30

One of Moore's songs, with new and very good music.

Tantum Ergo, and Ave Verum. Solo and trio, for Sop. Ten. and Bass.

R. Hall. 50

A fine piece, arranged from Sterndale Bennett, and fitted to use in the Catholic service.

Beauties of La Juive, by Halévy.

When first the heavenly grace. (Rachele, a quando a me). Romance for tenor.

35

One of the most effective pieces of the opera. It is that in which Lamsus the Jew is debating whether he will save Rachel, his reputed daughter, by confessing her true parentage, or sacrifice her to his hatred of the Christians.

My mother's cottage home. (Songs of Home).

W. O. Fiske. 30

Simple and melodious, with a good chorus.

A nation weeps. Dirge for Pres. Lincoln. Turner. 30

Suggested by the great national calamity.

When Sherman marched down to the sea. Song. 30

May fairly be called a "glorious" song. One of our best new national lyrics.

Instrumental.

Annie Laurie.

B. Richards. 30

Players will be glad to see their old favorite, arranged as Richards knows very well how to arrange. Good throughout, and fine for learners.

Chant du Bivouac. Fantasia Brillante.

E. Kettner. 50

An air by Kücken, arranged in dashing style. It has a military ring to it, and will be an effective show piece.

Faust galop. For Violin or Flute, and Piano.

S. Winner. 30

Gipsy Polka. " " " 30

Two more of Winner's acceptable arrangements, with very easy accompaniments. The whole set is called "Social Pastime," and, so far, all the pieces are useful, attractive and easy.

Now the early morn. (Parigi, O Cara). "La Traviata."

C. Grobe. Op. 1569. 40

This is No. 41 of Grobe's Operatic tit-bits. The air is known by the title, "O loved Italia," as well as by the above, and is a favorite. An excellent piece for learners. Of medium difficulty.

In memoriam in honor of President Lincoln. 30

President Lincoln's funeral march. 30

Requiem march for President Lincoln.

W. O. Fiske. 30

Three solidly good marches, called forth by the recent afflictive event.

Books.

Fifty pieces for the Organ, (not difficult, and carefully figured), consisting of Offertories, Elevations, Communions, Versets, Sorties, Preludes, &c. By Edward Batiste, Organist of St. Eustache, Paris. Cloth $4.00. B'ds. 3.50

Batiste has, perhaps, more reputation than any other, as a composer of the lighter style of organ pieces, and has the rare talent of arranging good music so as not to be difficult. Any organist of common power of execution is able to play these pieces.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 629.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 4.

Meyerbeer's "L' Africaine."

By this time, probably, the long expected post-humous chef d'œuvre of the great master of grand spectacle opera has been brought out in Paris. By last accounts, the first representation was fixed for the first day of May. Figaro contained, some five or six months ago, a long description of the plot and music, from the pen of Mr. Charles Beauquier, a young French writer, author of a work entitled "Philosophie de la Musique," which was to appear anon in Paris. To allay the curiosity of our readers, we translate from M. Beauquier's article—through the medium, however, of the Leipzig Signale, as we have not the French at hand.

The new opera has no Overture, properly speaking, but only a somewhat lengthy introduction, consisting of an Andante, whose motive, of grand design, is sung at the close of the second act by Inez.

In the first scene we hear from the mouth of Inez a sweet and melancholy ballad, in which she laments her hero and lover, the brave Vasco da Gama; she supposes he has perished in the waves with Bartolomeo Diaz. This piece with its gloomy feeling seems akin to the romanticism of the German song poetry, and in spite of its sombre coloring it is well calculated to become fashionable in our saloons.

Inez's father, the Admiral (M. Castelmare) and her bridegroom Don Pedro (Belval) enter, and, as if they had read what was passing in her heart, announces to her that Vasco da Gama has really perished. A terzetto, based upon a very melodious phrase, deserves to be prominently noticed here. This phrase, distinguished by peculiar elegance, is first sung by Inez, to be taken up again, with new artistic developments, by the two bases.

The principal part of this first act, which might also be termed the most important of the whole opera, is at any rate one of the most extensive pieces of music that we know, inasmuch as it occupies more than half of the entire act.

Meyerbeer has here made it his design to paint a historical scene in all its details. The conflict of the various passions represented in this picture rises to an effect bordering on the sublime. The bishops and the grandees of the State, under the presidency of Don Pedro, have assembled to discuss the schemes of Vasco da Gama, who has, after all, got safely home again, and to vote upon the proposals of the bold navigator. The Council enter to the sound of a march, in no wise inferior to the best which Meyerbeer has achieved in a form in which he was always so felicitous. Hereupon the composer develops a movement which is superb and grand in thought, and carried out with live, vigorous, and at the same time supple outline. Its forms stand out all the more clearly and powerfully, that they are sung unisono by all the bases. This chorus, with its masterly and peculiarly handled orchestral accompaniment, is of an indescribable effect. The splendid motive turns up repeatedly in the course of the commingled scene of choruses, solo airs, recitatives and ensemble pieces. When the debate grows too warm, it is taken up again, ironically, by the Grand Inquisitor, and every time appears in a new form. This thought is the melodic bond which holds the different parts of the grand whole together.

Let us run over some of the particulars of this Council scene:

In a long recitative, rich everywhere in artistic traits, and having nothing in common with Tannhäuser's narrative of his pilgrimage, Vasco da Gama (Naudin) tells of the storms he has survived and of the lands which he has passed in sight and which he proposes to go in search of again. As proof of the veracity of his statement he offers the testimony of two slaves whom he has rescued from the wreck. But Celika (Mlle. Marie Sax), Queen of Madagascar, and Nelusko (M. Faure) have taken the oath of silence, and so place Vasco in the most frightful quandary. The members of the Council are divided in opinion and, while some credit his account, others declare him an impostor. The stormy debate gives the composer an opportunity for daring feats of harmony only justifiable to such a fertile and powerful talent as his was: Vasco has to retire; the assembly press the matter to a vote, while you hear in the orchestra the ritournelle of the before mentioned musical phrase, worked up and developed in an effective manner. Vasco appears again. Don Pedro, who means to appropriate the hero's plans and use them in his own interest, reads the decision of the Council, in which Vasco's proposals are rejected. The navigator is beside himself with rage; he rails at the powerful assembly, and the Grand Inquisitor hurls his anathema against him. The scene closes with an ensemble, an Allegro with a strongly pronounced rhythm and of extraordinarily powerful effect.

Act II shows us Vasco in prison. He is stretched upon his bed in slumber, and his slave Celika watches over him. Vasco dreams of Inez and of his voyage;—a horn solo, of ravishing effect, accompanies the dream; the Africaine chants a cradle song, to lull the restless sleeper,—a strain of true oriental coloring and quite in keeping with the character of the singer. Having succeeded in rocking the man whom she secretly loves into a more quiet slumber, the poor slave, whose jealousy is awakened by the name of Inez, abandons herself to her ungovernable anguish, and an extremely characteristic theme depicts the passion of which her heart is full. This fiery motive forms a happy contrast to the lightly cadenced rhythm of the lullaby. But Vasco stirs, he seems on the point of awaking, and Celika relapses into the original melody, this time accompanied by a violin solo, whose forlure cover the song as with a fine lace veil.

Musically and dramatically, this scene is most admirably treated.

Suddenly Nelusko stands before Celika and informs her, that he has come to murder the sleeping Vasco. Faure on this occasion sings his great aria, whose effects allow him to exhibit all his virtuosity and ensure his success. The hot and glowing motive, developing with energy, and passing into a pathetic crescendo, relates the hatred and the thirst for vengeance of the slave. An Allegro full of passion and of verve forms the close of this interesting number. At the moment when Nelusko raises his poniard over his master, the latter awakes and asks the frightened slave what he is about. Nelusko retreats noiselessly, and the orchestra accompanies his exit with the motive of the Allegro he has just been singing.

Still full of the suddenly interrupted images of his brain, Vasco pursues his waking dream, and again the name of Inez escapes his lips. He will "find the longed for passage round the point of Africa." . . . Again his schemes absorb him altogether; all else has vanished. He draws upon the wall a map of the countries which he seeks. Celika, seeing his pencil arrive at the point where the Cape of Good Hope lies, arrests his arm and cries: "You are mistaken, look here—here, here is an island, Madagascar, of which I am Queen, the land in which they took me captive." Vasco in his geographical enthusiasm falls upon the neck of the learned slave and declares he loves her. This love encounter gives occasion for a duet, whose musical charms enable us to forget the improbability of the scene. This number may vie with the most melodious pieces of Italian song. Between the theme and its resumption there is a delicious passage, binding the two together like a flowery wreath. In an Andante of noble character Celika confesses to her master that she has long loved him.

A solemn sound of bells interrupts this outpouring of hearts, and Nelusko comes in to explain the meaning of this Sunday music, namely, the wedding of Inez and Don Pedro, in honor whereof the prisoners are set free. In fact Don Pedro and Donna Inez make their appearance; they have overheard and seen the tender demonstrations between Vasco and Celika. With death at her heart, Inez confesses to the object of her passion, that she has merely consented to the marriage with Don Pedro to purchase Vasco's freedom. Vasco utters a cry of anguish, and sobbingly exclaims, that Celika, this much dreaded rival, is only a slave, and offers to make her a present of the chattel. Here Meyerbeer has introduced a concerted piece of a peculiar kind. It is an unaccompanied sestet, written with remarkable knowledge of the vocal means. In a recitative, which the orchestra accompanies with a very original melody, Don Pedro announces that he has been appointed chief of the expedition proposed by Vasco da Gama, and that he intends to take his young wife with him.

Now follows another ensemble piece descriptive of the grief of Inez and Vasco. In this recurs the phrase sung by Inez, which forms the motive of the instrumental introduction of the opera. The scene and the act close with an unaccompanied ensemble, which softly dies away while the curtain falls.

[We are spared the trouble of translating farther from the article in Figaro, and may give what relates to the third act as we find it already done into English (albeit with some manifest embellishments) in the London Telegraph].

Taking a general view of the work, so far at least as can be judged from the first two acts, it abounds in fresh and graceful melody, and in this respect is superior to the last two works produced by the maestro. The closing scene of the first act excepted, which sounds very Meyerbeerian indeed, and betrays the composer of the Huguenots in every bar, one is reminded of Robert and of the warm and flowing airs of his pre-diabolical times. Perhaps it will not contribute to the popularity of the work and the impression produced by the whole, that the three following acts are said to have been written in a somewhat different style. It is well known with what care and indefatigable solicitude Meyerbeer matured this favorite work. Twenty years ago the libretto had to be written twice over by the scribe. From the same time dates the music of the first act, which is divided from the second by an interval of ten years. The rest belongs to a later period. As he wished to outdo himself in point of melody and intrinsic worth, he also took care to provide for the requirements of the stage by inserting numerous hints to the manager, introducing varianti, and the like. The score, written by his own hand, is the admiration of all who have seen it. On every page additions are proposed and appended, curtailments suggested and carried out. In many instances the orchestra has to choose between three passages or cadenzas ad libitum. M. Fétis, who knows and loves the music of Meyerbeer as few among the living, decides, in his capacity of musical executor, on the definite form of the text and music without appeal.

Don Pedro, having despoiled Vasco of his bride, hastens with his fair one to embark. Here an opportunity offers for the masters of French machinery to vie with the maestro of the musical art. The whole of the third act takes place on board ship. A great vessel fills the entire width of the stage, and is in point of artistic construction asserted to beat even the Warrior and La Gloire. It so far, however, differs from all that has ever been seen before as to show cabin and deck at the same. But it is not enough that the audience is placed in the position of le diable boiteux, who, unthatching houses, pried into their most recondite mysteries; he is occasionally converted into a demon riding on the wings of the storm, and looking down upon the laboring vessel from the height of the clouds. By some ingenious contrivance, the vessel now and then "moves on," and appears in full life-like rotundity in the distance, without any trace of its former hemispherical division. It veers round, comes to, catches quarter winds, and performs all the most approved feats of nautical science.

The curtain rises after a symphonic introduction of soft and dreamy coloring; it is, I believe, intended as a transcription musicale of sunrise at sea. A gay and pleasant chorus is heard resounding from the cabin of Inez's ladies. Besides the girls, already sporting about at this early hour, Don Pedro (Belval) is awake in his cabin. Of course, he cannot but praise himself for beginning work and pondering over his charts while others are still asleep. His ambitious and highly moral solo is, however, gracefully interrupted by the various abigails of his bride entering upon the day's labor in their own cheerful and musical way. The drum beats. The guns thunder their morning salute into the air. The crew awake, and, crawling from their hammocks, sing a grand chorus, accompanied by a quartet which stands out conspicuously from the harmonious background of the other voices. With peculiar instrumentation for the drums and double basses, this piece is distinguished by a most energetic and novel rhythm. At length the bells announce morning prayers. The male voices intone a peculiar motivo in unison; the females join with an equally expressive theme; the two melodies gradually blending, until at last a grand and harmonious crescendo concludes the passionate and impressive prayer. This ensemble, which is conceived in a severe and religious style, has little accompaniment, and bears the character of a chorale. It has not improperly been likened to a well-known piece in the fourth act of Les Huguenots. Thus three choruses succeed each other without interruption; yet so different are they in point of character and treatment, that the interest will not be found to flag. That all possible sensations may be exhausted one after the other, no sooner have the sailors finished praying than they begin to dance to a queer sort of double step, the accompaniment being remarkable rather for its new and peculiar harmonies than for its terpsichorean attractiveness. Be it observed in this place, that Meyer-beer, intending for once to write an opera without a ballet, did not insert in it any of the dancing choruses or singing dances, for which his preceding works have been so warmly praised by a large, and that not the least influential, portion of the public. So heinous a crime against taste could not, however, be tolerated by the members of the Jockey Club. The news of this strict Puritanism having spread amongst them, a feeling arose which made it evident to M. Perrin that the violation of their privileges would not be regarded with indifference. Accordingly it was resolved to slip in just a slight souppon of pas de deux and pirouette à l'Empereur de Japon; and, as he who seeks is ever sure to find in the long run, a chorus was fortunately discovered, so brisk, easy and gay as to admit being executed with the feet as well as the voice. Again, amid the various readings the maestro left behind him for a number of passages, there are some which so readily offer themselves for conversion into ballet airs, that M. Fétis, the musical executor, must have had a heart of stone had he turned a deaf ear to the protests of the fair danseuses and aristocratic patrons; and thus the serious views of the great deceased will probably, after all, be foiled. Already the necessary hints have been given to M. St. Léon, the celebrated choreographer at St. Petersburg, who, in preference to his Paris brethren, has been charged with the invention of the divertissements.

But to return to the libretto. Don Pedro, who was alone in his cabin, suddenly finds Don Alvarez, the confidant of Vasco da Gama, standing before him. The apparition greatly surprises the gallant commodore, since he had no inkling of the gentleman in question being on board. Alvarez is not long in telling him that an ardent wish to take part in the glorious venture having caused him to request, the permission of the Admiralty, he was lucky enough to obtain it. Moreover, having made the voyage once before, he will be useful to Don Pedro—an assertion he proves at once by betraying to him that the mate, an individual as thoroughly wicked as the requirements of the occasion can demand, is diverting the ship from her proper course, in order to wreck her on some uninhabited coast. But this treacherous officer is no other than Nelusko. For the better understanding of the most poetically romantic text, we should inform the reader at once that he as well as Celika had also managed to embark in the vessel at the eleventh hour and seemingly without the knowledge of her captain. The Queen of Madagascar, if we have fathomed the poet's meaning—which we are by no means confident we have—was received among her ladies of the bed-chamber by the royal Inez. Once there, she had no particular difficulty in getting her trusty slave to wait upon her; which slave, once in, was accidentally discovered to know the way to the unknown regions, and was accordingly constituted mate. Out of hatred of the Europeans, the treacherous African, so far from holding his course to possible continents, has secretly resolved upon taking the ship to his native shores, and either wrecking her on the sands or delivering the crew to his cannibal compatriots. But, though he may be very malicious, he can sing. In a most original melody, without accompaniment, he shouts his commands to the doomed crew, giving forth with peculiarly sonorous tones an echo which reminds one of a speaking-trumpet. At this moment the good ship begins to move, and majestically ploughs the waves. A long recitative here occurs, and is expected to form one of the principal attractions of the opera. It is sung with much vigor and suggestive energy by M. Faure. Don Pedro will not credit the charge preferred by Alvarez. He deprecates any further calumnies being hawked about in regard to his trusty mate, calls Nelusko, and, to give him a signal proof of his confidence, confers upon him in due form the supreme direction of the ship. Seeing vengeance thus insured, the slave skips about in savage delight. A bark is at length sighted. An unknown boards the ship. The reader will feel instinctively, and without a moment's doubt, that the stranger can be no other than Vasco da Gama.

After the departure of his enemy he has equipped a ship at his own cost. It must be either clipper-built, or provided with screw and steam-engine by some unchronological make-shift, for it has overtaken the other, though at the time of starting its captain had no plan. Vasco now comes to tell his enemy that he is in the wrong course. Knowing this to be the case, one is perhaps entitled to wonder at his coming in the wake, and being able to warn a rival against continuing his voyage. Nevertheless, he does warn him, in a splendid Allegro, which, being as energetically responded to by Don Pedro, develops into an interesting and dramatic duet. In the course of their melodious altercation, Vasco avows that a wish to save Inez has been the cause of his cautioning him against steering N.N.W. Don Pedro, in a beautiful Andante, directs the attention of his generous foe to the imprudence of the avowal. Vasco, he begs to suggest, finding himself on board his ship, is in his power, and may be dealt with according to the captain's pleasure. Upon this, relapsing into the melody of his first Allegro, Vasco becomes exceedingly angry, and, seconded by bassoons and kettle-drums, challenges the cowardly commander, flinging his gauntlet in his face.

The noise of the quarrel brings all hands on deck. Some petty officer orders them to throw Vasco overboard. Inez and her companions interfere, in a septet of Italian cast and melody. In its soft mellifluous tones, it is the only piece of the last three acts reminding one of the style of the first two. However, it is most effective, for it saves Vasco's life and procures him honorable imprisonment and a place at the captain's table during the passage. But the music has not so far prevailed over the criminal designs of the captain as to cause him to abandon all thoughts of revenge. This monster in human form will dine with Vasco, instigating Nelusko at the same time to free him of the disagreeable passenger. Female influence, however, once again saves him. If Inez is his guardian angel in the first instance, so Celika is in this. She has heard of the plot; she will prevent it. She orders Nelusko—who, we ought not to forget, amid the variety of other characters in which he appears, is all the while her slave—to save the gallant adventurer from the clutches of the would-be assassin. In a beautiful duet, Nelusko promises to spare Vasco, being, by way of compensation, allowed to destroy the rest.

Most opportunely, however, a hurricane ensues. Still more lucky is it that, whilst the tempest howls and the waves rise in furious rage around the devoted crew, the savages should make their appearance in numberless boats preparing to board the corvette. Another moment, and the destinies of the good ship are fulfilled. The Africans climb on to the deck; and a quaint and characteristic chorus ensues. While matters are in terrible disorder, Nelusko quietly scuttles the ship, which, rearing on her beams, magnificently sinks to the bottom of the sea. Of course Vasco and Celika are saved, and the latter is recognized as their Queen by the appeased pirates. The musical rendering of the tempest is a chef d'œuvre in itself. I will shortly send you more about the fourth and fifth acts.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

BY OTTO JAHN.

[Continued from page 20.]

Fortunately, the critical editor of Beethoven finds himself placed in a comparatively favorable position for the execution of his task. The master belongs to a time, with the events and circumstances, the thoughts and sentiments, the artistic conception and execution of which, in all essential points, we have not to render ourselves acquainted by laborious investigation; to a time of which the aspect and comprehension are at once clear, and only now and then, in isolated cases, require the aid of more particular knowledge. The composer himself, moreover, is no strange personage, whom we are compelled to bring near us by means of any artificial apparatus. He is at present too near us; we live with him, nay he even rules us, and, if anything is still wanting to our comprehension of him, it is not because he belongs to a Past which must be revived, but that he has outstripped even the generation coming after him, a generation which still looks up with reverence to him as he stands above it. So many and such important works, of various descriptions and stages of development, do we possess of his, that, by searching study, we are able to form so decided and sharply defined an idea of his artistic individuality, as regards his natural tastes and his education, as well as of the mental conception and technical facture of his compositions, that we thereby obtain sure guides for the formation of a critical decision. Finally, the editions of his works which have been handed down to us, though unequal, as well as here and there uncertain and defective, afford, on the whole, so sufficient a foundation for the critical restoration of what he wrote, that a satisfactory result may be achieved by their means. Nevertheless, in the exercise of criticism, even under these favorable circumstances, all the dif-facilities, questions, and doubts, which can present themselves to no one but a philological critic, have to be taken into consideration, and, in this instance, as in all others, can be solved by genuinely philological method alone.

As is well known, Beethoven wrote a very illegible hand. Not to speak of sketches and plans, which are naturally privileged to be scarcely decipherable, even in the ill-shaped and crabbed characters of the clean copies which he made of his own compositions, we fancy we perceive the impatience and annoyance at ideas and thoughts having to be fixed by the aid of written signs. In addition to this is the fact that Beethoven, even when he had completely noted down a composition—which, as a rule he did very rapidly, after working for a long time at the separate parts—was accustomed to make alterations, which were not written in a very neat hand. The result is that his manuscripts generally produce a discouraging impression at first sight, and do not appear very promising to any one seeking information from them. But when a person has made himself acquainted with the peculiar strokes and general style of the hand, and become accustomed to the latter, he feels convinced that, despite the apparent carelessness, the writer took pains to render plainly whatever was important for the comprehension of the whole, and that he wrote with attention and care. If the reader, who, of course, must appreciate the value of the interest at stake, does not shrink from the labor of deciphering, he will, as a rule, be sure to find out what Beethoven intended. It is, therefore, of great importance to consult, in the last instance, the original manuscripts. Scarcely one of them can be thus consulted without its enabling us to correct faults, some of which afterwards escaped the notice even of the composer himself, when correcting the proofs for the press.

At first, when Beethoven was somewhat more careful in his writing, he may have made clean copies himself for the press, and this may partly explain why we possess, comparatively speaking, fewer original manuscripts of his earlier works, though there is hardly any doubt that in his younger days he took, as a rule, less care of such manuscripts than he afterwards did. Subsequently, however, he let the engraver have only copies revised by himself. His copyists had no easy task with him. Even for an experienced copyist, his hand-writing was continually offering fresh difficulties, and, in doubtful cases, to hit upon the right reading was, with Beethoven's peculiarities, even for a person who had enjoyed a musical education, a hazardous task. The work of revision, which he performed with the copyist, usually gave rise to exceedingly animated scenes, and the copyist was obliged to hear, in joking and serious language, very severe reproaches levelled at himself. Despite, however, of the most violent impatience, Beethoven was excessively particular about these corrections, and all the copies looked through by himself afford evidence of the conscientious care he took to render them correct and clean. It is, consequently, natural that, in these copies, a few errors and inaccuracies which escaped notice in the original should be corrected, although in the copies themselves some fresh mistakes have, now and then, crept in, and must be corrected by the aid of the originals, so that copies and originals mutually control each other, the decision in doubtful cases being left to the deliberate judgment of the critic.

Great importance may be possessed by parts employed at performances conducted by Beethoven. Everyone with any experience knows, it is true, that faults remarked at rehearsals are by no means always accurately corrected in the parts; but whenever there is a correction we may assume it was especially intended and ordered. In a controversy that has been much discussed, the parts corroborated certain facts, though their corroboration was scarcely needed. As we are all aware, in the year 1846, at Mendelssohn's instigation, a letter of Beethoven's of the 21st August, 1810, was made public. In that letter, Beethoven informs the publishers that in the parts just engraved of the C-minor Symphony, there are two bars too many in the "Scherzo," and that they must be cancelled. The correction was not made. The two bars were transferred into the printed score, the parts, and all the arrangements; but, when the rectification appeared, Beethoven's own categorical statement, strange to say, was in opposition both to internal and external evidence. A glance at the original score, in possession of Mendelssohn—proved plainly how the mistake had arisen. The person who wrote the copy intended for the printer, mistook an alteration of Beethoven's, while Beethoven overlooked the mistake when correcting the proofs. Besides this, the orchestral parts employed when the Symphony was first produced, as well as when it was, on several occasions, repeated, under Beethoven's direction, do not contain the two bars in question. There can, therefore, be no doubt that he did not want them. Of course they are not admitted into the new edition.

The music to Egmont is now published freed from the additions which disfigured it. In writing his interludes Beethoven's great object was so to connect the conclusion of one act with the commencement of the next, as to lead us, at once from one to the other. Three of these interludes have not, therefore, a definite musical conclusion, but end, after the curtain has gone up, with a characteristic half-finish. The performance of the music, as Beethoven wanted it, presupposes, it is true, a very nicely calculated and careful mode of putting the piece upon the stage. In order to keep up the good old humdrum way of doing business, and, also, to render the interludes useful on other occasions, it was thought desirable that they should have additions definitely terminating them, and Beethoven—a rare thing for him—complied with "practical requirements," and agreed that the musical corrector in Leipzig should make such additions. These, according to the practice of the day, were printed with the rest, without the slightest explanation, and consequently passed for authentic, though they partially annihilated the original intentions of the composer. As a matter of course, they are entirely omitted in the new edition.

In this instance, all that was requisite was to refer to Beethoven's autograph manuscript, just as it was for a correction in the last Quartet (Op. 135), the circumstances connected with which are most extraordinary. In the last movement of this Quartet, two bars were omitted in the part of the first violin. As a matter of course, it could not fail to be observed, when the score was printed, that all the parts did not agree as a whole. The corrector however, did not look for the fault where it really existed, but left the first violin part incorrect, and altered so much in other parts as to render the passage endurable, it is true, though more thoroughly vitiated than if the original error had remained untouched. A comparison with the autograph manuscript immediately showed what was the correct reading, and thus a passage which appeared exceedingly strange and suspicious, but which it would have been impossible to correct, because the real fault was hidden under a false emendation, has now, in its genuine form, become perfectly clear and intelligible.

That such a corrupted reading could be allowed to pass and remain unrectified is to be explained only by the fact that the Quartet was not published until after Beethoven's death. Beethoven, in fact, expended upon the correctness of the printed sheets as much care as he bestowed upon that of the written copies. As far as was possible, he himself superintended the correcting of his works for the press, and was extremely particular in this respect. In the correspondence with his publishers, the correction of the typographical errors, which were capable of exciting the most violent indignation in his mind, played a prominent part; he, moreover, informed them of faults discovered by him after the compositions were published, and urged them still to correct the same. He seldom succeeded, it is true, in having his wishes carried out, as is shown by the example of the C-minor Symphony, and that of the Grand Mass, wherein, among other faults of which he complained in his correspondence, there is not the slightest mention of the tempo of the "Benedictus."

(Conclusion next time.)

Obituary.—Madame Pasta.

The death of the illustrious Giuditta Pasta cannot create any surprise. She was in her sixty-eighth year, having been born in 1798, and had almost outlived the remembrance of her artistic fame. With modern opera-goers, Madame Pasta bears the same sort of vague, indistinct reputation which Mrs. Siddons does with modern play-goers. As artists both are connected with the grand and the sublime, and neither has left behind her a successor. It is not just to call Grisi the successor of Pasta. Grisi was undoubtedly "grand" in appearance, and her voice had "grandeur" in its power and volume; but, mentally, she stopped short of what was great and never approached the "sublime." To those who have not seen Pasta in Semiramide, in Anna Bolena, in Norma, in Medea, or in Tancredi, it is quite impossible to convey any idea of what may be done with these characters. Bellini made a strange mistake in composing the music of Amina in the Sonnambula for Pasta, who never identified herself with the part, and who, indeed, was completely thrown into the shade by Malibran's wonderful performance. In Norma, however, he fitted her powers to perfection and, even though the Milanese went frantic about Malibran in the character, the Druid High Priestess lived and died with Pasta. Pasta's voice was not of the most delightful quality, nor was her natural facility very great. By dint of study, however, and a taste, refinement and judgment that have never been surpassed and rarely equalled, she gave a character and an expression to her tones that touched the most varied chords of the human heart; while, by extraordinary perseverance and a determination which nothing could subdue, she gained a facility and an ease in her vocalization that astonished every listener. The voice of Pasta was somewhat guttural, and the only voice I ever heard which reminded me of it, though remotely, was that of Madame Guerrabella. Pasta made an immense fortune and bought a splendid villa with pleasure grounds on the lake of Como, and died there. She lived in the days of great people and was greater than them all—but one. Fodor, Camporese, Catalani, Colbran, Pisanoni, Sontag and Malibran were contemporaneous with her, and Grisi came directly after her. Malibran alone was considered more inspired as an actress and more grandly endowed as a singer. Yet they were hardly to be compared together. Pasta was Norma, Semiramide, Anna Bolena, Medea, Niobe, &c. Malibran was Amina, Fidelio, Ninetta, Rosina, Zerlina, &c. In Semiramide Pasta would have played the Babylonian Queen and Malibran Arsace. In Don Giovanni the former Donna Anna, the latter Zerlina. In this distribution of characters it must be borne in mind that Malibran could as readily have accommodated her means to Semiramide and Donna Anna as to Arsace and Zerlina, and that she had frequently played them, while Pasta could not have changed her parts without serious detriment to her talent. Peace to them both! We shall not look upon the like of either soon!—Lond. Mus. World.

The Life of Pasta.

(From Miss Clayton's "Queens of Song.")

When Mr. Ayrton undertook the management of the King's Theatre in 1816, he commenced his task with an enthusiastic desire to render the Opera attractive, not merely by an array of brilliant talent, but by that perfection in the representation of the works of the great masters which was due alike to the composer and the audience. He had engaged several vocalists of talent, nearly all of whom were to be heard in England for the first time. When at the house of M. Paer, in Paris, he met with Signor and Madame Pasta, a tenor and a mezzo-soprano, and engaged both for the ensuing season, at the modest salary of four hundred pounds for the two.

Giuditta Pasta was then eighteen. She was born at Sarrano, near Milan, in 1798, of a Jewish family named Negri. She received her first lessons in music from Bartolomeo Lotte, chapelmaster of the Cathedral of Como, and was admitted at the age of fifteen to the Conservatorio of Milan, then under the direction of Asiola. In 1815, she left the Conservatorio, and, making her debut at the theatre of an amateur, obtained engagements at the second-rate theatres of Leghorn, Parma, and Brescia; appearing only in subordinate parts, her voice and style at that time unfitting her for any other. In 1816 she sang, together with Mile. Cinti, Miss Corri, and some other young debutantes, in the train of the haughty Madame Catalani, at the Favert; being precisely the kind of subordinate vocalist suited to one of Madame Catalani's exacting disposition, for she attracted no attention whatever. Pasta, when first seen in London, only appeared as a glimmering little star just risen above the horizon, in the sunblaze of the fame of Fodor and Camporese. As for her husband, finding there would be no chance whatever for him in competition with a singer like Crivelli, he wisely relinquished all idea of making a debut. The King's Theatre opened January 11th, 1817, with Cimarosa's opera of "Pendola." Madame Camporese taking the leading part, and as one of the papers said, "two subordinate singers, named Pasta and Mori, came forward also, in the characters of Telemaco and Arsinoe, but their musical talent does not require minute delineation."

Giuditta Pasta's voice was hard and unequal, and she had the greatest difficulty in managing it, while its natural tone was far from being perfect. She had expression, and could descend from the sharp notes of the soprano to the grave tones of the contralto: but she always wanted flexibility, and did not appear to advantage in bravura music. Some persons, however, perceived in her the germs of future excellence. In appearance, she was below the medium height, but admirably proportioned, with a queenly Roman head and beautiful features, a high forehead, dark, expressive eyes, exquisitely formed lips, and a finely shaped nose. The serious cast of her countenance, and the simple majesty of her air, denoted that her genius lay in the loftiest walk of tragedy, especially as she had much dramatic energy, while her gestures and her attitudes were noble and graceful.

It could not be disguised at the close of the season that poor Mme. Pasta, though sometimes spoken kindly of by the critics, had proved a "failure." She meditated deeply on the causes of her non-success, and felt the impetus of genius which urges those gifted with the spark of divine fire to persevere; so she returned to Italy and studied assiduously for more than a year, under the guidance of M. Scappa. An English nobleman, who saw her in Italy at this time, said that her exertions were unremitting. "Other singers," said he, "find themselves endowed with a voice and leave everything else to chance. This woman leaves nothing to chance, and her success is therefore certain."

That success was awaiting her reappearance in Italy. She created a marked sensation when she made her debut afresh in Venice in 1819. At Rome, in April of that year, she performed men's parts at the Argentina, with Tacchinardi, in such operas as Rossini's "Aureliano in Palmira," Mayer's "Donna," Nicolini's "Caio nelle Galle," and in 1820 she appeared at Milan and Trieste. In the Autumn of 1821 she was engaged at the Théâtre Italien of Paris, where she fixed the attention of the fastidious French public; but it was at Verona during the Congress of 1822, that she obtained a great success. She then returned to Paris, reappearing at the Italiens, March 30, in the opera of "Romeo e Giulietta," and was received with the homage paid only to the highest talent.

In January of the following year Madame Pasta for the first time appeared before the public in her great masterpiece—the character of Medea in Mayer's opera. Even her warmest admirers were taken by surprise by the grandeur of her impersonation.

The season of 1824 at the King's Theatre was remarkable for an unusually—and unnecessarily—large company of singers. No less than six prima donnas appeared: Mesdames Colbran-Rossini, Catalani, Ronzi di Bagnis, Vestris, Caradori, and Pasta. In the month of March, Madame Pasta was announced, and made her first appearance April 24th. The opera selected for her appearance was "Otello." It might almost be termed a debut, public curiosity was so strongly excited; for Europe was now ringing with her fame. Every portion of the house was filled at a very early hour, the boxes and pit being so crowded that many elegantly dressed ladies were obliged to be contented with seats in the gallery. To Madame Pasta was due the idea of reviving "Otello." The music was worthy of a better fate than being allied to such wretched trash as the libretto in which Shakespeare's beautiful tragedy had been travestied by a certain Marchese Berio, and tortured to suit what he considered the exigencies of the lyric stage. The utmost skill both of composer and performer was requisite to make the libretto even tolerable to an English audience.

At this time some persons of fashion, seeking for a new sensation, arranged to have operas performed at their houses on Sunday night: more than one performance had been given, when they were suddenly checked. The Duke of York had been invited to one of them, and the performance was delayed for some time, as his Royal Highness did not make his appearance; at length a note arrived, couched in polite terms, but plainly intimating that the Sunday operas did not receive the countenance of the Court. Had these operas been continued, it is certain that, in addition to the shock that would have been given to religious ideas, they would have tended to ruin the Italian theatre; as it was, their effect was detrimental, as some of the singers actually left the rehearsals at the King's Theatre unfinished, to attend those at aristocratic houses. Many of the singers being engaged to perform nightly at three or four public and private concerts, the Opera was often paralyzed by the indisposition of the vocalists in consequence.

Madame Pasta performed, during the season of 1825, on ten nights and in four characters, and she sang actually at twenty-four or twenty-five concerts, receiving twenty-five guineas for each. Her operatic engagement was 1,200*l.*, she sold her benefit to Ebers for 800*l.*, and within the brief space of four weeks she realized no less a sum than 2,400*l.* In 1826, she demanded 2,300*l.* for three months and a half, which was acceded to; and the security which she demanded was managed by making the money payable in three instalments, the last to be made previous to her appearance on the stage: in addition to her salary, she was allowed, during the term of her engagement, a private box, twelve pit and twelve gallery tickets.

In 1841 she went to Berlin. The Berliners regarded her with deep sympathy and commiseration, for she had lost almost her entire fortune—the well-earned reward of her splendid talents—by the failure of the great bank of Guymüller, at Vienna. But neither her voice nor her physical strength were now what they had been; and she wisely retired from the scene of her triumphs. For many years she had resided during the winter at Milan or Genoa, and during the summer at her villa at Como, occupying her leisure in giving to artists very valuable lessons. Mademoiselle Parodi was her most distinguished pupil.

Madame Pasta had one child, a daughter, born about 1825.

Pasta.

The art of declaiming recitative passages in opera has almost died out. Its greatest exponent was that gifted woman who passed away from us but a few days ago by the bright shores of Como. Mme. Pasta was undoubtedly the most inspired lyric actress that ever trod the stage; and it is worth while, now that we are associated with mincing Aminas, feeble Semiramides, and lay-sister Normas, to regard, in the dim distance of the past, that majestic woman's figure, at one moment instinct with the divine madness of a priestess, at another moving with the simplicity of an Alpine peasant. The original heroine of most of Bellini's immortal works, it was in Norma pre-eminently that Pasta soared to the loftiest range of dramatic conception. The present age has no idea of Pasta's Norma. It has seen Grisi (who was at one time only considered worthy to play Adalgisa to Pasta's Norma), and has given Grisi the title of "Diva" from her appearance in the part. But alas, flexibility and fluency—neither of which gifts Pasta ever possessed—could never atone for Giulia Grisi's want of soul. From her first success as Norma in England, may be dated the gradual decline and downfall of the power of declamatory recitative. Not a bar of Pasta's baldest recitative was without its special significance: it was sung—it was acted—with a force and understanding which were irresistible. Mme. Grisi could not do this, and never attempted it. With her, recitative was reduced into the merest "padding"; the torrent of passionate invective flowed equally along in the coldest manner of the Paddingtonian canal; and the rising race of singers were comforted by the example, which in effect declared all artistic effort beyond the most superficial vocalization to be needless in the interpretation of recitative. And the pernicious force of that example extends down to this day. We have no Pasta come. We have no Pasta coming.

Mme. Pasta's voice was a most difficult organ to reduce to rule. It was hard and unbending—although capable of expressing and pointing, as few could, the highest musical sentiment. It is a curious fact that she could not sing an ascending scale. All her florid passages were on down scales, and these she did perfectly; but every effort to sing an up scale proved utterly futile. Thus in the music of the parts which Bellini and other maestri wrote for her, one finds this peculiarity carefully studied, and the difficulty overcome in a most admirable way. Take the "AA! non giunge" from the "Sonnambula" as a case in point, and admire the ready dexterity of the master who had to write in fetters, and yet with such marvellous result.

"The last time I saw Pasta," said a musical friend of ours the other day, "was a few years ago at the villa of Count — on the Lake of Como. We were a large party, and many people of European fame were amongst the guests. One brilliant evening, a strange figure wandered in from the tree-lined highway, upon the glittering group in the Count's saloon. It was a woman—a peasant, if you might judge from her dress, which was one of the coarsest description, with rough woollen stockings drawn over her shoes; but you had only to look from the rude raiment to the face of the wearer, to know that she was no common person. Though her figure was bent and her hair gray, her face—which was that of a dark Marie Antoinette—still retained traces of a nobility, which, in youth, must have conferred on her the highest order of loveliness; and her eyes were still full and bright. It was Pasta. She was received with delight and a veneration which it was charming to witness. We all felt we stood in the presence of a great mind. By and by, after chatting with her for some time about old scenes in London and Paris, where she had been ever the prominent figure, I asked her if she would sing a duet with me—just to let us hear her voice again. At first she refused, but on being further pressed, she diffidently agreed to try a duo from "Semiramide." I sat down to the piano, and she began. It was but a thin, quavering sound—uncertain, unsteady—as if perfectly distrustful of itself. But in the cabaletta, where our voices went together, Pasta gained strength—her figure dilated—her eye flashed, and, strange to say, as if the trammels of age and disease were like leaves in an autumn torrent, her voice suddenly burst out with a brilliancy and power unsurpassed in her grandest days. The effect was indeed electrical. The ruset of the peasant—the gray hair of age—disappeared; and in their place we saw again the regal purple of tragedy, and the splendid light of eyes, following the glorious passion of her voice. This was the last time I saw Giuditta Pasta." —Orchestra.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music in Cincinnati.

I.

Four years have come and gone since last my hand wrote aught for your dear columns. Not often for three years was I made glad by seeing you. Amid the tumult of dread war, in duties of a sterner kind, the art's sweet influence, save once or twice, did not approach nor quicken me. And almost like a stranger in lands unknown, to Music's sacred realms I now return. Thus having eased my longing soul, I may proceed to business,—that of a correspondent namely.

And there would be much to tell of, had I but heard it. But sad indeed the years of absence from you and your dear home have been to me; and growing callous, as it were, my feet refuse to move to concerts of Mme. Rive or other artists, who by the yard their programmes do dispose, and sing of Kücken, Abt and Summer's Latest Rose. Nor did the more ambitious Gottschalk draw me forth, who on the banjo plays the last nocturno and "reveries" of Spain's or Brazil's belles. There are some concerts which I should have heard, some where indeed good music was performed. But who, I ask you, in these times of taxes and small salaries —

There are quite a number of associations for vocal music here, but none, so far as I have learned, for instrumental music, besides the different bands, which of course are business organizations. But a society like the New York "Philharmonic," or even a small one like the "Boston Orchestral Union," for the avowed purpose of furthering the cause of music by giving instrumental concerts at stated times, does not exist here. This is a pity, but is no more than can be expected. In the history of arts there is no principle more clearly defined than this; that they can only flourish at times when the strain of hard work, the necessity of turning all energy to the overcoming of natural obstacles to civilization, has in a manner subsided, and left, as the fruit and reward of such work, wealth not merely sufficient for one or two generations, but in such abundance that it may descend to more remote times, although the present may be enriched by princely munificence to literature and art. There is a library close to your home, dear Journal, in old Harvard, and another at your home, by the Common, that tell most strikingly of the love for literature existing in an old community, where with the accumulation of wealth, that ease and comfort grew up, which is essential to a love of the greatest and most lasting possessions of man. And there is a music hall adjoining your abode, with organ transcendent, I am told, which tells a similar tale. For no man may do more than one of the two: either hard bodily work and rest of the mental faculties, or hard brain work and cessation from hard work of the body—if he expects to excel in anything. As a community, in fact as a geographical section, we have here, and elsewhere all over the West, not had time to get beyond hard bodily work. There is no public large enough and free enough from hard, rough work, to care for really good orchestral or chamber music. There is therefore but a single enterprise in chamber-concerts by Messrs. Kunkel and Hahn, whose performances I have not heard, and of which, therefore I am unable to speak.

With the very large German population here, it is natural that singing-societies should flourish. I am told there are numbers of them devoted to four-part song for men's voices. There are three, however, which comprise among their members women and men, and are therefore enabled to perform pieces for the mixed chorus, which were mentioned in the Journal by "G," in a correspondence from here some weeks ago (No. 622, of Feb. 4), and in another by "X" of same date. They are the Harmonic Society, consisting of music-loving Americans almost exclusively, the "Männer-chor" (now a misnomer), and the "Caecilien-Verein."

II.

Looking at the programmes of the performances given this winter by these three societies, we must give the palm of excellence to those of the "Caecilien-Verein," which is now in its ninth season. As proof they are subjoined.

At their first concert, (Nov. 17, 1864), they performed in the first part:

1. "O, welch' eine Tiefe," from Paulus, by Mendelssohn.
2. Quartet in E flat, for piano, violin, alto and cello, by Mozart.
3. Benedictus from the Mass in C, by Beethoven.
4. Ständchen by Schubert, transcription for the violoncello.
5. "Wie der Hirsch schreit," from the 42nd Psalm, by Mendelssohn.

In the Second part they performed Schumann's "Neujahrs-Lied."

At their second concert, (Jan. 26), the following pieces were heard. First part:

1. Schumann's "Neujahrs-Lied" repeated.
2. Liszt's Lucia Fantasia, very creditably performed by Miss Steinschneider, the daughter of a teacher not unknown as a composer under his nom de plume of Werner. To my taste another piece would have been more consonant to the general character of the programme.
3. Alessandro Stradella's prayer.
4. Frühlings-botschaft, by Niels Gade.

Second part, the Finale of the first act of "Loreley," by Mendelssohn, the solo part of which was sung by Miss Marie de Roode, with much taste, though with a voice that in the upper notes was rather husky.

In the third concert (April 10th):

1. The "Frühlings-botschaft," by Gade, was repeated. There were also
2. Trio for piano, violin and violoncello by Beethoven, op. 1, No. 3.
3. Psalm XXIII for Soprano, with Piano-accompaniment, by Franz Schubert.
4. Grand Polonaise in A flat, op. 53, by Chopin, finely performed by the director of the Society, Mr. Andres, and followed by a transcription of the popular song "Muss i denn, muss i denn zum Städtele naus," composed by Mr. Andres and played by him as an encore. Although very neatly and brilliantly composed and beautifully played, and greatly relished by the audience, some other piece would have sounded better after the magnificent poem just preceding. But as the members were satisfied, outsiders have hardly a right to complain.

5. "Wie lieblich sind die Boten," from Paulus, by Mendelssohn.

The Second part consisted of Schumann's tender "Requiem für Mignon."

There is one peculiar excellence in the "Caecilien-Verein's" performances, which is owing to their excellent conductor, Mr. Andres, namely, the fine expression, the beautiful shading, in one word the true artistic taste pervading their vocal performances. There is a tenderness in the piano and pianissimo passages, and a verve in the fortes and fortissimos which only an artist understands how to imbue his chorus with. It is a great pity that the chorus is not large enough, and that the accompaniments have to be performed—very excellently though, by Mr. Andres—on a piano. Being here so short a time, and not acquainted sufficiently with the circumstances, I am unable to assign a reason for the smallness of the chorus. It seems, however, that with a population of Germans counting some 60 or 70,000, as I am informed, a society for the performance of classical music should be able to treble its chorus. Nor can I understand why the good German way of introducing boys' voices among the Soprani and Alt, so successfully initiated by Dr. Cutter of New York, is not followed here. It would certainly strengthen the Alt, and the youth of our public and high-schools, well-trained as they are by good teachers, foremost among whom stands Mr. Aiken, a Massachusetts man, I think, would certainly furnish German-speaking and singing material enough.

The instrumental parts of the chamber-pieces and the Violoncello-solo were performed by amateurs, very creditably, to be sure. The piano parts of the Mozart Quartet and Beethoven Trio were played by Mr. Andres with accustomed mastery. †

Musical Correspondence.

'NEW YORK, MAY 8.—Our concerts and other public musical performances, necessarily suspended during the recent period of national calamity, have recommenced, and succeed each other so frequently and numerous that we are afflicted with "L'embarras du choix" every night. But although our artists are all anxious to be heard again before the close of the season, the public seems less anxious to listen, for everywhere we find audiences of smaller numbers than we have been accustomed to meet at places of amusement. One of the first entertainments presented to us after the sad, although brief season of public mourning, was the closing concert of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was promised, and looked forward to, during the whole winter, by subscribers, as the bonne bouche of the season; but instead of giving us this great monument of human genius in its completeness, the Society performed the three first parts alone; thus cutting off Beethoven's sublime idea at the very point where it reaches its culmination. It was difficult for the audience assembled to accept the excuse given on the programme, that the vocal part of the Symphony was omitted out of respect to the memory of our lamented President, as a very general knowledge had got abroad that there had been difficulties in regard to obtaining an efficient chorus and solo singers; but we would be more willing to take the latter excuse as a reason for the omission, than the former. For, looking beyond and above the unlooked for tragedy of his mortal end, what could be more in keeping with the genial, humane, benevolent, and liberal character of the good man, the great work of whose life was the liberation of all races, than the words of Schiller's deep and beautiful "Ode to Joy"—a joy not superficial, but of the soul, glorified with such strains as only Beethoven could, in his highest inspiration, imagine?

The orchestra played at this concert, as an opening piece, and very appropriately, the Funeral March from Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, and Schumann's beautiful Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, at the close. Besides this, the Liederkreis sang a chorus for men's voices by Schubert, and Mendelssohn's "Loreley" Finale. How far this finale—if we except the greater facilities it presents to the chorus—was more appropriate to the spirit of the times than that of Beethoven's Symphony, we leave to be decided by more profound intellects than our own, for the praiseworthy Philharmonic Committee wrapped itself in cloudy darkness on the subject.

Our violoncello virtuoso, FREDERIC BERGER, whose merit as an artist we have already spoken of in these letters, gave his annual concert at Dodworth's Hall. He was assisted by Miss FANNY RAYMOND, Messrs. W. MASON, TH. THOMAS, MOSENFELT, and SCHWARTZ. Mendelssohn's fine Quintet, in B flat, op. 87, was the opening piece, and the performance of it was an able one. Mr. Berger played Servais' "Souvenir de Spa," an empty show piece, which has no other artistic merit than that of affording to the artist an opportunity of displaying his great technical ability, which was done in the most creditable way. Miss Raymond sang "Ausenthalt," a beautiful song by Schubert, a charming Ballad "Die Ueberfahrt," by C. Loewe, and three songs: "Ich wandelte unter Bäumen," "Die Lotosblume" and "Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden," by Schumann. If, on the one hand, we were delighted with the skillful manner in which Miss Raymond used her fine and rich voice, on the other, we did not less admire her true rendering of the spirit of each song; for every sentiment, every passion, she found the right color and the right tone, and the hearty applause and recall of the audience proved their appreciation of the singer and the songs. Mr. W. Mason played two compositions of his own finely (this we always expect from such an artist), "Monody," and "Ah! vous dirai-je Maman." In both of these Mr. Mason displayed his skill as harmonist and pianist; they are full of fine pianoforte effects and will not fail to become very popular. Haydn's "Kaiser Franz" variations, the pièce de resistance on "certain occasions" of our meritorious Quartet, was, of course, executed with all the pianos and fortes, crescendos and decrescendos; the pros and contras, even the morendo of the closing harmony was conscientiously observed, to the delight of the audience. The programme of the concert closed with a Duo for violin and violoncello by Schubert (not the Schubert, but another) and Kummer, a queer composition, in our opinion.—There is an overwhelming promise of "farewell," "complimentary," and "testimonial" entertainments.

The German Opera company has given us, during the short period of two weeks that has elapsed since its opening, a selection of works of the highest calibre, including "Fidelio" the "Magic Flute," the "Huguenots," the "Jewess," and "Faust," besides "Martha," &c. Since last season, this company, from continually playing together, has even improved on the already fine ensemble which it presented, in concerted pieces, chorus, and orchestra, while its individual members appear much the same; though we note a decided improvement in Mr. Weinlich's vocal method, due perhaps, to his recent practice with the Italian Opera troupe. To be quite satisfactory, Mr. Grover's company only needs a prima donna of first-class merit, and perhaps two or three alterations and improvements in the artists who fill the other principal positions. We trust that German Opera has now become a permanent institution among us.

LANCELOT.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 8.—Messrs. WOLFSOHN and THOMAS gave their 4th Soirée on Saturday evening, April 29, to I greatly regret to state, a very slim audience, a few ladies and gentlemen, urgently desirous of being present at this delightful concert, having perilled their newest Spring attire in a drenching storm, an unpleasant external accompaniment that seems to attend these entertainments with a vexatious pertinacity. The following programme was presented, the various items therein being, as usual, so satisfactorily rendered as to leave little to call forth criticism.

Trio (B flat, Op. 97) Piano, Violin, and Cello. Beethoven.
Messrs. Wolfsohn, Thomas and Schmitz.
Solo, Violin. Theo. Thomas. Spohr.
Fantasia, B minor, Op. 29. Chopin.
Mr. Wolfsohn.
Quartet, (G major, No. 1.). Mozart.

Nothing new can be said about the great Beethoven Trio, nor about the ever fresh and genial Mozart Quartet; would that all the performances of them that I have listened to had been as perfect as that upon this occasion! But Mr. Thomas handles his instrument as few of our virtuosos do, and one need never fear for the music that may be intrusted for interpretation to the hands of Mr. Wolfsohn and himself. Mr. Ahrend, whose place was so competently filled, at the eleventh hour, by our talented young musician, Mr. Charles Schmitz, is at present disabled by a severe illness, from which it is to be sincerely hoped he may soon recover to grace that sphere with his presence, where his absence is so noticeably felt.

Monday evening, May 1, the fifth soirée of the same series was given.

Novalletten, (Op. 21, Nos. 6, 1 and 4.). Schumann.
Carl Wolfsohn.
Solo, Violin. Theo. Thomas. Schubert.
Kleine Studien, (Nos. 1, 2, and 5.). Mary F. Howell.
1 Frühling Liedchen,
2 Prelude.
3 Song without words.
Carl Wolfsohn.

I can but refer in general terms of commendation to this concert. Mr. Wolfsohn was kind enough to repeat for an encore, the Chopin fantasia, which he so artistically and appreciatively rendered at the last soirée. The "Kleine Studien" are the compositions of one of our first lady pianists; they are quite interesting morceaux, and would not be unworthy the pen of many a more famous writer.

I was present at the N. Y. Trinity Choir Festival at St. Clement's Church on the evening of April 26. To my fancy, the singing of the juvenile-masculine sopranos and contraltos is more curious than interesting; and I can scarcely imagine that efforts of this kind are necessarily encouraged by the highest feeling for art, either on the part of the children or their preceptors. Perhaps I do the very able leader of Trinity Choir an injustice; but I think nearly every one will agree that a child of a dozen years must have a marvellous organ, indeed, and be gifted with an unwarrantable precocity for one so young, to be able to do complete justice to the great solos of the Oratorios of Handel, Mendelssohn and Haydn. At all events, except in the singing of the "Angel Trio" from the "Elijah,"—where the unaccompanied tones of their fresh voices blended in a really angelic manner, and which was the only thing they did that aroused my enthusiasm,—these young fledglings failed, through the natural febleness of their undeveloped vocal powers, to give to the music that interest which we ordinarily look to find.

The GERMANIA ORCHESTRA presented the following attractions at their "Rehearsal" on last Saturday afternoon.

Overture, "Return of Tobias." Haydn.
Arie, "Cujus Animum." Stabat Mater. Rossini.
Symphony, (No. 4. B flat) entire. Beethoven.

This is the second Beethoven Symphony Mr. SCHMITZ has produced this season. It was creditably rendered, the strings doing much better than they did when the "Eroica" was performed. At the next Rehearsal, Mr. JARVIS is to perform Weber's "Concertstück" with orchestral accompaniment.

MERCUTIO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 13, 1865.

The Coming Musical Festival.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

"Far off its coming shines." But indeed it is very near at hand. Ten days from this day it commences—namely on the morning of Tuesday, the 23d of May, when will be inaugurated a week of musical festivities upon a very large scale and of a very noble character. We are really to have, then, a Musical Festival, after the model (so far as our means admit) of those we read about at Birmingham and Norwich, at Düsseldorf, Cologne and other cities of the Lower Rhine. We do not say it will be in all things equal to the best of those, or that we here are in a condition—particularly just now at the close of a long war—to come up to the European standard either in brilliant array of solo singers, or in size or excellence of orchestra and chorus. We have not all the great artists of the world within call, in the habit of summering with us, as they have in England. Nor have we the elements of a great orchestra assimilated together by the constant habit of great European opera houses, or Philharmonic and Gewandhaus concerts, although by drawing from New York and other cities we can and shall effect a combination really noble and effective.

The Handel and Haydn Society honor themselves by not promising too much; by not indulging in the boastful style of announcement so common with shallow enterprises which have "great cry and little wool." They simply promise what they know they can perform. They can safely invite to a great, a rare, an inspiring occasion, one that will be memorable in our musical history, one that a music-lover cannot well afford to miss—this they can safely do, without challenging comparison throughout all Christendom. The more simple and matter-of-fact their announcement, the more do we trust them and the more expect of them. Big announcements, fancy advertising, are the vice of our time; and so far has it been carried that, with sensible people, it always tells suspiciously against the artistic character, the solid, sincere artist worth of those who employ such heralding. For instance, when Mr. A., pianist or what not, simply announces "a concert," we expect better things of him than we do of Mr. B. who announces a "grand concert." The word grand in such matters has come to belong to the "damaged phraseology" which is the stock in trade of quacks in art; real artists shrink from using it, real refinement prefers plainness.

But a musical festival on the scale now offered may properly and distinctively be called grand; here the word has a meaning; it means that we are to hear compositions grand in character, such as Oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn, Symphonies of Beethoven, rendered by voices and instruments enough to make their intrinsic greatness fully felt. Here will be a choir of six hundred voices; in announcing such a number, the directors, we are sure, neither deceive others nor themselves. Their calculations are carefully made. The attendance on the rehearsals for months past makes it safe to count upon even a somewhat larger number. The rehearsals, too have been no child's play, but earnest and assiduous, growing in interest and zeal from week to week. At first they occurred once a week; now they occupy three evenings weekly. They are picked voices, and the drill, under Mr. ZERRAHN, has been critical and thorough. We have been present at several of the last rehearsals, and can truly say that we never have heard the great choruses, even the most difficult in "Israel in Egypt," ring out here with nearly so much promptness, precision, spirit and harmonious ensemble. All four parts are effective, having breadth and fulness, not excepting the Contralti, who have frequently been weak before. Many amateur singers from our most cultivated families have been drawn into the resounding circle; for it is glorious to sing among so many and such music.

Then for accompaniment there is an Orchestra of at least one hundred instruments engaged. We wish we had their names to spread before our readers—they will appear on the programmes. But the list includes, in addition to our Boston orchestra, many of the leading members of the New York Philharmonic Society, others from Philadelphia, and nearly all of the old "Germanians" now scattered through the Union. It will be a grander Orchestra than that at our only previous Festival of this kind (given by the same Society in 1857); and what an impression was made by the 78 instruments in the 7th Symphony at that time!—Add to this the further accompaniment of the unrivalled Organ of the Music Hall, reinforcing the choruses with its massive harmonies, under Mr. LANG's excellent mastery, and we may well anticipate sublime effects.

The array of solo singers will not, of course, compare with Birmingham and London. No fault of the managers; they have done all that could be done; it is much to their credit that they offered very large pecuniary inducements to Sims Reeves to come over; it was a bold step, and will reap its reward another time perhaps. Meanwhile the Society can truly say that "the solo talent will comprise many of the best concert and oratorio singers now in this country." What with leading artists of Grover's German Opera, and what with resident singers of New York and Boston, they make out a formidable list, which stands, so far as it is yet settled, thus:

Soprani. Mme. Frederici (almost sure); Mrs. Van Zandt and Miss Maria Brainerd, of New York; Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Houston, and Miss Matilda Philipps, of Boston; and Master Coker, the "boy prima donna" (as he has been called) of Trinity Church, New York.

Contralti. Mrs. Jenny Kempton of New York, and Mrs. Carey, of Boston.

Tenors. Herr Himmer, of the German Opera, (almost sure); Mr. John Farley and Mr. J. E. Perring, of New York.

Basses. Carl Formes and Hermanns (German Opera); Mr. Rudolphsen, of Boston.

So much for the interpreters; now for the subject-matter of the feast.

For the opening ceremony, Tuesday morning, will be given, first, Nicolai's Festival Overture (based on Luther's Choral: "Ein feste Burg") for organ, orchestra and chorus; then Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." What could better suit the temper of these marvellous times in which we live?

There will be four Oratorios. On Tuesday evening, "The Creation;" Thursday evening, Handel's "Israel in Egypt," the grandest of his works, which will be as good as new to this public, notwithstanding one or two hardly brave enough attempts to make it popular a few years ago. Saturday evening, "Elijah," with Formes in his old part of the prophet. Sunday evening, "The Messiah," worthily closing the Festival. Concerts of orchestral and vocal music will be given in the afternoon of Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Each time a grand Symphony played by the Orchestra of one hundred; those selected are: the Eroica (No. 3) and the 7th by Beethoven, Schubert's in C, and Mendelssohn's in A minor ("Scotch"). The list of Overtures includes the Coriolan and Leonora (No. 3), by Beethoven; Euryanthe by Weber; "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Ruy Blas," by Mendelssohn "William Tell," "Tannhäuser," "Rienzi," Bennett's "Naiades," &c.,—though our memory may be wrong in one or two instances. There will be vocal solos and concerted pieces, instrumental solos, &c., choice and various,—in which respect there will be no difficulty in making programmes at least as good as those of the English festivals.

It is for the interest of musical culture in our land that this bold experiment of the Handel and Haydn Society should be warmly seconded by the music-loving public. Whatever lack of higher excellence there may be this time will come in future Festivals, if this be made remunerative. The objects, too, to which the proceeds are pledged, deserve the sympathy of every lover of his country. But we might have spared ourselves so many words; the advertisement, on our first page, tells essentially the whole story.

Concerts.

Mr. DRESSEL gave the fifth of his series of eight Piano-forte Concerts on Saturday afternoon, April 29. Chickering's Hall was full, as usual. This was the programme:

Sonata, A flat, op. 28. . . . . Beethoven.
Andante Con Variazioni. . . . . Scherzo. Marcia funebre sulla morte d'un Eroe. . . . . Finale.
Selections from op. 28, 29, 34, and 30. . . . . Rob. Schumann.
Romance. Notturmo. Scherzo. Andante espressivo. Allegretto.
Bolero. . . . . Ferd. Hiller.
Etude, A flat. . . . . Chopin.
Fugue, G-major. . . . . J. S. Bach.
Scherzo, B flat minor. . . . . Chopin.
Andante and Polonaise, op. 22. . . . . Chopin.

The Sonata, with its Funeral March—the grandest ever written, if we except that in the same master's Heroic Symphony—was timely and was deeply felt. The exquisite Andante and Variations (the third of which, in the minor, seems to us to hint already of the coming Marcia Funebre) never can become too familiar; their beauty and deep feeling have seldom been so poetically brought out. Then the sunshiny contrast of the Scherzo, and still more the Finale, sparkling with glad life like a fountain—does it not come like heavenly joy and reassurance after brave endeavor, sacrifice, and a great wholesome sorrow!

The Bach Fugue was one of the dancing, fairy ones (from first book of the "Well-Tempered Clavichord"), which everybody can enjoy. We have not room to recal the delights of Schumann, Hiller and Chopin.

Mr. Dresel's sixth concert will take place this afternoon, and the two remaining ones on Wednesday and Saturday of next week.

GREAT ORGAN.—The Noonday Concerts of the past fortnight have been: by Mr. WHITING (Bach's G-minor Fugue, Kullak's Pastorale, Wely Offertoire, Andantes by Best and by Whiting, Zampa overture, &c.); Mr. LANG, (Prelude and Fugue in A, by Bach, Oberon overture, Nocturne from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Danish melody, improvisations, "The Heavens are telling;" Mrs. FROMOCK (Bach Prelude in E flat, Pastorale from Beethoven's "Prometheus," Sonata No. 1, of Mendelssohn, Adagio by Fischer, Variation on an antique air by Rink); and Mr. LANG again last Wednesday (Bach Prelude in C minor, Midsummer Night overture, Hallelujah Chorus, &c.).—But almost everything is swallowed up now in the approaching Festival.

THE NATIONAL SORROW.—Thursday, the first of June, appointed by the President as a day whereon "all shall be occupied at the same time in contemplation of the virtues and sorrow for the sudden and violent end" of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, will be duly observed in this city by a grand procession and a Eulogy by the Hon. Charles Sumner in the Music Hall. The musical part of the services will be performed by the Festival Chorus (600 voices) of the Handel and Haydn Society, and will consist of the chorus from Judas Maccabeus: "Mourn, ye afflicted children," altering of course the words "Your hopes of liberty give o'er;" the beautiful Quartet from Elijah: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord;" and Luther's Judgment Hymn, with words expressly written by Dr. O. W. Holmes.

JOACHIM IN PARIS.—The second concert spirituel of the Conservatoire, last month, was distinguished by the first appearance in Paris of the great Gorman Hungarian violinist. It was a most enthusiastic occasion. The Society did its best to show itself in all its superiority and justify its European fame before the honored guest. Beethoven's 7th Symphony, and Mozart's Symphony in G minor were performed with more than the usual perfection at the opening and close of the concert. The chorus sang the Benedictus from Haydn's B-flat Mass, and a Motet for double choir by Bach—the latter proving a little too "austere" for the Parisians. And now we translate from the Gazette Musicale:

"Between the two choruses, in the middle of the concert, appeared the young and celebrated violinist, Joachim, the hero of the seance.

"This virtuoso, of whom England and Germany have thus far jealously disputed the possession, was born, not in England, as has been erroneously said [by people who supply keys to "Charles Auchester?"] —TRANS.] but in that fruitful Hungary which has produced so many virtuosos of genius. It was at Vienna, under the direction of Boehm, that he made his first musical studies. Ernst, who heard him in his debuts, predicted a glorious future for him, and it was by his advice that the young artist presented himself at the Conservatoire of Vienna. Afterwards Mendelssohn, who was very partial to him, directed him by his wise and experienced counsel. He was already applauded, as performer and composer. His Hungarian Concerto and his Concerto in G, from their first hearing in Vienna, reaped an ovation seldom realized. Soon Germany was filled with the report of his success; and his daily increasing reputation as a violinist sought more profitable triumphs in England, and without disappointment. After some time passed in Vienna, he visited Weimar, and then Hanover, where he settled and became Kapellmeister and first chamber violinist to the King [of whom he was a great favorite]. He studied constantly, making sensible progress, until he was one of the first virtuosos of the age. But to his success [mark here the sublime Parisian conceit!] "there was yet wanting the glorious and definitive consecration of France. It has just been given with éclat.

Now that this memorable day has established such an enthusiastic relation between the French public and the great artist, Joachim can no longer be exclusively called, as he has been so wrongly, the violinist of England. Henceforth, Joachim belongs to France, as do Liszt, Thalberg, Vieuxtemps, Jaell; he will return to us next winter, and the seven or eight months which he will devote to Paris will certainly give a great impulse to the musical season.

"The piece played by Joachim was no other than Beethoven's magnificent Concerto in D, a capital piece in grandeur of conception, in charm and power of thought, but ungrateful and perilous for the violinist. Joachim attacked it with an amplitude of style, a mastery, and an instinctive feeling of the music, which at once commanded respect and admiration. The effect was electrical. That powerful and sudden revelation, in spite of the emotion which the artist could not conceal from a public of such imposing authority, to whose judgment he had come to submit himself, had instantly attached his audience to him.

"As a violinist, Joachim incontestably possesses exceptional qualities, the powerful sonority of Vieuxtemps, an indescribable manner of attacking difficulties, without the public even suspecting it, a pure, calm play, at the same time profoundly impassioned and expressive. The most arduous works shine with a serene, warm light under his magical bow. He renders with a scrupulous exactitude the works of the master whom he interprets, and thus shows himself a musician alike consummate and respectful. He has no eye to effect, and difficulty does not exist for him. To see the simplicity of his play, the classical wisdom of his style, the placid, unshaken carriage of his left hand, admirably beautiful and of marvellous address, you would not believe that he was executing passages which the most celebrated virtuosos do not approach without danger.

"The public of the Conservatoire, not ignorant that the Germans and the English call Joachim the first violinist of Europe, listened with constantly increasing attention and interest. They would have applauded every passage, had they not been captivated by that elevated and pure style which allows room only for silent rapture, for pensive admiration. The end of the concert was a real triumph for Joachim; the artists of the orchestra applauded with the same enthusiasm as the public. The great artist was recalled three times."

Joachim also took part in the closing chamber concert of M. Lebourg, together with the admirable pianist, Mme. Szarvady (Wilhelmina Clauss) and others. He played in Mendelssohn's C-minor Trio and Beethoven's 7th Quartet, besides a Barcarole and a Scherzo by Spohr.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

"Fünf Kleine Studien, für das Piano, von MARY F. HOWELL. Boston, G. D. Russell & Company."

Thus reads the title page of a series of short musical sketches, by a Philadelphia pianist. They come in such modest guise that they would scarcely provoke criticism, were it not that they breathe true genius. They are not of those ephemeral productions which can be furnished at a week's notice from the workshops that produce our fashionable marceaux.

Our authoress is evidently learned in Mendelssohn and Chopin, and this, too, without sacrificing originality and native grace. It was, most probably, respect for the "Spring Song" of the former, that induced her to name the charming number one of this set in the diminutive. This was hardly necessary. There should be more than one "Frühlingslied," and we would gladly greet new ones every day, were they as fresh and winsome as this one of Miss Howell's.

No. 2 is a "Prelude" (after Bennett) and is, in some respects, the most interesting of the five studies. It seems to have been suggested by Heine's Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen, already treated vocally by Robert Franz. Light, joyous and exultant, our piano sketch offers us a beautiful paraphrase of Heine's poem.

Numbers three and four are "Styriennes"—pleasing and graceful examples of a too familiar form. The fifth number, entitled "Sonnenschein," is far superior to either of these and, in merit, is equal to the "Frühlingsliedchen" and the "Prelude."

We have refrained from a more detailed description. A mere verbal analysis, were it possible, would prove but a sorry substitute for the pleasure of playing, or hearing them played. We have done enough in indicating the character of each, preferring to remain silent regarding their remoter suggestiveness, as we have always endeavored to steer clear of the vagaries of those musical critics whose penetration enables them to account for a composition by ideas which never entered the author's mind. In common with many others, we prefer remembering music we have heard, with its own associations and endearing memories, instead of accepting the, sometimes rhapsodical, interpretations of third parties.

We confess to a rare pleasure from these little pieces, and trust that we may yet have more from the same pen. They are jottings of happy ideas, favored with artistic treatment. It is pleasant, amidst the mass of trivialities daily thrown off by our publishers, to alight upon an occasional tone-poem, showing so much true sentiment and such command of means.

Our Philadelphia Correspondent sends us the above, to which we cheerfully give place. We have the little pieces, and have perused them with much interest. For the first work of an amateur they certainly show sympathetic familiarity with the best composers, a fine feeling of the poetry of music, happy melodic conceptions (especially the first two, and we should add the fifth, but that it is so Mendelssohnian), considerable, but not unexceptionable artistic "treatment," and good knowledge of piano-forte effect. We could wish that the reviewer had not used quite so large a word as "genius;" not that we see proof to the contrary of its possible existence here, but because it is a word only to be used with the utmost reserve, and of the very few; for it at once lifts one into a glorious and august company, strong-winged ones, whom it is a blessing to admire, but not so easy to keep up with. With these frank reservations we thankfully accept the promising and pretty firstlings, together with the hearty note of introduction.

BANGOR, ME.—We are indebted to an occasional correspondent for the following report:

"The Choral Festival, noticed in the Journal of April 15, took place as announced, commencing on Tuesday, April 25, and continuing four days. Miss J. E. Houston, of Boston, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club were present. The forenoons were entirely devoted to the practice of Choruses from 'The Creation' and other Oratorios, with accompaniment of Piano-forte, and part of the time with accompaniment by the Quintette Club. During the afternoon rehearsals Miss Houston and others appeared in songs, and the Quintette Club in various instrumental selections. Three concerts were given. I enclose a programme of the Final Concert.

- 1 Chorus—"As the Hart Pants".....Mendelssohn.
- 2 Song—"Gratias Agimus Tibi".....Guglielmi.
- Miss J. E. Houston: Clarinet Obligato, Mr. Thos. Ryan.
- 3 Adagio from Quintet in E flat.....Mendelssohn.
- Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
- 4 Song—"My love and Me".....Thomas Ryan.
- Mrs. Crowell.
- 5 Violin Solo—Fantasia on themes from "Masaniello".....
- Mr. Carl Meisel.
- 6 Ballad—Sunny Summer Sky.....Glover.
- Miss Houston.
- 1 Violoncello Solo—Souvenir from Halevy.....
- Mr. Wolf Pries.
- 2 Song—"Knight and Shepherdess".....Gottschalk.
- Miss Minnie Brown.
- 3 Duet and Chorus—"I waited for the Lord".....
- Mendelssohn.
- Miss Houston and Mrs. Crowell.
- 4 Song—"Ye Merry Birds".....Gumbert.
- Miss Carroll.
- 5 Fantasia for Clarinet.....Ryan.
- Thomas Ryan.
- 6 Star Spangled Banner.....
- Miss Houston and Chorus.

"The 'Creation' was given on Thursday evening, with the orchestral accompaniment [outlined] by the Quintette Club. Miss Houston sustained the principal soprano solo. The chorus numbered about 350 voices, under the direction of Mr. Solon Wilder. Miss Houston was very enthusiastically received, and became at once a favorite. The audience were entirely fascinated by the music of the Quintette Club; and the rehearsals and concerts were well attended, the number of the audience varying from 600 to 1800 persons.

"The Festival was a great success and, we trust, has aided the cause of art in this vicinity. We hope some time to enjoy a similar occasion, and we should feel very grateful if you would recommend to us some association of artists, equal or superior to the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, for we are very anxious to have the best in the country. If you could tell us of some association of performers, of which each member could play three or four instruments at once, you would oblige us greatly, and we might then obtain a grand orchestra of fifteen or twenty equal to the grand orchestras, sometimes used in Boston.

"Yours very truly,

FREDERIC S. DAVENPORT."

NOTE. We indeed know of no Quintette Club better than the "Mendelssohn;" but the term "association" is large and comprises such combinations as the New York Philharmonic Society, the Boston Orchestral Union, &c., which certainly would answer the purpose of "an Orchestra" in accompanying an Oratorio far better than any possible Quintette Club, even though composed of such clever and experienced artists as our friends. Not to detract from their merit, but to hint the absurdity of advertising them as a "full Orchestra" (at which they themselves as artists must have been amused, perhaps annoyed), did we playfully quote a little from the high-flown circular announcement of the Bangor Festival. It was, no doubt, a good occasion; the only fault we had to find with it was this falling into the almost universal sickening vice of over-advertising; that is something which an artist must feel very shy of having plastered upon his fair fame and endeavor; it will do for Gottschalks and the like.

We find the following items in the London Musical World of April 15th.

Mr. Thomas Ball (the eminent sculptor), for many years primo basso to the Handel and Haydn Musical Society of Boston (U. S.), is in London for a few days, en route for Italy.

Mr. Sims Reeves has been offered a large sum of money to sing at the proposed grand musical festival at Boston (U. S.), on the 50th anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society.

St. Louis, Mo.—The Philharmonic Society, E. Sobolewski conductor, gave its sixth concert on the 27th ult. Part I. was mainly composed of selections (choruses and solos) from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, preceded by Litolf's "Robespierre" Overture, and followed by a Violin solo, Ernst's "Elegie."—Part II. The "Kermesse" Chorus, from Gounod's Faust; Trio from "Sargino," by Paer; first part of Beethoven's 2nd Symphony; Song: "Sleep well," by Abt; Weber's "Jubilee" overture.

CINCINNATI. Want of room prevented the insertion in our last of a letter describing the fourth "Concert de Salon" of Messrs KUNKEL & HAHN, on the 6th of April. The most interesting feature was Schumann's Quintet in E flat for piano, violins, &c., which was much admired. A piano concerto by Litolf, called "Troisième Concerto Symphonie (National Hollandais)," op. 45, was also a novelty to the audience, and by our correspondent counted a great gain in the classical direction. Mr. S. B. FELL, an amateur, with "one of the most admirable tenor voices," sang things of Abt and Verdi, which were received with great gusto; Mr. Kunkel played Liszt's second Polonaise (in E) for a piano solo, and Mr. Hahn a violin solo (Eryani fantasia) by Vieuxtemps, both receiving very high praise for the rendering.

"Taking these concerts for all in all, they will linger in the memory of their hearers, through many an hour of recreative thought, and will ever be referred to, as the era of appreciated classical introduction in our Queen City of the West."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Mary, Cambria's fairest daughter. W. A. Powell. 30
A ballad, written by "Cubelyn." The melody is rich and flowing.

Matrimony, or Mr. and Mrs. Brown. Comic Duet. C. W. Glover. 40

Mr. and Mrs. B. have a little spat, musically, together, which turns out very well, for they like each other all the better, afterwards. Quite amusing, and easy, good music.

He comes to me. (E viene a me.) "La Juive," by Halevy. 40

This is the striking scene, in which Rachel, trembling, shivering, yet hoping, is awaiting the coming of her lover. The music is pervaded with deep expression, and quite effective.

The Summer Rain. Ballad. Miss M. B. Stuart. 30
A fine poem about the "Sweet, the summer rain," with equally good music. Cannot fail to please.

Mer-ma-yed. Comic Song. 30
Capital. Discourses of the man who "tumbled overboard," and "was marry-ed to a mer-ma-yed at the bottom of the sea." Each verse winds up in grand chorus, with the "Star spangled banner!"

Praise the Lord. Quartet and Solo. From Beethoven. A. Davenport. 40

Contains a fragment from Beethoven's Fidelio, well arranged for Quartet singing. Quartet and other choirs will find it very pleasing.

If laws severe. (Se pel rigor). Bass song. "La Juive." 30

The excellent sentiments and mellow music of this song of Cardinal Brogni, commend it to the notice of Bass (and Alto) singers.

Instrumental.

Le Ruisseau. Valse etude. H. A. Wollenhaupt. 50
In a kind of flowing, liquid style throughout, promising a fine effect for those who will practise it carefully. A little difficult.

Golden Bells. Caprice de Concert. Sydney Smith. 75
One of the best pieces out. Very sweet and brilliant, and a fine exhibition piece. Difficult, but not extremely so.

Diana. Polka Mazurka. A. Talczy. 30
Classic and not especially difficult.

Morning dew. (La Rosée du Matin). Morcean brillante. Sydney Smith. 75
A fine piece, of hard-medium difficulty, not quite so brilliant as the "Golden Bells," but somewhat richer in melody than that.

Fragment of the Andante to Beethoven's 1st Symphony. For organ. Batiste. 75

Fragment of the Adagio of Beethoven's Heroic Symphony. For organ. Batiste. 75

Batiste has adapted these Fragments to the capacities of organs and organists with great skill, and his arrangements will open a new field of enjoyment to those who cannot bear the great Symphonies played by competent orchestras.

Books.

ST PAUL. An Oratorio. Mendelssohn.
Cl. $2.50, B'ds 2.00, Paper 1.75

It is a pleasure to announce the publication of this magnificent work; so solemn, so sacred, that it would do to substitute for a church service; so powerful as to bear the weight of the largest choruses: so thoroughly good throughout, as to grow in favor at each rehearsal.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 630.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 5.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

[In connection with the Musical Festival, we reprint from an early volume of this Journal our still earlier attempt at a description of this great Oratorio. The other oratorios of the Festival are too familiar and too well appreciated to require any such description.]

It is always good to inhale the bracing mountain air of Handel. His music beats with the strong pulse of a wholesome humanitarian, universal feeling. He knows not how to be otherwise than strong;—strong in faith, in conception, and in will, and large in sympathies. Really, if you study him in his music (where alone it is fair to read the character of a musician), he is one of the strongest and largest representative men of our race. He has expressed in the enduring form of Art, what the whole race in common needs to have expressed; he has done his full share to keep alive the noblest hopes, to strengthen the inmost, unsectarian faith, and to promote the noblest destinies, of Man, the image of his Maker. Will not after ages look upon him as a sort of prophet?—for surely it required a prophet so to illuminate and, as it were, revivify the grandest texts of Scripture, as he has done in his music:—Music, which alone solves the problem of a universal language.

No theme ever seems too great for Handel. He moves at home among miracles; he has music fit for Sinai and the passage of the Red Sea; and he perfectly reconciles miracle with humanity,—with the deep common instincts of the race. In the bold certainty and inexhaustibleness of his inspirations, he calls up the image of the old prophet, who smote the rock, and the waters gushed forth.

Perhaps our readers may not be wholly uninterested by some feeble reminiscences (feeble indeed must all attempts in words be to reproduce the impression of music!) of his great Oratorio—"Israel in Egypt." The piece is mainly a series of colossal choruses, describing the plagues of Egypt, the passage of the Red Sea, the triumphant delivery of the Israelites, with great anthems of praise built upon the song of Miriam. These are very individual and descriptive in their character, from the sublime to the sometimes (not offensively, grotesque. It is music to make one grow strong, as he sits and listens. The sentiment of the work is too great, too universal, for any but the simplest chorus treatment.

Seeking in the natural world a type for the great choruses of "Israel in Egypt," we think of the solemn, tranquil grandeur of our own "White Mountains." It is almost exclusively a mountain chain of immense choruses, connected by some rugged passes of recitative, and a very few green vales of song into which we are permitted to peep. These choruses are all wonderful specimens, in their way, of most consummate musical treatment, whether in plain, solid counterpoint, or in all the intricacies and beautiful "hide-and-seek" of fugue. But there is a poetic force of conception in them, that still more commends them. Each is unlike the others. Each perfectly embodies a spiritual and an outward experience, uttering an emotion, and painting an image or a scene. Hear "Israel in Egypt," and you will discover that there may be poetry, there may be feeling and dramatic pathos in the severe and, as many suppose, dry, cold, merely technical form of a strict fugue.

There is no overture or orchestral introduction. The origin of the whole matter is simply and briefly laid open in two lines of recitative, (No. 1.) by a tenor voice: Now there arose a new king over Egypt which knew not Joseph; and he set over Israel task-masters, to afflict them with burdens; and they made them serve with rigor.

Here is the cause: now for the effect, which is portrayed on a vast and gloomy field in a great double chorus, or chorus for two choirs, (No. 2.) which is in C minor. In long, slow notes of six-four measure, the altos of the first choir begin, with their rich and sad low tones: And the children of Israel sighed, sighed, by reason of the bondage. They pause two measures, which are filled up by the steady, heavy movement of the instruments, and then all the female voices of both choirs add, in unison: And their cry came up unto God. Another pause: then in shorter, equal notes, the sopranos climb the scale, an octave or more, by stages, with tenors accompanying, to the words: They oppressed them with burdens and made them serve, holding upon the high G on the word serve, while the altos echo the movement in their way, the sopranos adding emphatically twice, as they go on, with rigor: and then the basses fill all up below with the preceding figure: And their cry, &c. From this point all the choral floods swell onwards, and all the figures are mingled together in those complicated forms of counterpoint, which, of course, it is useless to attempt to describe. Once it gives way, indeed, to the sighs with which the altos opened, this time with the full mournful harmony of all the voices; one choir still utters the sighs at intervals, while voice after voice of the other begins again to roll in the burden of the second subject, They oppressed, &c. which is soon rejoined in all the basses in the third subject, And their cry, and all the subjects are worked up together as before. One more pause, and the chorus closes with a grand simplicity, by the whole mass of voices blending in a few bars of plain and solid harmony, in long-drawn notes, upon the words: And their cry came up, came up, unto God. The grandeur of this chorus warns you of still greater grandeurs coming. Miracle begins not yet; but here is the call, the deep, sufficient cause, the looking up for miracle. The mind is brought into a disposition to expect it—it is prepared for it by being made first to feel the Infinite within itself,—by being put in sympathy with the oppressed, and led with them to make the appeal from the natural to the supernatural, in obedience to that sense of justice and of order which relates us with both worlds. This chorus is the solemn portal by which Handel introduces us believably into the realm of wonders.

No. 3. Recitative, tells of Moses and Aaron showing signs, and turning the waters into blood; which is followed by the remarkable single chorus in G minor, They loathed to drink, whose fugal subject, passed from voice to voice, and multiplied through all the forms of chromatic counterpoint, sickens expressively through the continually echoed interval of the extreme flat seventh."

But from this imagination of disgust we are soon humorously relieved by one of those pleasant freaks of Handel's happy fancy. Presto! what frolicsome, grotesque hope and jumps between the figures of the violins! There is no mistaking the subject of the air (mezzo-soprano) which follows this droll prelude: Their land brought forth frogs; yea, even in their king's chambers: how the voice prolongs and plays upon the first syllable of that word chambers! The strain grows more sober at the thought of the cattle given over to the pestilence; but the frogs hop back in the accompaniment, and wind up with a merry ritornel. This hop-skip-and-jump song fitly precedes the double chorus, No. 6, which is in the same vein, and happily suggests the universally pervading presence of the small plague which it describes. He spake the word, is uttered in strong unison of the male voices; and there came all manner of flies: answer the silvery sopranos and altos, with their light and airy harmony; and the whole air swarms and shivers with the fine demi-semi-quavers of the violins. The flat and the image are several times repeated, now alternately and now in simultaneous distribution among the various voices. The heat of the movement increases, till, at last, the orchestral basses are stirred up from their depths, and roll along, like the roar of a fire across a prairie, to express the all-devouring plague of locusts. Here is a success which one would have pronounced impossible in music. Another composer could not have handled such a conception with any hope of not coming off flatly ridiculous; but the Handelian health and vigor could riot in the full humor of the thought, and dare to paint the images so literally, without violating the dignity of Art. It has been well suggested that Haydn doubtless "had been a close observer of this and other descriptive figures of Handel; and it is very probable that he caught the idea of the sporting of the leviathan, the crawl of the worm, the bounding of the stag, the tread of the heavy beast, and other passages of dangerous precedent, from his great predecessor.

No. 7. Now the creative energy of our composer is thoroughly roused; his resources are no more exhausted by this last effort than are the vials of the heavenly wrath. Look out for worse than locusts now; a pure elemental tempest, a wholly awful and sublime type of destroying force. The orchestra arrests attention to the hush before a storm, with now and then a big rain drop, then pattering notes that increase thicker, till out bursts the famous "Hailstone Chorus." How simple, but terrifically graphic, in its movement! Fire, mingled with the hail, ran along the ground! There is nothing intricate in its construction, the vocal masses are soon possessed by its crackling momentum, and it almost "runs along" of itself.

No. 8. As opposite from the last as possible is the next chorus: He sent a thick darkness. The dull, groping, chromatic harmony with which the instruments prepare the thought, is as far from commonplace as the most modern modulations of Spohr or Mendelssohn, and almost makes you shudder. Voice after voice, uttering separately little fragments of the sentence in recitative style, make the bewilderment appalling; and how palpable that darkness, when the instruments at last drop away, and in distinct unison the bass voices pronounce: which might be FELT!

Next follow two choruses so strongly and happily contrasted, as to be complements to one another. No. 9 is a double fugue, or fugue with two subjects: He smote all the first born of Egypt. From the first orchestral chord, it smites with a terrible emphasis; and the voice-parts writhe and struggle in their tough and angry embrace, like the splinters of an oak twisted by lightning; after a while they drop the fugue form and all smile together with the instruments; but the movement passes off in a spiral whirlwind (strongest natural type of force) as it came on. This is in the key of A minor; and the minor mood, if it is usually soft and tearful, yet admits of more modulations of a hard expression than the major. Pleasant as our bland Italian summer after pinching November blasts is the blithe, smooth, pastoral style of chorus No. 10: But as for His people, He led them forth like sheep. It is a cheerful Andante in G. The first clause is given with a degree of bold exultation; the second, He led them, is sung in soft, smooth, flowing cadence, sustaining the last note, through several bars, first by the altos, then by the sopranos, and so on—a serene and lovely picture; the third clause: He brought them out with silver and gold, is one of those clear and simple fugues, which the mind easily follows by the sense of hearing, without the aid of the eye to trace out its intricacies on paper; and was not strong Handel in his glory when he brought all the voices together upon the words: There was not one feeble person among their tribes? What a feeling of strength and unanimity there is in it! "NOT ONE, NOT ONE," sounds like the ring of grounded arms along a vast line of infantry; from end to end of the whole line, we are one, we are all here! No. 11, Chorus: Egypt was glad when they departed, is a fugue in A minor, though the strange intervals and modulations make you doubt the key continually. (It is written in one of the old ecclesiastical, or Greek modes, and you have a cold sense of barbaric antiquity in listening to the crude and sometimes cruel harmonies.) The whole has, it must be confessed, a dreary and ambiguous expression. It closes with the words, fear fell upon them, by a half cadence on the dominant instead of the key-note, leaving a painfully-unfinished, unresolved feeling. Perhaps, as the writer before cited suggests, Handel meant this chorus to describe "the doubtful or equivocal willingness or gladness of Egypt for Israel's departure."

No. 12. Here, as in frequent later instances, the full force of a double chorus is employed on a brief sentence of narrative, or introductory text, instead of a recitative for a single voice. In long Grave measure, fortissimo, in the natural key, the voices all pronounce: He rebuked the Red Sea; then all is silent, and in a whisper, resolving into the harmony of E flat, they all add: and it was dried up. Once more the rebuke is given fortissimo, in the last key, and the whispered effect ends in G minor. Brief, bold, impressive as a thunder-clap echoed on the mountains! The contrast of keys adds much to the startling effect.

What follows (No. 13) is worthy of the imposing announcement. It is another of those great musical miracles, with a miracle for its subject, the descriptive double chorus: He led them through the deep, as through a wilderness. It is one of the most difficult and complicated choruses in its structure, full of fragments of melody or routades, running in all directions, yet all tending so sensibly to one end, that the effect of the whole is easily intelligible to one who cannot analyze it. He led them through the deep, forms the first musical theme, which is a stately, firm ascent (of bass voices and instruments in unison) from the key-note as high as the fourth, then dropping on the word deep to the fifth below, to commence the ascent anew from that "deeper deep," and rise again to the same height. It is in quadruple measure, a quarter note to each syllable. As the tenor voices take up the same stately movement, the violins lead off the second theme in scattering streamlets of semi-quaver runs and routades, like the "mingling of many waters;" and bits of these the several voice-parts catch and imitate, to the words: as through a wilderness. A very wilderness indeed, and yet a most harmonious one, of melody! for all the while the steady, stately, ponderous ascent of the first theme: He led them through, heard in some part, gives uniformity and providential, sure direction to the multitudinous and seemingly bewildering movement.

No. 14. How opposite the next! In ponderous octaves the double-basses of the orchestra begin to heave and roll in unwearied triplets (key of C minor); the other instruments adding all their strength to the terrible narrative of the voices, which they chant in plain syllabic counterpoint: But the waters overwhelmed their enemies! The relentless billows roll and rage with unabated fury to the end, while the voices again and again, in breathless awe and wonder, simply tell the terrible facts without comment, that there is not one, no, not one of them left. The surging sea of harmony swallows up all other thoughts even of the most careless listener, as the Red Sea swallowed up the hosts of Pharaoh. And Handel was the Moses "who stretched forth his hand that the waters might come."

Nos. 15 and 16. Another of those short double chorus sentences: And Israel saw that great work that the Lord did upon the Egyptians; and the people feared the Lord; and the very solemn, antique, church-like harmony, in long equal notes, of the chorus: and believed the Lord and his servant Moses, close the miraculous display and the first part of the oratorio. In the severe absence of rhythmic variety, this chorus charms by the wonderful wealth of harmony. Its religious and profound composure, monotonous as it might seem to many, is singularly welcome to the soul of the true listener, after the faculties have been so long kept on the stretch by this astounding accumulation of chorus upon chorus (like "Ossa upon Pelion"), each a vivid tone-translation, palpable to one of our senses, of an outward miracle.

Here then let us rest awhile, and take advantage of a short interval between the parts, to think over what has passed before us. Each present moment of those thick-coming wonders was so all-absorbing, that thought had no liberty of looking back or forward. We only felt the past and coming in the present; felt the unity and natural development throughout; felt what it is the property of all high Art, like every heavenly inspiration, to make us feel, namely that kind of consciousness above time, to which "a day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years are as one day."

Think, in the first place, of the bold, unprecedented and gigantic plan, which could have entered no other head than Handel's to conceive, still less to execute, for the musical illustration of so immense a subject. The music of the first part has been nearly all descriptive; and the objects described, miracles, with their accompanying emotions. Later composers, since the great development of orchestral resources, have given us admirable specimens of descriptive instrumental music, like the "Pastoral Symphony," the accompaniments to the "Creation," the overture to "William Tell," &c. But Handel paints us his stupendous pictures mainly through the instrumentality of a vast choral multitude of voices, eking out the effect with only such secondary suggestions as he could draw from the meagre (to borrow a term from painting) almost monochromatic orchestras of his time. He wields the vocal masses to harmonize and spiritualize, and lift above all sense of mere physical jugglery, those old Mosaic wonders, which it is dangerous for human faculties to attempt to realize too vividly, lest in so doing we degrade them.

Think, too, of the extreme literalness and minuteness with which he fears not to take up and treat mean, ridiculous or repulsive images and sensations. Clad in thick proof of sound health and humor, he takes us safely through all this. He so blends the piquant individuality of his small creatures with the all-pervadingness of the plague, so tempers the actual with the ideal, as fairly to conciliate, and more than conciliate our imagination. In a word, he succeeds where another would have been a fool for his pains. He is Handel still, the sublime artist, though he have the homeliest sitters. Frogs and lice and commonplace predicaments cannot reduce him into even momentary equality with commonplace men.

It is also worthy of remark, how the character of the music rises with the gradation of the plagues. Putrid water, frogs, and flies and lice, devouring locusts, "fire mingled with the hail," darkness "which might be felt," death, and the overwhelming flood:—here is a literal ascent from plagues literal and mean, and shaming and annoying, to higher and higher types of doom, more spiritual, and elemental, and sublimely terrible. And Handel understood and reproduced it. When men violate the truth and morality of nature, the first reaction or penalty comes in forms that irritate, disgust and shame us; moral corruption feels its own natural consequences, and sees its own material image in these same little animated forms of uncleanness. As the sin goes on deepening, darkness comes, and death and elemental chaos; colossal shadows, and the blasts and lightnings, and abysses of impersonal, relentless, elemental fury smite the soul with spiritual awe, the terrors of the Infinite. We know not what "interior" or "second sense" the great interpreter by correspondence, the seer Swedenborg, found in the order of the plagues of Egypt; but we doubt if he could have stated the spiritual side and moral of the matter more completely than Handel renders it in the emotional language of this great choral music, at the same time that he keeps so close to the material image.

(Conclusion next time.)

Franz Schubert's Symphony in C Major.

BY ROBERT SCHUMANN.

The musician who visits Vienna for the first time may perhaps be able to amuse himself for a while with the festive bustle in the streets, and have, most likely, remained standing in astonishment before the Stephansthurm, but he will soon be reminded that, not far off, there is a churchyard more important to him than all the other sights of which the city can boast, and where two of the greatest men who ever exercised his art, repose at a few paces' distance from each other. Many a young musician has, no doubt, like myself, after the first few days spent in noise and bustle, wandered forth to the Währinger churchyard, to lay his offering of flowers upon the two graves, even though it were only a wild rosebush, such as I found planted on the grave of Beethoven. Franz Schubert's resting-place was unadorned. A fervent wish of my life was fulfilled, and I contemplated for a long time the two sacred graves, almost envying him—a certain Count O'Donnell, if I am not mistaken—who lies between the two. To look a great man in the face or to grasp his hand is perhaps one of those things which everybody most desires. It has not fallen to my lot to greet, while living, the two artists whom I revered most of all those of modern times; and, therefore, after having visited their graves, I would have given anything to have had near me some one closely related to either of them, especially one of their brothers, I thought. It struck me, on my way home, that Schubert's brother Ferdinand, whom the composer, as I knew, greatly esteemed, was still living. I quickly sought him out, and, from the bast near Schubert's grave, found he resembled his brother; he was smaller, but strongly built, with honesty and music stamped on his face. He knew me by my veneration for his brother—a veneration I had often publicly expressed—and told and showed me many things, of which, with his permission, a great deal was inserted, some time ago, under the title Reliquien in the Zeitschrift. At last he allowed me to see some of the treasures of Franz Schubert's compositions still in his possession. The riches thus heaped up made me shudder with pleasure. Where was I to begin—where end? Among other things he pointed out the scores of several symphonies, many of which have never been heard at all, having, in fact, been thought too difficult and redundant, and laid on one side. A person must know Vienna and the peculiar circumstances attending its concerts, as well as the difficulties there are in assembling the means for more than ordinarily great performances, in order to understand how, in the place where Schubert lived and worked, only his songs, and few or none of his greater instrumental works are ever heard. Who can say how long the symphony, of which we are now speaking, would have lain in dust and darkness, had I not soon come to an understanding with Ferdinand Schubert that he should send it to the directors of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, or to the artist [Mendelssohn] who conducts them, and whose sharp glance not even modestly budding beauty, much less beauty so apparent and brilliant, can escape. Thus it came to pass that the business was effected. The symphony was forwarded to Leipzig; it was heard and understood; it was heard again, and joyously, almost universally, admired. The active firm of Breitkopf and Härtel purchased the copyright of the work, and so it now lies before us in parts, and perhaps will soon lie in score, just as, for the profit and pleasure of mankind, we desired.

I say distinctly, whoever does not know this symphony, knows yet but very little of Schubert. This may, after what Schubert has already presented to Art, appear almost incredible praise. It has so often been said, to the annoyance of composers: "Abstain from ideas of symphonies after Beethoven"; and it is partly true that, with the exception of some few rare orchestral works of importance, which, however, are more particularly interesting as a means of judging of the gradual development of the talent of those who composed them, and have not exercised a decisive influence upon the masses, or the progress of other similar works, most of the rest are only flat reflections of Beethoven's style; for we make no account of those lame and wearisome manufacturers of symphonies, who possessed the power of imitating tolerably well the powder and perukes of Haydn and Mozart, without the head suitable to them. Berlioz belongs to France, and is only mentioned now and then as an interesting foreigner and madcap. What I had thought and hoped, that Schubert—who, steady in his forms, and full of fancy and variety, had already exhibited himself in so many other kinds of composition—would also attack the symphony from his point of view, and would hit the place, whence and through which the masses were to be reached, has most triumphantly come to pass. Most certainly he never thought of endeavoring to continue Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but, as an industrious artist, created uninterruptedly from out his own mind, one symphony after another; and that the world is now made acquainted with his seventh, without having viewed his gradual development, and the symphonies preceding the one in question, is perhaps the only thing which could cause any regret at its publication, and occasion the work to be misunderstood. Perhaps the bolt will soon be withdrawn from the others; the smallest among them will always possess its importance in relation to Franz Schubert; in fact, the Viennese symphony-copyists need not seek so very far the laurel needed by them, since it lies heaped up in Ferdinand Schubert's study, in one of the suburbs of the city. This would be a wreath worth presenting. But it is often thus: when people in Vienna speak, for instance, of —, they never end in their praise of their Franz Schubert; when they are among themselves, neither the one nor the other is reckoned of much importance by them. But, however this may be, let us now revel in the spiritual abundance which gushes out of this precious work. It is true that this same Vienna, with its Stephansturm, its beautiful women, its public magnificence, and girdled by the Donau with innumerable bands, stretching into the blooming plain, which gradually rises to a higher and higher mountain range—this Vienna, with all its remembrances of the greatest German masters, must be a fruitful soil for the fancy of the musician. Frequently, when contemplating it from the lofty mountains, I have thought how Beethoven's eye must many a time have wandered fitfully towards the distant range of Alps; how Mozart must often have followed dreamily the course of the Donau, which everywhere seems to vanish in bush and forest; and how Father Haydn must also have often looked at the Stephansturm, shaking his head the while at such a giddy height.

Let the reader bring together and envelope in a slight catholic cloud of incense the pictures of the Donau, the Stephansturm, and the distant Alpine range, and he will have a picture of Vienna itself, and, when once the charming landscape stands living before him, chords will be touched which otherwise would never have resounded within his breast. On hearing Schubert's symphony, and the clear, blooming, and romantic life it contains, the city rises up before me more plainly than ever, and it becomes once more perfectly evident to me how it is that such works can be produced in exactly such a place. I will not endeavor to give the symphony a folio; the different periods of age vary too much in their tastes, and the youth of eighteen often perceives in a piece of music an event affecting the entire world, where a man sees only an occurrence relating to a single country, while the musician has thought neither of the one nor the other, but simply gave his best music, the music he had in his heart. But that the external world, to-day brilliant and to-morrow gloomy, often penetrates the mind of the poet and musician, is a fact the reader must believe, as well as that more than simply beautiful song, more than mere grief and joy, such as music has already expressed in a hundred different ways, lies concealed in this symphony; nay, to grant it leads us to a region where we cannot remember ever to have been, we have only to hear such a symphony. We find in it, besides masterly technical musical skill of composition, life in every vein, the most delicate gradation of coloring, significance everywhere, and the sharpest expression of individual points, while, finally diffused over the whole is the romantic hue we have previously met in Franz Schubert. And then the heavenly length of the symphony, like a thick novel in four volumes of Jean Paul, for instance, who also can never end, and that for the best reason, in order to let the reader afterwards create for himself. How does this feeling of riches everywhere refresh us, while, with others, we have always to fear the end, and are so frequently grieved at being deceived. It would be impossible to imagine whence Schubert obtained such playful, brilliant, and masterly power of treating an orchestra, did we not know that this symphony was preceded by six others, and that he wrote it in the most mature vigor of manhood.* It must, at all events, be accounted an extraordinary instance of talent, that a man who, during his lifetime, heard so few of his instrumental works performed, should have been capable of training so peculiarly each instrument, as well as the combined mass of the orchestra, so that they often sound like separate human voices and a chorus. This similarity with the human voice I have never met with, in so surprising and deceptive a degree, in the works of any other composer, except Beethoven's; it is exactly the reverse of Meyerbeer's treatment of the singing voice. The perfect independence of the symphony, as far as Beethoven is concerned, affords another proof of its manly origin. Let the reader here remark how correctly and wisely Schubert's genius is displayed. Conscious of his more modest capabilities, he avoids any imitation of the grotesque forms and bold relations with which we meet in Beethoven's later compositions; he gives us a work of the most graceful form, and yet interwoven in a novel manner, never departing too far from the middle point, and always returning to it. Such must be the opinion of every one who has frequently studied the symphony. In the commencement, it is true, its brilliant character, novelty of instrumentation, breadth of form, charming alternation of the life of the feelings, and the completely new world into which we are transported, must embarrass many a person, as the first glance at something unusual always does; but even then there still remains the agreeable feeling which we experience, for instance, after a tale of fairy-land or magic; we are quite convinced that the composer was master of his story, and that the connection will in time become clear to us. This sentiment of security is produced at the outset, by the gorgeously romantic introduction, although everything then appears enveloped in mystery. Completely new, too, is the transition from this to the Allegro; the tempo seems not to be altered, and we are landed, we know not how. To analyze the separate movements would gratify neither ourselves nor any one else; it would be necessary to transcribe the entire symphony to give an idea of the novel character pervading it. I cannot, however, part without a word for the second movement, which appeals to us with such touching tones. There occurs in it a passage—where a horn summons us as from the distance—which appears to me to have come from some other sphere. Every one listens in silence as if a heavenly spirit were stealing through the orchestra.

* Written on the score are the words: "March 1828." Schubert died in the November following.

The symphony produced among us an effect produced by no work since those of Beethoven. Artists and amateurs united in its praise; and from the master, who had the work studied so carefully that the result was most magnificent, I heard some observations which I would fain have been able to convey to Schubert, as they would, probably, have caused him the greatest pleasure. It will be years, perhaps, before the symphony is firmly established in Germany, but there is no danger that it will be forgotten or neglected; it bears in itself the germ of eternal youth.

My visit to the churchyard, which reminded me of a relation of the deceased composer, rewarded me doubly; my first reward I received on the day in question. I found upon Beethoven's grave—a steel pen, which I have religiously preserved. Only on festive occasions, like the present, do I use it; may what has flowed from it prove interesting to my readers.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music in Cincinnati.

III.

Of the other two societies, the "Maenner-Chor" and the "Harmonic Society," I have missed the concert of the second by my own fault; and of the six nights of the opera season—yes, regular opera—given by the former, I was able to be present at but three, hearing Stradella twice and Masaniello once. La Dame Blanche, the third opera, I was prevented from hearing either night, much to my regret.

To give operas successfully requires large and varied forces. And the Maenner-Chor has them. It has not only splendid choruses, but fine soloists. I have not often heard the "briganti" in Stradella sing their parts better, and the action was almost unexceptionable. This is saying much, especially as I very distinctly remember the first night of this opera at the Theatre Royal at Munich. The choruses in both operas were magnificent, and the costumes splendid. I may state as a fact, and I think it might be set down as a remarkable fact, that the consciousness of seeing operas performed by amateurs very rarely obtruded itself, and then only for moments. Most of the credit for such an admirable state of things is due to the conductor of the Maenner-Chor, Mr. BARUS, who acted as musical director and stage-manager at the same time. Considering the fact that the orchestra employed do not habitually play together, and that they were to accompany choruses of singers not habitually performing with an orchestra, the fact that they sometimes played their accompaniments too loudly may be excused. It is less excusable in pieces where a solo-singer, not unused to the stage, as Mme. ROTTER was, is to be accompanied. However, I am not writing to detract in the least from the very brilliant character of the performances. A goodly portion of praise is due, likewise, to the members themselves and their energetic president, Mr. FUHRMANN. Not without much love for their work could they have done so well, and it is surely a bright sign of the love for art, to see so large a company of male and female performers devoting themselves to the hard work of studying and producing operas.

From what has been said it appears that the name "Maenner-Chor" is a misnomer, the Society, which was at first a men's society of the genus Liedertafel, having years ago called in female voices, and so really become a Choral-society. They have now given Cincinnati five seasons of opera, which, considering the dearth of operatic music "Out West," was deserving of all praise. It is understood that they are to bring out either the "Seasons" or the "Messiah" next winter.

The Harmonic Society gave a concert in which they performed—also under the direction of Mr. Barus—the first part of the "Messiah" and Romberg's "Song of the Bell." Concerning this programme I must repeat what on several occasions I said in your columns before, that parts of master-pieces are like the torsos, beautiful, but unsatisfactory. Why second-class works like Romberg's, however meritorious they may be, are performed in preference to works of genius, is a question which the conductor and the members may be better able to answer, than I can. Certain it is that with the inexhaustible riches of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Gade, something better might be studied than Romberg, even of the same difficulty with his "Song of the Bell."

It seems to be a general feature of concert programmes in this country to avoid Bach. People who have had opportunities of hearing much of him in Germany, or who have had the good fortune to be admitted to those delightful concerts for mixed chorus, whilom conducted by Mr. Dresel in the Mercantile Library Hall and elsewhere, or who have attended his concerts in Boston, cannot help regretting it. Nor does Robert Franz seem to be known; and of Schubert's songs, as well as his piano pieces, only a few familiar ones are introduced.

Mr. ANDRES promises a concert for May 4th; and Mr. BARUS sometime last winter opened the Cincinnati Musical Institute. Another fact in the musical life of the city must not be omitted; Anschutz, Grover, and their splendid opera, were here for a short season, though not attended—unfortunately for him—by your friend.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

Beethoven's Works in the Edition published by BREITKOPF & HARTEL.

BY OTTO JAHN.*

(Continued from page 27.)

Although, therefore, the editions published under Beethoven's own eye are not quite free from errors, they furnish an important addition to our authorities, nay, more, they may decide a point even in opposition to the autograph copy and the revised copy. This is proved by the one fact that the revision of the proofs was also a revision of the composition, because, under certain circumstances, it was in them alone that the composition could be finally corrected. A remarkable, and, in every respect, interesting instance of this, is furnished by the Violin Concerto (Op. 61). Beethoven had written the latter for the clever violinist, Clement, as is proved by the jocular title of the autograph copy:

* Translated, by J. V. BRIDGEMAN, from the original Die Grenzboten.

"Concerto per clemenza pour Clement, primo Violino e Direttore al teatro a Vienna, dal L. v. Bthven, 1806."

Clement played the Concerto for the first time at his benefit-concert, on the 23rd December, 1806. Now the autograph copy of the score contains a threefold version of the solo part. In its regular place in the score that part is written as Beethoven originally conceived it. He possessed a sufficient technical knowledge of stringed instruments to be enabled to judge what would be practicable and effective in certain cases; but a thorough virtuoso brings to bear upon the relation between difficulties and effect, and upon the employment of special means for a special end, a standard of judgment obtained by varied practical experience, and, where his own playing is involved, doubts and wishes springing from his individual position as an artist. It is evident that, previously to the performance, Beethoven carefully went through and discussed with Clement the Concerto in its finished state; that Clement gave him his opinion as to what struck him as unsuitable generally, or, at any rate as far as his own playing went, and proposed certain alterations; and that it is to this we owe a new version of the solo part written in a separate line under the score, and invariably showing that the composer had in his mind the practical violinist, desirous of achieving the greatest effects with the utmost possible certainty, that is to say: by the easiest technical means best adapted to the nature of the instrument and his own mode of play. That Beethoven yielded so much to Clement is a fresh proof that he entertained a high opinion of him, and, as it was thus altered, the Concerto was probably performed. But when it was on the eve of publication, Beethoven felt some scruples about approving all Clement's readings, and, therefore, wrote down in a new line over the score a third version, which partly re-adopts the original ideas, and partly makes use of the second arrangement, but also introduces completely new alterations. Doubts might certainly be now entertained as to which version was the proper one, were it not that we possess the edition published under Beethoven's own supervision, and corrected by himself, and as this follows the version last mentioned, there can be no longer any doubts that this is the final form fixed upon as such by Beethoven, and that the others can lay claim to no more than an historical interest.

Even where there is an abundance of critical materials, we still meet with certain passages which give rise to doubts and scruples, to be solved by internal evidence alone, and necessitating a sort of conjectural criticism. Such is the case, for instance, where Beethoven has made alterations in the work as a whole, and introduced them also into the principal parts or the leading passage, but, as may so easily happen with after corrections, has forgotten that such alterations indispensably require other corrections, in order that the connection and agreement of the separate portions of the work may be preserved. The original manuscript, under these circumstances, shows obviously where subsequent alterations have been made, and where the first reading, which no longer agrees with the rest, has been allowed to remain; it can, also, point out where a somewhat too striking discrepancy has been unskillfully got over, in the printed copy, by an officious correction; but in what manner Beethoven would have carried out his alteration through every detail is something which can only be guessed at, and the critical editor must, therefore, after carefully weighing in his mind all the facts, decide according to probability.

This is not the place to point out and to discuss what has been gained, in the new edition, for particular works by systematically turning to critical account existing materials; it is merely requisite to show clearly that a necessary and important task of this kind had to be accomplished. The result cannot be doubtful, when the task is undertaken with so earnest a will, with such valuable authorities, and with such decided talent. Very few pieces will remain entirely without corrections, while in the case of very many, even of the greater and best known ones, the corrections will be both numerous and important. As to what may be important in this respect, opinions will, it is true, vary. A false chord, of which the musician quietly disposes as a fault of the engraver, may excite grave doubts in the mind of the dilettante, so that the correction of it is for him a matter of no slight moment; signs regarding the style of execution, ties, dots, &c., may strike the latter as trifles, though his conception and performance not unfrequently depend upon them, and a correction of this kind may throw an extraordinary light upon a subject in the case even of a professional. While, therefore, the new edition can boast of corrections of all sorts, it is, above all, an essential step in advance that they are authentic, and that we may rely upon the text, thus given, as one critically trustworthy.

The critical mode of proceeding being what it is, it is highly interesting to be enabled to follow it; it is important to know what sources of information have been available for every piece, and what use has been made of them. To satisfy this want, arrangements have been made for the publication of supplementary critical articles, in which detailed information will be given of all questions that may arise on this head. A careful list has been made of the autograph manuscripts, of the copies, and of the original impressions which were available in each separate instance; of their nature, and value; of the use made of them; and of everything concerning them that could be considered remarkable, each necessary particular is recorded; and separate passages, too, in any way critically interesting, are especially pointed out. By this method, there has been collected a rich stock of materials, which, judiciously edited, is able to answer and satisfy all questions of criticism, and fix the proper reading, without producing weariness and bewilderment by a load of superfluous variations.

The searching examination to which Beethoven's works, as handed down to us, have been subjected, has cleared up, moreover, many points relating to another difficult question, namely: the chronology of those works. We know that it has become the custom for composers to distinguish their compositions, according to the order in which they are printed, with a continuous series of "Op." "numbers." These, however, furnish only an uncertain and vacillating guide for deciding matters of chronology. Even when the order of the series is scrupulously preserved—which it is not in Beethoven's case—it marks, at most, the order in which the works were published, and does not mark even this accurately when different publishers bring out works of the same composer simultaneously. The time of publication, however, is not even approximately given, since musical publications bear no date; we cannot guess what period intervenes between each work and the succeeding one, nor can we gather whether the publication proceeded quickly or slowly, or whether it varied at various epochs. Yet the solution of these material questions is by no means devoid of interest, for we learn therefrom what position the composer occupied with the public, what influence his works were able to obtain, and actually did obtain, under certain definite conditions of time. We find ourselves consequently left in the lurch as to the time when the various works were written, for this is decided neither by the "Op." number, nor by the year of publication. Accidents of all kinds may delay or hasten the publication of a work; grand and important compositions are frequently kept back for a considerable period, while smaller ones are quickly engraved; sometimes forgotten works are tardily brought forward again, and again, only that portion which the composer has finished is engraved. All these contingencies exerted an influence upon Beethoven, and so, the task of determining the time at which the various works were written and that at which they were published, is often a difficult one. In a critical revision of his works, however, this question, like every other, had to be met, and it was highly desirable that the new edition should contain as much trustworthy information as could possibly be procured about it.

Beethoven had a habit, though, unfortunately, there were many exceptions to it, of marking upon his clean copies the date of his writing them, sometimes doing so with great preciseness. Thus, for instance, at the beginning of the B flat major Pianoforte Trio (Op. 97), he has written "March 3rd, 1811," and, at the conclusion, "finished the 26th March, 1811," adding subsequently "sent to the engraver, the 11th June, 1816." In not a few cases, therefore, an examination of the autograph manuscript, or of a copy thus annotated by Beethoven, has furnished dependable information as to the time when a work was written: but it is not every original manuscript which has such notices marked upon it, while frequently no original manuscripts exist at all. Nevertheless, in very many cases, by the combined aid of other authorities and data, the time at which a work was written may, if it cannot be determined with absolute certainty or great probability, at least be brought within narrower limits, and approximately fixed. The most important aids in this matter are Beethoven's Note-Books (Skizzen-Bücher). Beethoven was accustomed to jot down upon a number of sheets of paper bound together, not only notions and ideas, as they struck him, but the separate motives, passages, and turns of the compositions on which he happened to be engaged, working out and recasting them, one after the other, with indefatigable industry; and, as he generally had several works in progress at one and the same time, the numerous sketches for the various compositions constantly ran through, and side by side with, each other. Beethoven himself obviously valued these sketches. He preserved and had them bound up in their original order. Such a note-book affords not only a vivid picture of his labors, but supplies actual information of what compositions he was working on at a particular date. If it is possible to determine by any other authority the date of some of the compositions sketched out, or if any incidental notices elsewhere point to a certain time—and, as a rule, such landmarks are not wanting—we are enabled to fix the date of the remaining compositions with tolerable certainty. Had reasonable precaution been taken to preserve the Note-Books in as complete a form as possible, we should have now possessed invaluable materials towards a knowledge of the history and the art of the great master; but they have been dispersed and lost leaf by leaf, and it is only with great trouble and by good luck that the investigator can obtain the scattered remains that he requires for his task.

Of decisive weight in fixing the time when a work was written is occasionally the period of its first performance. Many compositions were written for a special reason; many a concert derived all its attractiveness from the performance of new compositions; and many works are of such a kind that of necessity they found their way to the public immediately after they were terminated. The period therefore of the causes which gave rise to them and of their first performance, enables us to form an idea of the time at which they were written, though great care is always needed in such calculations. Thus, to take a case in point, Collin's Coriolanus was performed for the first time on the 24th November, 1802, while Beethoven's overture was not written until subsequently for a performance in 1807. Finally—leaving out of consideration the indications afforded by casual remarks in letters, and by literary aids of a similar kind—the particulars of the time of publication, are so far of importance, that, at any rate, they fix the latest date beyond which we must not go, and this may be a matter of moment especially with the earlier works. Trustworthy facts of this description are to be obtained only by laboriously and minutely searching through play-bills and concert-bills; announcements and advertisements in magazines and newspapers; and in fact the corners and dust-heaps of literature, great care and minuteness being requisite to arrive at sure results. What can be done by these means for the chronology of Beethoven's works will be shown by Alexander Thayer, who has devoted himself to the certain and unconditional demonstration of the truth with the genuine and enduring enthusiasm of the indefatigable investigator, in which character he has done some wonderful things in the way of research.

(Conclusion next time.)

Otto Dresel's Concerts in Philadelphia.

During the first week of the month Mr. Dresel gave, for the first time, four concerts in Philadelphia, before large audiences in the Foyer of the Academy of Music. We had hoped to hear about them from our worthy regular correspondent; but in the absence of a letter we take the following from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

In the excitement of a present pleasure it is almost impossible to reflect with sufficient calmness to give a candid judgment; but the pleasure having passed away and the time of reflection having come, we then sit down soberly to our task to discover whether it had a true foundation to rest upon.

Forcefully impressed with this truth, we have, until now, refrained from passing any judgment on the Pianoforte Concerts of Mr. Otto Dresel, of Boston, lately given here, and presenting, as we are now authorized to do, not only our own opinion, but that of a very large majority of those who heard him, (which must be our excuse for the tardy appearance of this article), we desire to fulfil our task, not with any wish or intention to make comparisons with others, which is always a very useless and wholly impossible work and of a very injurious tendency, but merely to say what we expected to find in Mr. Dresel as a musician, and how far he realized those expectations.

For two years a resident in the same house with Mendelssohn, who took a very kind interest in the young musician, . . . in frequent intercourse with Liszt, Chopin, Schumann, Ferd. Hiller, Klingemann, and others who lived in that time, when Leipzig shone more brilliantly than ever since with the great in music, Mr. Dresel has certainly enjoyed advantages not granted to many, and has consequently become, to a degree, the repository of much that is traditional in the interpretation of those masters whose works in the hands of many are an unmeaning conglomeration of notes.

Since living in Boston, now about thirteen years, he has devoted himself to teaching and occasionally giving a few small concerts, for the purpose of gradually unfolding to a yet untaught audience the many beautiful works in musical literature, rather than to show his own skill and dexterity as a pianist. With what success his efforts (always true to art) have been crowned, witness the present condition of piano music in that city, witness the programmes which are weekly offered by him to an attentive and highly appreciative audience. As we would speak of a professor of English literature, reading in a chaste and intellectual style specimens of the works of many of our great authors to his class, to exemplify his instructions and cultivate a love of the best and purest thoughts ever expressed by man, so would we speak of the musical readings (if we may be allowed the expression) of Mr. Dresel, as we have heard them spoken of in Boston.

Having this knowledge of Mr. Dresel, we did not expect to find a wonderful pianist; by which is understood one whose playing is an exhibition of great strength, unheard of dexterity, astonishing facility in octave passages, thundering arpeggios and everything else which is calculated to attract the eye, stun the ear, and leave the heart untouched; but we did expect to find one, who, combining the mental and moral qualifications necessary to form a true artist with a sound musical organization, had by a thorough appreciation of the dignity and capacity of his instrument, as a medium of expression through which he was to reach the feelings and awaken the artistic perception of his hearers, so carefully studied its every inflection and intonation, that he would thus be well fitted to interpret to others the works of those whose finest conceptions were written for that instrument. Were we then disappointed? By no means. A nervousness, natural to so keen and sensitive an artist, in first appearing before a perfectly strange audience, quickly disappeared, and we were soon made to feel that we were listening to one whose intellectual and artistic perceptions were very great. With a touch capable of producing the most varied effects, from the sternest sforzando to the most delicate, liquid pianissimo; from the crispest staccato to the most flowing legato; full of feeling, but without sentimentalism, intense thought without dullness, we found him continually throwing new light and beauty into that with which we were already familiar, and readily making us acquainted with that to which we were until then strangers. How continually were we reminded of the interest with which we listened to the Shakespeare readings of Mrs. Kemble, who would so often, by a certain intonation of the voice, throw sudden light upon a character, bringing out a phase of it which we never before perceived! Nor did we weary; for each concert found us more interested; and being so fortunate as often to hear him in private, and especially at a private concert, where we were more pleased than ever, we feel we judge rightly when we say that he successfully bore the test of the true artist, for he improved upon us each time we heard him. If we should presume to say in what composers he particularly excelled, we should select Bach and Chopin, two that are strangely at variance, the one great because so good and pure, the other tender, sensitive and impassioned.

A talent which is enjoyed by few, we think Mr. Dresel has in a marked degree—the power of transcribing orchestral works for the piano. We allude now to the Larghetto of Beethoven's Symphony, and the Andante from Mozart's Symphony, both of which were played at his concerts; but we heard, in private, many other similar works.

We then judge Mr. Dresel to be a thorough musician, a keen and subtle artist, a pianist capable of interesting his hearers in the varied works of very many different composers, to a degree which is not found to be the case with those, who, by the world generally, are called great pianists.

Eagerly solicited to come to Philadelphia, by a letter of invitation signed by over one hundred of our most musical people here, modestly appreciating the compliment paid him, he has given so much pleasure in this his first visit to our city, and conferred so great a favor in coming at a time which very much disturbed his concert engagements in Boston, that we desire to express the obligation we feel, and our sincere trust that at some future time he may be induced to repeat his visit.

MUSICA.

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, O., MAY 5.—"Im wunderschönen Monat Mai"—as Robert Franz, and after him Mr. Kreissmann, so beautifully sings,—your correspondent had the pleasure of listening last night to a beautiful concert given by Mr. ANDRES, of whom you have heard. Mr. A. occupies here a position in the world of music similar to that of Mr. Dresel; but the public do not seem to occupy the same position in relation to him, that a certain well-known and pleasantly remembered public in your dear Tri-mountain city does to Mr. Dresel. For, while Mr. D.'s concerts are crowded, as they always were, this was decidedly the reverse. And yet the programme, as you see, offered many good pieces, and Mr. A. is a player of fine taste and brilliant execution. Whether the tragedy, which had just crowned the dear departed father of the nation with the never-dying laurel of a hero and a martyr for freedom and for right, still held the mind and heart of the people in awful, solemn suspense, I am not prepared to say. But it would not be strange if it had. For he had a strong hold on the heart of the people, and we cannot forget our friends, if we would. As it was, the hall was only two-thirds full.

The programme was as follows:

- 1 Trio, op. 1. No. 2. . . . . Beethoven.
Henry G. Andres, M. and G. Brand.
- 2 Bariton Solo: "The Wanderer." Ballad by Mr. L. Piket. . . . . Franz Schubert.
- 3 Sonata quasi una fantasia, op. 27, No. 2. . . . Beethoven.
Henry G. Andres.
- 4 Hymn from "Stradella," Transcription for Violoncello.
A. Lindner.
- 5 Andante con Variazioni for two Piano-Fortes.
R. Schumann.
Mr. Fr. Kroell and Henry G. Andres.
- 6 Bariton Solo: "The Monk" . . . . . Meyerbeer.
Mr. L. Piket.
- 7 a) Marche Funèbre from Sonata op. 26. . . . . Beethoven.
b) Canzone Neapolitana. . . . . Franz Liszt.
c) Arabesques on a German Melody. . . . . Andres.
Henry G. Andres.

The pieces being well-known, it only remains to say that Mr. A. played his part finely and was ably assisted by Mr. F. Kroell in the Schumann Variations; true and good variations, which it is a pleasure to hear. Mr. Piket, who enjoys a fine barytone voice, sang with much taste; the Messrs. Brand show that, with faithful effort, they have a bright future before them. Their tone might be fuller, they might learn something in musical elocution yet from your Messrs. Eichberg and Wulf Fries, especially the efficacy of leading over passages being sometimes retarded, growing strong, and—stronger—still—with—ev'—ry—note; or gently losing strength, with loving tendrils climbing up to sweetest tones of the well-known theme. But on the whole they played well.

The last two pieces were especially well played by Mr. Andres, and we were glad to hear the "Arabesques" again of which I wrote you in my last. It is to be wished that Mr. A. will give us more of such pleasing concerts. But, despite the incessant rains, summer is upon us, the trees have done blooming, and I fear the season is over.

MAY 12.—Our high schools just now have a sensation. There is some speculation in the Yankee Nation; a point, which I think, is not to be contested. Some Yankee with a German name caused another Yankee with an English name—ever heard of Henry Morford, Esq., New York?—to write a libretto, which, as there happened to be a rebellion in the land, was to take for a subject "the great rebellion." H. M. Esq., of New York, took a mild copperhead-point of view, and wrote something half slang, half liberty and red, white and blue, in which Massachusetts (save the mark!)—Massachusetts, she, who in her public schools seats the negro-child side by side with the Anglo-Saxon's rosy-cheeked offspring—is made to reproach South Carolina on the subject of her loving a "smutty-faced" nigger, thinking that sister S. C. might have "better taste;" while sister S. C., on the contrary, declares him to be "a nice, black little dear." A libretto in which poetical phrases like the following abound: "So don't you look big"; "I say she shan't"; "You won't"; "There'll be a pretty row, then, if I don't," and so forth ad infinitum. Now that is sufficient, I think, of the subject. Of the performances we will say that the popular airs, sung by the pupils of both high-schools, by the freshness of the voices and the words and melodies made doubly dear by the years and experiences we have just passed through, made the most pleasant and soul-stirring impression. We will add that the declamation and stage postures of all the performers were surprisingly good, and we cannot refrain from mentioning three dramatis personae as excellent. Miss B., who represented the goddess of Liberty, was splendid; in form beautiful, in delivery dignified, and in carriage majestic; Miss C., who stood for New York, with her dark waving hair and antique profile, recited and acted her part admirably; and Master J. personated Paddy to perfection. The two young ladies mentioned, seemed to have had years of experience in their different parts and on the stage, and the impression made by Miss B.—, was that of a real goddess. Her beautiful form no less than the pathos with which she sustained her part, delivering the sentiments in a rich, sympathetic alto voice, made a visible impression on the audience. The surprising excellence of the military tableaux has nothing of interest for your paper; but it is worthy of record that so much good declamation and—in the choral and chant—such good part-singing could be done by the pupils of our high schools after so few rehearsals.

We are requested to be on the tip-toe of expectation for Madlle. HELENE DE KAROW, to whom we owe so much of the beauties of "Les Misérables" by Victor Hugo, who it seems, did not at all feel in a mood of writing long novels before he had the bliss of hearing Mlle. de K. in 1860 or thereabouts, and therefore dedicated the first copy of the Misérables book to her. Likewise are we to be charmed with the play on the piano of Herr JACOB WHEELI, or better Mr. James W., who elicited raptures from most, if not all, the European potentates. The latter fact will move the republicans, especially after they have "whipped," and are now ready to "whip all creation and some adjoining villages." Well, we will see what we shall see. If I am not mistaken, your New York correspondent said something concerning Mr. W. Mr. Strakosch is said to be entrepreneur, and if you do not believe the Victor Hugo and European potentates story, I will send you to-day's issue of the "Volksfreund," published in this good city, where those things are set forth at length. *†

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 27, 1865.

The Musical Festival.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY is enjoying its fiftieth anniversary, and causing hosts of other people to enjoy it, in a royal way this week. It is a whole week's feast of noble music, with such concentration of talent, and such amount of earnest preparation, as never before has been attempted in this country. It certainly will admit of comparison, to say the least, with the Birmingham and other Festivals in England. It is a long stride in advance of what was for its time a still bolder aspiration, and by no means to be forgotten, the first musical festival given by the same Society in 1857. That proved what might be done, this does it more completely.

We are in the midst of it (having to go to press this very Thursday), and hardly feel that the time has come for us to write about it. The truth is we are sucked into the vortex of the Festival itself, what with rehearsals, oratorios, and concerts day and night, and find no time to step outside of it and calmly make report. But we will make such beginning as in our weakness and distraction we find possible.

On Tuesday morning, then, after rehearsals crowding more and more closely on each other's heels, and growing more and more exciting, with eager listeners enough to make them virtually concerts (and we would we had room to describe them), all was in readiness for the inauguration of the Festival in due form according to programme. The first sight of the imposing scene ensured success; the large promise had not been empty, and all the labor had not been in vain. There at a glance were manifest all the elements, in orderly array, of such a realization of great song and symphony as had been so long, in hope and fear alternately, looked forward to. It was well that they attempted (we have not heard with what result) to photograph the scene. The hour, eleven, had come and past. When all were ready, and all waiting for the signal from the Conductor's wand to burst forth into song, suddenly that gentleman (no other than our CARL ZERRAHN of course) stood with fixed look toward the audience, the government of the Society grouped around him, and gradually all the faces and the forms of the whole mass of singers and musicians became likewise fixed, as in that famous banquet scene in the palace of the "Sleeping Beauty." It was soon seen that the photographer in the gallery was holding back the flood of harmony e'en then about to burst on the impatient ear.

And what a scene it was there in the Music Hall! The seating of the chorus and the orchestra was in itself a work of art. A more admirable economy of room, combined with acoustic adaptation and fine spectacular effect, could hardly have been contrived. The platform had been brought forward into the hall; rows of seats rose amphitheatrically on either hand into the side galleries, completely filled with chorus singers; tenors and basses, crowding that section of the galleries, overflowed down several steps of either staging, and the stream, still broadening forward and downward, grew gay with the many colored dresses of soprani and alti. To one looking up at either wing of the chorus from below, the mass of heads seemed poured out from above in just the form (a very frigid simile, we must admit) in which the glaciers spread down through the mountains—we, of the audience, may pass for the moraine. Clearly the promised six hundred voices were not merely nominal; there were actually at least seven hundred. The level space at the feet of the two great choral slopes was filled with the Orchestra of about one hundred instruments. These, too, were very ingeniously and well arranged. In the foreground, facing inwardly from each side, sat rows of violins, 22 first and 21 second; behind them, a row of 10 violas (tenors) faced the audience; a solid square of wind instruments sat behind these (4 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarinets, 4 bassoons, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, cornets, 3 trombones, huge opicleid or tuba, &c.) flanked on each side and in front by a double row of violoncellos and double-basses, 10 of each; and behind them, drums, triangles, &c., abutted on the front of the Great Organ. The Organ in the background looked superbly. Medallion portraits of Handel and Haydn were suspended, amid evergreen and flowery wreaths, with golden-chorded lyres, vases, national flags, &c., in front of the two central towers, just hiding the two giants; and between them, the bronze Beethoven, somewhat overweighed with garlands, stood the august genius of the hour.

In that orchestra it was pleasant to recognize the faces of many of the old "Germania," who have lived in other cities since they disbanded here ten years ago. We looked in vain, however, for their leader, Bergmann, among the Cellos; he should have been there, and he too might have been called on to conduct a Symphony or two to the gratification of many old admirers. Many a well-remembered worthy of the New York Philharmonic could be seen there also. This noble orchestra will for special requirements in certain compositions become somewhat larger. The printed list names two more double-basses, a Serpent (monster not yet visible—it must be we are threatened with some "Zukunft" music), and a row of drums et cetera, which swells the total to 112 instruments. Here is the list, with our WILLIAM SCHULTZE for leader:

1st Violin.	Schmidt.
Schultze.	Bernstein II.
Suck I.	Beisam.
Mesel.	2nd Violin.
Eichberg.	Eichler I.
Weins.	Eichler II.
Verron I.	Schneider I.
Suck II.	Ford.
Coenen.	Lothian.
Schuls.	Werner.
Bewig.	Trautmann.
Noll.	Vanstane I.
Reyer.	Sents.
Grill.	Jarris.
Hahn.	Andres.
Schwartz.	Walther.
Hermann.	Rietzel I.
Bernstein I.	Hallem.
Schreiber.	Rietzel II.
Phrall.	Plate.

Hirschmann.	Paulwaser.
Bahls.	Gurtelmaler.
Schneider II.	Mente.
Lautenbach.	Clarinet.
Mullaly.	Bohm.
Viola.	Ilebech.
Zohler II.	McDonald.
Ryan.	Albrecht.
Suck III.	Bassoon.
Rimbach.	Eits.
Bauer.	Sohat.
Cross.	Neits.
Thiede.	Kalkmann.
Matska.	Horn.
Haupt.	Hamann.
Schilling.	Regestein I.
Violoncello.	Kustramacher.
Fries.	Phgemann.
Verron II.	Trumpet.
Moorhouse.	Arbuckle.
Schmits.	Pinter.
Jungnickel.	Brown.
Mollenhauer.	Cornet a Piston.
Brannes.	Klenn.
Hoch.	Jacobus.
Lohde.	Trombone.
Allner.	Lacroix.
Contra Basso.	Letech.
Stein.	Saul.
Regestein II.	Tuba.
Fries.	Listmann.
Kohrhahn.	Serpent.
Kammerling.	Cundy.
Steinmann.	Tympani.
Pfaffen Schneider.	Stohr I.
Bartels.	Side Drum.
Rheder.	Stohr II.
Heinecke.	Simpson.
Preusser.	Keach.
Gebhardt.	Bass Drum.
Flute.	Field.
Zohler I.	Cymbals.
Schlimper.	Vanstane II.
Rametti.	Triangle.
Piccolo.	Nicholas.
Goering.	Librarian.
Oboe.	Lets.
Ribas.

Of course in so great an enterprise, and in spite of admirable organization, foresight, and unremitting vigilance and effort, there were some drawbacks; only one of which, though that one the most serious, was avoidable, namely the high price of admission, so foreign to our democratic habits, and necessarily excluding the larger number of the best music-lovers, who are too unworlly to be wealthy. The result was that the audience on the first day, though large, did not entirely fill the hall; if we allow two listeners to each of the eight hundred performers on the stage, we think we shall not underrate the audience of Tuesday morning. We cannot but think that prices ranging one half or one third lower would have paid quite as well, although we doubt not that the audiences will go on increasing with the momentum of the Festival, and we understand already that financially its success is sure. The next most important drawback was the rainy habit of the weather for weeks before and during the day of the opening;—this, thank Heaven, is already splendidly reformed. Then there was the difficulty of procuring famous solo singers, with mortifying disappointments in the case of some who were engaged. But there was a spirit in the whole affair which none of these accidents could damp; the grand orchestra and chorus were sure at any rate, and those are the main things after all; the Society had done its best to make all perfect, and each possibility of failure was so well anticipated that it could not be serious.

But to return;—we left our entertainers in the act of being photographed. It was a nervously protracted act of as it were suspended vitality, (leaving us time for the above reflections), which found relief at last in insuppressible laughter. Then up went the Conductor's baton, up rose all the ranks of chorus singers on their feet, and the great floods of harmony broke loose. The first burst was overwhelming, chorus, orchestra and organ uniting their full power in one massive rendering of Luther's Choral: "Ein feste Burg," on which sublime foundation Otto Nicolai has built up his religious Festival Overture. To this opening succeeds the overture proper, a strong fugue movement, quite Handelian in style, and made very effective by the successive entering of those solid masses of violin, viola, cello and contra-basso tone; after this theme and fragments thereof are worked up awhile with contrapuntal art, a second livelier theme sets in and is worked up with the first, both finally supplying quaint accompaniment to the Choral, after some alternation of instruments and voices. It was a significant and grand opening, revealing at the outset the full reach and volume of the sonorous means accumulated for the Festival.

This was followed by an appropriate address by the President of the Society, Dr. J. B. UPHAM, who related some amusing details of the history of a musical society which preceded the H. & H. in Boston; spoke of the origin of the latter, of its achievements and its influence on musical taste in the whole country; drew hopeful anticipations for us from the musical history of the old world; and briefly but suggestively characterized the great works which form the programme of our Festival. The address was heard with interest and frequently applauded; its length precludes our giving even an abstract of it here; we shall find room for it in full hereafter.

Then began Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" (Lobgesang), than which no great musical work could have been more expressive of what is in all true American hearts at this time. Well did the President say: "If it had found its origin here, at this day and hour, it could not have been more solemnly appropriate to these marvellous times of ours." It was composed to celebrate the invention of the art of printing, to give eclat to the inauguration of the statue of Gutenberg, at Leipsic, on the 25th of June, 1840. Praise and gratitude to God for Light—light spiritual and intellectual—the waiting and longing for light through all the long night of the dark ages—the break of Day, the free career and joy of a redeemed Humanity, and first and last and throughout everywhere the Praise of God—such were the themes and promptings of Mendelssohn's heart and genius when he composed the Lobgesang, perhaps the most felicitous and most inspiring of his larger works. (Read what Lampadius says of it in the "Life of Mendelssohn" just published).

In the performance it went gloriously. Especially the introductory orchestral Symphony, from the first trombone proclamation of the pregnant choral motive, through all the arduous difficulties of the rapidly unfolding, impetuous, complex Allegro, full of fine fire; through the gentler singing (as of the "heart musing while the fire burns"—yet with a slight flutter) of the sweet sad tune of the Allegretto, and the alternations therewith of the cheery choral full chords of wind instruments,—to the last deep-drawn sigh of satisfaction of that rich, soulful Adagio. Then we felt what it was to have a really complete Orchestra! How searching, pungent, tingling with nervous vigor and vitality, the collective tone of all those violins, moving with sympathetic unity in the hands of such artists, and how inevitably master of the situation in spite of all the brass! How boldly, unmistakably outlined, every passage! How rich, warm, round and satisfying the tone of the middle strings, tenors and cellos, those heart tones of the orchestra, which we have always missed in our small bands! How grand the dozen double-basses! Another delightful sensation, for a long time only remembered, but denied the ear, was the good honest sound of those bassoons. All the wind instruments were excellent. Verily twenty violins sound much more than twenty times as well as one; and those seventy odd strings all together, in wide harmony, realize a tone such as no great Organ can give more than a windy, dry suggestion of. The execution of the Symphony was one of the finest we have heard of any orchestral work in this country.

The choral portion of the Cantata was also a great success. We cannot attempt to describe the splendor, the mighty volume, the resistless power and grandeur of that vast four-fold mass of vocal tone; but in prompt, marked entering of the several parts, in unity, precision, rich and musical ensemble, and to a considerable degree in light and shade (though we did long for more piano and pianissimo by way of relief), it more than realized our high expectations. Our only question would be as to the policy of such very rapid tempo in two or three of the choruses; for instance, the latter, quickened, portion of the first: "Praise the Lord with harp and lute," and more especially, "All ye that cried unto the Lord in distress and deep affliction," whispering comfort and patience. To us it seemed faster than it can be natural to sing, or possible to get in all the syllables without some scrambling. But this, we are aware, is a mooted question. Temperaments differ, and with them the tempo giusto, so to speak, of each one's life. The execution, however, was so successful, and the effect so brilliant, so exciting, that we were far less conscious of the lightning speed with which we were borne away on those strong eagle's wings, than we had been at the rehearsal.

The great dramatic middle point and climax of the work, "The night is departing," &c., was thrillingly impressive. The anxious Tenor recitative: "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" with the fitful, wild accompaniment; the clear soprano answer: "The night is departing," high and bright, flooding all with instant light, like the first ray of the morning sun—suddenly athwart a world of darkness; and then the blazing outburst of the chorus, taking up the words, waxing more excited with the fugued rendering of "Let us cast off the works of darkness, and let us gird on the armor of light," and finally the massing together of all the male voices in one more utterance of the phrase: "The night is departing," answered in the same notes by all the female voices: "The day is approaching!" both masses joining in long notes for a close, set every chord to vibrating in the inmost American and human heart of every one of us, for it told the very story, all the suffering, the hope and fear, the waiting, the joy, the miracle of these four great years in the history of the cause of Freedom. "How prophetic," indeed, "would this performance have proved" (to allude again to Dr. Upham's address), "had it come earlier!" But many among us do not forget that the prophetic significance and inspiration of this solo and chorus was felt, in the same Hall, as much earlier as the 1st of January, 1863, when it was sung in honor of Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, not (to be sure) with the full force and will of the Handel and Haydn Society, but with quickening inspiration by an improvised much smaller chorus, including many of its members. Now we have the musical aspiration of that day realized upon a grand scale, just as the nation's dawning hope of that day is now the fully risen sun of victory with Liberty for all men.

We have only room for brief acknowledgement of worthy and in a high degree successful effort on the part of the solo singers. Miss HOUSTON's clear soprano rang out splendidly in "The night is departing," as it did in the truly "prophetic" earlier and smaller festival to which we have alluded. She was in good voice throughout, and sang with earnestness and large, expressive style. Miss GOODNOW sustained creditably the second part in the duet: "I waited for the Lord," which was begun (it seemed to us) a trifle too slow, but which, with the flowing in of those broad, calm, heavenly expanses of full chorus, ravished the audience. Mr. HAZELWOOD, compelled at short notice to take the place of Mr. PERRING, of New York, who was ill, has a sympathetic tenor, of fair power, which he used with taste and judgment in the sad music of his solos.—And here we have to pause, for this week, with merely this hurried and huddled account of but the Inauguration of the Festival. It was glory enough for one week, and very creditable to all concerned. We shall review the whole, when it is well over, in a calmer moment, when we have time to be short. For what yet remains of the Festival, (the concert this afternoon, "Elijah" this evening, and the "Messiah" to-morrow evening)—large opportunities to be improved—we must refer the reader to the advertisements.

Mr. Dresel's Concerts.

In the midst of so much on a grand scale, we must not forget our smaller and more quiet opportunities, equally and even more remarkable in quality if not in quantity. Indeed he who possesses (in the sense and in the spirit) half a score of Beethoven's Sonatas has got something, in an artistic and poetic sense, intrinsically as great, perhaps, and as significant, (so far as his own soul is concerned, only he does not share it with so many), as a whole musical festival. And we give but half a picture of the musical good luck of our city during the past fortnight, if we omit to mention what occurred during the first week thereof, before the Festival, to-wit: the last three of Mr. Dresel's eight Piano-Forte Concerts. If we have saved room barely to set down the programmes, we have made a significant mark here.

The sixth concert, (May 13) opened with an Andante from a Symphony by Haydn, exquisitely arranged and played, so neat, cool, fresh and resting to a weary brain. Then he played, for the second time, Beethoven's romantic Sonata in C, op. 53, and most felicitously. Then another Symphony arrangement (an art which Mr. D. possesses in a rare degree), namely, the supremely beautiful Allegretto from Schubert's Symphony in C. The second part contained smaller pieces, all most genial and enjoyable, and not new, namely: Mr. D's own charming Intermezzo and Phantasiestück; Ferd. Hiller's brilliant Bolero; and of Chopin, the Mazurka in C sharp minor, op. 30, and the Waltz in D flat, op. 64.

The seventh programme (Wednesday afternoon, May 17) was almost wholly new, and made up of a unique selection of pieces.

Prelude E flat minor, and Fugue G sharp minor. J.S. Bach.
Sonata A minor, op. 42. Schubert.
Allegro. Andante con Variazioni. Scherzo. Finale.
Variations, C minor. Beethoven.
Gigue. Mozart.
Fantasia Variations, op. 1. Aug. Saran.
Sonata, E minor, op. 90. Beethoven.
Allegro appassionato. Allegretto cantabile.
Fantasiestücke, C sharp minor, D flat major, op. 2.
Aug. Saran.

The Sonata by Schubert was one of which our ears have long craved a hearing at the hands of such an interpreter, for there is no finer work of genius in that form since Beethoven—but it was our fate to be a prisoner to other music that day. It was a good thought to place the Variations by Saran (of which we lately printed a description) side by side with those of Beethoven, which we think Mr. Dresel was in duty bound to let us hear again. The Bach Prelude and Fugue are of the very finest, and that Sonata of Beethoven is as full of original fire and passion in its first (minor) movement, as it is a perfect, exquisitely lovely example of the Rondo form in the second, which is in E major; it flows as spontaneously as Mozart, and the theme returns into itself by the most stealthy and felicitous surprises.—Here is the eighth and—for there must be an end to all good things—the final programme:

Sonata, in G. op. 81. Beethoven.
Allegro. Adagio. Rondo.
Three Phantasiestücke, op. 1. Jul. Schaeffer.
Allegretto, from Op. 58. Rob. Schumann.

Scherzo, from op. 52. Rob. Schumann.
Valse. Steph. Heller.
Andante and Etude. Schubert.
Mazurkas. Chopin.
Scherzo, from op. 17. Mendelssohn.

Also a characteristic and a rare selection. The pieces followed one another as they might have come up involuntarily in the player's mind when playing by himself in a fine mood. The Sonata in G was most happily rendered; particularly the Adagio, which without the fine vitality and exquisite shading of Mr. D.'s rendering is apt to be found long and rather "slow," though it is really full of beauty. The Rondo, however, had the most riches to reveal and only waited for such an interpreter.

The Fantasy pieces by Schaeffer (author of the article on Variations and on Saran, which we recently translated), are singularly original, poetic, fascinating compositions; and the Schumann Allegretto, in canon form, fell in after them like a foregone conclusion by intrinsic fitness.

We must reserve for a quieter time the summing up of the unusual richness and representative variety of those eight programmes of the choicest series of piano-forte concerts ever yet given in this country.

Meyerbeer's "L' Africaine."

The first production of the long expected work occurred at the Grand Opera in Paris on the 28th of April—a few days earlier than before announced, in order that the Emperor might hear it before going to Africa himself. In spite of its enormous length, its bad libretto and the bad working of the "big ship," it was hailed, of course, with a general chorus of newspaper praise. From various specimens we select the following:

On Saturday morning, shortly after one o'clock, the representation of L' Africaine, which began, with a punctuality quite military, at a quarter-past seven, was terminated. I hasten to give you the impressions which this grand occasion has produced upon me, believing that it will not be without some interest for the readers of the Independence, were it even only as an offering of early fruit. Proceeding to take my place in the orchestra through the Rue Lepelletier, which was magnificently lighted as far as the Boulevards, seeing the façade of the opera outlined under its garlands of gas, and marked from space to space by symbolical stars, beholding the crowds of carriages filled with young women in splendid toilettes, and ornamented with flowers and diamonds—I could not refrain from thinking I was going to some splendid fête. It was a fête, and a great operatic fête. The Emperor and Empress, who took possession of their box a little before the end of the first act, were dressed in deep mourning, and some ladies in the boxes of the first tier were also similarly attired. In general the gentlemen adopted a black dress and a white cravat. The vast space of the opera was filled to the ceiling with a crowd of young ladies, whose spring toilettes, full of splendor and freshness, brought out in the most pleasing manner the sombre groundwork of the scene. A great number of the official world were present, no doubt as a portion of the cortege of the Emperor, who decidedly leaves to-morrow for Algeria, as well as to witness a second time the work of Meyerbeer, of which they had already a foretaste in the general rehearsal, which took place on Sunday evening.

The impressions produced on the first occasion were entirely confirmed by the final trial, which has just taken place. The success was so great and decided that we have to register a new chef d'œuvre for its composer. Can the same be said for the author of the poem? I doubt it; he has obtained but a hypothetical success.

We omit the description of the first four acts, of which we gave an account in our last number. The writer proceeds:

The fifth act is composed of two tableaux. The first takes place in the gardens of the Queen, who has invited her rival for the purpose, no doubt, of insulting and wounding her before putting her to death; but by one of those sudden outbreaks of feeling which occur in the Tropics as well as in Europe the African takes pity on her victim, and calls Nelusko to her. She orders him secretly to put De Gama and Inez on board a vessel which is about to sail for Portugal; then knowing that she could not survive the loss of the handsome European to whom she was so devotedly attached, she proceeds to the headland where the machineel tree, whose shadow is death, rises in its funeral majesty. At the foot of the tree, which covers with its thick foliage the greatest portion of the large scene of the opera, the sacrifice which forms the poetic subject of the second tableau takes place. The scene is a marvel of color and effect. Here it is that Selika, having before her eyes the vast ocean on which appeared in the distance the vessel which was to bear De Gama and Inez, inspires with a sombre pleasure the fatal perfume of the fruit with red leaves, which leads gradually from delirium to death. Nelusko, alone the witness of her agony, remains bent beside his queen, whom he has so much loved, and who, if she is not to be his, will not at least belong to anybody else. This is the substance of the libretto. There are certainly others more interesting, more dramatic, and even more ably conceived; but Meyerbeer, who understood the subject and who could exercise a selection from a certain number of poems, gave the preference to the present one, and the effect of the first representation shows that he was not quite wrong. There is in L' Africaine what we rarely find in this kind of theatrical productions, the difficulties of which are greater than are generally supposed, musical situations happily conceived and combined, and in default of a very marked opposition in the sentiments of the persons, all of them lovers in their fashion, a certain variety of types which has supplied to the composer the subject of many a sublime passage and more than one inspiration, which will become immortal like the name of Meyerbeer himself.

Without doubt the general effect of the score is not less severe than grand. In the three first acts especially, it is the lyrical melopœia after the fashion of Gluck, which prevails, and we feel that this majestic Janus—bifrons of music, one of whose faces was constantly towards Germany, his country, whilst the other was turned towards Italy, and perhaps a little towards France, wished, as far as possible to fix his eyes on the side of the Rhine, but from the beginning of the fourth act the melody flows in full flood, and even in the preceding acts, where it is absent from the singing, we discover it in the marvellous arrangement of the orchestra. I shall confine myself at present to pointing out the portions which have produced the strongest and most profound effect. In the first act the chorus for basses of the grand inquisition, and the bishops, "You whom the world reveres," which was encored. In the second act, the slumber song, by Mlle. Saxe (Selika), "On my knees, child of the sun!" In the third act, all the choruses, so varied in rhythm, of the introduction, which is a masterpiece of instrumental and choral melody, as also a magnificent phrase recited by Faure (Nelusko) with incomparable power: "To the north, turn to the north; or if not, death." In the fourth act we may mention almost all the pieces, but that which raised a transport of enthusiasm was a duet, full of tenderness and sweetness, between Naudin and Mlle. Saxe. Never did Meyerbeer display more of the inspiration of love. One might almost say that the notes fall like the tears of a virgin into the cup of a lotus. In the fifth act the entire theatre burst forth into wild applause when the orchestra executed the symphonic prelude in the time of a funeral march, which precedes the arrival of Selika under the machineel tree. In this there are 16 bars, executed in unison by altos, violas, and violins, on the fourth string, the fascinating melody of which is inexpressible. Although the hour was far advanced, there was a desire to hear this prelude several times, the audience could not do without it, and when, according to usual custom, the pit loudly demanded the name of the author, and the curtain was raised for a kind of apotheosis, in which all the artistes were grouped around the bust of the illustrious author, the eyes of many were filled with tears, whilst the orchestra repeated once more the splendid phrase. It was like the song of the dying swan. As to the performance, Naudin, Faure and Saxe, whom the composer had himself pointed out before his death as the interpreters of his work, were deserving of the highest praise. Perhaps Mlle. Saxe deserves the highest place of all. Her voice was splendid. Naudin is not exactly modelled like a hero, and in the recitative the Italian accent was too prominent; but he sang the duet in the fourth act in the most charming manner. Faure, in his Malgachian dress, was magnificent, and his voice was more sonorous and powerful than ever. The divertissement in the fourth act is at once full of sweetness and richness; and the only pity is that it is so short. The scenery, especially that of the machineel tree, was painted by the hand of a master; but the three-decker, of which so much has been said, had not much success, and shared the same fate as the libretto.

Here is what the London Orchestra gets from its correspondent about "L' Africaine":

It would be unjust to say that it is a failure, and untrue to announce a great success. I think the expression "succès d'estime" the most suited to the occasion. The opinions on the music are various, and strongly opposed; some declaring it superior to that of "Les Huguenots," whilst others say that there is not a single good passage in all the work. But all agree as to the deadly qualities of the piece; which are as fatal in their effects as the emanations of the upas tree of the dénouement. Who cares about Vasco di Gama, who as I learn from Mr. Richard Mangnall's popular work was a Portuguese "navigator?" What interest can we take in Nelusko, that lago in chocolate, who not only perjures himself to save his rival's life, but afterwards, actually conveys him to a place of safety? The fourth act, which passes in Madagascar, leads us to imagine that the Malgaches belong to the Indian religion, and gives the high priest (M. Obin) an opportunity of singing an invocation to Brama, Siva, and Vishnou, of a character so asomant, that had those dietics listened to it, I don't know to what terrible vengeance they might have resorted.

With regard to the music: Inès solo; the finale of the first act, with the famous phrase, in E flat, for the bassi "Dieu que le monde rêvère;" Faure's air, "Fille des Rois," in Act I.; the double chorus O grand St. Dominique, and the unaccompanied phrase for baritone "Hola matelots! le temps change, tourne au nord," in Act III.; the splendid duet in the fourth Act, and the orchestral phrase in the fifth and last, all of which I have already mentioned (seven pieces in all) are those which attracted the greatest attention, and produced the greatest effect. But is this enough to make you sit quietly in your fauteuil from half-past seven until one in the morning? I fear not; and feel convinced that had the great maestro been still alive, we would have had a very different "Africaine," to that edited by Fétis.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Johnnie Gray. Ballad. F. Mori. 30
A fine ballad in the best "real ballad" style.
- Under the cliff by the sea. Song. J. L. Hatton. 30
A lover's romance. His lady is seated below the cliff, absently watching the waves and the ships that go sailing by, while he is wishfully regarding her in the distance. Pretty.
- The morning walk. Terzett and chorus for female voices. Concone. 40
This is an excellent trio, melodious and rich, and not extra difficult. It belongs to the set called "Les Harmoniennes."
- Little Tad. Ballad. J. W. Turner. 30
Thaddeus Lincoln, whose pet name is "Tad," must hereafter occupy a place in history, as being a favorite associate of his father in the last months of his life. This is an affectionate little song, and will be welcomed, especially by those acquainted with the family.
- All is well at home. Ballad. Lesta Vase. 30
An answer to "Is all well at home," and is quite home-like, and a comforting song to send to the absent ones.
- For him, for me, my father. (Per esso, O padre mio). "La Juive." 30
One of the pathetic songs sung by Esther, the supposed Jewess. Full of deep feeling.
- The flag is at half mast. Quartet. W. Willing. 40
Has German words as well as English, and contains a fine old choral and other good music.
- The death knell is tolling. Quartet. J. F. Fargo. 30
Words well put together by Judge Cony, and appropriate music. The subject, of course, is our national loss.
- The Sour apple tree. Ballad. J. W. Turner. 30
Those who buy this piece, get a comical picture of Jeff Davis, with the sour apple tree, and a good song thrown in, and all for three dimes. Cheap enough.

Instrumental.

- The dawning of peace. March. J. W. Turner. 30
Mr. Turner has been very successful in this composition, which, without being difficult, has a good deal of character, and is decidedly pretty.
- Polonaise No. 1, C sharp minor. Chopin. 50
Worthy of careful study.
- Lincoln's national funeral march. E. Everett. 35
Quite a number of these marches have been issued, but they differ in style, and those who have tried another, will do well to look over this also.
- Nearer my God, to thee. Transcription. Richards. 40
A sacred piece sounds better in a transcription than in variations, and this solemn and beautiful hymn is well worthy of translation into music.
- Stradella. Piano and Violin. Operatic Potpourri. Eichberg. 50
Still another of these welcome pieces; buy it while it's new.
- Polonaise, Op. 26, No. 2, E flat minor. Chopin. 75
It is superfluous to praise Chopin. You that can, play his music, and do not doubt its enjoyableness.
- Home, varied for 4 hands. Grobe. 50
Good, of course, and suited to the progress of learners.

Books.

- Chopin's Mazurkas and Waltzes. With portrait. $5.00
These compositions advance in favor, year by year as they become better known.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 631.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 6.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

(Concluded from p. 34).

In a tolerable performance, such as we are supposing ourselves and our readers to have just been hearing, even the least technically musical of us were plainly much impressed by the wholesome strength and grandeur of this first part of "Israel in Egypt." Some, perhaps, thought such a perpetually crescendo series of great choruses monotonous and stunning; the strain upon the mind and nerves was too seldom relieved by the gentler melody of song, quartet, or instrumental symphony. No one, however, can charge these choruses with lack of variety; they are an ever shifting, wonderfully contrasted, wonderfully harmonious range of mountain scenery. It was the fault of the performers, perhaps, if we did not so feel them. Their boldness would have been at once relieved and heightened by more decided contrasts of loud and soft, on the part of choir and orchestra. It is very natural for such music,—being in the fugue form, which is flame-like, wave-like—to work itself up into a very storm of harmony; but even storms have partial lulls, and there is no musical effect so soothing, satisfying, and sublime as the pianissimo of a vast multitude of voices.

But now for the Second Part. For, see, the singers have resumed their places, the players have re-tuned their instruments, and the conductor's baton is already raised. We may be sure that there are even greater things in store, for Handel grows as he goes on; his energy is never too much spent; in doing so much for us, he has been opening deeper springs of inspiration in himself; we shall witness with what new force and fulness they gush forth. The subject-matter of the Second Part is the sublime Song of Miriam, contained in the fifteenth chapter of Exodus. To bring out and illustrate the full sentiment of this, by all the resources of his art and genius, seems to have been Handel's aim.

And now hear what a prelude! a sort of universal prelude; as if filled with the magnitude of the theme, and conscious that this heavenly passion of divine praise, which now craves expression, contained all the primal, unperverted passions of the human soul. The orchestra begins, and in so many bars tries, hurriedly but boldly, all the harmonies of one key after another, to the number of seven—a whole octave of distinct scales. Of course the starting-point is the centre of the whole musical system, the natural accord of C; with a quick, spasmodic grasp, Handel's strong hand (as it were) sweeps through the several positions of this chord; in the next bar, he tries those of the chord of A; in the next, of D, and so on, traversing the circle of varieties and returning into the noonday fulness and repose of unity in C. It is like feeling every chord successively of the great harp of humanity, to satisfy himself that each is sound and true, and ready in its turn to yield response worthy of the great occasion. Then with the instruments the voices with their full strength and volume burst forth: "Moses and the children of Israel sang this song unto the Lord," traversing essentially the same circle of harmonies from the same point of departure. Upon this noble prelude follows the stupendous fugued double chorus: "I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." But as this chorus is repeated at the close of the oratorio, we suspend till then our remarks upon it.

In No. 19, we have for once the relief of a sweet soprano duet; for now the miraculous display is over, and sentiment may follow its own law, sometimes absorbed with all hearts into the great choral act of praise, and sometimes "musing at its own sweet will" in individual melody. "The Lord is my strength and my song: He is become my salvation:" is the text, on which one voice commences musingly a minor strain, climbing through several short, liquid, rhythmical divisions, but soon, by a regular cadence on the key-note, relapses into silence. Meanwhile the other voice has commenced a little later, and is finishing the same melodic fragment. Again they start, one after the other, as before, with the same little rhythmic motive, and this time carry it several stages higher; and before the second voice can finish its imitation, the first with three bright notes upon that highest height, plunges down into a bolder strain, full of exulting roulades; and before the end, the voices riot in triplets, and in still finer and more curious divisions, with bird-like ingenuity warbling through all forms of melodic floriture. The form is quaint, antique, full of the Handelian mannerism, and not much to the taste of this day; yet it has an intrinsic beauty that will live.

Nos. 20-22 are 1. another short introductory double-chorus sentence: "He is my God;" 2. the chorus in old ecclesiastical style: "And I will exalt Him," in which two fugue subjects are regularly worked up; and 3. the famous bass duet, known in concert-rooms: "The Lord is a man of war." This last is in the bold, declamatory, as well as elaborately ornate style, which Handel can employ with great effect, given the singer great enough to enter into the spirit of it, in spite of its not being modern. True Handelian singers and players, who get at the life of its peculiarity, are rare in this day; and his turns and phrases seem a dull and antiquated mannerism, when not taken up with nerve and con amore. These songs, therefore, in the hands of such solo-singers as can be made available in ordinary performances, seldom amount to more than accurate, but feeble and inanimate readings, to save the completeness of the oratorio. Handel has indulged in some exuberance of accompaniment in this duet, contrasting the pastoral oboes and bassoons with the string instruments.

"The depths have covered them." (No. 23) is a chorus, beginning in the cheerful key of F, but modulating into colder harmony at the thought: "they sank," till at the close the basses heavily drop through the intervals of the chord of A minor down to the E below the lines upon the words: "to the bottom, like a stone." This very brief chorus is followed by one more elaborate: "Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power" (No. 24), whose last clause: "hath dashed in pieces the enemy," introduces a striking theme, answered and imitated with great skill in the several parts. Double choruses still continue to rise, like mountain beyond mountain, in unabated majesty and novelty of form. The choral sentence: "And in the greatness of thine excellency, thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee," seems to convey the idea of a power transcending all our limited ideas of natural order, by the daring use of discords and their triumphant resolution. Of No. 26: "Thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble," we need but name the subject, which Handel has of course wrought out at length in the fugue form, the correspondence whereof with the spiral movement of consuming flame is perfect. Indeed, to convey an idea of the fugue to those not musically initiated, we have often been obliged to liken it to flame.

No. 27: "And with the blast of thy nostrils," is a single chorus, wonderful in structure and expression. Miracle itself could not more hold one breathless, than that monotone passage of the basses in octaves, telling how "the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea." The separate clauses of the verse form four distinct and characteristic musical subjects, which continually cross and interweave.

Passing over two elaborate songs: (No. 23) "The enemy said, I will pursue," and (No. 24) "Thou didst blow with the wind," in which the words "pursue" and "blow" furnish a key respectively to the musical treatment; passing, also, the double chorus, "The earth swallowed them," and the duet, "Thou in thy mercy hast led forth thy people," (30-32), we come to one of the most sublimely descriptive choruses (No. 33), "The people shall hear and be afraid." The agitated movement of the accompaniment, modulating wildly from E minor, gives the shuddering image of fear, which is kept up in the breathless, fragmentary utterance of the voices. "The inhabitants of Canaan," is pronounced firmly by all the voices; but, "shall melt away," is given in little vanishing fragments of melody by one voice-part at a time. These are long kept up, and imitated from voice to voice. "By the greatness of thy arm," is given in long notes of solid harmony; "they shall be as still as a stone," sing the basses in heavy unison, suddenly dropping down an octave; and as they lie there motionless and cold, the "passing over of the Lord's people," group after group, begins, in little travelling phrases of melody, or short scale passages, now in the major and now in the minor, ascending all the time in some two or more of the voice-parts.

This is followed by a delicious, serene melody for a mezzo-soprano or contralto voice, in the warm, spring-like, happy key of E: "Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established." It breathes the grateful repose of a sweet and pious home feeling.

We have now reached the sublime close of the whole. Handel's strength has been steadily growing towards this climax. It consists of several numbers. First the sentence of plain and majestic double chorus: THE LORD SHALL REIGN FOR EVER AND EVER. The words are first given in unison by altos and tenors, accompanied by the stately, ponderous tread of a figural bass; then they are answered, in a full blaze of vocal harmony and instrumentation, twice. This is, as it should be, in the key of C. Then a brief recitative (No. 36): "For the horse of Pharaoh went in with his chariots, . . . but the children of Israel went on dry land, &c.:" and then, again, the choral burthen of: THE LORD SHALL REIGN, which represents the highest moment of a universal act of worship, all thoughts, all feelings absorbed in the thought of the Eternal. Then another sentence of recitative (38), telling how "Miriam, the prophetess, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances; and Miriam answered them."

Finally, as if to raise expectation to the highest pitch, a single high soprano voice, with clear, silver, clarion tones, delivers the first line of the great double chorus, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously!" reaching the highest note, which it prolongs, bright and firm and clear, on the first syllable of "gloriously." And again bursts out in full chorus: THE LORD SHALL REIGN FOR EVER AND EVER. The clarion voice of Miriam continues: "The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea," with a triumphant trill upon the note above the key note, which terminates the strain; and still again the choral outburst of: THE LORD SHALL REIGN! after which the altos give out the fugue-subject, "For he bath triumph-ed gloriously;" its long, rolling cadence upon "gloriously" is thenceforth heard echoing about from one quarter to another of the vocal heavens, throughout the whole chorus; and, mingled with it, you hear short, spasmodic fragments—"the horse," "and his rider," "hath he thrown," &c.; also, "a sober, chanting kind of countersubject" (as Dr. Burney calls it) on the words, "I will sing unto the Lord," swells and subsides continually amid the roar and tempest of triumphal harmony. Once this gently swelling, joyfully solemn chant becomes the leading theme, and draws responses from all parts of the choir,—a pure heaven of serenest rapture, just before all the subjects are again brought together for a full and final close in the perfect accord of C. This is essentially a repetition of the opening chorus of the Second Part, and is by many esteemed Handel's greatest chorus. "The effects of this composition," says Dr. Burney, "are at once pleasing, grand, and sublime. Voices and instruments here have their full effect; and such is the excellence of this production, that, if Handel had composed no other piece, this alone would have rendered his name immortal among true lovers and judges of harmony."

As a whole, "Israel in Egypt" is one of giant Handel's mightiest works. We shall not say, in every sense, the mightiest. For colossal proportions, laid out as it is upon an immense scale; for bold conceptions, even exceeding the boldest of Michael Angelo in another art; for most triumphant execution; for power to keep the mind of the hearer strained up to its fullest comprehension of the sublime throughout so long a journey; for musical learning and invention, and strong application of creative will, this oratorio is perhaps unrivalled by any other work of music, or of any other art that will admit comparison.

But we cannot agree for a moment with those who call it greater than "The Messiah." The books of Moses are sublime; but who will say that Isaiah and the Gospels are not greater? "The Messiah" is as much a greater oratorio, as its theme is greater. It is the difference between Judaic and Christian; between the old dispensation of Power, and the new dispensation of Love; between the Old Bible love of Justice, and the New Testament justice of Love. The sublimity of "Israel in Egypt" is more material; that of "The Messiah" is more spiritual. One brings mighty miracles, as it were, palpably before us; the other utters the prophetic aspirations of the soul of all Humanity, and their fulfilment in Humanity's MESSIAH. This last, then, was the true predestined theme for Handel, for the culminating effort of his genius, up to which all his other oratorios, as well as his forty operas, and all before that, had been so deeply and broadly educating him. Necessarily, therefore, besides "Hallelujah" choruses, that theme required deep songs of love and grief and faith. "The Messiah" has more variety, and, as a work of Art, as well as sentiment, more unity. It is a wonderful, organic whole, vitally connected everywhere. "Israel in Egypt" is grand in detail; a succession of astounding pictures or events, wonderful, because the strength of the composer flags not to the end, but seems ready to begin again and build as many more such choruses as you will find him texts. In "Israel in Egypt," Handel is a mighty miracle-worker, a colossal strong man; in the "Messiah," he is the loving, deep interpreter of the best instincts and aspirations of the human soul,—a prophet of Humanity made one with Man, with Nature, and with God.

Correction. In the earlier part of the above article (first page of the last number) is a misprint: "Our bland Italian (it should be Indian) summer."

Dr. Upham's Address.

AT THE INAUGURATION OF THE MUSICAL FESTIVAL, MAY 23, 1865.

At the conclusion of the Overture, the President of the Society, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, addressed the audience as follows:—

I need not say to you, ladies and gentlemen, with how great reluctance I have consented—at the request of the government of the Society over which I have the honor to preside—to interrupt, even for a few moments, these sublime utterances from "Music's golden tongue," by any dull and feeble words of my own. It has been thought proper, however, that this occasion should not be allowed to pass by without some brief allusion to the principal incidents and events which have marked the progress of the Society during these fifty years of its existence; the circumstances under which it was formed; and the objects it has aimed to accomplish. How unfitted I am for the duty thus imposed upon me no one is more conscious than myself. With the promise to be brief, I must begin by soliciting your kind indulgence; and I will take to myself, at least, this consolation, that the effect upon your ears, of a patient listening to such dry details as I may have to offer, will be like that of the prolonged dissonance which precedes the resolution of a chord, to make more appreciable the glorious harmonies that are to follow.

If we go back for a moment to the earliest agencies, of which we have any knowledge, having a bearing directly upon the formation of the Handel and Haydn Society, we must refer to the existence of a similar association, founded more than seven years previously, with objects and purposes kindred to our own—an association whose very name is, I doubt not, unknown to the majority even of this intelligent assembly; and whose long lost records have, only within the last year, been exhumed from oblivion and presented, with thoughtful consideration, by one of the descendants of the original Founder of the Institution, to the Library of this Society. These records I now hold in my hand, in the shape of this respectable volume, dressed in a new and attractive garb—the title-page to which, but recently affixed by the donor, runs as follows:—

CONSTITUTION AND MINUTES OF THE MASSACHUSETTS MUSICAL SOCIETY. Founded by Charles Nolen, Esq., and from which sprang the Boston Handel and Haydn Society. Presented by Henry F. Nolen. Philadelphia, Dec. 25, 1864.

A most interesting and valuable acquisition, truly, to be counted henceforth among the treasured relics of our archives. It may not be amiss to make a single extract or two from these minutes, in vindication of the claims thus set up for the association, as being the parent of the present large and prosperous society, whose fiftieth anniversary we hail with appropriate ceremonies to-day. From these original records, then, it appears that in the spring of 1807 fifteen persons met together "for the purpose of forming themselves into a society for improving the mode of performing sacred music"—each, at the same time, subscribing a sum towards "the purchase of six volumes of sacred music, as the foundation for a musical library." A constitution and bye-laws were adopted, and the society was organized by the choice of a president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer and librarian, and a "selecting committee of three." This selecting committee, as the record goes on to say, then proposed the following tunes to be performed at the next meeting, viz: St. Ann's, Old Hundred, Blendon, Easter and the 97th Psalm, together with an anthem taken from the old "Worcester Collection of Psalmody." A fortnight later the Society came together again, with augmented numbers, and performed, to their mutual gratification we are willing to believe, the programme marked out at the previous meeting. But at a subsequent gathering, the Government of the Society had evidently become aware that a too long and varied programme had been attempted on the previous occasion; for I find the number of tunes recommended to be performed on the next evening reduced to two, viz: the Anthem, "O Praise the Lord with one consent," by Handel, and Pleyel's Hymn.

From this time forth the Society continued to hold its meetings monthly, with considerable regularity during the greater part of the year, adding to their numbers from time to time by ballot such persons as, in the estimation of a committee appointed for the purpose, were competent to take a creditable part in its performances. So far as appears from the minutes at hand, the largest number upon the rolls of active membership at any one time was twenty-one, and the average attendance at the meetings for practice about sixteen, showing that then, as now, absenteeism was an evil justly to be complained of. I infer, too, that a certain indulgence and favoritism was occasionally meted out to the more gifted among the members of this Association, for I find on their records a memorandum to this effect:—

"Voted, that Mr. Peter Dolliver be invited to attend our meetings whenever he thinks proper—Mr. Coffin be a committee to acquaint him of it."

The extent of book accommodation for the chorus, as also the dimensions of the orchestra, may perhaps be measured from the following vote, recorded upon the same page as the above:—"Voted, that six copies of the chorus in Handel's Messiah—"Worthy is the Lamb"—be provided at the expense of the Society, and also one copy for the first violin." This was at the close of the year 1808, the period of the Society's greatest prosperity. A few months later, the fortunes of the Association being evidently upon the wane, I find, under date of March 2, 1809, this entry:—"Agreed to meet at Hovey's Tavern, in Cambridge, on Wednesday evening the 15th of March;" the precise intent and purport of which meeting, however, doth not appear.

The meetings were now held, at longer and still increasing intervals of time, with an average attendance of about thirteen members, till at length, upon the records under date of Thursday the 21st of March, 1810—eleven members being present—may be found this ominous entry:—"Voted, that, on the next evening, the Library be sold to the highest bidder for the purpose of paying the debts of the Society." And at a meeting held by adjournment, at Villa's Hall, in Boston, on the 5th day of July, 1810, "it was voted unanimously that the Society be disbanded." Signed, CHARLES NOLEN, Secretary.

We now pass over a period of about five years from the date last mentioned. In the mean time, the second war with England had been waged—banishing for the while all other themes of interest, and absorbing, in its stern realities, all considerations of the gentler arts and graces which had just begun to adorn our hitherto harsh and ungenial civilization. As an instance of the hankering of the people, in those days, after the noisy accompaniments of instruments, suited to their warlike tastes—the roll of drums, the blare of trumpets and shrieking of the "wry-necked fife"—on every possible occasion that presented, I will read, with your permission, a line or two from an old advertisement of a Concert, printed in the form of the programmes of the time, which is as follows:—"A Grand Selection from Handel's Sacred Oratorios will be performed at the Stone Chapel, on Thursday evening, Oct. 29, 1812, under the direction of Dr. G. K. Jackson, assisted by the theatrical band, and many respectable Vocal and Instrumental Amateurs of this Town." Among the prominent attractions of which occasion, I find announced the Celebrated Bell Chorus, "Welcome, Mighty King," accompanied by the stately Dr. Jackson on the Carillons, and the "Hallelujah" from the "Messiah" with the accompaniment of trumpets and kettle drums! "Doors to be opened at 1-2 past 4, to commence at 1-2 past 5." Opportunities for the enjoyment of music during the two years and more of the continuance of this struggle were indeed very scarce and of the most meagre description. But no sooner was the news of Peace proclaimed, than the joy of the people burst forth spontaneously in the utterance of Hallelujahs and Anthems of Praise; and a Grand Concert was forthwith got up, by an assemblage, gathered, it is hard to say how or from whence, of nearly 250 vocal and instrumental performers. This took place on the anniversary of the birthday of Washington, 22d February, 1815.

"It can hardly be doubted," said Mr. Winthrop in his eloquent and instructive address, delivered in this hall at the opening of the three days' festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, in 1857, "that the impressive musical services of that peace jubilee gave the immediate impulse to the establishment of this association." On the 24th of March following, a call was issued, in due form, for all who were interested in such matters, to meet at Mr. Graupner's hall in Franklin street, "for the purpose of considering the expediency and practicability of forming a society for cultivating and improving a correct taste in the performance of sacred music, and also to introduce into more general practice the works of Handel, Haydn and other eminent composers." Among the gentlemen who convened in obedience to this call, five were original members of the former society. At a meeting held for the purpose on the 20th of April in the same place, a Constitution, consisting of a preamble and thirteen articles, was adopted and signed by thirty-one gentlemen. On examination of the rolls, I find, among those who were present at this first meeting, the names of two of our respected fellow citizens who are now living. One is that of Mr. John Dodd, well known to many here present, who was an original member also of the first named sacred music association, and afterwards, and for many years, connected with the Government of this Society, and who, I regret to say, is prevented by infirm health from participating with us in the interesting ceremonies of this eventful week; the other is a name you all know, for it is of one yet active in the performance of his duties on the Board of Trustees, and occasionally in the ranks of the choros, who for 50 years, with but two or three exceptions, has been annually elected to some post of honor or of trust in the administration of the Society's affairs,—its first Secretary—for the last 25 years its faithful and devoted Treasurer—and who, in the enjoyment of a hale and vigorous old age, is with us in his accustomed seat to-day—Mr. Matthew S. Parker. And if we follow with our finger down the starred columns of that first year of the Society's existence, one or two more living representatives might, perhaps, be found.

My associates, we venerate and honor these good and faithful servants, who thus ministered at the formative stages of the Society, and bore the heat and burden of its early struggles, and to whom so much of its present success and prosperity and influence is justly due. No word of mine, I am sure, is needed to remind you of the filial respect and love with which they should always be held in our hearts.

But to resume, for a moment, our narrative: On the first day of May, in the year above named, occurred the first private practicing of the newly formed society, from the old Lock Hospital Collection, "in a style," says the Secretary's Records, "very flattering to the hopes of its members." As early as the month of September, the subject of a public exhibition began to be mooted, and the idea gaining in favor as it was considered, the evening of Dec. 25, 1815, being Christmas, was fixed upon as an auspicious event for so important an undertaking. The work of rehearsal was taken immediately and vigorously in hand, and the concert was duly given, in the old Stone Chapel, before an audience of nearly a thousand persons; and such was the excitement of the hearers and enthusiasm of the performers, says an eminent critic of that day, "that there is nothing to compare with it." "The Handel and Haydn Society," he further adds, in eulogistic and somewhat exaggerated phrase, "is now the wonder of the nation!"

But I will not weary you with further details of the Society's operations. Suffice it to say, that, from that time to the present, their public performances have been given with more or less regularity year by year, and every year; that their services have been sought after, and cheerfully rendered on very many occasions of national and municipal interest and importance—before audiences of delighted and sympathizing thousands—with sometimes the aid of the most famous of the world's celebrities, a Braham, a Caradori Allan, a Sontag, a Phillips, a Formes, and others of rising reputation or more recent fame, from abroad or at home; in honor of the visitation of Presidents and Statesmen, or in solemn commemoration of their death; at public jubilees, the celebration of city anniversaries, the opening of the Crystal Palace exhibition in a sister metropolis, the laying of the corner stone of the monument on Bunker Hill, the introduction into our city and our homes of the waters from Cochituate Lake; on the occasion, too, of many of the most beautiful and significant events in the artistic annals of our history; the inauguration of statues, the setting up of kingly instruments of music; at the dedication of this noble hall, and the unveiling of its presiding genius, the bronze Beethoven; and in many other events of civil or political or religious moment—at all of which the Society has borne itself with dignity and with abundant credit.

We have not time, in the further consideration of our subject, to more than hint at the many ways in which, directly and indirectly, the Society has given an impetus and a direction to the cultivation of music as a science and as art, in Boston and in New England; by its numerous compilations and publications of practical musical works; in its collection of a Library of standard oratorios, and other musical compositions of the highest order, numbering, of all kinds, between four and five thousand by catalogue; in the influence of its two thousand and more of active and associate members, who have availed themselves of the privileges and opportunities it has afforded for the study and practice of the best music; as manifested in the existence, in such numbers and goodly proportions, of the earlier and later musical organizations, vocal and orchestral, which have sprung up amongst us, and have done, or are still doing good service, each in its legitimate sphere; in the prevalence of a better taste and higher culture among the church choirs, and in the organ lofts of our good city and the neighboring towns; in the unseen part it has taken in giving that shape and direction to public opinion that made it possible, here first in the cities of the new world, to introduce the study of music as a regular branch of instruction in our schools; in the persistency with which, through years of pecuniary embarrassment and debt, and in times of anxious solicitude and sometimes of doubt and almost desperation, it has held fast to its original aims and principles. These and such as these are the fruits of the long years of labor and of effort on the part of this ancient and respected association; and are, in part, the results—the grand and sublime results—it may justly claim to have accomplished.

Shall we stop here in our estimate of the ends achieved or the possibilities yet to be accomplished? Not so, as I conscientiously believe. The seed time indeed has passed, and the season of the ripening harvest is at hand. More than ever in the future do we look—ought we to look—now, in the unfolding of so vast and sublime a page in our country's history, for the rapid development of whatever can ameliorate and adorn, as well as strengthen the condition of a reunited and powerful people. It is in times of political perturbation, or long continued and desperate wars—history will tell us—that great geniuses, in whatever sphere of warlike or peaceful and artistic pursuits they may incline to act, are being nurtured and made ready for their work.

"The thirty years war in Germany," says Hullah, "was fruitful in the production of a host of thoroughly well-trained masters of the musical art and science of their day and here. Among such were Kircher, Johann Christopher and Ambrose Bach, and Zachau, the immediate predecessors and teachers of Sebastian Bach and of Handel. The same may be said, to a limited extent, of the effect of the civil wars of the seventeenth century in England. It is likewise a fact—a curious coincidence only it may be—that the last half of each century, from 1550 onwards, has proved invariably most prolific in its gifts of musical greatness and genius to the world—in Italy, in Germany, in Belgium, France, and England; Palestrina, Paesello, Clementi, Cherubini; Emmanuel Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Pleyel; Orlando Lasso, Lulli, Montigny, Gretry, Lesueur; Tallis, Humphrey, Welbo Calcott, Battishill, Purcell. The early and vital life of Beethoven belongs by right to the last half of the last century. Handel, too, budding three half centuries in his long and laborious career, can hardly be said to fall out of the category; while Mendelssohn, Schubert and Schumann of our own times, are the brilliant exceptions that only strengthen the rule.

May we not argue from this, that the sacred requirement from us, in the last half of this nineteenth century, is to "go and do likewise?" I will venture the assertion. Certainly the conditions in us have now at length been fulfilled. And are not two centuries and a half of hard prosaic life, compacted in its early experiences by every form of civil, religious, political, social and domestic trial and perturbation, and put to the test by all conceivable hardships of the French and Indian wars, the early and later struggle with England, and, in these recent days, a rebellion, in comparison with which the combined horrors of the civil wars in Germany and Great Britain are but as skirmishes upon the outposts—enough to place us, at length, in the category of the nations, whose mere toil and tasks are ended; and henceforth to permit us to cherish and develop the peaceful, humanizing influences of art in all its varied and delightful forms? Is it too much to believe that, here in New England—in the ancient colony of the Massachusetts Bay—in the home of the Protestant Pilgrims, there shall yet arise some future Handel or Haydn, or Sebastian Bach, some youthful Mozart or Mendelssohn, deriving his first knowledge of the art in our public schools, perhaps, or fired with inspiration, it may be, at the revelations of genius, first opened up to his soul while listening to the sublime music it has been the custom of this old Society to endeavor to interpret?

Do you ask, doubtfully, where in this matter-of-fact and prosaic locality are the materials for new and fresh themes, after the giant minds we have contemplated have been gleaning along the track of the ages for fitting thoughts and themes, and gathering and binding them up and giving to them form and expression, in such wealth of abundance and completeness, for centuries? I answer, these elements and materials are those of truth—and are everywhere, and in exhaustless measure. "All that happens in the world of nature or of man," said the most eloquent of New England orators, "every war, every peace, every hour of prosperity, every death, every life, every success and every failure—all change, all permanence,—all things speak truth to the thoughtful spirit—speak to the soul in the full chords of revelation, in the teachings of earth, or air, or sky, or in the still melodies of thought." So to the listening ear and the willing mind, the voice of music is audible always. The world is full of it; the very air is laden with it; it is heard through all the manifestations of nature. It roars in storms; it thunders in the cataract; it murmurs in the "slumberous caverns of the earth;" it hath its abode in wild solitudes and in great forests; the silence of tropical deserts is eloquent with it; the ocean holds it in her hidden depths, and in measured cadences is casting it ceaselessly upon the shore. It is with us, too, in the occupations of our daily life, and is the companion of our common ways. Consciously or unconsciously to us, it is a participant in the strife and tumult of the town, the noise of streets, the rattling of wheels and the tramping of innumerable feet, the jargon and wrangling and discordant clamors of the exchange and mart. All this the soul that is alive with appreciation of truth, knows and feels, and interprets, and in due time will reproduce, clothed with the transfiguration of genius—in the highest forms of musical creation, the symphony, or, that greatest realization of Christian art, the modern oratorio.

These, then, are the thoughts and hopes we are permitted to cherish as we celebrate this, at the same time, most memorable epoch in our musical history, and advent of a new and joyous career of peace and prosperity to our country. But we have no further time for the indulgence of such pleasing speculations; let us turn for a moment to the consideration of the programme marked out for this occasion. It has begun with the invocation to which you have already listened—that sublime religious choral of the 16th century, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," than which nothing can be more appropriate to the hour, and which, if it cannot with absolute certainty be attributed to Martin Luther, as its author, reflects forth in its stately harmony and the strong and earnest words that break along the unequal rhythm of its lines, the grandeur of his heroic spirit, and is the very impersonation of the stormy times in which he lived. To be followed, by that magnificent cantata of Mendelssohn,—with "pre-amble sweet of dreamy Symphony,"—composed, as you know, to give eclat to the inauguration of the Statue of Gutenberg, on the 25th June, 1840, but which, if it had found its origin here and at this day and hour, could not have been more solemnly appropriate to these marvellous times of ours, proclaiming as it does the triumphant gladness, the yearning sorrow with yet strong confidence in the all-abounding goodness of God, the deep affliction, the unutterable joy, that now agitates the great heart of the nation.

I cannot but think how almost prophetic the occasion would have proved, had the nearly completed preparations of this Society, to give publicly this Cantata of Praise in commemoration of the recent splendid triumphs of the armies of the Republic, at the time when the uncontrollable transports of a whole people urged it upon them to do it, and which would have anticipated only by a few days the news of the appalling event that has since clothed the civilized world in mourning, not been interrupted. How prophetic, I say, would now seem that wonderfully dramatic interrogative passage, which wails through the music of the recitative,—"Watchman, will the night soon pass? Ask ye; inquire ye; ask, if ye will; return again; ask." And that significant and calm reply—"The Watchman only said, Though the Morning will come, the Night will come also!"

And thus, through all its complicate and wondrous harmony, is shown that antagonism of elements, which is striving, and which must always, and of needs be struggling and striving with itself, in the accomplishment of every grand and mighty achievement—but out of which all hath the Lord delivered us. Yes, well may the people now say, in joyous and jubilant song, "The night is departing, the day is at hand." "Let all men, all things, all that hath life and breath, sing to the Lord—Hallelujah! sing to the Lord."

Next, in striking contrast, like oil poured out upon the troubled waters, comes that exquisitely beautiful oratorio by Haydn, wherein he has given full latitude to the exuberance of his imagination, letting loose his playful fancies in those rare and curious imitative effects, mostly to be distrusted—depreciated, perhaps—but which here have power to charm and carry away the most captious of critics—from the first crystalline ray, dimly perceived in that chaotic confusion, out of which, in due time, "a new created world springs up at God's command," rising and rising still into a more joyous and splendid light, till, at length, the achieved work bursts forth in coruscations of song—the Heavens themselves proclaiming the glory of God. This followed by that "Colossus of Oratorios"—Israel in Egypt, of Handel—simple in its massive grandeur—but full of genius—full of exultation; in the manifestly onward motion of whose grand triumphal choruses you seem to hear the tread of armies, as of that innumerable host whose victorious columns are even now, to-day, at this hour, receiving in the avenues of the nation's capital the plaudits of grateful thousands, echoed in the hearts of millions at home.

Then that other fascinating, unequalled work of Mendelssohn, "Elijah," in which, perhaps, more than in any of his works—more than in the composition of any other great musical author—the morbidly delicate organization of the composer's mind shows itself, now rising to the topmost height of sublimity and power, now sinking into the depths of almost weakness—but which, in all the realm of musical art, is not surpassed—is not equalled in its passages of transcendent beauty, in brilliancy, in force, in painfully dramatic intensity and interest;—closing with that wonderful production of genius—almost of inspiration—the "Messiah" of Handel, who himself is recorded to have said that during the twenty-one days employed upon its composition, he seemed to see the heavens opened and the angels of God ascending and descending therefrom—with which, among all his works, through the praiseworthy custom of this Society, in bringing it annually before us at the Christmas season, we ourselves are perhaps made most familiar—which, now for more than a hundred years, has held the admiration of the civilized world; whose strains of mingled grandeur and pathos, of power and of melting tenderness, soaring upward and expanding in all-absorbing interest, in devotion, and religious fervor, as it proceeds, seems, at last, to rest over us, and to cover us as with a benediction from Heaven.

Shall we pass in review likewise the orchestral portion of the festival? I forbear. Words would be of little moment in the august presence of these so many and so earnest and most worthy interpreters—in the presence of that Great Master of Symphony—fitly crowned and garlanded, surrounded with sympathizing kindred and friends from the Fatherland,—who "being dead yet speaketh,"—fashioned by the cunning hand of art—not "with counterfeit presentment," but in very living, breathing bronze.

"Clay no longer; he has risen from the buried mould of earth.

To a golden form transfigured, by a new and glorious birth. There's the brow by thought irradiated, with its tangle of wild hair;

There the mouth so sternly silent, and the square cheeks seemed with care.

There the eyes so visionary, straining out, yet seeing nought, But the inward world of genius and the ideal forms of thought. There the hand that gave its magic to the cold, dead, ivory keys.

And from out them tore the struggling chords of mighty symphonies.

There the figure, calm, concentrated, on its breast the great head bent;

Stand forever thus, Great Master, thou thy fittest monument."

Yes, in such a presence, I forbear. In the mighty productions it shall be your privilege to listen to from day to day—so worthily interpreted—music herself will hold with you sweet converse in her own language, free from the imperfections of feeble human speech—the universal language—the only one that has survived the Babylonish confusion of tongues—that is appreciable in all its utterances; common in its possibilities; uniform in expression; adapted to all ages; all moods; all occasions; all tastes, and conditions and phases of life. I have only, in conclusion, and in behalf of my associates in the government of the Society, to perform the pleasing duty of extending to you all a cordial welcome to the banquet that is here spread out before you.

In the eloquent words of another—which, with but slight modification, are better adapted to the present even, than to the occasion on which they were uttered, now more than twenty years ago: "The transition from the scenes which have been passing before us for the last few months, to such an occasion as this, is so sudden and so delightful, that I can scarcely refrain, when I cast my eyes over this composed and cultivated assembly, from exclaiming, 'Hail, holy light!' The excitements, the clamor, the tumult, the agony, which has attended that great trial and great task of liberty, through which we have just gone; the hope, the fears, the anxious care; the good news waited for and not coming; the bad news flashing always in advance—all are passed away as dreams. We find ourselves collected in the security and confidence of peace, upon the green and neutral ground of Art, common and grateful to us all." The night indeed has passed away, and the morning of a glorious day is at hand.

The Last of Liszt.

The greatest artistic celebrity of modern times has at last taken his farewell of a world which, after all, has not treated him so badly, and receives his adieu with the deepest regret. Franz Liszt, although living still, is dead to us, and we shall listen no more in breathless entrancement to the harmonies which thrilled us to the very soul as they rose beneath his touch. For a long time past has the resolution now definitively adopted been germinating in his brain, and once or twice has been so nearly on the point of execution that his admirers, already mourning him as lost, have been transported once more to the very summit of delight on beholding him again in the world still charming, poetical, and tender as ever, though scarcely so gay. Liszt paid us his last visit about two years ago. At the time it was remarked that he studiously refused every invitation to play the airs with which he has been wont to charm our souls, and for which we had nought to give him in return save a few of our miserable gold pieces—

the superflu to him—while his talent had become a necessity to us. We remember meeting him on the occasion of that same last visit by accident at Erard's rooms. Listlessly and almost without thought he ran his hand over the piano against which he had been leaning for some time in a fit of moody abstraction. Humbly did we come forward to compliment the great master on his conquest of the whole universe, and above all, on his victory over every difficulty presented by the instrument he had made his own. The expression with which he looked up as his ear caught the familiar sound of compliment we shall not easily forget. "All vanity! all vanity!" he exclaimed, "composed of dead men's bones, out of which the living extract food for vainglory on the one hand, and frivolous delight on the other." With these words he replaced the hand which had been wandering so playfully over the keys into the bosom of his waistcoat, and after again standing for a few moments in a position familiar to him, with one leg crossed over the other, and leaning back heavily against the wall, he sighed mournfully, and withdrew without another word. The evening before his entrance into the adieu, and undergoing the ceremony of the tonsor which separates him more effectually from the pomps and vanities of this world even more solemnly than the actual pronouncing of the vows, he attended a party at the Palazzo Barberini. Those present knew nothing of his intent, and were awaiting him with impatience, as he had promised the Princess to play the night previous to setting out for a long journey from which he might never return.

The consequence of this announcement made public amongst the friends of the Princess was the assembling of a crowd so great that the great drawing-room of the Palazzo was thrown open to admit the overflow of company. As usual in Italy, the doors of the chambers leading from the stair to this apartment were left open, and the eye was charmed and astonished at the magnificent view presented by the great staircase, modelled on that of the Vatican, with its magnificent frescoes and superb antique lions. The moment that the well-known head, with its abundance of long dark hair, streaked here and there with lines of silver, became visible above the marble balustrade of the stair, a general rush of the company took place towards the door through which he passed, heedless of the flattering homage thus silently expressed. A grand piano stood in the middle of the room; he seated himself before it without bidding, and presently the din and hubbub ceased, as if by magic. That master-touch had struck the chords, and this earth and all it contained passed away like a vision while the enchantment lasted. His head was thrown back, and the long hair, once his delight, streamed over his shoulders, while his fingers, still long and thin as ever, seemed to fly from one end of the instrument to the other, leaving harmonious memory wherever they alighted. He began by the most tremendous sounds of joy and triumph ever expressed upon the keys of a piano—the drum and trumpet were distinctly recognized—pride and vainglory seemed to float upon the air as he played on, all the while his eyes in a fine frenzy rolling round and round the ceiling, as if drawing his inspiration thence. Suddenly, when in the very midst of all this thundering gladness, a crash was heard, the instrument, left untouched for a moment, vibrated with a mournful sound, and then the master began again, this time in soft, low, wailing notes, expressive of sorrow and disappointment—something of complaining and impatience, too—producing an effect not so easy to describe. Gradually the whole seemed to pass away into nothingness, a measured retreat as of shadows flitting into darkness, and then nothing more save now and then a spasmodic sob, as of some strong soul in agony, and finally the loud sardonic laugh of some invisible Mephistopheles making sport of all this emotion so admirably expressed that none could help shuddering as the unearthly sound broke from the ivory keys as though it had in reality been uttered by some human being in a frenzy of madness.

The spell remained for some few moments over that aristocratic company, even when Liszt had risen from the piano. "Caro mio, whatever is the subject of that painfully exciting improvisation?" exclaimed the Prince Barberini, laying his hand upon the artist's arm. "Did you not feel it an illustration of yonder chef d'œuvre?" said Liszt, pointing to the ceiling, on which he had been gazing all the while he had been playing. "The Triumph of Glory!" added he in an undertone, raising his eyes once again to that wondrous work by Pietro Cortone which adorns the great drawing-room of the Barberini Palace. "Does not Glory's Triumph for ever end in woe and disappointment, in misery and disgust?" And as he said the words he turned sharply round with a bitter laugh that echoed through the silence of that awestruck crowd, so exactly like that which had just echoed from the piano beneath his touch that again did the same shudder run through every overwrought nerve of the assembly, which broke up soon afterwards almost in silence, and without seeking to dispel the awe which had been created. The only individual present remaining unmoved was the old Prince Samferti, who declared "the performance to be nothing more than a geometrical piece gymnastically played." But the truthful and comical joke produced no laughter, and the vengeance of the ladies was reserved for the first convenient occasion of display. Such was the scene of exit from the pomps and vanities of this world made by Liszt, who, idolized and flattered to the fullest extent, had tasted of them all. That night he retired not to rest: he spent the time till dawn in the arrangement of his affairs, bequeathing to his daughter, Madame Bülow, one-half of his fortune, and to the child left by his second daughter, the late Madame Emile Ollivier, an ample dowry; to his mother the insignia of honor he had received during his long career of glory, accompanied by the most touching letter of farewell ever penned by poet.

The next morning those flowing locks characteristic of the great master fell beneath the scissors wielded by Cardinal Hohenlohe into the silver dish held for the purpose by the white-robed acolyte, and Franz Liszt rose from his knees both within and without a changed and altered man—his very name will know him no more, and be merged in that of his religious denomination. The world is busy, of course, with the motives of this step. Some say it has been occasioned by the sudden determination taken by a certain Archduchess to abandon all idea of the marriage which has been so long in contemplation, and take the advice of her friends by resigning all hope of a union which thwarted the views and prejudices of the whole Imperial Family of Austria. Others declare it to be the consequence of melancholy brought on by the early death of Madame Emile Ollivier in the midst of her youth and beauty, and the talent she had inherited from himself; but those who knew him best declare that no direct cause was needed for the step. Always an enthusiast, first in St. Simonian mysticism, then in revolutionary ardor, and at last in religious sentiment, Liszt was sure one day or other to withdraw to the cloister, there to seek consolation for all the bitterness and deception he had found even in a world which had overwhelmed him with wealth, honor, and distinction.—Letter from Rome.

Music in London.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS.

The Saturday Review, May 29, gives the following resumé of the season, from the first of April to that date:

The early part of the season is usually the dullest at our Italian Operas, and the present year has formed no exception. At Covent Garden various new singers have been introduced, not one of whom can be said to have made a very marked impression. Madlle. Fillippine von Edelsberg, from Munich, who appeared as Fides, in the Prophète, shows a fair talent, but not the requirements, either vocal or histrionic, to support with dignity a part made famous by Madame Pauline Viardot. Her voice—weakest in the lowest part of its register, where it should be strongest, and colorless throughout—possesses little charm, and, as the trying bravura in the last act sufficed to prove, just as little flexibility. Being young, Madlle. von Edelsberg may nevertheless improve. Hardly so much can be hoped for the lady who, as Bertha, was associated with her in the fine but gloomy opera of Meyerbeer, and who made her début on the opening night, as Mathilde, in Guillaume Tell. Madlle. Sonieri exhibits the worst vices of the French school—a school which, whatever its charm when eminently represented, as by singers like Cinti-Damoreau, Dorus Gras, &c., exposes the shortcomings of mediocre attainment in a more glaring light than any other. One of its besetting sins is a habit of trembling upon every sustained note; and this appears to be an idiosyncratic peculiarity with Madlle. Sonieri. As second lady—or, to borrow from the received operatic vocabulary, comparsa—Madlle. Sonieri, if she could manage to get rid of this defect, might eventually be found more or less serviceable. Her impersonation of the sprightly character of the Page, in Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera, though inferior to what we have seen, is by no means devoid of merit. In the same opera, a third unknown lady made her début as the unhappy Amelia or Amalia (les deux se disent)—which fact being recorded, no more need be said of Madlle. Bianchi, who, as prima donna assoluta di cartello, may do very well at the Lisbon Opera-house, but is certainly not able to uphold the credit of Covent Garden, even as seconda donna. A fourth stranger, Madlle. Honoré (from Moscow), came out as Siebel—that insignificant lover invented for the operatic Faust by MM. Barbier and Carré, purveyors in general to the literary wants of M. Gounod. Madlle. Honoré can boast an agreeable mezzo-soprano, which assiduous study may help to cultivate, and thus render yet more agreeable; but her vocal skill is not at present remarkable, while as an actress she has much to learn which experience alone can teach. For parts like Maddalena, in Rigoletto, she is perhaps best suited. In Madlle. Berini (from Milan), a fifth new-comer, Mr. Gye, if not unprecedentedly lucky, has at any rate been more fortunate. This lady made her appearance as Margherita, in Faust. Though not gifted with a voice of unusual quality and compass, Madlle. Berini has evident sensibility, and her accomplishments as a singer are considerable. All she does she does with earnestness, and at times she legitimately moves her hearers. The second part she essayed was more favorable to her than the first. Her Gilda (Rigoletto), though the incomparable performance of Angiolina Bosio must have been fresh in the remembrance of a large part of the audience, made a really good, if not a very deep, impression. Madlle. Berini, too, has youth to back her, and, under encouraging conditions, may eventually reach a position to which just now she cannot in reason lay claim. There are still some names to be added to the list of aspirants. Signor Medini (from Milan), in consequence of the illness of Herr Schmid, has taken the part of Walter, in Guillaume Tell. Endowed with a tolerable bass voice, his performance generally was not so effective as that of Herr Schmid's earlier substitute, Signor Attri, an Italianized Frenchman who, in the unavoidable absence of M. Faure, has been accepted as a more than respectable Mephistopheles. Signor Brignoli, if we may judge from his performance as Lionel, in Flotow's Martha, is likely to prove a valuable acquisition. This gentleman, who was in England as far back as 1848, the year in which the formidable opposition that eventually ruined Mr. Lumley was instituted, should have been brought out earlier. Besides growing middle aged, he has grown fat, and fat stage-lovers are apt to weaken stage-illusion. His voice, however, a tenor of rare quality, will always bear him through with credit, and this in a great measure because he knows how to use it. What may be Signor Brignoli's histrionic capacity such a lacks-daisical character as Lionel affords but small opportunity of judging. About Madame Vandenhevel Duprez—who, in consequence of Madame Miolan Carvalho being detained in Paris, has sustained the part of Catarina, in L'Etoile du Nord—we should be sorry to say anything at all disparaging. A worthy daughter of an illustrious father, her singing belongs to the most refined school. But, unhappily, she lacks the physical force to produce, in so large a theatre as Covent Garden, an effect in any way proportionate to her very admirable talent.

It will be seen from the foregoing that Mr. Gye can scarcely, on the whole, be felicitated on his new discoveries. But this has not prevented him from giving some very striking representations. Such superb "spectacles" as Faust e Margherita, Guillaume Tell, Le Prophète, and L'Etoile du Nord—to say nothing of music just as superb, and, in the instance of the first-named opera, rising above all that lavish scenic exhibition can possibly compass—must inevitably attract, and even in some degree persuade the audience to forget that they are not listening to singers of the highest rank. Messrs. Costa, Beverley, and Harris, whose names should be inseparable, have by their united efforts frequently averted a discontent among subscribers that might otherwise have been injurious to the interests of the theatre. But Mr. Gye has been fortunate this year in other respects, and most of all in what may appropriately be called the quasi-rejuvenescence of Signor Mario. This still incomparable tenor and still incomparable lyric comedian has astonished even his most enthusiastic admirers. In the trying character of Jean of Leyden; in Faust; as the Duke of Naples (Un Ballo in Maschera), whose fault is visited with retributive justice, and that naughtier Duke of Mantua (Rigoletto), who escapes being murdered, to the tune of "La donna è mobile," while the unhappy victim of his profligacy lies bleeding in the sack; Signor Mario has been singing and acting as no other can sing and act at the present time. True, the less frequently he undertakes such terribly exacting parts as Jean of Leyden the longer he will be able to delight us in operas belonging to the real Italian school, which is his native and congenial element.

Herr Wachtel, the German tenor of the C and C sharp "in alt," has been singing his loudest as Manrico (Il Trovatore) and Arnold (Guillaume Tell), and winning the applause of the galleries after each successful achievement of certain notorious feats. Signor Graziani's delicious barytone has been heard in the music of Guillaume Tell, and other parts, to such advantage that none seemed inclined to criticise his deficiencies as an actor, even in Rigoletto, which character he was bold enough to assume on one occasion while Signor Ronconi was a member of the company, and known to be in London. Madlle. Fricci has exhibited her accustomed painstaking mediocrity as Leonora, in Il Trovatore; and Madlle. Fioretti, the fugitive of two years since, lured back by the impresario, has warbled, like a nightingale, the somewhat insipid strains of Lady Enrichetta (Martha). It is a pity that Madlle. Foretti should have grown so stout; for though as an actress she counts for little, she is really an accomplished vocalist of the legitimate school—one of the few, in short, who remain to us. But, better than all, Madlle. Adelina Patti, the brightest star of the last four seasons—a positive genius in her way, equally to be admired as a singer and as an actress—has returned. Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Rossini's comic masterpiece, was performed only the other night in a style that brought back to the memory the Italian Opera in its days of glory. The Rosina was Madlle. Patti, the Almaviva was Signor Mario, the Figaro Signor Ronconi. Nothing but an unctuous Bartolo was required to make the cast perfect; for though Basilio has found better representatives than Signor Tagliafico, none on the whole so good as he has appeared within the experience of the present generation. The Bartolo of Signor Ciampi, dry, without a spark of humor, is a serious drawback. Instead of a "swan trooping with crows," Signor Ciampi is a crow trooping with swans. Dr. Bartolo seems to have died with Lablache.

Mr. Gye's season is now in its meridian. Madlle. Patti will successfully play all her favorite parts, and conduct the subscribers through a gallery of vivid, brilliant, life-like portraits. Madlle. Pauline Lucca—the other runaway, whose sudden flight was made by the Prussian people almost as serious a question of political difference as the condemnation of Franz Müller—will reappear forthwith, as Margherita (Faust). Other new singers are to follow in due course, and among the rest, Madame Isabella Galletti, proclaimed, not long since, by Mr. Lumley, whose opinion has been endorsed by Italy, Giulia Grisi's legitimate successor. But, most portentous of all, the grand geographical spectacular opera, finished twenty years ago, and only produced in Paris at the end of last month—L'Africaine of Meyerbeer, so long and anxiously looked for—is to terminate the season, let us hope, with real and brilliant success. Mr. Gye's "cast" of L'Africaine is entirely different from that of Paris; but really, after weighing the respective distributions of the dramatis personae at the Opera Imperiale and the Royal Italian Opera, we are inclined to think that the English manager has got in some degree the best of it. Madlle. Pauline Lucca is both younger and more attractive than Madlle. Marie Sax; Madame Miolan Carvalho would have just cause of offence if she were placed in the same rank with Madlle. Bath; Signor Graziani has incontestably a finer voice than M. Faure, while their histrionic abilities are, after all, not so very disproportionate; and, to conclude, it is pretty generally known that the tenor after Meyerbeer's own heart, at least in so far as L'Africaine is concerned, was Herr Wachtel, to compare whose vocal enunciation with that of M. Naudin would be to compare a high trombone with a cornu inglese. Our musical readers will appreciate the distinction, and, judging from the antecedents of Meyerbeer as exemplified in his previous works, will readily understand why Herr Wachtel is more likely to answer his purpose than M. Naudin.

Of Her Majesty's Theatre, which opened a full month later than the Royal Italian Opera, we shall have something to say very shortly. Meanwhile we may premise that the season commenced with a performance of La Sonnambula, in which Miss Laura Harris, a mere child from New York, appeared as Amina; that Madlle. Tietjens has been performing in operas with which she has entertained the public for the last three years, in all seasons—ultimately stirring up a new enthusiasm by her magnificent impersonation of Beethoven's Leonora (Fidelio); that Mr. Santley, the deservedly eminent English barytone, just returned from Barcelona, is singing better than ever; that a tenor hitherto unknown to England, Signor Carion, has met with a succès d'estime; and that in a new soprano, Madlle. Irma de Murska, a Hungarian, whose representation of the mad scene in Lucia di Lammermoor is now the operatic town-talk, Mr. Mapleson has in all probability hit upon a phenomenon. The opinion is unanimous that nothing so original as Madlle. de Murska has appeared on the operatic stage for many years.

Persons interested in Good Music for the Young Folks at School and at Home will not fail to read an advertisement on the last page of this paper.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 10, 1865.

The Musical Festival.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

II. ORATORIO. "THE CREATION."

Duly inaugurated, as we have seen, on the morning of Tuesday, May 23, with Choral Overture, Address, and "Hymn of Praise," the Festival was continued on the evening of the same day by a performance of Haydn's very familiar, but always cheerful and refreshing Oratorio—one of the two Oratorios which happened to be known to our fathers when they founded this Society, which may account for their coupling together for a name thereof the names of two composers who have no particular affinity; by no means such, for instance, as the names of Bach and Handel might have suggested;—however, if we consider the fact that fifty years ago, both here and in the mother country, Haydn was as much the type of Orchestral music as Handel was of Choral, the name was not so inappropriate to a Society uniting these two factors in its tuneful demonstrations. That the "Creation" and the "Messiah" should enter into the programme of the first half-century festival of such a Society seems very natural, and indeed imperative, if only as an act of filial duty to its founders. Then, too, we must remember, that hosts of musical pilgrims from the country who come up to Jerusalem to take part in the great feast (and "to be taxed") are just familiar enough, in a fragmentary way, with the music of these two well-worn famous works to feel that they are kept out of a portion of their birth-right so long as they have not heard them brought out on a grand scale, whole, in all their glory. Regarded in the light of real increase of knowledge, as a mark of progress, a new step in musical culture, a new pledge of artistic earnestness, the production for the first time of any Oratorio, Passion, or Cantata of Sebastian Bach would have been more significant. This, so far as the Festival was for musicians and for life-long dilettanti, would have sharpened appetite; but since the Festival must be also popular, it will not do for that class to demand an entire departure from the good old Sunday dinner. And there is no denying the intrinsic excellence of the "Creation" and of the "Messiah," the two corner stones on which the old Society was built. (In this sense, the old gentleman from the country was not so much out of the way when he answered his neighbor's inquiry, at the Festival, about the two portraits hung before the Organ: "O, those are Mr. Handel and Mr. Haydn; they were the founders of the Society.")

But on this occasion the "Creation" had a fresh interest for everybody; it was, as the Transcript well said, in a manner re-created for us. To hear it brought out with such means, with that vast choir of 700 voices, with the support of the Great Organ, and with the accompaniments enriched and vivified by that noble orchestra of 100 instruments, was to come to it with fresh senses. The audience was larger than in the morning, and the staging actually overflowed with singers. Here was music in which they all felt perfectly at home; here were choruses which would almost sing themselves, and each forefelt the zest of a full, free trial of their own combined sonority; there was an exhilaration about it, as of a crowd of lusty bathers plunging into the surf. It was evident from the outset that we were to have an animated rendering; the whole thing would go off with spirit and enthusiasm,—as indeed it did. The choral effects were superb. Chiefly to be noted are the great burst on the words: "And there was LIGHT!" which, splendid as it has been before (especially at the last Festival), was this time doubly electrifying. Then the cool, tranquil, buoyant harmony of "A new created world," spread out over so broad a surface by so many unstrained voices, a vivid translation to the sense of hearing of what you might see and feel that very day of May in the young green grass of the Common or the dewy meadows. The climax of effect was reached, of course, in "The Heavens are telling." It was immense, exceeding in power, in mass, in fervor and entrainment any grand choral movement ever before heard here; the quickened speed of the latter portion was kept up with wonderful steadiness and carried every listener away with it. Who turns his back upon Niagara, or Mont Blanc, and walks away not looking back again? So sublime a moment must needs be prolonged, and the whole audience insisted on a repetition of the chorus,—a necessity as real as it was exceptional.

But the chief, the characteristic charm of the "Creation" is found in the instrumentation. The luxuriance of delicate melodic figures which entwine and overgrow the whole; the billowy rhythm of bold massive string accompaniments in the strong passages; the blending and contrasts of color everywhere, reward such an orchestra as this was. You could enjoy it as so much fresh and ever variegated musical landscape. Nothing profound or greatly imaginative in the ideas, as when Beethoven sways the orchestra; but it gratifies us with a return of our old child-like wonder and enjoyment at the sight of nature. In this orchestral rendering none of the instrumental intentions were lost sight of; it lent new warmth and loveliness to the sweeter songs and trios, and new breadth and quaintness to the queer bits of literal imitation.

The solo singing was creditable, although not the strong point of the performance. It was shared among a stronger array of artists at the Festival of 1857, when we had for sopranis, Mrs. Eliot (Anna Stone), Mrs. Long, and Mrs. Mozart; for tenors, Mr. Arthurson (such a master of recitative), Mr. George Simpson, and Mr. C. R. Adams; for basses, Mr. Leach and Dr. Guilmette. This time the soprano pieces were divided between Mrs. VAN ZANDT and Miss BRAINERD, of New York. The former has the younger, fresher, more powerful and more sympathetic voice, with musical feeling, animation, and a fair degree of culture; she sang "With verdure clad" with pure tone, gracefully and sweetly, only betraying now and then the influence of Italian opera in worse than needless ornament of phrases which Haydn has turned so perfectly. She is decidedly an interesting singer and full of promise. Miss Brainerd has much more of culture and of oratorio experience; with her all is well-studied, carefully conceived and finished; but the voice is not very fresh or sympathetic, and is a little strained and harsh in the higher notes. With this allowance, and saving some slight liberties on her part also with the text, her rendering of the great Jenny Lind air: "On mighty pens," and still more of the melodies of mother Eve, was in good keeping and acceptable. Mr. FAR-

LEY came newly to the task of Oratorio. His tenor is clear and rich in the upper tones, weak and unsatisfactory in the lower. He did all carefully, and some things effectively; but he is not a master in the art of recitative. In the absence, on plea of illness, of Carl Formes, Mr. RUDOLPHSEN took all the bass parts, and showed all the care, intelligence, largeness of style, and manly, firm delivery, which we have been accustomed to expect from him. He is an artist who is on the right way, still improving.

III. FIRST AFTERNOON CONCERT.

On Wednesday, at 3 P.M., began the first of four instrumental and vocal concerts. It was indeed a rare, a grand experience to hear Beethoven's Symphony in A brought out with all the sonority, the breadth of effect, the rich contrasts of color, and would we might say the fine light and shade, of that superb orchestra. One such hearing of such a work of genius stamps it on the mind indelibly—not in detail perhaps, but in its general spirit and character. Hear it, if only precisely rendered and with spirit, with all that satisfying mass of violins and middle strings and basses, and it is impossible not to feel how great a work it is, and how great a man addresses himself to the deepest and the greatest there is in you through such music. We know not how to say more of it, and certainly we cannot say less, than we did after hearing it at the last Festival: "With the 'Choral' and the 'C minor,' it holds the highest place among the immortal nine—among all orchestral inspirations. One place in it—that episode, (or Trio, technically), in the Scherzo (where the A sounds on so continuously), has ever seemed to us the highest moment ever reached by instrumental music: more so now than ever. Up to that moment it is joy uncontrollable and exquisite; but then the heavens open, and the soul thrills with bliss unspeakable and infinite. And the return to the more earthly mood of the Scherzo, how marvellous! that drooping of the music through a single chord, and with a sigh we are at home—no, not at home, but here again! The mystical beginning of the Allegretto was uncommonly beautiful and impressive, with that fine body of middle strings and cellos. The Introduction to the whole was statelier than ever; and the Finale (clearer in those rapid figures through that sure mass of violins) swept us along with it, not with the march of victory, as in the Fifth, but away and upward, as on eagle's wings, now poised at rest a moment, and then still upward to the sun of Joy."—More so then than ever; but still more so now! For this time the orchestra was still grander in its composition, and the common impulse of the performers was stronger, the sympathy of the audience more inspiring. And yet, as we have hinted, we cannot say the rendering was in point of fineness, of nice gradation of light and shade, all that could have been realized from such a rare assemblage of means. It seemed a pity that, with so grand an orchestra, there could not have been opportunities for fine and critical rehearsal, so as to have made the rendering of at least one symphony as nearly perfect as possible. But the conditions of the Festival did not admit of it; the only rehearsal for each concert took place in the forenoon of the same day, between the fatiguing spells of oratorio and concert, and then the Conductor had to trust more to the musicianship of his men and to their old familiarity with all this music, than to any special rehearsal farther than just comparing notes, trying over the cues, a few entrances and exits, and connecting links of various passages, to make sure that all would hold together. O that that orchestra could be kept together months, instead of a single week! Yet we should hardly be willing to forego the chance of hearing four great Symphonies in four days which may never come again, even for the sake of more refining upon one or two.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture was more delicately rendered. The fairy flutter of so many violins, reduced to something really like a pianissimo, the warm and palpable 'cello and viola tones, and those of the unmistakable fagotto, the spirit and fine shading of the whole made it uncommonly enjoyable. There was spirit enough, too, but of another kind, animal spirit, smart, brilliant, noisy effect, in the two pieces which opened and closed the concert: Wagner's Rienzi Overture, which begins well but runs into a brass-band sort of commonplace, and Meyerbeer's Fackellanz music, which, without denying its peculiar merits, is indeed best suited for a torch-light procession, and is properly music for out-of-doors, and not for a Festival like this. But these two selections gave the blowers of brass instruments a chance to show their metal.

The vocal pieces were contributed by three favorite artists from the German Opera: Mme. FREDERICI HIMMER, the Herren HIMMER and HERMANN, and Mrs. KEMPTON, who made their best mark in the admirable Quartet from Fidelio, which they had to repeat. The effect, however, was much weakened by the want of orchestral accompaniment; Mr. LANG sketched this skilfully upon the Organ, but it needed, being in Canon form, the marked individuality of separate instruments. The same want of orchestral parts destroyed the effect of Frederici's always exquisite singing of the Prayer in Der Freyschütz; she seemed not to hear the piano-forte placed down in front of the stage, and so sang not in tune with her accompaniment. To give the Prayer alone, without the recitative and the whole scene, and without orchestra, seemed a small thing to come all the way from New York for. Hermann is the same glorious bass as ever, and sang a German Lied: "An dem Sturmwind," of a dark and sombre character, with considerable effect; while Himmer's manly tenor and artistic feeling were not wanting in a Reise-lied by Mendelssohn. It was one of the unavoidable penalties of crowding so much into one week, one of the misfortunes of engaging solo talent at a late hour after many disappointments, that all thought of orchestral accompaniment to the singing in these concerts had to be dispensed with.

IV. SECOND AFTERNOON CONCERT.

Wednesday evening was devoted to rehearsal of "Israel in Egypt," and Thursday morning to rehearsal of the Concert of that afternoon. The orchestral selections were remarkably attractive, beginning with what we looked forward to as one of the special rarities of the whole Festival ("Israel" being the other), Schubert's glorious Symphony in C. It has never been quite fairly presented here before, and never properly appreciated save by the few; and for this reason we printed in our last paper Schumann's account of his discovery of the MS. score, showing how highly he and Mendelssohn esteemed it. Hitherto we have heard it here in Boston only outlined as it were with insufficient means; first, in 1852, by a little summer afternoon orchestra under Mr. Suck; then in the winters of '53 and '54 by the Germanians; again at Mr. Zerrahn's Philharmonic Concerts in March '57. On the last occasion, although keenly relished by the musicians and some hundreds of listeners, it was sneered at by most of the newspaper critics as "tedious," "prolix," "music of the future," "broken crockery music," lacking "symphonic form,"

&c. What we said then of it is essentially what we would say of it now :

Intrinsically it is a work of genius, a truly inspired creation from beginning to end ; as truly so as any Symphony by Beethoven or Mozart. Indeed, outside of Beethoven (and with a full recognition of the merits of his predecessors and of Mendelssohn in his line) we know no work of instrumental music that appears to us so great, that so exalts and fills the listener. It tingles with imaginative life and ecstasy in every bar ; it teems with beautiful and glorious ideas, which are wrought up and carried through with logical consistency and vigor ; it is equally remarkable for melodies of startling individuality and beauty as for the wildest wealth of modulation and the richest instrumental coloring ; it is full of solemnity and full of joy, and with its buoyant rhythm treads on air like one caught up by the divine afflatus. And then, as Schumann says of it, "its heavenly length, like a thick novel in four volumes by Jean Paul!"

Its date shows, (only one year after the death of Beethoven), that the work is by no means to be classed with the "music of the future." And as to "broken crockery," absence of the "symphonic form," and all that, the criticism deals in catch-words, and not genuine perceptions or ideas. Will the writer perhaps inform us in what the symphonic form consists? If Beethoven's or Mendelssohn's symphonies are models of it, we must assure him that Schubert's follows, throughout, the same general plan of structure. For a first movement, we have a slow Introduction, the religious theme of which is first, as it were, intoned by the horn, and then worked up by the orchestra, with a Beethoven-like sublimity ; and then starts off the Allegro, which has a leading and an answering theme, the first bold, heroic, full of nerve, the second of an exquisite gaiety, and these are stated, contrasted, blended, discussed, illustrated in the usual symphonic manner, with perfect directness and consistency, yet with endless variety and beauty of outline and coloring, until near the end the religious horn theme, or a phrase of it, sounds in from one part or another of the orchestra, and rounds off the whole to still completer unity. The Andante is marvellously beautiful, with a pervading melody, in form like other Andantes, and only growing to such length, because its thoughts are so inspired, so pregnant, that they haunt and tempt the mind along, and seem too beautiful, and too significant to end. The Scherzo, strong and jovial and riotous, is the usual quick three-four movement in two parts ; followed by the usual Trio, which in this case is very long, (Schubert loved to keep up the Scherzo mood), but is built on a buoyant, triumphant glorious theme, worthy to be so prolonged. The Finale has the usual Rondo form, and is elated with ideas such as come only to the mind in its happiest moments.

Now, for the first time, we had an orchestra equal to the production of Schubert's Symphony in all its glory. Conductor and musicians sprang to their task with a will—they knew how good it was. They waxed more and more enthusiastic as the work progressed ; they enjoyed all their labor that week, but this they enjoyed most of all. And truly it was given with great verve, the musicians forgetting themselves and only thinking of the music, and each successive movement wrought up the vast audience to a higher pitch of inspiration. All that could further have been desired was room for critical rehearsal, to make it in all points as fine as it was spirited. But the musicians were artists, they all knew the music, and indeed most of them had played it but a short time before in New York. The parts which made the greatest impression were the wonderful Andante, in spite of its great length, a sustained and perfect inspiration ; and the swift Finale, whose ecstatic little themes peeping in anew under every strange garb of new keys, new instruments, amid the thundering charges of the insatiable double-basses, never could reveal half their charm or fine intoxication without these liberal and choice means of performance.

Part II. opened with the great Leonora Overture (No. 3), which was magnificently played. For once there were violins enough to build up the great crescendo near the end, which like a nascent whirlwind draws up more and more into its widening circles. Mr. Arbuckle's trumpet flourish, too, was capital. The concert closed with Wagner's Tannhäuser Overture. Of all the great modern orchestral effect pieces this is the most interesting, and in a representative series deserved a place (yet let us not forget the entire omission in this Festival of one name of far greater importance—MOZART!). It has long since ceased to be a novelty ; but so played it becomes a new sensation ; the wonderful vigor of the prolonged violin figure, and the mystical and sombre quality of the low clarinet and bassoon tones in the pilgrim chant, were sensibly brought home to us. With many, doubtless, the Tannhäuser bore away the palm among the orchestral productions.

The vocal miscellany was not worthy of companionship with such great music. Mr. FARLEY's singing of "Adelaide" was the best thing, and indeed the most tasteful and artistic specimen of his singing which he has given us at any time ; he had the good sense not to take the last movement in an absurdly fast tempo, after a too common fashion ; and Mr. LANG played the accompaniment very finely on a charmingly sonorous, sympathetic Chickering grand piano. Mrs. VAN ZANDT's fresh voice and free Italian execution are pleasing, but who could patiently listen to such cheap commonplace as the "Venezian Waltz" and the air from Traviata after Brethoven and Schubert. An Italian duet from I Masnadieri, well sung by her and Mr. Farley, was less hacknied.

V. "ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

Thursday night's Oratorio should have been the event of the Festival. "Israel in Egypt" is counted the greatest of Handel's Oratorios in Germany, and is the most admired of all at English festivals, while it is still only partially known and only half accepted here. Here some fatality always prevents its being brought out whole and as it should be. Former trials of it by the H. & H., and by the old "Musical Education Society" have been but feeble and discouraging and not persisted in up to the sure point of success. We did look to this Festival as bound to solve the problem of "Israel in Egypt," and therefore we sought to prepare our readers in some slight degree by the description we have been reprinting. The best has been done, perhaps, that the circumstances permitted ; still the colossal Oratorio stands half done and half accepted. In the non-arrival of Carl Formes, the bass solos and duet had to be omitted ; this led to further shortening, and a welcome repetition of the "Hymn of Praise" to fill up the evening and the measure of attraction.

What choruses were sung—mostly double choruses, with a view to which the choral masses had been throughout halved into two four-part choirs, one each side of the stage—made an impression by their mass and majesty, as well as vivid imagery. They were delivered with the utmost spirit and precision, every voice telling in the great solid harmonies. The momentum of such as the "Hailstone" chorus, and "The horse and his rider," carried all before it, and the former had to be repeated. But many ears and brains were weary with the relentless series of sublimities ; though beauty, expressive sentiment and picturesqueness must have been perceived in many passages. The fault was not wholly with the audience ; it may be traced in a great measure to two things. First, in the great pains and drill required to secure that military energy and promptness of such an army of voices, in choruses so trying, light and shade had been comparatively overlooked, or postponed ; it was all one uniform fortissimo ; passages like "darkness which might be felt," &c., which would have gained unspeakably by being hushed to a pianissimo, were loud like the rest ; and so the "Darkness" chorus, and others, lacking contrast, had no means for creating a sensation—their sort of sensation—comparable to those which took the house by storm. Secondly, the omissions (some nine choruses) not only broke the connection, disturbing the unity of the whole and setting several pieces in a feeble or a wrong light ; but they included some of the most remarkable choruses in the whole work, some which more than any have helped to give it its prestige. We will only mention "The people shall hear and be afraid," the longest and perhaps the very greatest number in the Oratorio ; and that very expressive and important one in the beginning : "They loathed to drink." It is morally certain that the whole work, even without the nicely studied contrasts and gradations of light and shade so desirable, would have produced a far greater impression than the specimens. That the singers must have been equal to the task is proved by the fact that they were successful in the most difficult and complicated of all the choruses : "He led them through the deep, as through a wilderness."

Most of the solos were given, and well given (bating superfluous trills), by Mrs. SMITH, Mrs. CARY, and Mr. FARLEY. The contralto air : "Thou shalt bring them in" suited the warm, tender, natural cantabile of Mrs. Cary ; and Mrs. Smith achieved something very near a positive success in the sublime Miriam passage heralding in the final chorus.

The crowd was great, the room warm, the delay long, and the "Hymn of Praise," though admirably performed, found hardly such fresh listeners as before.

Moreover it was a sad curtailment that of the first movement of the Orchestral Symphony.

VI. THIRD CONCERT.

The Symphony on Friday was Beethoven's Eroica (No. 3) ; the one which, next to the 9th, has been the least often heard among us, and never in its full power and majesty as it was this time. It seemed to us the most successful executive achievement of this Orchestra. The funeral march was profoundly impressive ; the quick, electrical staccato of the Scherzo ran along with crisp life and precision ; and the Variations in the Finale never revealed their unity and their imaginative variety and charm to us half so palpably before. Weber's overture to Euryanthe opened the concert well, and is a work by no means heard too often. For the lovers of brilliant orchestral effect and sensuous coloring the best of opportunities were offered in the "Tell" overture and "Les Preludes" by Liszt—the Abbé Liszt ! Preludes to what a sequel ! Both works were splendidly played.

The vocal selections again were out of place, the "bright particular star" being Master COKER, the choir boy of Trinity, New York. He began with hacknied "Robert, toi que j'aime," ill suited to the singer and the place ; but he was singing it quite well, to the hard, unmusical piano accompaniment of his director, Dr. CUTLER, when the latter found his music pages wrong, struck chords blindly for awhile, and came to a dead stop. It was too much for a "Mus. Doc.," but not for the musicians of the orchestra, some forty of whom, adroitly rallied and prompted by Zerrahn, played it from memory, and young Cherubino sang it all the better. His delicious voice was vouchsafed but once more, and that only in the little Cradle Song by Gottschalk. Mrs. CARY sang a cavatina from Il Giuramento ; and Miss MATHELD PHILLIPS, with a voice much like her sister Adelaide's, essayed with fair success another concert hack, "O mio Fernando."

VII. FOURTH AND LAST CONCERT.

The Afternoon programme was in some respects the most satisfactory of the whole, and indeed unexceptionable. Beethoven's fiery, compressed Coriolanus overture, Mendelssohn's A-minor (Scottish) Symphony, Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads," Mendelssohn's dramatic overture to Ruy Blas, all received excellent treatment. The musicians had grown more in love with their work and more in sympathy with each other day by day, so that these last renderings left little if anything to be desired.—The vocal part was better this time. The Fidelio Quartet was again claimed from the same four artists, who were in fine voice, FREDERIC especially. She also sang "Ah mon fils !" from "The Prophet," revealing a remarkable compass of voice, beautiful and telling in all parts, and singularly musical and strong in the low contralto tones. In artistic feeling and true womanly charm her singing always goes to the heart of her audience. Mrs. KEMPSON sang Schubert's "Wanderer" with much power. HERMANN used his rich basso acceptably in a little German song. Herr HIMMEL, the tenor, gave great pleasure with an Ave Maria by Mendelssohn.

VIII. "ELIJAH."

The rush for tickets for Saturday evening had been immense. Extra seats had been placed in the Hall, and every place and corner had its occupant. There had been a presentiment, which was fully verified, that "Elijah" would be the great occasion of the Festival. It was the great success of all, in point of grandeur, spirit, light and shade, and general unity of performance. The singers were well trained in it, and they all loved to sing it.

All the choruses went admirably. Master COKER's clear voice told finely in the boy's part before the Rain chorus. Miss HOUSTON sang the soprano solos in her best style. Mrs. CARY distinguished herself by her truly beautiful, chaste, warm rendering of the contralto airs ; there has been nothing better in the Festival. Mr. HERMANN, to heal in part the disappointment about Formes, had been induced to study and sing two of the airs of Elijah ; but the gain was only nominal ; he was too much tied to his notes and English words to sing with freedom. But Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, who took upon himself the main burden of the grand old Prophet, covered himself with honor. His declamation was admirable ; his musical conceptions good, and he entered fully into the spirit of the part, making it dignified and grand. A few faults of English accent, and the somewhat unpleasant quality of a few lower notes, were about the only drawbacks. Mr. FARLEY marred the conclusion of two perfect tenor airs by his eagerness to advertise his high B flat.—But as a whole, this performance of "Elijah" was a great triumph and sent thousands away happier, better, stronger and believing more than ever in great music that it is divine.

[Here type cuts us short ! Next time.]

Punch's Version of L'Africaine.

This is the Libretto of the grand new old Opera. Evolved from the depths of our own moral consciousness, with slight aid from the contradictory accounts by critics none of whom were present at the performance.

ACT I.

Council Chamber of some King of Portugal.

Bishops, Grand Inquisitors, inquisitive Courtiers, Members of the Royal Lisbon Geographical Society, and others.

First Bishop. Vasco de Gama was a great discoverer, but we await his return in vain, because he is drowned.

Enter VASCO DE GAMA.

Vasco. Subject to correction by your Reverence's superior knowledge, I venture to remark—nothing of the kind.

Grand Chorus.

He is not drowned,
In fact, he's found.

Vasco. I love Donna Inez, and there ex't very large countries which have never been discovered.

Don Pedro. You must not love Donna Inez, because she is engaged to me.

Bishops and Inquisitors. And you must not say that there are any other countries than those mentioned in the Scriptures.

Vasco. Call in Selica and Nelusko. (They enter.) Answer, my dear, and you, Sir. Are there not vast countries yet undiscovered?

Selica and Nelusko. We decline to make any statements.

Vasco. It is true, though.

Bishops and Grand Inquisitors. Go to prison for life.

(He goes to prison for life.)

ACT II.

Deepest Dungeons of the Inquisition, comfortably furnished with books, maps, quadrants, sextants, sextets, octoroons, the last new globe from Stanford's, and a copy of the "Globe Shakespeare" from Macmillan's.

Vasco (turning globe). But still it moves. Stop. I ought not to say that. I am not Galileo.

[Studies Map.]

Enter SELICA.

Selica. If you loved as I loved you, I'd show you where the ships go through.

Vasco. I love you to distraction, but do you understand the use of maps, fair savage?

Selica. Intimately. When only four years of age, I was taken by cruel parents to England, and sold to Sir Robert Murchison, President of the Geographical Society. I escaped by the submarine telegraph. See, false man (shows him a Map), that is the way to double the Cape.

Vasco. You are an angel, and if the devotion of a life—

Enter INEZ.

I hope you are quite well.

Inez. Not in the least. You are free.

Vasco. You are an angel, and if the devotion of a life—

Inez. But it will not. In fact, I have made other arrangements. To save you, I have consented to marry Don Pedro, and we are going out to discover the passage to India.

Vasco. I am astonished.

(He is astonished until Curtain falls.)

ACT III.

A great Ship at Sea. The footlights represent the stern. Cabins seen. Nautical Incidents. Inquisition band plays, "Oh, the roast Jews of old Portugal."

Enter INEZ.

Inez. Alas, poor Vasco!

Enter VASCO, through a port-hole.

Vasco. Believe me true.

Inez. You must also be very wet.

Vasco. It is so. I love you.

Enter DON PEDRO.

Pedro. I cannot allow such an observation to be made to my wife. What ho, menials!

Enter many nautical menials.

Pedro. Put this slave into a cask. Head it up. Bang the bung-hole. Throw it into the sea.

[A tremendous Storm arises.]

Grand Chorus.

Behold our tears and groans,
We go to David Jones.

[The Ship begins to go to DAVY JONES, when thousands of Madagascariotes swim round her, come on board, draw swords, daggers, affykans, mucks, creases, ataghans, inferences, and other weapons of vengeance. All the white folks are going to be massacred.]

Enter SELICA.

Selica. Don't. [They don't; the Ship sinks.]

ACT IV.

Madagascar. Splendid pagodas, temples, caves of Elephants, Giants' Causeways, putully nautches, and other interesting scenery. SELICA is Queen: she enters.

Selica. My people are loyal, but they have constitutional rights, and they insist on killing all these whites.

Enter VASCO.

Selica. So! you are there, are you?

Vasco. To your Majesty's assertion I assent, and to your Majesty's inquiry I reply affirmatively.

Selica. The people will kill you.

Vasco. It is unfortunate. It occurs to me at this crisis respectfully to ask your Majesty why you are called The Africaine?

Selica. Because I am an Asiatic. Resuming the subject, I remark that I can save you in one way only. I will declare you my husband.

Vasco. You are an angel, and if the devotion of a life—

INEZ is heard singing without.

"I go to execution,

"Tis righteous retribution,

And by this Constitution

All foreigners must die."

Vasco. That voice!

[He starts.]

Selica. How dare you start? I'll make you smart.

You love that Lisbon coquette! 'Tis well.

[Sarcastically.]

Vasco. Is it?

[The Curtain descends on his conviction that however well it may be, it might be better.]

ACT V.

QUEEN SELICA'S Gardens. They are very beautiful, and oranges, olives, ostrich-eggs, oysters, and other luxuries depend from the trees.

Selica. Is this Madagascar? Am I its Queen? But without entering at this moment into a discussion upon those details, slaves, bring in your prisoners.

VASCO and INEZ are brought in.

Nelusko. It may be convenient for me to mention that I love your Majesty.

Selica. If equally convenient, hold your tongue. But where is that person's husband?

Nelusko. Ask the sharks.

Selica (haughtily). I ask you. But I am answered. Now, false lover, and you, artful woman, you are in my power, and you shall feel it. What can you expect.

Inez. I expect nothing further in this mundane sphere.

Selica. But you love him?

[Pointing to Vasco.]

Inez. The statement which has just been made in reference to my late husband, allows me without impropriety to say that such is the case.

Selica. Ha! And you love her?

[Pointing to Inez.]

Vasco. I love you both, and if the devotion of a life—

Selica. Silence, you double-faced Janus. Pollio in Norma was a gentleman to you. Never mind. Put them on board a vessel which I see coming, and which is about to sail at 6 45 A. M., for Portugal; and may they be happy!

[They are led away to happiness.]

The Scene changes, and discovers

THE UPAS TREE.

It is very splendid, with red leaves, but surrounded with dead elephants, ichthyosaurs, crocodiles, giraffes, and others who have ventured within reach of its poison. There occur sixteen bars in unison on the fourth string, and the audience weep for seven minutes.

Enter SELICA and NELUSKO, following.

Selica. Who told you to come?

Nelusko. I thought I had apprised your Majesty of my undeviating attachment.

Selica. Did you? I forgot. But it really does not matter. Are they safe?

Nelusko. Deign to look through these branches. There goes the ship, and on his return Vasco de Gama will be made Admiral of the Indian, Persian, and Arabian Seas.

Selica. How do you know that?

Nelusko. From a statement in Mr. Charles Knight's excellent Cyclopædia of Geography.

Selica. You are right, it is an admirable work, and no gentleman's library can be complete without it. Now give me that bunch of crimson berries. Not that—keeping the largest for yourself, pig!

[She eats the Upas fruit. He does the same.]

Tremendous final Chorus.

Mlle. Saxe. How they are singing out of tune!

[Dies.]

M. Faure. Perfectly atrocious.

Curtain falls on Final Chorus.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The butterflies. (Les Papillons). For 3 or 4 female voices. J. Concone. 40

Belongs to the set of "Les Harmoniennes," and is a very pretty arrangement of Rossini's air, "Night's shades no longer," to very different words and subject. Not difficult.

Sweetly the moonlight gleaming. (Guard ache biancha luna). Duet. F. Campana. 40
A first class duet, of rich and soft harmony.

Our soldier's return. G. H. Barton. 30

The return, as the going forth of our citizen soldiers, sets the pens and the voices of the minstrels at work. A good song.

My own. (Mein). F. Schubert. 40

Belongs to the "Cycle" of twenty songs, all of them about the "Maid of the Mill." This is one of the prettiest, and is distinguished for its singular accompaniment.

The ring you gave to me. Ballad. J. Harrison. 40

The poet "rings" many changes on the significance of the pleasing parting gift. Music very good.

Nicodemus Johnson. Song. C. Pettengill. 30

The young people of Boston are quite well acquainted with Nicodemus, who has a strange way of dancing while he sings. His portrait appears on the title, and his comic song inside.

Gold, my friends, if that be wanting. Baritone song in "Fidelio." 40

In the spring of life forsaken. 40

Two of the most striking melodies in the great (to some the greatest) opera. The last is for tenor, but may be sung by soprano, of course, and the first will not sound badly with a mezzo-soprano voice.

Soldier coming home. Song. H. M. Slade. 30

One of the "welcoming" ballads which come along so appropriately, just now.

Instrumental.

Fragment of the Adagio of Beethoven's fourth Symphony. 60

Fragment of the Andante of Beethoven's sixth

Symphony. Trans. by E. Batiste. 50

Two more organ pieces of Batiste's series. The second is from the Pastoral Symphony, and of course, both are well arranged.

Alice. Romance. J. Ascher. 60

Tasteful, and good practice.

Within a mile of Edinburgh. Trans. S. Glover. 35

The old Scotch song is almost universally liked, and the transcription is well managed.

Butterfly's ball. Polka. C. Coote. 40

Mr. Coote is a good easy man, or at least his music is good and easy, and just the thing for those who must have a piece that is not difficult.

Evening breezes. Nocturne. E. M. Porter. 30

Union march militaire. E. M. Porter. 40

Two good pieces by a gentleman who is apt to do his work thoroughly.

Night's shades no longer. From "Moses in Egypt." Trans. by C. Grobe. 40

Excellent for practice. The melody is too well known to need an extensive description.

Books.

LOUIS KOHLER'S PIANO STUDIES. Opus 50.

The first studies. $1.25

Kohler's studies are all useful, but special attention is directed to this, as being almost the only collection which can be placed in a pupil's hands within a few weeks of commencement. Most teachers who try them, will find them just the thing they were wanting.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 632.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 7.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Lost.

The sunset of early summer
Illumined, with rosy glow,
The rock and the ancient castle,
The hut on the beach below.

A maiden looked from a turret;
"Oh fisher, young fisher," cried she,
"Over the sea, in the sunset,
Fain would I float with thee!"

"Fairer maid among maidens!
Come down to the beach alone;
With the ebb of the tide I'll bear thee
To isles in the sea unknown."

Down she came from the castle,
With exquisite motion slow,
The beautiful bend of the wavelcet,
When south winds over it blow.

Greetings and innocent kisses
Each to the other gave;
The water-spirits' music
Sighed under the ruffled wave.

Together they floated, singing,
Over the deep, away;
The wind was slowly rising,
And slowly sank the day.

All, all save love forgotten,
They lost the sheltering shore;
On, on, through night and tempest
They sped, to return no more.

Was love or death the stronger?
Which won the victory?
Long hast thou kept the secret,
Unfathomable sea!

KATHARINE FRANCES M. RAYMOND.

The Grand Review.

EXTRACTS FROM SERMON OF REV. WILLIAM H. CHANNING.

All that I can hope to give is a general impression of this wonderful scene, the like of which none can expect or wish to see again; for God grant that our warfare is accomplished for ages, forever, within this nation. But sublime beyond power of expression was the manifestation thus given, for once, of the heroism of a free people. Rome in her era of imperial grandeur, France and Germany in the mediæval ages, Paris in the most splendid days of Napoleon, London in the noontide of Wellington, never looked on such a triumphal procession as rolled through the broad avenues of the capital of this Republic for twelve hours, one hundred and fifty thousand strong, and thirty miles in length! More showy displays have been often made; for these men were returning from the longest marches, the severest exposures, and the sternest contests which any armies in modern times have passed through, and, though neat and trim as circumstances permitted, yet their uniforms were faded and weather-stained, and their tattered banners told the tale of their prolonged hardships. But it was this very evidence of terrible toil and struggle, so unconsciously given, that made the chief charm of the spectacle. This was no holiday parade of professional soldiers. Here were our brothers, men of the people, fellow-citizens, who had for four long, weary, woeful years, left home and all that makes home dear. left peaceful pursuits of industry, and the pleasant paths of peace, and risked all, sacrificed all, for the laws and liberties of the Commonwealth. For us and for our children, for all our privileges and immunities, for our free churches, free courts, free legislative halls, free farmers' fields and mechanics' workshops, free schools, and free presses, had they fought and poured out their life's blood, and borne the pitiless peltings of the storm and parching heats. O God, bless and reward them and theirs! How from the heart and to the heart of our whole nation came and went the meaning of the motto inscribed that day on the Capitol: "The only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to our victorious Union soldiers."

To one who looked eastward from the gate of the Treasury Building, up Pennsylvania avenue to the Capitol, more than a mile, the vast host of moving heroes, united into one, the surface of the mass undulating with the cadenced march, bayonets, and gun-barrels, and sabres, and spear-heads glistened with innumerable jets and sparkles of light, like the rapids of Niagara flashing in sunshine—a flood forever flowing down and on, from ever-full fountains, unintermitting, continually renewed; immense in volume, majestic in sweep, resistless in momentum, graceful in might—it seemed like a river of life—a very Missouri of manhood! Eye, heart, imagination were filled with this sublime vision of the giant stream, so steadily pouring on and ever on, through gaily enamelled flowery banks of crowded sideways, packed windows, thronged roofs all ablaze with banners, and flowers, and many-hued dresses; and the sense of wonder grew deeper and deeper as the fascinated eye watched the inexhaustible current of vital vigor, so beautiful in ordered will, in manifold oneness, in harmonized omnipotence. Whence do they come—these waves on waves of athletes, so upright and firm in port, so bronzed and ruddy in tint, with matted beard and close-clipped hair, with muscles so pliant, strong and elastic like steel, and steady, springy step, and gay cheerfulness of look, and carriage? And are these the "exhausted resources" of a nation decimated by four years of bloody strife? And these thirty miles of indomitable sons of Anak, only two-fifths of the armies of the Republic, with a countless fleet and another of seamen to guard their flanks? Oh, thanks to the Lord God Omnipotent, that he has thus demonstrated before the on-looking nations that free institutions—the government of a people by a people and for a people, is the most stable, while most progressive—the most loyal, while most liberal form of government on earth. Thanks, ever fresh thanks! This young giant of a Republic, in the grand Olympic Games of the ages, has proved its prowess and won its crown! Henceforth let us have peace. Here are our peace-makers and our peace-keepers—men who prize freedom as the law of heavenly order, and who, to guard this sacred birth-right, are ready at the instant to give their lives—their all.

When somewhat satisfied with the grand general impression, one was free to note particulars. What first attracted the eye, perhaps, was the profusion of flowers, for this is the season of roses in this district; and the rose-tint seemed to light up, with festive brightness, the dingy and dust-powdered uniforms. There were garlands of flowers on the shoulders, breasts, and arms of the mounted officers, wreaths of flowers on the arched necks of their chargers; bouquets of flowers at the saddle-bow or in the bridle-hand; sprigs of flowers projected from the gun-barrels of the soldier; sprigs of flowers were badges on the breasts of the officers heading the ranks, and, above all, wreaths and garlands of flowers, and, in several instances, civic crowns of laurel were pendent from the spear-heads of the torn battle-flags and bullet-riddled guidons. The fresh beauty of these floral adornments seemed to overspread the mighty host with the atmosphere of a Paradise Regained of Peace. And next the gaze was rivetted upon the banners—some glistening bright with silken folds untarnished, their blue ground blazoned all over with golden letters, recording the desperate fights through which the brigades and regiments who proudly bore them had proved their patriotic ardor and won their fame. And beside them—their companions—were the old banners, first blessed at home, and consecrated with the prayers of wives and mothers, now shrivelled and shorn to fluttering shreds, scarce able to cling to the flagstaff; the staff itself often shattered, and bound and strapped to hold together. How those pierced, scorched, ravelled rags told of the fierce thunder storms and iron hail and sheets of flame of many and many a battle-field! How proudly, yet with what almost reverent tenderness, the sturdy standard-bearers drooped their treasured trophies in answering salute to the cheers, and hand-clappings, and kerchief-wavings of the multitude; and how eye answered eye as they grimly smiled, while memory recalled the terrific combats of the past! And then from the battle-flags one turned to study the rank and file of regiments and brigades, who, with company front of twenty deep and massed, swept by, so stately in majestic strength—living organisms whose pulsating heart-throbs were numbered by the rhythmic tread. What stalwart forms—what bronzed and rugged faces! How swinging the stride—how buoyant the bearing! How youthful these veterans of scores and hundreds of desperate combats! How gay and glad, with lightsome hearts, their trials ended, their work well done, their victory fairly earned, their nation saved, are these our nobles marching to their humble homes! Alas! And where are they, their well-loved, trusted comrades, who left shoulder to shoulder years ago, the quiet village, far away among the embosomed hills, or on the flowery prairies? These wasted ranks are their witnesses. They sleep; their soldiers' rest under the green mounds of the blood-dyed Wilderness, amidst the sighing pines of the Carolinas and Georgia, or their bones are bleaching yet on the fatal field of Chickamauga. Will you think it strange when I say that, as I watched the tramping army here visible, overhead, seen only by the spirit eye, another army seemed sweeping on, clad in white robes, and waving palm-boughs with crowns of unfading flowers, who responded to the martial strains with a Gloria in Excelsis and a welcome home, that filled the whole heaven with harmony—and chief among that cloud of witnesses appeared our risen President!

Thayer's New Beethoven Catalogue.

The writer of the following article, which we translate from a German musical paper,—Dr. Laurencin—is a son of the Cardinal Archduke Rudolph, to whom Beethoven dedicated so many of his greatest works, including the great Mass in D, the great B-flat Trio, the Concerto in E flat, the Sonata: Les Adieux, &c., the most difficult of all the Sonatas, op. 106, and the last of them all, that in C minor, op. 111. His testimony to the thorough excellence and value of our friend's work—which may be regarded as a sort of avant courier to his forthcoming Life of Beethoven—carries weight with it. We long since were notified that a copy of the Catalogue was on its way to us; but it has not yet come to hand. Meanwhile the following will serve to show in what high esteem the fruits of our friend's "bee-like industry" are held in Germany:

A. W. THAYER: Chronologisches Verzeichniss der Werke (Chronological Catalogue of the Works of) LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. Berlin: F. Schneider. 1865.

The work before us deserves a warm greeting from all students and friends of Beethoven. Nay more. It is significant under every aspect of the latest mode of exploring and presenting the history and biography of Art. The present time demands a deep and poetic comprehension of all possible occurrences of life. But with the spirit the outward given matter must substantially correspond. This must be placed in order first of all. Farther work is only possible upon this basis. One must first be fully master of the facts. Then only can he enter upon the how, whence, and wherefore of what is given. Such a manner of proceeding is by no means synonymous with the brainless labor of mere draymen and compilers. On the contrary, the soul must shine through independent and self-active everywhere. To be sure, this goal, in the case before us, can be reached only in a very limited sense. The old formalistic logic, long since discarded as to its stiff one-sidedness, and reformed into a higher and more comprehensive way of thinking and teaching, must in a certain sense claim precedence in labors like the present. At the same time the so-called pragmatical way of writing history and arranging its material, long since superseded as an exclusive and controlling principle, must from grounds of inmost necessity play the second and subordinate part in works of this kind. Let now a man strictly conscientious and of true piety, a man of sharp insight, genuine faith and unaffected love, set about such an undertaking, and this outwardly given logical-historical raw material will at once assume, in his original conception, a living and life-giving form. In such a presentation of a subject we have a piece of actual human life revealed to us, a sort of psychological or character-drama. And this is the very kernel, deeply grounded in the spirit of our time, of all biographical and historical inquiry.

Now Thayer's book, viewed on a certain side at least, is a speaking proof of this striving in the spirit of our times. Its fundamental thought and object is: to fix as accurately as possible the time of the origin of Beethoven's works. The point here was the laying of a trustworthy foundation for later investigations and for the long expected full biography of Beethoven. The pressing problem at the outset was the rectification of a multitude of firmly rooted errors about the time and mode of origin of these creations. Heretofore a superficial view has regarded the Opus numbers affixed to the master's works as sole and conclusive authority as to the period of their beginning, progress and completion. For a long while this notion obstinately prevailed, in spite of the proof of the utter groundlessness of the assumption furnished by a comparison of the existing catalogue by Breitkopf & Härtel (1851) with the notes by Wegeler, Ries and Schindler. Many a work of the master, which is numbered very high, clearly belongs to an earlier period; and on the other hand, many a one bearing a lower opus number, belongs to a much later creative period of Beethoven. Finally, what is to be done with those works which, both in the above named Catalogue and in the notes and oral communications of Beethoven's contemporaries, have been left utterly unnumbered, and chronologically undetermined?

To a perception of the fundamental thought and standpoint of the pamphlet now in question, the following introductory matter seems to me indispensable:

Breitkopf & Härtel's Beethoven Catalogue gives only 188 printed works of the master; but of works unprinted, whether finished or only sketched, it says nothing. Until very recently the world has trusted blindly, with implicit confidence, to this Catalogue and to the notes of Wegeler, Ries and Schindler, as unquestionable oracular sources with regard to everything worth knowing about Beethoven. Thayer's book applies a sharp probe to all these original materials. This is done partly by removing some things altogether and putting others in their place, partly by correction and completion of details more or less essential. Above all it sets the number of Beethoven's printed works at 298, instead of 188, as heretofore assumed. Thayer authenticates these numerical statements always with documental exactness. He gives the complete title of each work. He also notes by figures the time of its origin and completion, and even the place of its birth and first performance. The place of publication and the name of the publishing house are also mentioned for each work. In many cases he gives the leading motive or motives in notes, after the manner of a pianoforte score, with words beneath what is to be sung. To these original vouchers the author very often adds a copy, word for word, of brief announcements of publication, and even criticisms upon most of Beethoven's works, which appeared at the time in Vienna, Leipzig and other journals. One also meets in this work very many most precise disclosures about the places where and the persons in whose keeping the original manuscripts of the master may be found.

And still the author's bee-like industry has gone much further. He knew how to get an accurate insight into the sketch-books of Beethoven, which are scattered about here and there, and from these he has lucidly brought together what was best worth knowing. This is an act of the highest importance to the history of culture. Such a process, persistently carried through all the prominent manifestations of artist and explorer-life, would unquestionably afford the clearest insight into the growth and working of the creative mind in every sense. It would give us one of the most speaking life portraits, one of the most significant complements to our knowledge of a people and of individual minds. The kindling thought which is put into the world unquestionably works much more lastingly upon one who knows how, and by what crooked and cross ways of will, thought, feeling, struggle, it has gradually come to light.

Reference may here be made particularly to page 19 (first draughts of "Adelaide"); pp. 51-2, (Torso of the Larghetto of the D-major Symphony); p. 69-70, (draught of a song entitled: "Empfindungen bei Lydiens Untreue"); p. 75-8, (Sketch of the C-minor Symphony); p. 92-3, (additions to the 8th Symphony); pp. 94-116, (Irish Melodies); pp. 141-148 (pioneer labors—

Andante—upon the "Missa Solemnis"); p. 144, (first shapings of the "Opferlied"); finally, pp. 148-150, (single aperçus for the "Ninth.")

The amiable modesty of the author has not been backward, on such occasions, in making thankful mention of those who have furnished him the means of such an insight. Among others named by Mr. Thayer are G. Nottebohm in Vienna, Fr. Espagne, Custos of the musical department of the Royal Library in Berlin, and Otto Jahn in Bonn.

In the same view we may thank the work before us for dragging to light whatever could be hunted up of hitherto unprinted things of Beethoven, especially those youthful works which date from his life in Bonn and the early part of his life in Vienna, and which hitherto have been scarcely known by name; to these it refers, now cursorily, and now with greater emphasis, naming the place where each work has been found. Here the author goes sharp-sightedly to work. He carefully distinguishes what is unquestionably Beethoven's from that which, bearing his name may possibly have proceeded from the great man's brother, Caspar Anton Carl Beethoven. This latter was at first a music-teacher in Bonn, afterwards in Vienna, where, having retired from professional life, he died a private man in the year 1815. Thayer also mentions among things commonly declared to be youthful works of Beethoven some, which he considers to be studies of Carl van Beethoven, a nephew of the master, once a pupil of Carl and Joseph Czerny. Among other things the author treats with especial librarian-like minuteness the hitherto unprinted "Italian Songs," for one and more voices, partly with and partly without accompaniment. Moreover the short dedicatory and other letters, the personal remarks of Beethoven, handed down orally or in writing, which Thayer communicates in their appropriate places, help not less to complete that high and grand image which we had long since formed to ourselves of Beethoven, the most German of all artistic characters. Especially you meet in this connection many caustic, striking traits of humor of a stamp wholly peculiar to the Germans.

Finally, Thayer's pamphlet gives us (pp. 173-182) the completest inventory and appraisal thus far of what Beethoven left behind him, with an accurate fixing of the valuation and the selling price. All these data, so attractive partly in an artistic, partly in a personal point of view, and partly in both, are here enjoyably and even eloquently set before us, and reveal a man of intellect and heart. Not only must we thank the author for his conscientious labor; it is even a duty to enjoy it heartily, to set forth its importance in every sense, and to commend it as warmly as possible to the faithful imitation of all chronologists and biographers.

DR. LAURENCIN.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

Beethoven's Works in the Edition published by BREITKOPF & HÄRTEL.

BY OTTO JAHN.*

(Concluded from page 57.)

For the sake of brevity as well as of consistency, it was necessary that the editors of the new edition should restrict themselves to giving, in the first instance, the chronological details undoubtedly established by proven authentic documents, with the headings of titles of all the works. When such headings can be arrived at only by combination, and when, consequently, they are based on reasons which cannot be at once recognized and proved, but possibly may be doubtful or erroneous, they had to be excluded. Everything, however, that could be determined with a tolerable degree of certainty, might, with a short account of the reasons for its insertion, be appropriately comprised in the critical supplementary numbers, which will be the suitable place, moreover, for numerous other matters, both historical and biographical, such, for instance, as the publication of the exact titles and dedications. It might appear that the most simple plan would be to produce the title and dedication of each work as they were originally printed. But in a large collection no little consideration must be paid to economizing space, and, still more, to preserving consistent uniformity. Though many of the titles of Beethoven's compositions were undoubtedly drawn up by himself, and are distinguished by something characteristic, which ought not to be obliterated, in their form, the far greater majority are worded after the usual model, and at great length, comprising, for instance, in various languages, a list of all the instruments for which the various pieces were written. A reproduction of them, therefore, in a long series, would be attended with great inconvenience. For this reason, the same sort of heading has been given to each piece, and this heading comprises all that is material in the title, the idea of the dedication, and the "Op." number. The bibliographically exact reproduction of the titles and dedications, when these are of any interest, is better reserved for the critical supplementary parts, which, also, are the most fitting place for many remarks connected with this part of the subject. This is the place for titles written in Beethoven's hand, but altered when printed; examples of these have been adduced. Thus Beethoven gave the magnificent Quartet in F minor (Op. 95) the title of Quartetto serioso; while the Overture for Wind-Instruments (Op. 103) bore the title of Partie dans un concert, as indicating the time at which it was written. Many alterations, too, made by him in dedications are deserving of notice. The first Mass in C major (Op. 86) was originally dedicated to Prince Nicolas Esterhazy, at whose house it was first performed—the copy with Beethoven's dedication is preserved among the archives at Eisenstadt; being annoyed, however, at the coolness with which the work was received at the Prince's, he dedicated it, when it was published, to Prince Kinsky. The graceful Rondo in G major (Op. 51, 2) was originally dedicated to the Countess Giulietta Guicciardi, who, at Beethoven's desire, waived her right to the dedication in favor of the Countess Henriette Lichnowsky; as compensation, he dedicated to her the C-sharp minor Sonata (Op. 27, 2.) We are all aware what importance both the Sonata and the Dedication obtained after it was known that Beethoven was bound to Giulietta Guicciardi by the most tender partiality; knowing this, let any one compare the Rondo with the Sonata.

*Translated, by J. V. BRIDGEMAN, from the original in Die Grenzboten.

We have been imperceptibly led to the more material questions connected with the work. The first requirement of every good edition is naturally correctness, in order that the results arrived at by careful criticism may be faithfully and reliably communicated to the public. How seriously the publishers have set about their task is proved by the fact that they called in, cancelled, and replaced with other and correct copies the parts of the earlier Quartets, which had been struck off without being finally revised, and, consequently, were not free from faults. Quite free from faults no work, it is true, has ever issued from the Press; even when the most unheeded care has been taken in correcting the proofs, typographical errors have been discovered. The peculiar custom which obtains in the music-trade, however, of having the engraved plates preserved, and the editions not more than sufficient to supply the immediate demand, admits of subsequent corrections, and each member of the musical public can, by sending notice of any faults he may notice in practice, contribute his part towards a degree of accuracy increasing with each successive edition.

The getting up of the work is most admirable, and will more than satisfy even extravagant demands. Every thing like mere display, however, especially such as founds upon waste of space and paper the claim of the work to rank among "splendid editions," is most properly avoided, the object in view being the greatest possible circulation among all classes. The form is the long folio, usual at the present day, and is well adapted for the music-stand and not inconvenient to read; the paper is good and white; and the notes are clear and well-formed, those intended for the executant being exceedingly bold and striking. Those in the scores, being meant rather to be only read, are naturally smaller, but even they are distinct and taken in at a glance. The distribution and arrangement of the work are throughout such as to convey the impression of gentlemanly and agreeable liberality, while, at the same time, space has been skillfully combined. The price of each sheet, which, owing to the adopted plan, contains more than is usually the case, is fixed at three groschen, that is: about half the ordinary price.

A material recommendation of this edition is, finally, the great energy with which it is being pushed forward, and carried on towards a rapid conclusion. When a man subscribes to a serial in several volumes, he must be prepared for a long succession of years to pass before he can see his serial completed, and must console himself with a reflection that, should he not live to see its completion, he has, at any rate, contributed his quota towards a work which will delight a succeeding generation. When, in opposition to this kind of experience, founded upon absolute fact, a distinct promise was given in the prospectus that this Edition of Beethoven should be completed in three, or at most, in four years, many a person received that promise, probably, with mistrust. However, the work was begun at the commencement of 1862, and, after the lapse of 2 years, the following compositions named in the prospectus are already completed and published:

- Series 1. Symphonies, Nos. 1—8.
- " 2. Orchestral Works, Nos. 10, 12.
- " 3. Overtures, Nos. 18—28 (complete.)
- " 4. For Violin and Orchestra, Nos. 29—31 (complete.)
- " 5. Chamber Music for four and more Instruments, Nos. 32—36 (complete.)
- " 6. Quartets for Stringed Instruments, Nos. 54—58 (complete.)
- " 7. Trios for Stringed Instruments, Nos. 54—58 (complete.)
- " 8. For Wind Instruments, Nos. 59—64 (complete.)
- " 9. For Pianoforte and Orchestra, Nos. 65—70, 71, 72.
- " 10. Pianoforte, Quartet, and Quintet, Nos. 74—78 (complete.)
- " 11. Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, Nos. 79—91 (complete.)
- " 12. For Pianoforte and Violin, Nos. 92—103 (complete.)
- " 13. For Pianoforte and Violoncello, Nos. 105—111A (complete.)
- " 14. For Pianoforte and Wind Instruments, Nos. 112—119 (complete.)
- " 15. For Pianoforte, four Hands, Nos. 120—123 (complete.)
- " 16. Sonatas for Pianoforte Solo, Nos. 124—161 (complete.)
- " 17. Variations for Pianoforte Solo, Nos. 162—182 (complete.)
- " 18. Smaller Pieces for Pianoforte Solo, Nos. 183—198 (complete.)
- " 19. Sacred Music, No. 205.
- " 20. Dramatic Works, No. 206.
- " 21. Cantatas, No. 209.
- " 22. Vocal Pieces with Orchestra, Nos. 210—214 (complete.)
- " 23. "Lieder" and Songs, with Pianoforte, Nos. 215—227 (complete.)

Thus of the 264 numbers contained in the catalogue, 212 are already published. It is true that among those still to appear there are some exceedingly important and comprehensive works, but we must bear in mind that the preparation of them required a longer time than that of the others, which could be got ready more rapidly, and that it is proceeding simultaneously with them.

We may, therefore, confidently look forward to the speedy completion of an undertaking, which, by the grandeur and importance inherent to it, as well as by the spirit and vigor with which it is being conducted and carried out, has a right to be regarded as a national undertaking, and which will be a splendid monument honoring the master who produced such great works, and the generation that understood and admired him.

OTTO JAHN.

(From the Home Journal).

New Musical Instrument for the Drawing-Room.

We have become so accustomed to the piano-forte as the sole interpreter of all classes of instrumental music, in our homes, and it is so admirable in its office, in many respects, that it is not realized that, in large classes of music, it labors under a great disadvantage from its inability to produce sustained tones. Yet, for the interpretation of many compositions, these are actually essential. From the instant a piano key is struck, the tone rapidly decreases until it is lost entirely. In no way can it be long continued or made to increase, instead of diminishing; and the repetition of tones, to which the performer is compelled to resort, in place of their prolongation, is, after all, unsatisfactory in its results. This peculiarity of the tones of the piano-forte is undoubtedly excellent, as a single effect, conducing to the gracefulness and spirit of its utterances, and its capacity for expression, but it is by no means the only desirable effect, and the impossibility of escaping it produces a certain sameness and monotony, and greatly circumscribes the capabilities of the instrument.

The various orchestral and band instruments, and the human voice, especially, avoid this sameness of the piano-forte, and are capable of sustained tones, with greater variety in crescendo and diminuendo effects: but not one of them, singly, can produce harmony as well as melody. Here, then, they are far behind the piano in usefulness. Where a number of them can be used together, as in an orchestra, choir, or even quartet of voices, or instruments, harmony as well as melody is possible, with every variety of musical effect. Hence it is for such combinations that most of the best musical compositions have been written, and they cannot be adequately rendered by any instrument not capable of sustained tones. But those of us who are less than princes cannot keep, at our private command, bands of musicians to minister to our musical pleasure at will, and thus the need of some one instrument which shall combine the capabilities of many; which shall add to the capacity of the piano that of the organ, and, under the hands of a single performer, better render our most valuable music than the piano can possibly do, on account of the peculiarities mentioned.

Pipe organs are out of the question from the large space they must necessarily occupy, in order to contain reasonable compass and variety, as well as from their great cost. In a pipe-organ, if it be properly balanced, and well furnished in its lower, as well as upper tones, a pipe sixteen feet long, and several inches in diameter, is requisite to produce the single lowest tone. From this size, the pipes gradually decrease in size as the tones to be produced are higher; but, as in a single full stop, there must be sixty-one pipes, and as a reasonably satisfactory pipe-organ must contain several stops, it is obvious that a large amount of space must be occupied by such an instrument—not to mention the expense involved in its construction. For private houses, therefore, to save space and expense, it has been customary and even necessary, to omit the heavier stops requiring these large pipes, and so disproportioned, ill-balanced instruments have been the result, without, after all, attaining sufficient compactness and economy to render them generally available. This insuperable difficulty, with some minor ones, has prevented the pipe-organs from becoming popular as parlor instruments.

For a long time it has appeared probable to those who were cognizant of such matters, that if the desired instrument, which should be a miniature of the great pipe-organ, or an epitome of the orchestra, were ever produced, it must be by the improvement and development of some form of instrument in which the tones were produced by reeds. These occupy little space, are readily controlled, and do not involve very great expense. Hence much time and ingenuity have been given to experiments in this direction. The chief difficulty to be overcome was not trifling; being nothing less than poor, unattractive quality of tone. The term "reedy tones" had become almost a proverbial expression of condemnation. And then there were other shortcomings scarcely less important.

It is not our purpose to attempt any allusion, even, to the innumerable experiments which have been made in the course of many years to overcome this radical defect, as well as the many other deficiencies in reed instruments. Their success has been various, and not always encouraging, though progress was made from time to time, the result of which the public had in the shape of melodeons, harmoniums and reed organs of various names. It is only within a few years, however, that reed instruments have attained such a degree of excellence as to merit or receive much attention from musical connoisseurs. But within these few years such material progress has been made by the well-known manufacturers, Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, of Boston, as to place the instruments made by them, on a higher level, and to decide the question that the piano-forte is no longer to hold the only prominent place as a household instrument. These manufacturers have worked out the secret of producing tones of the best quality—tones of surpassing purity and richness—from reeds, and have otherwise brought the instruments, for which they have adopted the appropriate name, "Cabinet Organs," to such a degree of excellence, that they are exciting much interest in musical circles, and are already becoming the fashion with those who are on the alert for musical novelties of real merit. Without doubt, in these cabinet-organs, we have the long-sought instrument of sustained tones, which is hereafter to divide with the piano-forte the musical honors of the drawing-room.

The attractions of these new instruments are their really beautiful tones, which are capable of being sustained indefinitely, and which have considerable variety in character, while the performer has their degree of loudness always easily at command; so that he can, at will, produce what are technically termed organ-tones, crescendos, diminuendos, etc. Here, then, are met the principal requirements of the long-needed instrument, possessing the capacity which the piano lacks. Almost all sacred music, as well as the majority of transcriptions from the operas and various orchestral compositions, find better interpretation in the cabinet-organ than they have before had from any single instrument. As compared with large pipe-organs, these new instruments are, of course, lacking in power and grandeur. On the other hand, they have much more vivacity of utterance, and need not shrink from comparison as to quality of tones.

The size of the cabinet-organ averages not half that of the piano-forte, while the shape affords opportunity for elegant designs in exterior finish, of which its makers have availed themselves with much good taste.

Having in so many respects compared or contrasted this new instrument with the piano-forte, let us guard against being understood that it is likely, in any way, to displace the latter instrument. We rather adopt Mr. Gottschalk's view, that "the cabinet organ is an admirable complement to the piano-forte, being a better interpreter of many delightful compositions, and so enlarging the field of home music."

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, MAY, 1865.—You will not wonder at the delay of my April letter, in view of the terrible news from America which reached us just as I was about to write it. Every loyal American will know by experience how that intelligence, coming with a double shock from following so close upon the most joy-inspiring accounts, unfitted him for a while for every other interest or pursuit. Not to let my news grow too old, however, I will now, before leaving Berlin, close up my account of the musical advantages which it has afforded, and which I can assure you I have fully enjoyed during this winter.

Easter, and the preceding Holy Week, brought a rise in the tide which had in a measure set during Lent. During the latter season, however, some of the finest concerts of the winter took place; for instance the last series (three) of the Symphony Soirées of the Royal Orchestra. Of these, again, the last was the best, the programme consisting of Beethoven's Fifth and Mozart's G-minor Symphonies, and Mendelssohn's music to the Midsummer Night's Dream. These concerts are now given in the beautiful concert hall of the Opera House, a large, lofty, excellently ventilated apartment, beautifully decorated, decidedly the finest music hall in Berlin, which it is to be regretted is not more frequently used. The performance of the orchestra needs no comment; its excellence is well-known, and in point of execution and the material which they bring to it, these concerts may be said to belong to the first in the world. During Holy Week a number of performances of music appropriate to the season took place. It has become customary in Berlin, as in most Prussian cities, whether Protestant or Catholic, to produce certain standard sacred works annually about this time. In Berlin the Sing-Akademie, on every Good Friday, bring out Bach's Passion Music, according to the Gospel of St. Matthew, a stupendous work. Graun's "Death of Jesus," a Cantata, more popular and more comprehensible in style, is also sung every year during Passion Week in the Garrison church by Schneider's Verein, and was this year performed, besides, by no less than five other societies in different churches, as well as by the Sing-Akademie, for a benevolent object. In addition to these, Stern's Society produced Beethoven's Missa Solennis on Easter Eve. It was certainly most interesting to hear these three great works in such close succession, and performed with equal excellence, the choruses of both societies (Sing-Akademie and Stern's), being superb, and the solos mostly very fine. Fräulein Decker distinguished herself more than ever in the Cantata of Graun and Bach's Passion. Amateur though she is, I can truly class her among the finest singers of oratorio music extant. Her voice is remarkably clear, and true, and sweet, as well as powerful, her style, pure and free from the slightest affectation, and she sings with so much earnestness and dignity, that it is an exquisite enjoyment to listen to her.—At this season, too, the liturgic services in which the Cathedral choir takes part, are peculiarly impressive and beautiful. At the one appointed for Thursday before Easter, a portion of the music consists of the Impropria of Palestrina, which is inexpressibly solemn; and not much less so the "Seven Words" (the seven last sentences spoken by Jesus on the cross) by Neithardt. Speaking of Palestrina reminds me of a sacred concert given by some society during Lent, for a benevolent object, which a very fine programme, well executed, made a most attractive one. Among the compositions sang were Mozart's Ave Verum, Beethoven's Bussied (tenor solo), Duet for Tenor and Soprano from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the Hymn with chorus by the same composer, a beautiful eight voice Motet by Corsi, and, the most beautiful of all, a short sentence in 5 parts, "Jerusalem convertate, etc." by Palestrina. What it was, or what from, I cannot tell. I only know it was one of the most exquisite pieces of music I ever heard, the high, swelling tones with which it ended, only too quickly, when one thought it had only just begun, seeming to draw the listener strait up to heaven!

After Easter commenced a series of performances by Herr NIEMANN, from the Royal Theatre at Hanover, who is considered one of the first tenors, if not the first, at present on the German stage. Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Spontini's Fernando Cortez, Mehul's Joseph, Dorn's Niebelungen, The "Jewess," the "Prophet," "Faust," these were some of the operas in which he sang the tenor part. He has an uncommonly fine presence,—such as, strangely enough, is rarely met with in a tenor; tall and broad, and finely proportioned, he overtops most of his fellow-singers, and seems just made for the hero parts which he usually fills. His voice is a true tenore robusto, of great power and clearness, somewhat lacking, naturally, in the often requisite sweetness perhaps, but so well under his control, that he can tone it down to any degree of softness. His school is excellent, and his enunciation perfect. Add to this that he is as great an actor as he is a singer, and I need not tell you that he fully deserves all the enthusiasm which is lavished upon him.

Not long ago, we disappointed mortals who were cheated out of half of STOCKHAUSEN's last concert, were gratified by seeing the long-promised "Compensation Concert" announced in the papers. We hastened to call for our tickets, and on the day and at the hour appointed, the hall was crowded with expectant listeners. We soon saw, however, that Herr Stockhausen intended to give us only just what he owed us, and nothing more, or at least nothing worth mentioning. For the programme announced only just the song in which his hoarseness interrupted him, and the vocal number still remaining on that occasion. Between these was interpolated a "Feuille d'Album," which proved to be an insignificant piano composition by Mr. Kirchner, the gentleman who accompanied Herr Stockhausen. The singing of the latter, in the "Minstrel," by Schumann, and Beethoven's Songs "To the Distant Beloved One," was all that could be wished, indeed most exquisite, and, in fact, the short programme was no less than we had a right to expect. Still, it gave the impression of decided shabbiness, and several persons expressed surprise that Stockhausen had not been even more particular, and commenced Schumann's song exactly where he had broken off on the 14th of January, or that he had even added that "Feuille d'Album." Take it all in all, the getting up of this concert was not the most politic proceeding on the gentleman's part, and I doubt whether he will ever be as great a favorite in Berlin again as heretofore. Some say that he had no intention of giving any "Compensation Concert" at all, but had been told that, if such an one were not announced in time, his reception at a concert of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde," at which he was long since engaged to appear, and which took place the day after, would be a very unpleasant one, inasmuch as a number of silver whistles had been prepared for the occasion. In consequence of this warning, he advertised his extra concert for and gave it on Monday, and remained unmolested on Tuesday.

I am not sure whether, in one of my previous letters, I told you of my having heard Mad. WAGNER-JACHMANN in Orpheus. In retiring from the operatic stage, she reserved for herself the right of still appearing occasionally in this one opera. It is but rarely that she dares attempt the part, as she cannot always trust her voice; and I was fortunate enough in hearing the only performance of the opera given this winter. Very lately I had the pleasure of hearing the music of it sung again, at a concert. On both occasions Wagner was superb in her singing of the part, as on the first also in her dramatic representation thereof. The music is most beautiful, and appears to quite as great advantage off the stage as on it. For, with the exception of the role of Orpheus itself, the scenic action is rather shallow and uninteresting. Wagner's voice, both times that I heard her, seemed almost as fresh and powerful and rich as ever. On the last occasion particularly, when, singing in the hall of the Sing-Akademie, she was not obliged to strain it at all, it came forth with all its former beauty. And she is still, and ever will be, the same earnest, truthful, conscientious artist that she always was, and proves this not only when she appears as a singer, but also in her dramatic career, where she interprets most faithfully such poetic conceptions as Goethe's Iphigenia, Shakespeare's Lady Macbeth, Constance, etc., Schiller's Queen Elizabeth, and the like.

The Berlin stage has just lost one of its fairest flowers in the person of Mlle. DE ANNA, who died, after a lingering illness, only 27 years old. Of charming person and dignified demeanor, cultivated and refined, and of spotless reputation, she occupied a very high position as an artist, both vocal and dramatic, and is universally regretted. Her voice was a high mezzo-soprano, very pure and clear, and her acting truthful and earnest. It was but once my good fortune to hear her, as the Countess in the „Marriage of Figaro,” when I was delighted with her embodiment of the part. A fit substitute for her will not easily be found for the Berlin stage.

M.

Music Abroad.

Leipzig.

The following letter, taken from the London Orchestra, sums up the musical opportunities of a single season in this most peculiarly musical city of Germany:

LEIPZIG, 25th May, 1865.—I have more than once had occasion to observe that no small proportion of the benefit students of music can derive from a residence in Leipzig is due to the many opportunities they have of listening to music of the highest class.

That I did not speak without reason, may be seen from the following summary of music produced at Leipzig from the 1st of October to Easter Sunday. The list might be increased considerably were all the performances of the many semi-private societies,—the Dilettanti Orchestra-Verein, and the various concerts given by separate artists, such as—Frau Schumann, Dr. Satter, &c., and the weekly Pupils' Concerts in the Conservatorium,—added to the number.

Those pieces marked † were produced for the first time in Leipzig.

1.—IN THE CHURCH OF ST. THOMAS.

(On every alternate Sunday, except during the seasons of Advent and Lent, and on the festival days, music with orchestral accompaniment is sung at the principal morning service. On Saturday afternoons, and on the eves of festivals, two unaccompanied motets are sung.)

A.—WITH ORCHESTRA.

*Chorus and choral, Bach; chorus (Vater unser), Cherubini; two anthems, Händel; chorus, and Kyrie, Gloria, and Credo, from a Mass, Hauptmann; two choruses, and “The seven last words,” Haydn; Kyrie, Gloria, and Sanctus, from a Mass, Hummel; chorus (Verleih uns Frieden), and selection from “Christus,” Mendelssohn; two motets, and Kyrie, Gloria, and Credo, from a Mass, Mozart; Psalm 130, Richter; motet, Schneider.

B.—UNACCOMPANIED.

(Where more than one motet by the same composer has been sung, the number is given in parentheses.)

Bach, Dole, Drobisch, Durante, Fesca, Gade, Graun, Hauptmann (13), Haydn, Homilius, Kitzan (2), Mendelssohn (5), Mosel, Müller, Reissiger (3), Richter (8), Riets (3), Romberg, Scarlatti, Schicht (3), Schulz, Schütz, Schneider (2), Wemlig.

C.—ON GOOD FRIDAY.

The Matthæus Passion, by J. S. Bach.

2.—GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS.

A.—ORCHESTRAL PERFORMANCES.

(Twenty subscription and two extra concerts.)

SYMPHONIES.—“Columbus” symphony, Abert; in C, Bargiel; Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, Beethoven; Allegro, menuetto, rondo, Bennet; in D, Burgmüller; in F, Gade; in E flat and G, Haydn; in A minor, Mendelssohn; in G minor, and in D (without menuetto), Mozart; in B flat and E flat, Schumann.

OVERTURES.—“Leonore,” No. 3, Fest overture, Op. 124, Beethoven; Anacreon, Abencerragen, Waserträger, Cherubini; Michel Angelo, Gade; “Fingal's Cave,” “Midsummer Night's Dream,”† overture in C, re-written for the London Philharmonic, Mendelssohn; “Lorely,”† Naumann; “Manfred,” Schumann; “Alchemist,”† Spohr; Festival Overture, with the “Belgian Hymn,”† Viextemps; “Der Freischütz,” “Oberon,” “Preciosa,” Weber.

OTHER ORCHESTRAL WORKS.—Toccata in F,† instrumented by Esser, Bach; “Solemn March,”† Cherubini; part of the ballet music from “Orfeo,” Gluck; Suite No. 2, Lachner; “Haffner” Serenade, Mozart; Suite,† Raff; “Faust, ein musikalisches Charakterbild,”†

CHORAL WORKS.—I. With Orchestra.—Chorus and choral from the cantata, “Bleib bei uns,” Bach; “Frithjof-Sage,” Bruch; two anthems: “Und Gottes Will' ist dennoch gut,” “Nicht so ganz wirst meiner du vergessen,” Hauptmann; Athaliah, “Walpurgisnacht,” Mendelssohn; “Belshazzar,” Reinecke; “Paradise and the Peri,” Schumann. II. Without accompaniment.—Eight-part choral, “Mitten wir im Leben sind,” Mendelssohn.

CONCERTOS, &c.—Pianoforte—Beethoven, in C major, played by Fr. von Asten; in E flat, twice, by Herr Halle and Frau Schumann; and in C minor, by Herr Reinecke. Hummel, in B minor, by Fr. Mehlh. Mendelssohn, in G minor, by Herr E. Lübeck. Rosenhain,† by the composer. Schumann, by Herr Jaell. Violin—Joachim,† in G major, by the composer. Mendelssohn, by Herr Röntgen. Mozart,† in D major, by Herr David. Riets, by Herr Dreyschock. Spohr, No. 11, by Herr Walter; “Georgenscene,” by Herr Kömpel. Violoncello—Reinecke,† by Herr Grützacher. Volkmann,† by Herr Popper. Clarinet—Weber, adagio and rondo, by Herr Landgraff.

INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.—Pianoforte—Chopin, Heller, Jaell, Kirnberger, Lebert, Liszt, Lübeck, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, played by the pianists named above. Violin—Bach, Beethoven, Spohr, and Viextemps, played by the violinists named above. Violoncello—Bach, Grützacher, Mozart and Pergolesi, played by Herr L. Lübeck, and the violoncellists named above. Horn—Lorenz, Phantasiestück, played by Herr Gumpert.

SINGERS.—The Frauen Flinsch, Joachim, Köster, Passy-Cornet, Pögnen, Thelen; the Fräulein Alvsleben, Borchard, von Edelsberg, Gastoldi, Hinkel, Kimmritz, Pressler, Scheuerlein, Weber; the Herren Degale, Gitt, Gunz, Hertzsch, Hill, John, Richter, Rudolph.

B.—KAMMER-MUSIK.

(In Eight Concerts.)

FOR STRINGS.

TRIO.—C minor, Beethoven.

QUARTETS.—E flat, Cherubini; D minor, D major, Haydn; D major, Mendelssohn; D minor, Schubert; A major, Schumann.

QUINTETS.—C major,† C minor (re-arrangement of the pianoforte trio, Op. 1), Beethoven; C major, Schubert.

SEXTET.—Gade,†

OCTET.—Mendelssohn.

DOUBLE QUARTET.—D minor, Spohr.

CONCERTANTE.—For two violins, two viols di gamba, violoncello, and contrabass,† Bach.

FOR PIANOFORTE AND STRINGS.

PIANOFORTE AND VIOLIN. Kreutzer sonata, Beethoven.

PIANOFORTE AND VIOLONCELLO. Sonata, A major, Beethoven; sonata, D major, Mendelssohn.

QUARTETS. A major,† Brahms; Gernsheim†; Prince Louis Ferdinand†; G minor, Mozart.

QUINTET. Reinecke; E flat, Schumann.

VIOLONCELLO SOLO. Bach.

STRINGED AND WIND INSTRUMENTS. Divertimento, for string quartet, contrabass, and two horns,† Mozart.

3.—EUTERPE.

A.—ORCHESTRAL PERFORMANCES.

(Eight Concerts.)

SYMPHONIES. Nos. 5 and 7, Beethoven; B flat, Gade; G minor, Mozart; C major, adagio from the “Tragic Symphony,” Schubert; D minor, Schumann.

OVERTURES. “Prometheus,”† Bargiel; “Lo-diska,” Cherubini; “Midsummer Night's Dream,” Mendelssohn; “Jubel-Overture,”† Raff; “Genovefa,” Schumann; “Tannhäuser,” Wagner; “Euryanthe,” Weber.

OTHER ORCHESTRAL WORKS. Concerto for three violins, three violas, three violoncellos, and contrabass, Bach; “Sylphen Walzes, and Rákoczy March,” from the “Faust,” music, Berlioz; Symphonische Dichtung,† Huber; “Lohengrin” (introduction to Act III.) Wagner.

CHORAL WORKS. Fantasia for pianoforte (Fr. Bach) orchestra, and chorus, Beethoven; “Frühlingsbotschaft,” Gade; “Lobgeang,” Mendelssohn; music to Byron's “Manfred,” Schumann; Bräutlied, from “Lohengrin,” Wagner.

CONCERTOS, &c. Pianoforte. In E flat, played by Fr. Mehlh. Beethoven; F minor, by Frau Magnus-Heinze, Chopin; G minor, by Fr. Krebs, Mendelssohn; Concertstück, by Fr. Bach, Weber. Violin. Beethoven, by Herr Jacobssohn; Viotti, No. 24, by Herr Hugo Wehrle. Violoncello. Servais. Concertstück, by Herr Popper. Trombone. “David,” concertino, by Herr Nabich.

INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS. Pianoforte. Chopin, Händel, Liszt, Wallace, played by the pianists named above. Violin. Schumann and Viextemps, played by Herr Jacobssohn. Violoncello. Bach and Pergolesi, played by Herr Popper.

SINGERS. Frau Thelen; the Fräulein Brenner, Borchard, Eggeling, Martini, Metzendorf, and Wigand; the Herren Schild, Hertzsch, and Wiedemann.

B.—KAMMER-MUSIK.

(Two Concerts.)

STRING QUARTETS. E flat, Op. 74, Beethoven;

D major, Haydn; A minor, Schumann.

PIANOFORTE TRIO. D minor, Mendelssohn.

PIANOFORTE SEPTET. Hummel.

PIANOFORTE SOLOS. Chopin, Henselt, Liszt, Schumann.

VIOLIN SOLO. Bach, Chaconne. Lieder, with pianoforte and violin accompaniment, Hauptmann (2). Standchen, for contralto solo, with female chorus, Schubert.

4.—CHORAL SOCIETIES.

A.—RIEDELSCHE GESANG-VEREIN.

Cantata, “Ach Gott, wie manches Herzeleid,” cantata, “Gotteszeit ist die allerbeste Zeit,” second part of the “Weihnachts oratorium,” “Magnificat,” Bach. Oratorio, “Johannes der Täufer,”† Leonhard. Motet for double chorus, Franz. “Agnus Dei,” Herszod. “Die Seligkeiten,” Liszt. Psalm, Marcello. Liturgical chorus, Müller-Hartung. Three numbers of Russian church music. Organ pieces by Bach and Thomas.

B.—SINGACADEMIE.

“Messiah,” “Judas Maccabæus,” Händel.

5.—THEATRE.

(The figures refer to the number of performances of each opera.)

“Masaniello,” (5) Auber; “Fidelio,” (3) Beethoven; the Montecchi e Capuletti, “Norma,” (2) Bellini; “Jean de Paris,” Boieldieu; “Daughter of the Regiment,” Donizetti; “Die Dorfsängerinnen,” Floravanti; “Murtha,” (2) Flotow; “The Jewess,” (2) Halévy; “Lara,” (10)† Maillart; “Joseph,” Méhul; “Robert der Teufel,” (4) Meyerbeer; “Don Juan,” (3) “Figaro,” (5) “Schauspieldirector,” (4) “Zauberflote,” (4) Mozart; “Merry Wives of Windsor,” (3) Nicolai; “Meister Fortunio und sein Liebeslied,” (2) “Die Verlobung bei der Laterne,” (5) Offenbach; “Barber of Seville,” (4) “Tell,” (2) Rossini; “Der Dorfbarbier,” Schenk; “Prinz Eugen,” Schmidt (Gustav); “Flotte Burschen,” (8) Von Suppé; “Trovatore,” (2) Verdi; “Der Fälschler,” (3) Weber.

Speaking of Leipzig, here is a pleasant bit of news, which we copy from the Transcript:

BOSTON MUSICAL STUDENTS IN LEIPZIG.—Our city has for many years been always represented by one or more students in the famous Leipzig Conservatorium, and with credit. At the second examination, or “Hauptprüfung,” on the 27th of April, the highest honors in piano-forte playing were borne off by a Boston boy, Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, son of our well-known teacher; or at least they were only shared with him by a young Englishman. The Leipzig Telegraph says: “In Mr. Petersilea (who played the first movement of a Concerto by Henselt) we made the acquaintance of a pianist who in technical respects decidedly bore off the victory. This Concerto by Henselt is so full of colossal difficulties that it might be considered hardly a fit piece to be undertaken by a pupil”—indeed we learn that Prof. Moscheles was strongly opposed to the selection until he heard Petersilea play it.—“But P. overcame the difficulties with a certainty and a precision which almost raised a doubt about the ‘pupil.’”

Another paper says: “The most conspicuous achievement in piano-forte playing was that of Mr. Petersilea, and the orchestra were enthusiastically carried away in accompanying the admirable composition by Henselt.”

We add the opinion of the musical journal which was founded by Schumann, the Neue Zeitschrift:—“In excellent technical finish and brilliancy the playing of Messrs. Petersilea and Allison (from England) was distinguished. The former executed his task not without fiery impetus, and the latter (in Chopin's F minor Concerto) with tender shading. The two renderings unquestionably belonged to the most interesting of the evening, and we must emphasize especially the choice of the beautiful Concerto of Henselt, so full of soul and feeling, as a very happy and an edifying one.”

On the fourth day of examinations, May 4th, another young pianist, who formerly lived in Boston, but more recently in Sandusky, Ohio, J. ERNST PERABO, distinguished himself (according to the authority last quoted) by his “finely finished and soulful rendering of the Barcarole and Finale of Norbert Burgmüller's F-sharp minor Concerto.”

Not a few of our readers who have watched with interest the artistic promise of these young men, will be gratified by these extracts.

Cherubini's Medea is the most important novelty announced for production this summer at Her Majesty's Theatre. The son and grandson of Cherubini are in London, to witness their father's and grandfather's opera.

THE ABBÉ LISZT. Mr. Chorley, in the Album, thus touches, truly, we doubt not, the secret of Liszt's great disappointment with the world, which, when we consider also that he was always a romantic, restless genius, eager to try every strange sensation, and still to make a new sensation, leaves it not so unnatural that he should have drifted into the snug harbor of the monks at Rome. The cunning priests will see that he is well off. How tenderly they will care for him! What roses will they not weave into his chains till they weigh lightly as silk upon him! To what heavenly uses will they not flatteringly employ his talent! Why does not the Pope send him as a miraculous piano-playing propagandist to America? But for the extract from Chorley:

As a creative artist Dr. Liszt must have felt his life to have been a failure, and may therefore be not unwilling to retire from further feverish struggle after the unattainable. He has carried it with a high hand, supported by his transcendental powers as a poetical executant, the like of which, we conceive, have never been approached; but twenty years of ceaseless production of works on the most ambitious scale, under the encouragement of a congregation of devoted patrons, friends and believers, have not yielded one solitary composition which has laid hold on the world.

Further information of the Abbé—not the "Abbot"—is found in the Orchestra:

Abbot Francisus Liszt has fallen on his monastic feet. He will perform his first mass at Whitsuntide. His nomination to the canonicate of St. Peter is spoken of, as also his probable nomination as chapel master to Pius IX. It was during a visit to Liszt's apartments, that the Pope, who found the Abbot playing, recorded his special permission that he should keep on at it.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 24, 1865.

The Musical Festival. (Concluded.)

IX. "THE MESSIAH."

The ninth and last of the great series of concerts—fifth of the Oratorios, counting the "Hymn of Praise"—came on Sunday evening, May 28, crowning a glorious week with a performance of Handel's "Messiah." The crowd of listeners was again immense. There is not much that need be said of so familiar an oratorio—a work which the Handel and Haydn Society have probably performed several times every year during the whole half century of its existence which it was the object of this Festival to celebrate. Of course it derived new interest from the occasion, from the great mass and volume of the chorus (over 700 voices); and more especially did that splendid orchestra, with such a mass of stringed instruments, lend fresh life and interest to the old work by bringing out the quaint Handelian figures of the accompaniment in such strong outline, with such hearty breadth and positiveness; and the bassoons (pardon another allusion to them—our long privation of them must excuse it) were richly welcome in such passages as "O thou that tellest."

The performance was on the whole a very successful one, although the voices naturally showed signs of fatigue after so hard a week's work. Many of the choruses, especially such as the "Wonderful" chorus and the "Hallelujah," went more grandly than ever, the latter drawing the largest part of the audience upon their feet—which was very well so far as it was done spontaneously and not by the constraint of custom or example, simply because it is the traditional way in England. The chorus "All we like sheep" was too hurried for the careless image it suggests; nor was the profound feeling and beauty of "Surely" and "With his stripes all we are healed" expressed so clearly and palpably as it might have been. There were one or two other slightly blurred passages, but not enough to seriously weaken or mar the general effect of a really noble choral rendering.

The solo airs and recitatives were undertaken by Miss BRAINERD, Mrs. KEMPTON, Mr. FARLEY and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, all doing their best in music that demands the best, and for the most part successfully, if we except the tenor, who plainly has never yet been fairly naturalized in the serene, high element of Oratorio, and whose pleasing voice has learned its clever ways of the Italian operatic singers. This time, however, he was more careful than in "Elijah," and cheerfully complying with the Conductor's hints did not take liberties with his text to show off his high notes. Mr. Rudolphsen has acquired rare evenness and aplomb in rolling out the long roulades of Handel's bass songs, and indeed all his part was unexceptionable. Miss Brainerd made her best impression in the soprano airs of this oratorio; it was a careful and well studied rendering, fluent and finished, albeit lacking inspiration as well as fresh vitality of tone. Mrs. KEMPTON took great pains to sing with fervor, and in the contralto airs won plentiful applause. Her voice is rich, her execution fine; but we could not help feeling that she overdid the matter of lacrymose expression in "He was despised;" and generally the emotion, the "pathos" of her strain is too much after the unquiet modern Italian manner. It is in the most simple and chaste rendering that you feel the melody of Handel; of course the singer too must feel it, and we most trust the singer's feeling in the simplest rendering.

So ended the great Festival. That it was a gratifying, an inspiring success, artistically, socially, and even financially (for, although it has cost more than $17,000, it leaves a balance of $4,000 to be divided between the two great War charities and the Society's own fund for further musical usefulness);—that it is a just theme of pride for Boston, and most creditable to the old Society (which seems to have rejuvenated itself in this effort), to its devoted officers, to the enthusiastic, able, indefatigable Conductor, the skillful organist, the admirably selected, numerous Orchestra, who did so much great work so well with small time for rehearsal, and did it, too, with all their heart, and all the volunteers and regulars who went so heartily into the chorus work, in short, to all concerned;—that it has given a new impulse to the cause of noble Music in this country and the best assurance of more and better Festivals to come,—is the very least that we can say of it, although in saying it, and in thus echoing the general feeling, we would by no means imply that it has left no room for improvement.

There are scores of individuals to whom we would severally give credit for a great work so admirably planned and carried through, even to the marshalling and seating of the vocal army and the attentive courtesy to each member on the part of the vigilant Chorus superintendents (Corps commanders) to whom this care was intrusted. The words of the Daily Advertiser must serve our purpose here:

One word of gratitude to those who began it and made it what it was. First came the President and Directory of the Handel and Haydn Society, with their Secretary, who has proved an executive of thorough ability and affability; then the hundreds of semi-professional and amateur vocalists who gave their time and strength to the study of the choruses; and then the faithful, enthusiastic, energetic Mr. Zerrahn, together with Mr. Lang, quiet, retiring, but a master of the organ and piano,—the one strong to direct, the other ever able to lead and sustain, the hundreds of individualities which were as chaos without such control and help. These brought out from an idea a "marvellous work," and to their reinforcement came the men of means with their proffer of moneys against any emergency, which again the great public had provided for its liberal and remunerative patronage. And as we leave the Festival to take its own place in the records of time, let us not forget the pleasant, patient Superintendent Peck, who has been impartial to all applicants for places, nor Mr. Whittle, who has had a troublesome post at the door during the rehearsals, and whose courtesy has not failed those whose entrance it was his duty to bar any more than it has seemed his gratification to throw open his portal for the participant or the privileged. Such places are too often poorly filled, and when they are well occupied the public service of their holders deserves a public recognition.

We have but briefly chronicled the daily progress of the Festival. Still more briefly must we weigh results and read the lesson.

It has been a success, we say, and so say, so feel all (except one or two carping fault-finders, not "critics," in New York, who seem to hate the sight or sound of any good that cometh out of Nazareth). The Handel and Haydn Society and all participants are naturally elated and very happy in a success so far beyond their sanguine expectations. They have a right to feel so. And yet no one presumes to say the thing was perfect. Inevitably, under the circumstances, there were, there must have been short-comings. These, of course, become more obvious on reflection as the first flush of enthusiasm fades away, and as we begin to measure all by the ideal and not by a merely comparative, external standard. No one is more conscious of this—sooner or later at least—than the earnest heads and managers of the undertaking. They are justly proud of what they have achieved; they take hope from it; they also have learned lessons by it, which, or some, the principal, of which, are doubtless precisely of the same tenor as the few comments we are about to make.

A great success there was; but what success?

1. We think it will be agreed that the success was more one of quantity than of quality (not that there was not something to be proud of in the latter respect), in point of execution. The effects realized were more those of mass and grandeur, than of fineness, delicate and subtle distribution of light and shade; more of spirit and momentum, military energy and unanimity in great mass movements and manœuvres, than of poetic fusion and subdued blending of all the individualities in an exquisite, expressive whole. As we have before said, there was seldom, if ever, a pianissimo, to vary and relieve the sweeping and triumphant charges of the seven hundred voices; and what effect so beautiful, so wonderful as the pianissimo of a great host of voices; the breadth of such a softly swelling, murmured mass of tone conveys even more of power and of sublimity than the loudest thunder of the cataract. The Conductor knew this; but it was not easy, in those new circumstances, before each singer had begun to feel himself at home, and feel the others with him in those strange seats, so many of them and so far apart, to persuade each that his or her single voice was audible, was any voice at all, unless he made the most of it and gave it out with full force. Singers have to learn to trust themselves on such occasions, and to dare to sing softly, losing and finding themselves in the collective beautiful effect.

The same, too, with the orchestral performances. Those great Symphonies and Overtures were given with spirit and power, with a massive breadth of tone extremely satisfying to an ear long disused to it; but the finer accent in each little phrase of whatsoever instrument, the poetic light and shade, the real gradual crescendo, &c., the delicate, warm, finely sympathetic transcript of the composer's thought and mood, was too frequently lost sight of in the pleasurable momentum and extemporized esprit de corps with which the thing was so vigorously carried through. There was effect, to be sure, a quite exciting, sometimes thrilling, grand effect. The great thoughts of Beethoven and the other masters were deeply, strongly felt; there was no mistaking the men, no denying their quickening magnetic presence. But it is idle to suppose that the best was realized that could have been out of that splendid material. It was quick, strong, confident, decided military leadership, rather than the fine musical instinct, that impressed itself upon the spirited movement of those hundred instruments. Here, as with the chorus work, in all that is required of spirit, executive force, bold, impetuous momentum, there was no lack; but the pervading finer soul, the subtle imaginative kinship of interpreter with author, however obvious in individuals, was not felt in the whole. Of course, we do not say this of every piece performed. And it behoves us to make full allowance for the situation and the necessities which it involved. Such an orchestra could only be assembled for the brief week filled by the Festival itself; there were no peaceful intermissions, scarcely, for rehearsal; the musicianship of the men, the familiarity (to them) of the masterworks to be performed, the brain and nerve and hand of the conductor, the inspiration of the occasion, were the guarantees of each successful launch and coming into port. Yet here for once we had the material; such an opportunity might never come again; who could help a certain greed to crowd that little week with all the Symphonies and orchestral creations possible to hear on such a scale? It was at least excusable, the willingness to sacrifice something on the score of nicest quality of rendering to glorious quantity and representative variety. We do not live in Berlin, Leipzig, London, Paris, nor even in New York, where all the elements are always within call and assimilated, tempered to each other.

While on the subject of execution, we may merely allude again to the solo-singing, which all know was the weak point of the Festival, although in our review we have specified much that was satisfactory. It is enough to say that the time was unfavorable for the collecting of great vocal talent in this country. The management did the best that could be done; the only wonder was that they made out so well. Here, again, hurry, want of time for consultation and rehearsal, allowed tares to creep in with the wheat in the selections of vocal miscellany for the afternoon Concerts. And for the sake of this explanation we have reserved till now what should properly have been our first point:

2. The Programmes. The only disturbing elements in the nine programmes, which had better have been flung out entirely, were the hacknied Italian opera show-pieces already referred to, (the things from Traviata, Favorita, "Ah non fili!" "Venano Waltz," &c.) and one or two noisy orchestral effect pieces, full of brass and only edifying when heard out of doors. The former we will dispose of at the outset by suggesting whether we have not learned this among other lessons by the Festival: That in dealing with solo singers, in the making up of programmes, the choice of pieces must not be left to the singer's own vanity, or indolence, or ignorant unconcern whether his or her pet piece and patent reaper of applause will make or mar the harmony of the whole programme; but it must be controlled by the Conductor, or by the management, at all events by the one mind that ought to shine through the whole work. In Germany—perhaps not in England—the Conductor is responsible for what is sung, and it is for him to say if wrong company creeping in by a back window shall be tolerated. We have not yet reached the point where our Conductors may take so much upon them; we rather fancy that we shall have reached it by the time of the next festival.

Judging by the quantity and variety of good music, the number of really great works produced—works great intrinsically and requiring such great means as were assembled to produce them—the programme of that week was exceedingly rich. Four such Oratorios, the "Hymn of Praise," four such symphonies, several of the overtures: the time was when to each of us it was an event of his life to hear either of them. It was in the main, too, quite a representative variety; the greatest and best of Handel, of Haydn, of Mendelssohn, of Beethoven, of Schubert, were given; the best overture of Rossini; the best probably of Liszt's still problematical Symphonic adventures, Les Preludes, which was well enough in a representative light to gratify curiosity; and the best exhibition thus far of the purely musical part of Wagner, the Tannhäuser overture. But we must again remark in this connection the very strange omission of anything whatever bearing the name of Mozart, one of whose symphonies or even overtures would have well justified the omission of half a dozen noisier modern things. And above all, it must be owned that a great Festival of sacred music at this day, lacks the full height of aspiration, and fails to set the extra mark on the occasion, when it makes no effort, manifests no wish to make at least the beginning of any acquaintance with Sebastian Bach. A fair performance and appreciation, or at least impression of the Passion music, or of only one of his hundreds of Cantatas or Motets, would have brought us into the direction of the world's real musical progress at this day. No other novelty could we so ill afford to still renounce and fast from. Such a Festival writes itself below full character, not quite up to the musical tide-mark of to-day, so long as it can ignore Bach.

It is not enough, either, to have things of unquestionable merit; the programme, to have piquancy, and to mark progress, should offer points of rarity and novelty. Such points in our Festival were "Israel in Egypt" and the Schubert Symphony. A realizing impression of these works would be points gained to our musical culture and experience. The advanced taste here cared most for those two works, because never more than half admitted to them hitherto, while their importance was vouched for by all good authorities. It was particularly unfortunate, therefore, that "Israel" was curtailed in the manner that we have related, and that great work still remains half understood among us to be the point of ambition for some other Festival, putting Bach off perhaps still longer. For all these things are only questions of time; we must come to them.

It may be a question whether our programme was not too ambitious—in quantity, not in height of aspiration; whether we did not attempt too much in a single week. It is certain that the Festivals in Germany, where musical feeling, tact and wisdom are to be sought for rather than in England, seldom if ever last more than three days, and seldom load those days with such a mountainous outlay of work. "Enough is as good as a feast," is rather the rule there, and to make that feast choice, ingeniously rare and delicate and appetizing, rather than to pile Ossa upon Pelion. Often they content themselves with one great Oratorio, and for the rest a choice variety of pieces of more moderate length, so put together and related to each other as to make the programme one delightful whole, neither distracting nor fatiguing, and each piece served as nicely and tastefully as possible. The composition of the programme is itself a work of art, for the Conductor, or a truly musical Committee. In England, at Birmingham, &c., they have long and crowded programmes. In weight and excellence of matter, this Festival of ours may compare well with any of them; our mixed vocal and instrumental concerts only sinned in the same respect (the Italian fashionable element), and in a less degree, while for the four great Symphonies the Birmingham Festival which we attended offered not a single one. "Israel," however, and Beethoven's mighty Mass in D were given there in all their glory. Let us, at least, study choiceness, fitness, things that quicken and that make for progress, rather than overwhelming aggregates.

3. While we may comparatively with all attempted thus far in this country, and to some extent in England, boast our Festival a great success, let us be cautious how we rush to rash conclusions about having placed ourselves musically in the front rank of the world by this brave enterprise. In the enthusiasm of after-dinner mutual congratulations this may be all natural enough, but it will not bear the test of sober reflection. Better believe that neither have we yet the orchestra, nor the chorus, nor the solo singers, nor the controlling and directing musical mind and taste, nor the informed, exacting public, nor the ripeness of musical history and culture, to enable us to compete, save at a humble distance, with what can be done in Europe. That we are exceedingly well pleased with our achievement may be because we know no better. In point of magnitude, the scale and proportions of our Festival, we have gone as far as we need ever wish to go; but in point of perfection, all-pervading taste and fitness, there is much left to labor for. And it is well that it is so. The Festival has done a great work if it has given us the impulse in the right direction.

4. And this it has done. It has proved the feasibility of Festivals in this country. It has shown that we have the capacity. It has consolidated into a week the best experience of an ordinary year of music, and kept thousands of people within the charmed atmosphere until they have felt and loved great music as they never did before, and henceforth they will evermore demand it. The rest of the lesson we may return to occasionally.

AFTER THE FESTIVAL.—SOCIAL REUNION.—

The ladies and gentlemen composing the Festival Chorus of the Handel & Haydn Society had a pleasant reunion in the Music Hall on Wednesday evening, 14th inst. It was mainly designed, we believe, as a complimentary acknowledgement to the ladies who had taken so zealous and so creditable a part in the Oratorios. But it was also made the occasion of several well merited presentations. To Mr. LORING B. BARNES, the efficient Secretary of the Society, who had been as it were the chief engineer of the great enterprise, was presented a silver tea-set of five pieces; to CARL ZERRAHN, a silver ice-pitcher and salver, and also (on behalf of the ladies of the chorus, through Mrs. Dupree) a pair of gold-lined goblets; Mr. B. J. LANG was the recipient of a gold guard chain. There was dancing, to music by Gilmore's orchestra, and a supper provided by J. B. Smith, and the festivities were kept up with great zest until past midnight. The Transcript says:

The presentation proceedings incident to the occasion were most happily arranged and fulfilled.—Dr. J. B. Upham, the President of the Society, occupying the post of chairman. Gen. Oliver assumed the office of presentation to Mr. Barnes, and his remarks were replete with characteristic humor and bluntness and good-naturedly pointed allusion. Judge Putnam did the same service for Mr. Zerrahn, and his speech was, as usual, elegant and felicitous. To Mr. F. H. Underwood was allotted the address to Mr. Lang, and very happily, and with much musical and poetic suggestion he acquitted himself.

The several replies to these little addresses were in capital taste, and expressed all that could rightly be said under the natural embarrassment in which the gentlemen were placed. It is almost needless to add that the company present heartily applauded each recipient, and evinced their favor and sympathy with these well merited rewards for duties performed. And the general public who attended the festival or had any connection with its well-planned and executed arrangements, and are observant of its valuable and encouraging results, will most emphatically acquiesce in the propriety of the gifts.

We are sorry that we cannot furnish a report of all three of the little presentation speeches; fortunately we can furnish a copy of Mr. Underwood's remarks, which were as follows:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Festival Chorus:

The gentlemen who have preceded me have given well merited honor to the choir and its conductor, and have recognized the energy, foresight and indomitable perseverance with which the business of the Society has been conducted. Let me add my humble tribute! Let me rejoice with you that your affairs are so ably administered!—that your prosperity is as ample as it is deserved! Let me also repeat the hearty commendations which every lover of music has bestowed upon the great choir. For the first time in this country the chorus has risen to its true position in the oratorio: for the first time it has absorbed the attention of eager listeners, and has made the best efforts of solo voices, no matter how richly ornamented, appear tame and of little worth, except as affording a temporary relief from an almost oppressive grandeur. For the first time we have learned the electrical power of numbers,—have felt around the great circle of human hearts, the thrill, the ecstasy, the awe, and perhaps the glad tears which have started at the sweep of that baton, while the mighty surges of sound from voices, instruments and colossal pipes rose and swelled around this stately pile.

But do we fully comprehend the grand, the overpowering effect of this majestic Organ upon such great occasions? Do we acknowledge, what is true, that without this broad and solid foundation our success would have been only of a moderate sort? Have we thought of its slow but omnipotent influence upon the popular taste? In its presence how is littleness rebuked, and prettiness abashed, and the commonplace made odious! In its symmetry, variety, its exquisite and complementary qualities of tone it reminds us of nothing less than the ever changing, the old, the eternally new phases of Nature itself:—whose simple beauty the prattling child may enjoy, and yet whose endless resources for combination the loftiest minds can only wonder at. But how shall I fitly describe the sensations I have felt, sir, as it has been my privilege to hear this wonderful instrument? What words will come, winged and plumed from the blue empyrean, at my call! For music begins where speech ends; and only in the great hereafter can we hope fully to know, to feel, to express this glorious passion, of which the Creator has given us so blissful a foretaste!

I seem now to sit, as I have done many an hour, at the foot of the Apollo opposite while some artist has reverently addressed himself to evoke its powers. I look upon those bold towers, the rich sculpture, the carved symbols of strength and beauty, and my soul rises to the exalted mood that Music requires of her votaries. Then comes the prelude.

Over his keys the musing organist,
Beginning doubtfully and far away,
First lets his fingers wander as they list,
And builds a bridge from dreamland for his lay.
Then as the touch of his loved instrument
Gives hope and fervor, nearer draws his theme,
First guessed by faint auroral flashes sent Across the wavering vista of his dream.

Then for the theme. How shall I portray it so well as in the words of the same graceful poet:

Then swelled the organ: up thro' choir and nave
The music trembled with an inward thrill
Of bliss at its own grandeur: wave on wave
Its flood of mellow thunder rose, until
The hushed air shivered with the throb it gave Then poised for a moment it stood still
And sank and rose again, to burst in spray
That wandered into silence far away.

Need I say more, ladies and gentlemen, to recall to your minds the gentleman whose taste, good judgment, and experience have been so conspicuous at our recent Festival. If ever we have faltered we know who was firm. When the direction came: Lead boldly, we know what gigantic throats took up the theme. We know who covered our errors, supported our weakness, crowned our strength, and led us in our exultation. Shall I point to him? No, rather let it be my grateful task, Mr. Lang, to offer to you in the name of the chorus this slight testimonial. Your part in the Festival will not be forgotten.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The adjourned annual meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society was held in Bumstead Hall last evening, the president, Dr. J. B. Upham, in the chair. The treasurer's report was submitted and accepted. The total receipts during the past year amounted to $1332.01; expenditures $989.31; leaving a balance in the treasurer's hands of $342.70. The annual report of the librarian, George H. Chickering, Esq., was submitted. From the report it appears that the library now contains 2183 vocal parts, 473 vocal scores, 649 pianoforte and vocal scores, 1 orchestral score, and 193 separate orchestral parts. The sum of $1050 has been invested mainly in the purchase of music for the recent Festival, and $215.56 has been expended for general music, during the year. The report was accepted and ordered to be placed on file. The secretary, Loring B. Barnes, Esq., reported that there had been admitted during the year twenty-four new members; one had resigned his position, and none have been expelled. Death had removed three of the most active members,—Messrs. John F. Payson, John H. Pray, James Dyer. Geo. W. Palmer, Esq., one of the trustees, presented a report on the "Festival Fund." The whole amount received on that occasion was $21,180, and there was left a balance over and above expenses of about $4000. Dr. Upham, the president, submitted an elaborate report, which contained many valuable suggestions whereby the society might improve itself; also a brief and interesting sketch of the rise and progress of musical festivals. Dr. Upham congratulated the society on the complete success of the recent festival, and spoke of the good will which would result from it, on the part of the kindred societies in other cities. In connection with this, communications were read from the New York Harmonic Society and the Handel and Haydn Society of Philadelphia. The report was accepted and adopted by the society, and one thousand copies ordered to be printed for the benefit of the members. The society then proceeded to ballot for officers for the ensuing year, with the following result:

President, Dr. J. Baxter Upham; Vice-President, Oren J. Faxon; Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Matthew S. Parker; Librarian, George H. Chickering; Trustees, Edward Faxon, George Fisher, George W. Palmer, J. S. Sawyer, Charles H. Johnson, Frank N. Scott, O. Frank Clark, George Hewa.

On the board of trustees the first four gentlemen elected were from the old board. A vote of thanks was tendered to the retiring trustees,—Messrs. Isaac Woodwell, S. L. Thorndike, George P. Carter, and W. O. Perkins, and the meeting was dissolved.

The above report is from the Advertiser of June 17. We would gladly have found room for the Reports of President, Secretary, &c., but must leave that to a less crowded time.

LIFE OF MENDELSSOHN.—In spite of frequent notices of Dr. Carl Mendelssohn being engaged in writing a biography of his father, the composer, that desirable consummation seems to be as far off as ever. The short, but interesting Life by Lampadius, recently published here by Leyboldt, is still the best, the only life of real value. In a letter to the Transcript, written from Cologne, by Rev. W. L. Gage, the translator of Lampadius, we find the following:

Prof. Mendelssohn has been very hospitable, and at his house I have had the pleasure of meeting much of the best society of Bonn. Prince Alfred of England, the second son of Victoria, is studying here, and is often met—a fine, genial and accessible young man, not ashamed to snuff a candle with his fingers if no better instrument is at hand. Mrs. Klingemann, the widow of Mendelssohn's dear friend Carl Klingemann, formerly of London, often referred to in the "Letters" and the author of the words which accompany many of Mendelssohn's songs, also lives here, a thoroughly excellent, cultivated and gentle lady. Her husband died two years ago. She has in her possession many of Mendelssohn's letters, and both she and Prof. M. assure me that they consider the critical severity of the ordeal which the printed letters underwent at the hands of the brother Paul, before they were allowed to be inserted, was reprehensibly great. All traces of the delightful family relations were omitted, and as Prof. Mendelssohn rightly said, instead of knowing that his cousin Felix was most happy with his wife and children, the reader would hardly know that he had a wife. With the exception of the brief life written by Lampadius and recently published by Mr. Leyboldt of Philadelphia, there exists no biography of Mendelssohn, nor is there any in preparation or contemplation; in fact, the biography is wanting. The son (who is privat dozent in Heidelberg) is not musical, neither is his cousin, Prof. M. of Bonn. Mrs. Klingemann does not feel herself equal to the task. Her husband, who would so well have executed it, is dead. Hiller is too much engaged; the brother is absorbed in his banking business. Besides these one knows not where to look to find one who thoroughly knew the great composer and yet has the ability and the leisure to execute the task. Meantime a good life is much wanted; and Messrs. Smith & Elder of London wish me to keep the subject before his friends in order that the English at least might enjoy a view taken from an external point, objective, instead of subjective, of this most interesting and remarkable man.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

In peace again. Song of Peace. J. W. Turner. 30
Mr. T. very happily seizes the rapidly following incidents of these wonderful days, and has a song ready for each. Ends with a chorus.

The evening hour. (Am feierabend). F. Schubert. 40
Another of the "Maid of the Mill" series. A simple-hearted, pretty song.

He's got his discharge from the army. A companion to "Grafted into the army."

W. A. Field. 10

Poor Jimmy, who was "grafted" some years since, has "grown" to be a sturdy soldier, and has come back from "Alybarny" and the other places, safe and sound, to rejoice the "poor widow's" heart. An easy, taking song.

O, were I now thy loving wife! (O wär ich schon mit dir verient). Fidelio. 50

The song of the prison-keeper's daughter, and very pleasing from its simple style, as well as from the fine music.

Thou who searchest the depths of the heart. (Dio che leggi in fondo all' Alma). Petrella. 75

Of the character of the greater opera pieces. Long and difficult, but more worthy of practice on that account, as one rises by such practice nearer to the higher ranks of vocalists.

Instrumental.

Opera house waltz. Mad. Pattiani. 30
Quite brilliant. In five and six flats.

Cavalry Sheridan. Galop. A. Birgfeld. 40
Spirited. Has a portrait of the hero, on his lonely ride from Winchester to the front.

Nocturne. F minor, No. 1. Op. 55. Chopin. 50
E flat major, "2." 35

Romantic Polka. Lion Spier. 35
The name indicates a slight departure from the usual polka style. Pretty.

Coronation, or Leap Year Waltzes. Strauss. 40

It is safe to class this among the very best of Strauss's sets of waltzes. With a due share of brilliancy, it contains more gentle beauty than the average of his compositions. If you intend to buy three sets of his waltzes, make this one of them.

The "last ditch" polka. 30
One more joke on poor Jeff, who is depicted as a rat in a crinoline cage, and that in a dungeon, and that alongside the "ditch" of Fortrose Monroe. Music good.

The Wind Demon. Rhapsodie Characteristique. C. G. Hopkins. 75

A furious piece, full of storm and thunder. Sure to please in concert, since there is nothing like a tornado to "bring down the house."

See the conquering hero comes. Transcription. Kuke. 60

The old song, very skillfully transcribed, and makes a massive and showy piece for exhibitions. Not difficult for those who play chords easily.

Books.

GEMS OF GERMAN SONG. A collection of the most beautiful vocal compositions of the German masters. Cl. 3.00, full gilt 4.00, plain 2.50

It is a gratification to announce the advent of another very valuable work. We have here nearly a hundred of the best German songs, all carefully translated, nearly all with both languages affixed. The variety of style is great. Add it at once to the little pile of books on your piano. A lady who owns this, with perhaps the Operatic Pearls, Silver Chord, and Shower of Pearls, possesses just about the best collection of song music in the world.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 633.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 8.

Musical Festival at Cologne.

THE REPORT OF A FRENCHMAN.

[We translate from the Revue et Gazette Musicale the following account of the Lower-Rhine Festival which occurred in the first week of June. It will furnish some good points of comparison and contrast with our late Festival in Boston; and for this purpose the report, clearly a fair one, on an outsider is better, perhaps, than one taken from a German paper].

Cologne, June 7, 1865.

The Musical Festival which has just come off in this city lasted three days. It was very brilliant, and drew crowds from all the neighboring countries. I speak not only of other cities of Rhenish Prussia, of Düsseldorf, Aix-la-Chapelle, Coblenz, Trèves, Bonn, Münster, &c., but of Brunswick, of Wiebaden, of Frankfort, of Mayence. Belgium, too, furnished its contingent, a very considerable one, of curious visitors. France itself was pretty largely represented, thanks to an excursion train at reduced prices, organized by the powerful Company of the North. For four days, the streets of Cologne, too narrow always for the most part, offered a crowded and a lively spectacle only to be compared to what we see in Paris during great national fêtes.

The Gurzenich concert hall is admirably fine and shames Paris, which possesses nothing like it. Twelve hundred auditors are there seated very much at ease and can circulate about very conveniently. This point is more important than it seems; one has but an imperfect enjoyment of music when one breathes badly, and when the body is for several hours condemned to immobility in a constrained position. The constraint and physical pain resulting from it in the long run singularly diminish the intellectual pleasure which you came to seek, and sometimes ends by annihilating it. One end of the hall, occupied by a platform, whence rise immense galleries, was reserved for the performers. On the 4th, 5th and 6th of June, you counted there 600 chorus singers and 180 instrumentists. In the middle front there was erected a sort of tribune, from which the chief of those harmonious phalanxes directed their movements and communicated to them the fire with which he was animated himself. This chief—you know him, doubtless—is M. FERDINAND HILLER, whose talent Paris formerly applauded as pianist, and who afterwards conducted, for a year, under Mr. Lumley's management, the orchestra of our Théâtre-Italien.

Hiller is now Kapellmeister of the city of Cologne. It is an honorable position, and a sufficiently lucrative one, if I am well informed. There he enjoys a consideration which he owes to his character as well as to his talent. He is a learned musician, a man of convictions, conscientious, who takes seriously all that he does. During these three days, very laborious days for him, I do assure you, he has not had a single moment of yielding to fatigue or negligence. And yet by how many rehearsals had not these three days of public performance been preceded! The choruses—to speak only of them—had been rehearsed, I am told, nearly thirty times. And yet you count among them none who are not musicians, more or less ready readers. It is not in Germany that you meet singers by instinct, what the Italians call orecchianti (who sing by ear). But, if they come sufficiently prepared by previous studies, they have a respect for Art, a feeling of the Beautiful, a lively desire to approach as nearly as possible to perfection. No difficulty rebuffs them; no labor can wear out their patience.

These choirs are composed exclusively of amateurs. But they must not be confounded with our choral societies in France, where we see only working people. All classes of the bourgeoisie of Cologne and of the neighboring cities are represented in them, including the wealthiest families. They hold it an honor to take part in the execution of a great musical work. They take extreme pleasure in it, and no one likes to deprive himself of that pleasure. All those young men in black coats and white gloves, all those elegant and fresh young girls who sang upon the platform, saw at a distance, in the hall, their relations, who had paid a pretty high price for their places. You can hardly imagine the beautiful sonority produced by the re-union of those young and pure voices, nor the accuracy of their intonation, nor their ensemble, nor the precision of their manoeuvres, nor the infinite variety of their finer shadings, nor the tenuity of their pianissimo, nor the power of their crescendos and their fortes. It was marvellous. I ought to say, however, that the feminine part of this admirable choir appeared to me very superior to the masculine. The tenors had some moments of hesitation, and gave here and there slight signs of feebleness. The basses lacked force in the grave passages; once more I remarked this singular phenomenon, now common to almost all Europe: There are no longer any deep voices; and when the contrapuntal evolutions carried the bass part below B, it disappeared. On the other hand, the contraltos had a superb energy, and the sopranos [the Rhine is famous for its soprano voices.—T.R.], which never once screamed nor shouted, even in the most exciting passages demanding the greatest force, had a timbre at once brilliant and velvety, a sonority sweet and penetrating, which captivated the hearer in spite of himself, and caused all his soul to vibrate. Thus must the angels sing.

[Opening the London Musical World, this moment brought in, we are saved the trouble of completing our translation, since it is all done there, better, no doubt, than we could do it.]

The orchestra consisted of the musicians of the place, with a reinforcement from the neighboring towns. To these were added some few amateurs. The wind instruments were not, at times, all that might have been desired, but the violins and double basses displayed an amount of spirit, precision, brilliancy, and power, which must be unconditionally praised. Every one was struck by their skill in the accompaniment, by the delicacy of their piano, and by their nice touches of light and shade.

The programme on the first day contained only two works: the overture to Mendelssohn's St. Paul, and the oratorio, with double chorus, of Israel in Egypt, one of Handel's masterpieces. These grand compositions of Handel's, which we never hear in France, are marvels of harmonic science, and characterized by a degree of steadiness and of energy, by a certain sovereign majesty, which astound the imagination. There is a story—told, I think, by Carpani, the author of Haydine—that Haydn, being in London, happened to hear, for the first time in his life, one of Handel's oratorios executed by a considerable number of singers, according to the English fashion. He was astonished, delighted, and quite carried away, exclaiming in his admiration: "There is the master of us all! compared with him we are only so many children!" Haydn really did not say too much, for, on the second day of this Festival, when the second and third parts of The Seasons were performed, they were far, despite all the genius possessed by their author, from producing so grandiose an effect as that of Handel's oratorio.

And yet this effect was not, on the present occasion, as powerful as it ought to have been, because the two choruses were seated on the same platform. They should have been placed at the two opposite ends, or, at least, two opposite sides of the hall; at any rate, they ought to have been placed at a considerable distance from each other, so that the composer's intentions might have been thoroughly and perfectly carried out. Such a result has been achieved, at the Conservatory, in that fine piece by Leising, which is performed there every year. The chorus is left in its usual place, and four soloists are despatched to the top of the steps, where, by singing piano, they appear to be very far off. At Cologne, one of the two choruses might have been located in an upper gallery, running round the hall, at least ten metres from the ground. Perhaps no one thought of this. Perhaps it was not practicable, for I did not examine the galleries. But, whatever the cause, the result is no less to be regretted.

Independently of the two choruses, Israel in Egypt requires five reciting voices, or soloists: a soprano, a contralto, a tenor, and two basses. These five parts, all important, were sustained by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington and Mlle. Pauline Wiesemann (that is to say, the soprano part was divided between two), by Mlle. Francisca Schreck, M. Gustave Walter, M. Jules Stockhausen, and M. Max Staegemann. Mme. Lemmens, whilom Miss Sherrington, sang, if I mistake not, last summer, in Paris. You consequently know her. A pretty woman, with a pretty voice, executing correctly her groups, her scales, and her arpeggios, and, moreover, shaking well. We should have to praise everything about her, if she were less affected, and if the amiable accent of Great Britain were not so apparent in her German. M. Jules Stockhausen is better known among us than even Mme. Lemmens. He was with us, I fancy, several years at the Opera

Comique, where the management hardly turned his talent to the best account. They wanted to make a comic artist of him, and that was not his vocation. He is, at present, Musik-Director at Hamburg, which, I believe, is the proper place for him, since he is not only a first-class executant, and probably the most skilful barytone of the day, but something more; he is, above all things, a great musician, thoroughly acquainted with every branch of his art.—Mlle. Schreck is a concert-singer, residing at Bonn, the country of Beethoven, where she was born. She possesses a very fine contralto. She sings with somewhat austere simplicity, perhaps, but she phrases magisterially, and with remarkable talent for expression. Mlle. Pauline Wisemann has a charming voice, but it is not yet formed; and the prettiest mouth in all the world, but it opens badly. M. G. Walter is a singer from Vienna. His voice is a very fine one, though, perhaps, a little too sombrière, as the worthy Parisian professors of singing say. He sings exceedingly well, as does his colleague, M. Max Staegemann, a bass from the Theatre Royal, Hanover; a good recommendation, for we all know that the King of Hanover is a great lover, and an excellent judge, of music. M. Staegemann valiantly held his own against M. Stockhausen, in a prodigious duet of the First Part: "Der Herr ist der starke Held" (a very weak translation of the English text: "The Lord is a Man of War.")—The music has all the originality and—excuse the word—all the crânerie of the English phrase. Nothing can be more astonishing than the vocal style, as well as the pace and style of the accompaniment. While listening, you feel yourself all over, and ask yourself where you are.—You are with Handel, that is all!—I have neither the time nor the space to speak in detail of every piece. Let it suffice to say that the execution of this grand work was extremely satisfactory.

The programme of the second day was more varied: Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, third part of Schumann's Faust, Beethoven's Symphony in A, second and third part ("Summer" and "Autumn,") of Haydn's Seasons. As a rule, with the exception of certain little defects in the details, resulting, as I have already mentioned, from the weakness of some of the wind instruments, the execution was worthy of those glorious masterpieces which the conscientious Germans approach only with profound respect. They are too well known—except the Faust—for me to say anything about them. I may, however, remark that M. Hiller does at Cologne the same thing M. Georges Hainl now does at the Conservatory: he takes the trio of the third piece so slow as absolutely to transform it into an Andante. This strikes me as exaggerated and affected. I have been told it is the German tradition. That may be, but this languishing pace deprives the piece of its accent and vigor, sensibly diminishing its effect. I say deliberately—though I may raise up against me all Germany from Hamburg to Vienna, and from Aix-la-Chapelle to Königsberg—that I greatly prefer Habeneck's tradition.—We do not yet know Schumann in France. Most of the soloists who have undertaken, during the last few years, to import his works among us have played scarcely any but the later ones, which are not the best. Towards the end of his career, when he was fatigued, melancholy, discouraged, and already, perhaps, laboring under the mental malady to which he fell a victim, he often wrote what M. Wagner's friends have entitled: "The Music of the Future," that is to say, music without ideas. Quite recently Madame Szarvady introduced to our notice a very different Schumann: a Schumann both accomplished and inspired. The Concerto in A major which she played at her last concert is a most valuable work. The Faust which we heard at Cologne, and which is often heard in Germany, teems with original ideas and harmonic combinations, exceedingly remarkable, but never eccentric; it is exceedingly melodious; skilfully adapted for the voice as well as for the orchestra; and animated with a very powerful vein of poetry. M. Padeloup, whom I met at Cologne, and who had come on purpose to attend the Festival, will, I feel sure, see that something is to be made out of it.

The third day was for the soloists. However, a Symphony by M. Hiller was performed. It contains a great deal of science and talent, especially the Third Part, a very original and piquant Scherzo. The overture to La Flûte Enchantée was given less rapidly than at the Théâtre-Lyrique, and consequently with more crispness and accent. It produced a deep impression, as deep I think as that of Oberon, which terminated the concert. I need not speak of the solo-singers; but I cannot terminate this article, already too long, without proclaiming the success of Madame Szarvady, a success fairly earned by her magisterial execution, her noble style, and her powerful energy, which detracts nothing from her marvellously delicate finish, from her fiery spirit, always, however, contained within due bounds; in a word, from her accent, as well as from the depth of her expression when the harmony grows overcast, and the melody impassioned. It was in Beethoven's G major Concerto that she displayed all these qualities which it is so rare to see combined. She was, however—for we must tell the whole truth—admirably assisted, firstly by the band who accompanied her with incomparable intelligence and tact, and then by her piano, a magnificent instrument from the factories of MM. Pleyel and Wolff. Brilliantly, yet sweetly sonorous, and capable of every gradation of expression under a skilful hand, it satisfied all the caprices of the virtuosa, and was never once at fault. The hall is twice as spacious, in length, at least, as the salle of our Opera, and yet, even at the end, nothing was lost. Pleyel's pianos always possessed the advantage of being so solid as to be almost indestructible, and of possessing a vigorous tone, united to a very prolonged vibration. But the upper octave was deficient in brilliancy, and the keyboard stiff. Thanks to the laborious researches and ingenious inventions of M. Wolff, these defects have disappeared, and his pianos are, at present, nearly as brilliant as those of Erard. His key-boards are no less sensitive, if we may use that expression. They yield, as though of their own accord, to the slightest pressure of the hand, and instantly respond to all the sentiments, to all the emotions of the performer, just as a high-spirited and well-trained horse appears to share the passions which affect his rider, and to divine his thoughts.

LEON DAROCHER.

PARIS.—Mendelssohn's little domestic opera, Die Heimkehr aus der Fremde, never intended for public performance, has been brought out at the Théâtre Lyrique under the title of Lisbeth.

Annual Meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society.

We alluded very briefly in our last issue, to the proceedings at the adjourned meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society, which was held in Bumstead Hall on Friday evening 16th of June. This was the 50th Annual Meeting of the Society. An unusually large number of members were present. The Reports on the occasion possess more than ordinary interest, and we, therefore, make no apology in presenting them to our readers at length.

First in order, came the Treasurer's Report for the past year, which, in the absence of the venerable incumbent in that office, Mr. Matthew S. Parker, (now in his 84th year), was read by the Secretary, Mr. Barnes. By this document it appears that the total receipts, added to the balance in hand at the beginning of the year, make up the sum of $1332.01; and that the expenditures during the year have been $989.31, leaving a balance in the Treasurer's hands of $342.70. The Society is now wholly free from debt.

The Annual Report of the Librarian, Geo. H. Chickering, Esq., was next submitted, as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN:

My duties as Librarian during the season just closing, although more arduous than in former years, have been performed willingly by me, and in a manner, I hope, that has given satisfaction to you. The extra amount of duty was the consequence of the Festival, to have taken any part in which I feel is looked upon with pride by all who participated in it. My duties, however, were greatly lightened by Mr. Bedlington, the assistant Librarian; for on him devolved much hard labor, and the admirable execution of it was witnessed by all who took part in the Festival.

In closing my last Report, I informed you that the Orchestral music of Mendelssohn's 42d Psalm, together with 105 vocal parts and two scores of Costa's Eli, had been ordered from England. These, with an orchestral score of the Psalm, were received and added to the Library, after having been properly bound, last October. One copy of Eli was returned to Mr. Ditson, who since then has published the work. The addition of the instrumental music of the Psalm and the vocal parts of Eli was made at a cost to the Society of $215.26. At one of the early meetings of the Government of this Society, it was decided that, at the proposed Festival in commemoration of the semi-centennial anniversary of its formation, the following works should be performed: The Messiah, Creation, Elijah, Hymn of Praise, Israel in Egypt and Nicolai's Festival Overture. I was requested to obtain such vocal and instrumental music of these works, as we might need, in addition to what we then owned, sufficient in all for a chorus of six hundred voices and an orchestra of one hundred instruments.

The performance of this duty I at once entered upon, ordering three hundred copies of Israel in Egypt from England. These were received early in January, but before they reached as I visited Mr. J. D. Kent, and examined a collection of music that had formerly belonged to the Musical Education Society. In this collection I found very much that we should need at our Festival, and other music that I thought would be of value to the Society. Mr. Kent desiring to dispose of the whole, and offering it on exceedingly favorable terms, I purchased the entire collection. * * *

The next addition to our library was of music purchased of Mr. Stutson, being a portion of that formerly belonging to the Mendelssohn Choral Society. It consisted of 118 chorus scores of Messiah, 144 of Elijah and many orchestral parts for each work. From Messrs. Mason and Hamlin, I obtained 122 chorus scores of the Messiah, and from Messrs. Tolman & Co., 67 copies of Elijah. All the rest of the music required for the Festival I purchased of Messrs. Ditson & Co., which was either published by them or imported from England especially for us. They also engraved and printed for us 500 copies (voice parts) of the Festival Overture, of which we retain the plates. Add to this nearly 100 separate orchestral parts, imported for us, and all the music required for the oratorios to be performed at the Festival, was obtained. The only other addition to the library was that of 1000 copies of the music sung by us June 1st at the Eulogy on President Lincoln. This, consisting of the Chorals, "Cast thy Burden upon the Lord," Luther's Judgment Hymn, and the chorus "Mourn ye afflicted people," from Judas Maccabæus, was engraved and printed for us at the expense of the city.

Most of the music purchased of Mr. Kent and Mr. Stutson was in excellent condition, the little that required it being rebound before using. All the music purchased during the season was entered on our catalogue and labelled as the "Property of the H. & H. Society, not to be taken from the hall." The request contained in the latter part of the sentence was not strictly complied with, for much music was, and is still, taken from the hall. If this was taken away to study at home, after obtaining permission to do so, no fault can be found, unless some are still studying, when such studies should have been only for the benefit of the Festival and the music returned at its close. * * * Of the orchestral music belonging to us, none was lost. In this connection I will state that the Orchestral music for the Symphonies, Overtures, &c., performed at the afternoon concerts during the Festival, was mostly loaned us by the New York Philharmonic Society. Their generosity has been properly acknowledged by a vote of thanks passed by our Government and transmitted to them by the Secretary.

To give a proper idea of the actual additions to our Library during the past season, I will state that they consist of 2133 separate vocal parts, 473 vocal scores, 649 piano-forte vocal scores, one orchestral score and 193 separate orchestral parts.

The music purchased for the festival, including some repairs and the printing of labels, cost us about $1050, and, as before stated, that purchased before the festival, and not for it, cost $215.26. These large additions to our music, with what we before possessed, have been properly arranged on our Library shelves, completely filling them and forming, I think, the most valuable musical library of its kind in the country.

I am happy to inform you that what is termed in our By-Laws "the other property of the Society," and whose care devolves on your Librarian, has received an addition recently. For many years this other property consisted of a huge double bass and a pair of kettle drums. My care of the double bass ceased when it was sold a few years ago. The drums still exist in excellent condition, and did good service at the Festival. The addition referred to consists of 6 clarionettes, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, and 2 bassoons. These instruments were purchased for and are owned by the Music-Hall Association and our own Society jointly, and were manufactured especially for us in New York, under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. The cost to our Society for its portion of the expense of these instruments was $300. The object in obtaining them was to overcome the difficulty, or impossibility, of tuning the instruments owned by the members of the orchestra to so low a pitch as that of the organ. Thus an important step has been taken to facilitate our performances of those great works in which our Library is so rich. Let each season witness such improvements as that just closed, and although none of us may live to see it, the Society will surely live to celebrate its one hundredth anniversary.

Respectfully submitted,

Geo. H. CHICKERING.

Boston, June 16, 1865

Librarian.

From the Report of the Secretary, Loring B. Barnes, Esq., which was next presented, we extract the following:

"I trust it may not be considered out of place, Mr. President and Gentlemen, for me to tell you with what anxiety, mingled with fears and doubts, and yet with hope and confidence, the discussions of the various important questions constantly arising in connection with the Festival were entered upon by the officers of the Society and disposed of according to the best information at hand; neither is it unbecoming for us to rejoice at the great and perfect success of the enterprise, which not only relieved our friends who so generously contributed their names with large amounts liable to assessment in case of loss, but added largely to our own means; at the same time placing in the hands of the two great National charities a sum of no inconsiderable amount. I will not intrude farther, however, upon the ground properly belonging to the President, but will content myself with giving you a few items of interest already on record.

The Society appeared but three times, during the entire season, before the public, previous to the Festival. First in presenting "Eli," in November, which resulted in a small loss, and not again until Christmas, when the "Messiah" was given twice on successive evenings to full house. A concert commemorative of our great National victories was in preparation for Easter, and would have been given but for the great calamity which befel the nation at that time —the assassination of the President of the United States—which obligated an indefinite postponement, and caused a loss for expenses incurred. These were all given on joint account with the Music-Hall Association.

Next came the Festival with its nine Concerts and Oratorios, preceded by numerous rehearsals, involving constant and laborious work for all concerned,—officers of the Society, conductor, organist and chorus. When all the excitement of that festival week had passed, there still remained one more duty for that great festival chorus to perform, and that was, in answer to an invitation of the City of Boston, to perform suitable music on the occasion of the Eulogy by the Hon. Charles Sumner on the late President Lincoln. Notwithstanding the arduous and almost incessant labors of the week then but just closed, the ladies and gentlemen composing the chorus were found promptly in attendance, and sang the music selected for the occasion in a satisfactory manner. With this the season closed.

There have been twenty-four persons admitted to membership during the past season, and some five or six more have passed examination and been admitted by ballot as members of the Society, but, for reasons not given, have declined to qualify, and consequently are not enrolled as members. Only one member has resigned his position during the past season, and no expulsions have taken place; a circumstance entirely unprecedented for the past several years.

Death has deprived us of two of our most honored and most active members, and another no less active and constant in his attendance has also passed away. John F. Payson, John H. Pray and James Dyer, were among the most constant attendants at all rehearsals and concerts; and their vacant seats will not soon be filled by more devoted members than they long ago proved themselves to be. Mr. Payson, though not enrolled as an original member, was admitted, according to the records, but a month or two later than those entitled "original;" his name appearing under date of June 8th, 1815. Mr. Pray registered his name but a month later, July 6th, 1815. Both rendered invaluable service to the Society during their long term of membership, and both passed away within a few hours of each other, at about the date of our last annual meeting. Honored be their memory.

Mr. Dyer's membership dates from 1838 to within a few months past, when he too passed away.

This Mr. President, forms a portion of the records of the Society during the past season, with the recital of which my duties are brought to a close.

Respectfully submitted,

LORING B. BARNES,

Boston, June 16, 1865.

Secretary.

Mr. Geo. W. Palmer, one of the Trustees, and Treasurer of the Festival fund, then presented a brief but very satisfactory statement, from which it appears that the whole amount received from the Festival was $21,180, and the total expenses a little upwards of seventeen thousand dollars, leaving a balance of very nearly four thousand dollars to be applied in the manner set forth in the original prospectus.

The President, Dr. Upham, then read his Annual Report, which we give in full, as follows:

GENTLEMEN, MEMBERS OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY:

It is not possible for me, amid the multiplicity of duties that have recently been crowded upon me, to present to you, at this time, other than a very hurried Report.

I am happy to congratulate you, at the outset, upon another year of success. I refer now to the ordinary operations of the Society in the year which has just closed. That it has proved financially successful appears from the Treasurer's Report, to which you have just listened; artistically, also, it has fallen, at least in no whit behind its predecessors in the measure of its excellence—although, in the preparations necessarily given to the Festival performances, but just completed, the regular concerts of the season have been fewer than the average. Our meetings for practice commenced at an earlier date than usual, and have been continued at least a month later, greatly to the advantage of the Society.

The actual musical force of the Society, as you perceive from the Secretary's record, has been increased during the year, and, I am happy to add, has proved a more earnest working force than heretofore since my acquaintance with the Association. How much of this is to be attributed to the stimulus of the great Festival, you are yourselves the best judges.

I am glad to note, in the Report of the Librarian, the substantial increase of your Library. This is a solid and valuable acquisition to your property, and, at the same time, should be considered a gain in an artistic point of view to our whole community. By purchase, in conjunction with the Music Hall Association, (as has already been mentioned by the Librarian in his Report) the Society has now a joint interest in a complete set of orchestral instruments, [the wood department,] adapted to the pitch of the Great Organ in the Music Hall. These instruments were made to order by an accomplished manufacturer in New York, and are pronounced in every way perfect and complete. It is the intention of your Board of Trustees to place them in the custody of a proper person, who shall be responsible for their safe keeping and judicious use; and it is hoped that their employment, in the concerts that may in future be given by the Society in the Music Hall, will add to the completeness of the general effect.

In my last year's Report, I took occasion to allude to some of the prominent faults pertaining to Associations of a kindred nature with our own—and from which we ourselves could not claim to be exempt. In many of the particulars then named, I am happy to note an evident improvement. This is in some measure, as I believe, to be attributed to the carrying out of the suggestions, then presented, for the better organization of the Executive Department of the Society, by the appointment of a staff of Superintendents, and the assignment to them of specific and definite duties. Even more can be done with advantage, in this direction, in the future. Indeed, the more the discipline of the Society can approach to military system and exactness, the better, I am convinced, it will be ultimately relished by the members themselves, and the easier and pleasanter will their ordinary duties at our meetings appear. This will especially be so when our number of active and working members shall be largely increased.

I should be derelict in my duty, did I not again direct your attention to some of the standing faults of the Society, which always have been, and unless corrected will always continue to be a drawback to its complete success. In this list of deficiencies, now as ever, absenteeism at rehearsals must be counted as first and foremost. It is this want of regularity and punctuality, on the part of some of the older members in particular, in their attendance upon our stated meetings for practice and rehearsal, that gives to a full performance—a public performance especially—such uncertainty in its results. I would respectfully but earnestly suggest that the attention of the Government of the Society, in the ensuing year, be engaged in devising some means whereby this prime evil may be lessened if not wholly eradicated.

And I must again refer to the suggestion brought forward in a previous Report, that some method be adopted by which the attendance of individual members shall be marked at such rehearsals as may be given in preparation for a public performance, so that the presence and participation of all who are to take part in such public exhibition shall be ensured for a reasonable number of times. Until some such course be pursued, I am convinced that perfect unity, accuracy, and certainty of results can never be obtained.

The habit of an improper position of the body while singing, of an inadequate utterance, and of imperfection in the quantity and quality of the voice, is so prevalent in all our larger and smaller organizations for choral music, as to demand your careful and conscientious consideration. Indeed, I do not hesitate to advise, as the best possible investment of a portion of the time and money of the Society, the employment of a competent instructor in the Elements of Vocal Drill, as it is now practised in the several departments of the Public Schools. If a series of lessons were given to the Society as a body in this important branch of vocal culture, I feel sure they would not only be greatly interested, but would also evince, in the performances of another season, a surprising advance in all that pertains to choral excellence and success.

And while upon the subject of the Society's shortcomings, I may mention that of irrelevant conversation—in whispers or loud talking—both at public performances and at rehearsals. I need not remind you how seriously such practice detracts from the attention that ought to be given to the music in hand, to say nothing of the annoyance it often occasions to those in the immediate vicinity of the talkers. If those who may feel themselves guilty of this infringement of the decorum of the concert-room, will observe the absolute silence and attention which is exacted in the ranks of the great choir of pupils from our Public Schools in their annual performances in the Music Hall, they cannot fail to be convinced of the beauty and propriety of such a requirement; and what is applicable to the children and youth of our schools, is equally applicable, in kindred positions, to us, who are but children of a larger growth.

I will take this occasion again to express the opinion, that if the forces of our chorus were so distributed as to furnish an equal number of voices to each of the four parts, a better balance of tone would ensue, and a more artistic and satisfactory effect be the result. With the belief that the interest of the Society would be promoted by its increase to the number of six hundred, and that, for the present, this limit ought not to be exceeded, I would respectfully recommend to the Examining Committee that they canvass most carefully the present apportionment of voices, and ascertain with exactness the total number of active and efficient members of the Society. As preliminary to this, a Catalogue should be made out, at once, in which the names of all should be inserted, each in his appropriate place. If, then, it shall appear that—on the basis I have named as the proper limitation of our forces for the present—any of the departments of the chorus are already filled, no more should be admitted, under that head, till, by resignation or otherwise, the proportion has been reduced. It will be readily seen that tenors and altos are the voices which, under this arrangement, will be most in request for the ensuing season. Indeed, I shall be surprised if, on such careful canvass, it does not appear that we have already the requisite number of sopranos and basses pledged as permanent members; and when once our limit is reached, and the requisite six hundred, in equal apportionment of parts, has been obtained, the care of the Government must be directed to acquire and retain, within these limits, the best materials only. Then will the Society have reached a point where it will be no longer necessary to have a care for the filling up of its ranks—but, on the contrary, the Committee will be beset with applications for admissions, and those whose names are now inscribed upon its rolls will be careful lest, by any neglect on their part of a strict regard to all the Rules and Regulations of the Society, they may subject themselves to loss of membership. This is the enviable condition of the only two other kindred Associations of equal renown (so far as I know) with our own, the Sacred Harmonic Society of London, and the Sing-Academie at Berlin.

But it is time for me to allude more particularly to the recent commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the formation of our Society. I turn gladly to the consideration of so pleasant and grateful a theme. And first, let me especially congratulate you upon its abundant and everywhere-acknowledged success—a success more than we had dared to anticipate—more, as it is recognized and sealed by the public approbation, than we have ourselves since claimed for it. In this so gratifying result you will find, I doubt not, a sufficient reward for all your self-sacrificing interest and devotion, during these long months of study and preparation, in which, with a zeal and a patience that can only be explained by a real love for the Art you have espoused—you have given your time and study and best efforts.

It may not be amiss, in this connection, to call your attention for a few moments to what may perhaps be termed a brief historical sketch of the great Musical Festivals of the world. The first in importance among these—if we throw aside the occasional Church jubilees, which from time to time have periodically been celebrated in Roman Catholic communities—was the grand Commemoration of Handel, as it was called, which took place in Westminster Abbey in 1784. On this occasion, for the first time, so far as we are informed, upwards of five hundred well trained vocalists and instrumentalists were consolidated into one body. The best of the London Choral singers, the elite of the bands and orchestras of that famous metropolis, together with Madame Mara and other distinguished vocalists of the time, here vied with each other in rendering homage to that great man, who had twenty years previously—on Good Friday, 1765—finished his long and laborious career, died, and was buried in English soil, and whose statue was shortly afterwards to be allowed a place within the sacred walls of Westminster Abbey—a privilege which, in the estimation of Englishmen, is the pinnacle of posthumous fame. This undertaking, as I have said, was the first of its kind. It is called by one of the biographers of Handel “a great and trying occasion.” The worthy Londoners, from royalty downwards, were greatly interested in the event. It is amusing at this day, to recall the fears and misgivings of the public—which were freely expressed—as to the possible effects of so vast a body of sounds as was then, for the first time, to be compressed within the four walls of a building. By some it was predicted that an orchestra so unwieldily could never be in tune; by others that, from their number and great distance apart, they could never play in time. By some, it was insisted that, owing to the immense size of the building, no single voice had the least chance of being heard by any one remote from the immediate vicinity of the stage; by others it was gravely asserted that the aggregate sounds of the band and chorus would be so loud, that whoever heard their performance could never hear again! Dr. Burney, speaking seriously and intelligently of the effect upon the hearers of this great choral force, as he calls it, says the totality of sound seemed to proceed from one voice and one instrument, and, in its power, produced not only new and exquisite sensations upon judges and connoisseurs of the Art, but was felt and acknowledged by those who never received pleasure from music before. “These effects,” he continues, in his somewhat quaint but expressive phraseology, “run the risk of being doubted by all but those who heard them, and my description of being pronounced fabulous, if it should survive the present generation.” He dwells, among other considerations, upon the silence of the vast audience, it being “remarkable,” as he says, “throughout the whole performance.” The Count Buononcini, an Italian nobleman of eminent taste and discrimination in musical matters, and who was present on that occasion, has written of it in the following strain: “I shall long have before my eyes that prodigious orchestra, the like of which had never before its existence upon the earth. I have in vain tortured my memory to find any festival similar to this either in history or fable. Certainly, since the inexhaustible riches and variety of harmony were first displayed, I believe that it has not been possible till now, to assemble upwards of five hundred musicians, and, what is still more extraordinary, without impeding by their numbers the most accurate and finished execution.”

Bear in mind that all this is said of an aggregate of but little more than 500 instrumentalists and vocalists combined.

The net proceeds of the five performances of this festival were upwards of £12000. This sum, it may be interesting to remark,—as has been the case with so many occasions of a similar character since—was devoted mainly to charitable purposes, being divided, after some inconsiderable reservations, equally between the Westminster Abbey Infirmary, the Musical Fund Society, and the Foundling Hospital. “That such a sum could be raised in so short a time, by the productions of a single composer only,” says one of the critics of the day, “may be numbered among the marvellous powers of music.”

I have thus dwelt upon this first instance of a great and successful festival of sacred music, partly from its historical interest, and partly to show, by contrast, the remarkable advance in the appreciation of the public at the present day, and the comparatively extraordinary culture of the art and science of music that now prevails, and which makes it possible, in this city of less than 200,000 inhabitants, to gather together a choral and instrumental force by far superior numerically—and I believe artistically as well—to that which, less than a hundred years ago, called forth such extravagant exclamations of delight from the most accomplished and appreciative audiences in the metropolis of the world.

Music, it has been well said, is a progressive art and its developments are of recent date. Indeed it was not till the beginning of the 18th century, that Oratorio had begun to acquire importance. And as a proof of the rapid development of the love of oratorio among the people, the great musical festivals which began, as we have seen with the Commemoration of Handel in 1784, have, within the last half century, spread and multiplied all over the Continent of Europe. In England they were followed up in the years 1785, 1786 and 1787, successively, each occasion improving upon its predecessor in numbers and in the excellence and magnificence of its appointments.

But “it was not till the beginning of the present century,” says Mr. Jennison, in his admirable resumé of the progress of music in the last half century, published a few years since in Dwight's Journal, “that this example of England, in all its ample proportions, was followed upon the Continent—first in Germany in 1804, next in Switzerland in 1810, after which they became common throughout the German States.” As late as 1835 a festival of similar nature was celebrated for the first time in Italy; this was succeeded the following year by one in France and also in Russia. The great musical gatherings which for the last twenty years have been held in the valley of the Rhine in the vintage time are to be counted among the most beautiful and significant of the domestic institutions of social, music-loving Germany. In our own land, setting aside the out-door carnivals of our German brethren in New York, Philadelphia, and the larger cities of the West, as hardly coming within the category, our first grand festival of choral music was given in the spring of 1857, under the auspices of this Society, in the Boston Music Hall, during the presidency of our excellent and much esteemed friend and fellow citizen—for we cannot yet give him up to New York—Mr. Charles Francis Chickering, with an orchestra of eighty instruments, a chorus of six hundred well trained vocalists, and a most admirable array of soloists. But to England, as at the first, so now and always, must be awarded the palm for excellence and completeness of choral performances, on a scale, too, of amplitude and grandeur that has never been approached elsewhere. The great triennial festivals of the last twenty-five years, held in Birmingham, in York, in Leeds, in Bradford, in Liverpool, and more recently in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham under that Prince of Festival Directors, Mr. Robert B. Bowley, are familiar to us all. To give some measure of the progressive ideas of the English in regard to the musical construction of these festival occasions I will adduce the following statistics. At the Commemoration of Handel in 1784, the exact number engaged, according to Dr. Burney, was 527. At the festival in the same place on the succeeding year, 616; at the festival in 1786, 741; at the festival in 1787, 806; at the various triennial festivals in the provincial towns of England before named, the numbers engaged have ranged from 500 or 600 to about 1500. At the opening of the Great Industrial Exhibition in Dublin, in May 1853, the combined chorus and orchestra numbered 1200; at the opening of the Crystal Palace in London, in 1854, the number was 1700; at the Festival in the Sydenham Crystal Palace in 1857, preparatory to the Grand Commemoration of 1859, it was 2500; and on the occasion of the Commemoration itself in 1859, the forces employed fell but little short of 4000! This was the case also at the same place in 1862, when the Directors of the Crystal Palace Association came near having the first use of the “great instrument” that lent such distinction and brilliancy to our own recent festival occasion; and at the coming triennial festival, which is to take place in the palace at Sydenham next week, as I learn from a prospectus sent out by Mr. Bowley, a similar gigantic choral and instrumental force, together with the best oratorio soloists of the world, is to be engaged. Such, in very brief, is a sketch of the rise and progress of the grand musical festivals, as they may be termed, par excellence and without exaggeration.

To return for a moment to the occasion which has so lately engrossed our immediate attention. It is not for me to say, perhaps, in how far it is entitled to take rank with the great festivals to which I have alluded; and I may be accused of partiality in the expression of my opinion, which is nevertheless sincere—founded as it is upon some knowledge and personal experience of similar events elsewhere and in various parts of the world—when I say that in point of legitimate, honest, and artistic results, it will at least bear comparison with the best of them. That its influence upon the taste of this community, and upon the future prosperity of our own Society, will be most happy and beneficial, I do not entertain a doubt.

Not the least in importance among interesting incidents of this festival, is the expression of good will and fellowship it has brought forth on the part of kindred associations in our sister cities, from two of which I have received communications which, with your permission, I will now read. One is a letter from the New York Harmonic Society addressed to the Boston Handel and Haydn Society—covering a Resolution—in words as follows:

NEW YORK, MAY 22, 1865.

At a special meeting of the Board of Officers of the New York Harmonic Society, called by the President, and held Saturday the 20th inst., the following resolution was unanimously passed.

Resolved,—That, the Boston Handel and Haydn Society being about to celebrate, by a Musical Festival, their semi-centennial anniversary, we, wishing to express to them our hearty congratulation for the great success which has attended their labors, and our sincere desire for their future prosperity, do hereby appoint two delegates to be present at the coming anniversary of the Boston Handel & Haydn Society, and represent us on that occasion. Whereupon the President, Mr. T. S. Berry, and Mr. G. F. Hsley, were elected said delegates.

T. S. BERRY.

Pres. N. Y. H. Society.

D. B. JOHNSTON.

Sec'y N. Y. H. Soc.

[seal]

The other is a communication from the Handel and Haydn Society of Philadelphia, most elegantly drawn up, in the following words:

TO THE HANDEL & HAYDN SOCIETY OF BOSTON:

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Handel and Haydn Society of Philadelphia, held May 4, 1865, it was unanimously resolved to present to your Society a communication expressing a desire to cultivate those fraternal feelings which should exist between two Institutions bearing the same name, and laboring for the same high end.

In compliance with that Resolution, we congratulate late you upon the honored and respected name which your exertions in the cause of music have achieved for you, and extend to you our appreciation of the skill with which the operations of your Society have been conducted, resulting in the development of that public spirit which so successfully sustains you. The advancement of a taste for Sacred Music, and the cultivation of that taste to a standard which can appreciate the majesty and beauty of the productions of Handel and Haydn, is to us, as it is to you, the object of our earnest endeavor. We aim, equally with you, (and, if in a degree successfully, we shall equally with you pride ourselves) at the perpetuation of those great names whose compositions, stamped with classic dignity, derive their highest inspirations from the lofty subjects of their song which breathe noble and generous sentiments, harmonize the minds and hearts of men, excite admiration of the works of God, and show forth His praise.

We feel that the importance of the influence of music on the mind is not fully appreciated, nor its powers sufficiently called forth. The early history of all nations presents instances of its wondrous efficacy. The poets of Greece and Rome concur in attributing to it a great moral power.

By divine institution, Sacred Song, of which we have the remains in the Book of Psalms and other parts of the Old Testament, formed almost the only social worship of the Hebrew temple. Luther had ear, science, and execution, and his hymns and his music, powerfully seconded by other and superior poets, poured the stream of Sacred melody through the land. No country can pretend to rival Germany in the richness of its religious music, and our earnest endeavor should be to create the same euphonic taste and judgment in our land, conscious, as we are, that music is the grand means of keeping the flame of religion glowing in the hearts of the people.

The path we have marked out for ourselves is the same over which you have struggled; our ambition is to assist in the furtherance of the cause of sacred music, as ably in our city as you have done in yours; and, although we follow in your footsteps, we feel that emulation which tempts us to hope that we may equal all that you have heretofore accomplished in that cause.

We have long since been convinced that great benefits would result from the gathering together of the musical societies of neighboring cities and towns in great musical Conventions, and hope, at no distant day, to initiate a movement here, corresponding to that you have made so productive of good.

We desire to congratulate you, as the parent Society in the United States, on the long course of prosperity which you have enjoyed, and also to express the hope that it now rests upon a permanent foundation, destined to flourish and extend its influence long after we who now sustain these Societies shall have passed away.

We beg leave to introduce to you our esteemed Conductor, Mr. Carl Sents, of Philadelphia, by whom this communication will be presented.

In conclusion, we cordially extend an invitation to your members to visit us, when in Philadelphia, at Handel & Haydn Hall, and assure you that you will receive from us a hearty welcome.

(Signed)

A. R. PAUL,
President.

JNO. GRIER UNSTED,
Vice Pres't.

And others of the Government of the Society.

To these most gratifying and kindly communications, a fitting response will, in due time, be officially made.

Before leaving the subject of the recent festival, allow me to suggest the propriety of establishing, under the auspices of our Society, a celebration on a similar scale as a periodical and regular institution, feeling, as I do, every confidence that such an enterprise can be creditably and successfully carried out, at least once in three years, to the great benefit of the Society and the good of the community.

It remains for me to tender to my associates in the Government of the Society, one and all, my earnest appreciation of their untiring zeal and devotion to the interests in their charge, during the trying year just past, and especially to offer them my sincere and heartfelt thanks for the uniform courtesy, and good nature; and patience and Christian forbearance, they have, at all times, shown to me as their presiding officer. Congratulating you, gentlemen, upon the good fortune of possessing, in those to whom I have alluded, such faithful and efficient administration of your affairs,—your gentlemanly and accomplished Vice President; your beloved and venerable Treasurer; your intelligent, courteous Librarian, and his faithful assistants; your devoted, untiring Secretary; your active, thoroughly competent corps of Superintendents, watchful and attentive, patient, long-suffering and kind;—congratulating you, as I do, honestly and heartily, upon all this, with my thanks, also, for all that you have done—and so successfully done—in the past season, and with many apologies for inflicting upon you so lengthy a report, I will weary you no longer to-night.

Musical Correspondence.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JUNE 12.—Our neighboring city of Hartford must be a very musical place, judging from the number of first-class concerts it has patronized the past season. The most noticeable one, and probably the best, was given on the 8th of last month by the Choral Union, assisted by twenty-six of the Germania Orchestra from Boston. A new work from the pen of the talented young organist and composer, Dudley Buck, Jr., was brought out for the first time at this concert, and we are happy to add it was a genuine success. The work is a musical rendering of the forty-sixth Psalm, for solos, chorus and full orchestral accompaniments.

Mr. Buck has had advantages superior to most of his professional brethren, having studied several years in Leipzig and Dresden; and musical accuracy, at least, was to be expected from him. In this work the highest culture is apparent, together with a leaning toward originality, if not genius. The introductory prelude and first chorus: "God is our refuge and our strength," produced at the rehearsal a decided sensation, even among your fastidious Germanians, and which they manifested by real Teutonic zeal and earnestness. No. 2, Soprano solo and double quartet, is finely conceived and well instrumented, affording a pleasing contrast to the telling climaxes in the chorus.

The composition throughout shows a masterly knowledge of counterpoint, and a nice and clear comprehension of orchestral effects and resources. The style is a happy medium between the strict and free schools. Mr. B. has evidently studied the scores of such composers as Schumann, Rietz, and David, rather than the older classicists. A slight touch of Wagnerism is apparent in the final chorus, if the free use of the brass can be called such, but which the subject demands. This is a fugue chorus, and is the most elaborate part of the work, as bringing out the fullest resources of voices and instruments.

The work merits a more detailed and careful analysis than we feel competent to give it, without a more familiar acquaintance with the score. We trust some of our music firms will find it for their interest to publish it in vocal score, as it must in our estimation prove a valuable addition to the list of sacred compositions of like character. Hartford is fortunate in having so talented a musician, and, what is more satisfactory, they seem to appreciate him.

Our own city of Springfield is picking up considerably in musical matters. On, or about the 28th of July coming, our new Music Hall is to be dedicated by a Grand Concert by our Mendelssohn Union, who will bring out the "Hymn of Praise," assisted by an orchestra from your city. Something of the former musical interest seems to have newly awakened here, and all we need is a few more good musicians of ability, energy and character, to assist in raising our standard of appreciation to an equality with our sister cities in this respect.

PIANISSIMO.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., JUNE 2.—Thinking a line or two from this goodly city would be acceptable to you in the present dearth of musical news, I send the few following "scraps," about music and musicians here. Without exaggeration, I think there is no city of its size in the country where music of the highest order is so little appreciated, or where artists are so little encouraged, as this one. Several attempts have been made in times past to organize a mixed chorus, but either through professional jeal-ousies, or other inexplicable causes they have all failed. A universal apathy prevails, and those wishing to hear good music are obliged to go to Boston or New York, or go without it. Many of our churches have fine quartet choirs, however, and I think the quality of the music, sung will compare well with other places. Grace Church and St. Johns have both good choirs and able organists in Messrs. Tingley and Hayward. The music at Dr. Hall's (Unitarian) has for some time past been very fine, under the competent direction of Mr. E. A. Kelly, organist of the church.

At the solemn services by the city authorities on June 1st, a select choir sang a chorus of Neukomm, a quartet by Spohr, and the Integer Vita by Flemming, with fine effect. A Funeral Anthem by Mr. Kelly was also sung, and we hope soon to see it in print. I have heard it said that he was to leave here in the fall and take up his residence in Boston. I trust not, as our city can ill spare so fine a musician.

The Orpheus Club under the direction of Mr. E. Baker is in a flourishing condition, and I believe is the only organized body of musicians here. Mr. E. Tourjee is striving to establish a Musical Conservatoire after the European plan, with what success I have not heard. I wish him God speed in so laudable an undertaking.

ROGER WILLIAMS.

CHICAGO, JUNE 15.—The present week will close the finest and most complete Opera season that Chicago has ever witnessed, for which we have to give hearty thanks to Mr. Grau, the enterprising impresario, who has alone built up the Opera in Chicago, and has given to the music-loving citizens an opportunity of hearing not only so many standard operas of the day, but also many new works of merit, almost contemporaneously with their production in London and Paris.

We doubt if Boston has ever witnessed a more perfect season of opera than that just about closing. Fine singers, a superb orchestra, a well drilled chorus, splendid scenery and mechanical appointments,—this Chicago has had in her midst for the last two months.

Besides the usual repertoire of operas, we have had the following for the first time or nearly so:—Fra Diavolo; Don Sebastian; Forza del Destino; Rigoletto. Don Sebastian has been given three times; Fra Diavolo, four times; Don Giovanni, twice; Daughter of the Regiment, twice; Martha, three times; Poliuto, four times.

I have neither time nor space to speak as I would wish of the artists; of the eloquent Zucchi; of Miss Kellogg, a charming lady and finished artist; and of the beautiful contralto, Morensi. In Mazzoleni, Chicago has seen for almost the first time a great dramatic Tenor. He is not only a fine singer, but a magnificent actor; a combination which is quite rare in this part of the country. May he soon return to us again.

Massimiliani has already become a favorite by his beautiful voice and artistic rendering, while Lotti, who has never held a prominent part here before, has taken his place as the second Brignoli. Bellini, by his noble voice and great dramatic power, whether in a tragic or buffo part, has won the admiration and applause of all, while of Ssaini what can I say except that he is the same as of old?

In conclusion let me thank Mr. Crosby for his magnificent temple of Art, and Mr. Grau for his dedication of the same, and may he soon return to us full freighted with song.

Yours,
CHICAGO.

Music Abroad.

London.

CHERUBINI'S "MEDRA" has been the most notable event of the season at Her Majesty's Theatre. We copy from the Times of June 7.

Last night Cherubini's tragic opera, Medea, the book translated for the first time into Italian, and the music heard for the first time in this country, was produced with a success due no less to the excellence of the performance than to the singular merits of the work. Although Cherubini was twice in London—in 1784 and 1787—and composed several pieces for the "King's Theatre," of which, on the occasion of his second visit, he was appointed musical director, and although his dramatic overtures fairly divide opinion with those of Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber at our classical concerts, his operas have never made way in England. Indeed, we are unable to recall a single instance to the contrary. This is the more surprising when it is considered that Cherubini is universally acknowledged to be one of the great masters, and was proclaimed by no meaner authorities than Haydn and Beethoven, after the production of his Faniska, at Vienna, the first dramatic composer of his epoch. How highly Mendelssohn esteemed him may be seen on reference to the second volume of the Letters. It is even something in Cherubini's favor that, like his friend and rival, Méhul, to whom the printed score of Medea is affectionately inscribed, he was one of those composers most thoroughly detected by Napoleon Buonaparte, perhaps the worst judge of music that ever affected to patronize the art. "My dear Cherubini," said the Chief Consul, "you are an excellent musician, but your music is so noisy and intricate that I can make nothing out of it." "My dear General," replied Cherubini, "you are an excellent soldier, but I see no reason why I should try to adapt my music to your understanding." Two of the operas of Cherubini—Les Deux Journées and Medée, both composed originally for the Théâtre Feydeau (Opéra Comique)—though rarely heard in France since the quasi-failure of his last dramatic composition (Ali Baba), are familiar to many of the towns of Germany; but in England, notwithstanding our immense progress in the general culture of musical taste since the first visits of Spohr, Weber, and Mendelssohn, a progress in no small measure traceable to the immediate personal influence of those gifted men, they are wholly unknown. It was a bold step on the part of the director of Her Majesty's Theatre to set the initiative with one of the most difficult of all Cherubini's works; but complete success has justified it, and we have only to hope that Faniska, or Les Deux Journées, may follow in due course.

Medée, or Medea, as we now may style it—originally produced at the Opéra Comique, 23d Ventose, year 5 (13th of March, 1797)—is the seventeenth of thirty-two dramatic works by Cherubini, and the fifth which he composed for Paris. The author of the book was Francois Benoit Hoffmann, a poet and controversialist chiefly remembered now by bibliomaniacs as an ardent partisan of the music of Méhul, which he defended in a pamphlet against Geoffroi, the once famous critic of the Journal des Débats. Like the author of the Italian Medea, set to music by the prolific Simone Mayr, long kept on the stage by the admirable genius of Pasta, revived by Mr. Lumley in 1850, for Madame Pasta's favorite pupil, Mlle. Parodi, and now, we imagine, laid forever on the shelf, Hoffmann has founded his drama upon the celebrated tragedy first represented at Athens (B. C. 431), through which, with three others that have not come down to us, Euripides obtained the third prize. In the Greek play Jason abandons Medea for Glauca, daughter of Creon, King of Corinth. The sorceress, infuriated at being thus deserted by one who had possessed her love, and through her enchantments has been enabled to win the Golden Fleece and achieve more wonderful deeds, is banished from Corinth by command of the King. Feigning acquiescence, she ultimately extorts permission from Creon to remain at Corinth for a single day; and, promised by Ægeus a secure asylum at Athens, she employs the day of grace in contriving a plan by which she may revenge herself on Creon, Jason and Glauca. Deceived by her pretended submission, a wreath and robe, which by her art are impregnated with deadly poison, are accepted by Creon as presents from Medea to the new bride of Jason, who, wearing them, perishes in horrible torture, her fate being shared by the King, her father, who has embraced her in the moment of agony. Medea's next step is the murder of her two young children, which, after a fierce struggle between her affection for them and her hatred of Jason, she successfully carries out. Jason covering her with reproaches, and vainly asking to be allowed to see the bodies, she taunts him in return with his own misdeeds, and finally escapes in a chariot drawn through the air by winged dragons. There is no very great difference in the materials that form the basis of Hoffmann's drama and the substance of the Greek tragedy. Certain incidents are superadded, in order to afford reasonable opportunities for the composer, and these may speak for themselves, Ægeus, one of the speaking characters in Euripides, is not even alluded to in the French libretto; while Glauca, called Creusa by the Italian poets, after Seneca's Latin Medea, and who is only spoken of in the Greek play, is re-christened Dirce, and becomes one of the principal singing personages. There are other slight dissimilarities, but none especially worth pointing out.

Of Cherubini's share in Medea, which contains some of the sublimest passages in dramatic music—a last act, indeed, with scarce a parallel—and is in every way worthy to be mated with the lofty ideal of Euripides, we must take another opportunity of speaking. So truly magnificent a composition ought not to be dismissed in a few brief sentences. Nor can we do more at present than cursorily allude to the performance, which was creditable to all concerned. Mlle. Titiens was grand and impressive from the first scene to the last. There is no part in lyric tragedy so arduous and so difficult as that of Medea. Even Fidelio is easier labor in comparison. Nevertheless, Mlle. Titiens proved fully equal to her task, and achieved a legitimate triumph. All the parts were adequately filled. Probably the splendid music given to Creon, the Corinthian despot, was never so well sung as by Mr. Santley; Herr Gunz, as might have been anticipated, was an excellent Jason; while Dirce, Medea's unhappy rival, found in Miss Laura Harris one able to cope with the more trying than graceful air in the first act, and Neris, Medea's attached follower, was equally fortunate in meeting with so clever a representative as Mlle. Sinico. The opera is thoroughly well put upon the stage, with new scenery, appropriately Greek (by Mr. Telbin), new costumes, and decorations. The last act, which culminates with Medea's escape in the Chariot of the Sun, is particularly imposing. The band and chorus covered themselves with laurels by their execution of music so terribly exacting; and no compliment was ever better deserved than that paid at the termination of the opera to Signor Arditi, the conductor, who, after a general call for the principal singers, followed by a double summons for Mlle. Titiens, was led on to the stage by the Medea of the evening, in obedience to the unanimously expressed wish of the audience. The execution by the chorus of the superb antiphonal pæans in the scene of Jason's marriage with Dirce, and that by the band of the storm, in the midst of which the curtain rises on the third and grandest act, would alone have stamped this performance on the memory of any one capable of being touched by the loftiest manifestations of art.

Among the audience last night were observed the son and nephew of Cherubini.

MUNICH.—From Herr Wagner's letter to the papers it would seem that his "Tristan and Isolde" is to be produced in the King's private theatre in the palace at Munich, and that the performances are to take place before audiences, who, as the letter expresses it, it is desired may consist of those who by previous study of Wagnerian music have prepared themselves to sympathize with the new work.—Orchestra.

LEIPZIG. The Sing-Academie, in May, performed Haydn's "Seasons," an old work which seems to be attracting new attention in several parts of Europe, and is by many considered superior to the "Creation."

On the 9th of May, C. de Barbieri conducted, at the Stadt-theater, his new opera, "Perdita," subject from Shakespeare's Winter's Tale. The Lower-Rhine Musik-Zeitung finds in his work "only the musical Italian eclectic, who at one time mirrors the style of Verdi and Donizetti, and, at another, that of Meyerbeer and Rossini,"—most successful in following the latter.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 8, 1865.

The Past Musical Year in Boston.

The great Festival of the Handel & Haydn Society fairly closed our musical season, and we may count up what music (of the kinds commonly most worthy of a hearing) we have heard, or had the opportunity to hear. Looking over the period from the middle of October to June, which includes all the concerts, operas and oratorios of any consequence, we will first note the

I. ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

The larger plans of Mr. Carl Zerrahn for "Philharmonic" evening concerts, as in former winters, having been abandoned, we have been dependent solely (until the Festival) on the Wednesday Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union, a small, but well assimilated orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn, in whose twelve concerts were presented the following:

a) SYMPHONIES. Beethoven, Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6 (Pastoral), and 8.—Mozart, No. 3, in E flat, No. 10, in D.—Mendelssohn, No. 3 ("Scotch"), No. 4 ("Italian"), twice.—Gade, in B flat.

On a grander scale, with an Orchestra of 100 instruments, the Festival gave us: Beethoven's Eroica, No. 4, and No. 7 in A; Schubert in C; and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" in A minor.

b) CONCERTOS. None for piano-forte. For violin, Beethoven's in D, and Mendelssohn's in E minor, were played by Mr. Henry Suck in the Orchestral Union Concerts.

c) OVERTURES. To the Union we owe: Bennett's "Naiads" (twice); Rietz, Concert Overture in A (twice); Rossini, La Gazza Ladra (twice); Herold, Zampa (twice); Auber, La Sirene (2); Fra Diavolo (2); Weber, Oberon; Beethoven, Fidelio; Mendelssohn, Ruy Blas and "Midsummer Night's Dream;" F. Kielblock, "Miles Standish" (MS.)

These are for the most part lighter overtures, best suited for a small orchestra, and for graceful contrast before and after a Symphony in popular afternoon concerts. The four Festival concerts gave us larger Overtures, on a larger scale, some of them gloriously rendered, namely: Mendelssohn: "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Ruy Blas;" Beethoven: Leonora (No. 3), Coriolan; Weber: Euryanthe; Bennett: "The Naiads;" Rossini: "Tell;" Wagner: Tannhäuser and Rienzi.

d) MISCELLANEOUS. Liszt's Les Preludes was splendidly played at the Festival, after several performances by the Orchestral Union.—Meyerbeer's Fackeltanz music was played by the Festival Band, and also in the two "monster" concerts given in the Boston Theatre by the "Musicians' Protective Union."—Various orchestral arrangements, also—such as Chopin's Marcia funebre, fragments from Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, and other operas, have figured in the programmes of the winter.

To complete the list of purely orchestral music, we must add performances of the C-minor Symphony, and of the Leonora, Rienzi and Tell overtures at the aforesaid "monster" concerts. The Overtures in Oratorio and Opera performances we need not, and those played in the various theatres we cannot, name.

The above is not a meagre list, and yet we have done better. If we look back twelve years, to the season of 1852-3, we find in our list of Symphonies that year all the nine of Beethoven, including the "Choral," most of them three times over; the four principal ones of Mozart; three by Haydn; one by Spohr; four by Mendelssohn; and one each by Schubert, Schumann and Gade. Of Overtures, five by Beethoven, four by Mozart, six by Mendelssohn, four by Weber, two by Cherubini, and one each by Gluck, Spohr, Schubert and Bennett. And during that and the succeeding year we heard, with orchestra, the principal piano Concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber and Chopin; that was in the days of Alfred Jaell and the Germanians, and of the classical pre-existence of Heller the magician. When shall we do so well again?

II. ORATORIO.

For this grandest form of combined vocal and instrumental music we have relied wholly of late years on the Handel & Haydn Society. This year the list is short, containing nothing new, but much that is of the best, the most memorable part of which is that which was compressed within the great week of the Festival, which gave us Handel's Messiah and Israel in Egypt (incomplete), Haydn's Creation, Mendelssohn's Elijah and Hymn of Praise (twice), and Nicolai's Choral Overture: "Ein feste Burg," &c. Before the Festival, the Society gave one performance of Costa's Eli and two of the Messiah. In the year above referred to for comparison we had two choral societies in the field, who, between them, gave us five Oratorios of Handel (Messiah, Judas Maccabeus (4 times), Jephthah (in part), Joshua and Saul); also Beethoven's Mount of Olives, Haydn's Creation and Mendelssohn's St. Paul (in part).

Sebastian Bach, in the great forms of Passion, Cantata, Mass, Magnificat, and even of Motet and Choral, still knocks at the door of the great music halls unheard; but he has found entrance into some smaller, more secluded, genial chambers, and must ere long leaven the whole lump.

III. OPERA.

GERMAN. We have a new satisfaction in summing up under this head, since the past year has given us for the first time a German Opera, and a really good one. Mr. Grover's company paid us two visits, one of a fortnight (12 performances) in May, 1864, and one of four weeks (24 performances) beginning Oct. 10. In these six weeks they gave us: Mozart's Zauberflöte and Don Juan, twice; Beethoven's Fidelio, 4 times; Boieldieu's Die Weisse Dame (Dame Blanche), 3 times; Meyerbeer's Robert 2, Huguenots 2; Halévy's La Juive; Weber's Freyschütz 5; Gounod's Faust 7; Mireille (in part); Flotow's Martha 4, Stradella 2; Wagner's Tannhäuser (1st act); Kreutzer's Nachtlager in Granada; Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor.—The pieces new to Boston were Fidelio, the Dame Blanche, Tannhäuser, Mireille, the Nachtlager, Stradella, and the "Merry Wives."

ITALIAN. Maretzek's troupe occupied the Boston Theatre several weeks in January, during which time they gave: Donizetti's Poliuto, Lucrezia Borgia, Don Sebastiano 4, La Figlia del Reggimento, and Lucia; Bellini's Norma; Verdi's Trovatore, and Ernani 2; Flotow's Martha 2; Mozart's Don Giovanni 2; Gounod's Faust 3; Auber's Fra Diavolo 3. The novelties were Don Sebastian and Fra Diavolo.

This ends the list of music addressed to the larger audiences; Chamber Music, &c., next time.

A Letter from Chicago.

The good people of the Lake City have, we suppose, as good a right as others to cluck over their new Opera house and new invoice of latest operatic fashions; but really their newspaper "critics" (and even our own correspondent in some degree) have carried their glorifications to a pitch which is fairly satirized in the following:

CHICAGO, JUNE 28.—The new Opera House is at last fairly dedicated. The anticipations of months have been more than realized in the successful season which has just closed. According to the verdict of critics, who of course are thoroughly qualified to judge, and whose truth and justice are proverbial, we have had the most brilliant operatic season that ever was known. The Opera House is the most magnificent in the world, and the audiences are the finest, although London, Paris and New York do very well for small cities. Mr. Grau is the greatest of living impresarios, indeed the greatest that ever did live, and deserves to be honored at once with a saintship for his unheard of liberality, profound knowledge and devoted self-sacrifice in the interests of art. Unfortunately we are not Roman Catholics, and it would be quite out of the question to confer so unorthodox a degree. The only practicable thing left would be to send him to Congress, where they send all good people whom the "world delighteth to honor."

We condole with those who have been so unfortunate as to miss the great triumph of the century, if not of the world, a series of thirty or forty operas rendered with absolute perfection. We congratulate ourselves upon the rare occasion that has called together so many artists who have reached the summit of earthly glory. The fame of Pasta and Malibran is dimmed. Grisi reigns no longer. Lablache and Tamburini are eclipsed. Rubini will be heard of no more. The genius of the past pales in forgotten splendor. The genius of the future sighs hopelessly. Well may the artists weep, like Alexander of old, for more worlds to conquer. The earth can offer nothing further. It was confidently expected by the credulous that at the close of the season the entire company would ascend together in a blaze of glory. Imagine the shock to unduly wrought imaginations when they simply went away like ordinary mortals. Sic transit gloria mundi.

The only consolation we can offer those who are still wearily "climbing up the ever-climbing wave," is, that they must "learn to suffer and to wait"—until some one compiles a new dictionary with a fresh supply of superlatives.

But it has been profoundly remarked that "all things have an end." The operatic season has ended. There were several benefits, in accordance with the scriptural doctrine which teaches us that "unto him that hath shall be given, but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." There was a gala night or two, and the opera was over. The Sanitary Fair is over also. The heaving tide of life is settling back to its level, but thinking people recognize that it is a higher level than before. A decided advance in the Art culture of Chicago has been made within the last two months. The Fair brought here a collection of paintings by many of the best American artists. Sculpture has been ably if not very largely represented by Miss Hosmer's Zenobia, and some of the lesser works of Palmer. Architecture has achieved a triumph in the completion of the Opera House, which, if not the finest in the world, a point upon which we are not qualified to judge, never having seen "the world," is certainly a model of convenience, taste and beauty, in other words a "representative Opera House." Music has asserted its power by commanding the time and resources of the people to a remarkable degree for a season of two months. We have listened to the masterpieces of Mozart, Auber, Gounod, Donizetti, Bellini and Verdi, interpreted by such artists as Zucchi, Kellogg, Morensi, Ortolani, Bellini, Mazzoleni, Sisini, Massimiliani, and Lotti.

If we have not a generally cultivated taste for art, we certainly have for fashion, which, practically amounts to very much the same thing in supporting the Opera, indeed, perhaps, to rather more. Taste in itself is eminently unproductive. People who have no castles of their own, build themselves "castles in Spain," and fill their souls with beauty, which costs little in money, and has no disposition to take unto itself wings and fly away. But they are rarely able to pay for the beauty that is in other people's souls. Idealism is expensive, but idealists seldom pay for it. Fashion, however, has a wonderful power in the adaptation of means to ends. It has a keen eye to the good things of this world, and usually the wherewithal to get them, which after all is very convenient. If money will not buy appreciation, it will buy something that cultivates it, and so in the end fashion is really the good genius of artists. With us it serves very well as a scaffolding, until the glorious temple of Art shall have built itself a more solid foundation in the hearts of the people.

ALTON GRAY.

ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY.—We had no room in our last to speak of the delightful Soirée at Chickering's Rooms, on the evening of June 8. It was truly refreshing to the social room full of invited guests, in the musical dearth that has followed the Festival. The Club still holds its own under the able directorship of Mr. KREISSMANN, and the part-songs were sung with spirit, delicacy and perfect unity. These were: "Abendruhe," by Hauptmann, "Reiterlust," (Gade); "In der Ferne," and "Das Lieben bringt gross' Freud," (Robert Franz); "Das Vögelin im Wald," (Dürner), "Ich liebe was fein ist," (Marschner); "Wohin?" Zöllner), "Hüte dich," (Girschner); and a very clever, droll burlesque on the "Carnival of Venice," by Gené. Messrs. DRESSEL and LEONARD played the slow movement and finale of quite an old-fashioned Concerto in E flat, for two pianos, by Mozart. Mr. Kreissmann sang with his usual fine artistic feeling a couple of songs by Franz and Schumann. But the freshest and most enjoyable feature of the evening was three Arias from Mozart's operas, sung with accompaniment for two pianos arranged from the orchestral score by Mr. Dresel, and with such consummate skill that almost all that the orchestral parts contain was there. In Leporello's "Madamina!" you seemed actually to hear the orchestra, and the air was sung with delightful unction by Mr. SCHRAUBSTAEDTER. The other two were from the Seraglio: a bass recitative and air in the part of Osmyn, the jailor, sung by Mr. LANGERFELDT, and one of the most profoundly tender and beautiful tenor songs to be found in Mozart's operas, too little known among us, Belmont's apostrophe to Costanza, which gave scope to Mr. Kreissmann's best powers. We trust these real gems of song, with such accompaniment, will become well known next winter.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.—We cannot print any contribution unless we know the name of the writer. This necessary rule has deprived us of the pleasure of printing more than one good article.

MENDELSSOHN MUSICAL INSTITUTE.—Our readers who have been interested by reports from Mr. OLIVER's excellent school, will be gratified to hear of its continued prosperity. Its twenty-eighth term has just closed another year of unexpected success in our city, during which fifteen out of forty-eight pupils have graduated, many of whom now occupy, or are about to occupy, positions of importance as teachers in seminaries or towns in various parts of the country. By special request of a majority of the pupils, no time has been devoted to preparation for a public exhibition of the skill they have attained, and the teachers of the Institute, entirely satisfied with the evidence of public appreciation afforded by a goodly share of patronage, willingly accede to their wishes. The next term commences Oct. 5.

Rossini's "Barbiere" has lately been given in London by Adelina Patti, Mario and Ronconi; and the London Times says that "no other such representatives of the characters of Rosina, Almaviva and Figaro have existed within the memory of the present generation." Of Patti the Times adds:

"Happily, though petted, Mlle. Patti is by no means spoiled. This is apparent in the progress she is continually making. No lyric comedian at present on the boards tries harder to perfect herself—to make herself mistress, in short, of all the requirements indispensable to her recognition as an artist of the first class. Nature has not only bountifully provided her with the physical means, but also with the rare gift of original genius. She can not only master with incredible ease whatever is set down for her, but invent for herself. A more charmingly piquant, graceful, and refined assumption than her Rosina could hardly be imagined.

We think there is no exaggeration in what is said above of the three artists in the "Barbieri," for we heard them sing it in London four years ago.

A biography of Schubert, published abroad, includes many extracts from his diary, like the following:

"1824. From the deepest recesses of my heart do I hate that one-sidedness which causes so many poor wretches to believe that only the particular occupation in which they are engaged is the best, and that all the rest are nothing. One beauty should accompany man through life—that is love—but the lustre of his enthusiasm for this should brighten everything else."

"27th March. There is no one who understands the sorrow of another, and no one who understands the joy of another. We always fancy we go to some one else, and we go only by his side. O torment for him who knows this!"

"My productions in music spring from my understanding and from my sorrow; those which my sorrows alone created appear to please the world most."

THE CENTRAL PARK, in New York, is certainly a great fact in the æsthetic, and to some extent the musical, culture of the people. Is it not pleasant to picture to oneself a scene like this described in the Tribune?

The fourth concert of the season was given at the Park on Saturday afternoon, by the Central Park Band, under the direction of H. B. Dodworth. The selections were well made, and creditably rendered, to an assembly far too vast to enjoy the music; thousands wandering off in various directions, lounging on the grass, boating on the lake, looking at the (at present) very diminutive zoological collection, taking the air in carriages, feeding the swans, partaking of ices, and luxuriating in modes too numerous to mention. The day was charming, a delicious breeze springing up about the time of the concert, and continuing until long after sunset. The sky was as soft and blue as the eye of Laura di Noves bending over the passionate sonnets of Petrarch; the air was balmy and delicious as the blooming vales of Andalusia. The heavens seemed to kiss the earth, and each to glow with new beauty born of the dear caress. Little was left to desire physically as one sat on the benches or reclined on the smooth sward; the zephyrs stirring the leaves or playing in his hair; the eye resting on the broad, sweet, green shade—a grateful oasis in the brick and mortar desert of the city—with a full and exquisite sense of repose; the soft, melancholy music of Schubert or the vivacious, half-intoxicating strains of Strauss floating and throbbing through the atmosphere into the melody-awakened heart with a semi-voluptuous, semi-spiritual influence. Thousands of citizens and strangers were there on foot and in vehicles of all kinds. Brilliant toilets and lovely faces beamed from the carriages and along the promenades. Every man, woman and child looked happy under the Tuscan sky of rose-fragrant June. The toils, the cares and anxieties of life were forgotten for those few hours which were surrendered quite to the tranquility and pleasure of the radiant scene. We were glad to observe among the throng, a large representation of the mechanical and laboring class, who had come there with their wives and sweethearts and children to breathe a little fresh air, and gain an opportunity to preserve through their next week of toil a pleasant memory and a sweet anticipation of joys to be renewed. Our glorious Park is what it was designed to be—a resort for the people at large; a place of rest and recreation for the poor and humble, who have not the means to seek Saratoga or the sea-shore, the quiet nooks of the country, and the cool shelter of the mountain retreats. The Park generally, but especially on such occasions as Saturday, represents the heterogeneous homogeneity (if we may use the expression) of the Republic, and particularly the metropolitan and cosmopolitan character of New York.

Fashionable women, flashing with jewels and brave with immaculate toilets, rustle against the plain robes of artisan's wives and day-laborers' daughters. Broadway dandies, who give what little mind they have to their sartorial adornment, come in contact with the threadbare coat and the over-worn pantaloons of the small tradesman or burly stove-dore, who does not care a fig for modes, and never heard of La Folle in all his life. All ranks, grades, phases of society are found at the Park; and they who believe everybody is out of town have but to visit the vicinity of Fifty-ninth street, to discover their mistake. The Park is indeed, a grand social maelstrom, where personal distinction is for the time being lost, and pretentious individuality swallowed up.

There must have been at least, 20,000 to 25,000 people scattered over the Park on Saturday; but in that large crowd there was no disturbance, no violation of order, no transgression whatever.

Verily we are encouraged to believe the American people are growing civilized, and that in the course of time, we can assemble together and enjoy ourselves rationally without manifesting any disposition to put our National irreverence into practice, and do what we ought not to do just for that reason. We are gradually though steadily gaining in repose, at least externally; we are slowly learning to rid ourselves of the fever that burns our lives out so early; we are gradually disciplining ourselves into self-containment and augmenting our discipline without losing our strength. As a country we need rest, and we are taking it more than we used, and will take more and more because we have so magnificent a place to seek and find it as the Central Park.

MR. L. H. SOUTHARD.—We clipped the following from the Transcript of May 30th, but in the crowd of other matters it was overlooked. Mr. Southard is one of our best musicians, as well as a tried pianist.

CONCERT IN ROXBURY.—The production of original musical works is always a matter of interest, since it is seldom that we are able to welcome the advent of a composer of genius. In spite of the vast number of published pieces, there are fewer originators of ideas in public probably, than in any of the arts. Mr. L. H. Southard, well known in this city some years ago, and who has now returned after nearly three years' military service, gave a concert at the Mount Pleasant church on Wednesday evening last. He was ably sustained by the choir, aided by several distinguished amateurs. The programme was finely arranged, and every portion of it enjoyable; but the chief interests centered in the few original compositions of the conductor. We have not space for description or analysis, but only to say in general that they display creative powers of a high order and are full of sentiment, fervor, taste and learning. They should be heard in a wider circle, as they will be sooner or later.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Palladium of June 14th says:

W. Eugene Thayer, of Boston, gave a concert at Mechanics Hall on the evening of the 7th instant, assisted by Miss Annie Cary, Miss Loise Adams, Mr. J. P. Draper, vocalists, and Mr. Joseph Sharland, pianist. Among the best of the performances were Mr. Thayer's playing of Bach's great Fugue in G Minor, the beautiful Sonata of Mendelssohn, No. 3, in A, and the Larghetto from Beethoven's Second Symphony. Mr. Thayer also performed one of his "Idyls of the Rose," and an improvisation. The Organ had long been silent, the player was on the eve of departure for Europe and study, and the concert was most favorably received. The other performers acquitted themselves well. Miss Cary sang in her best manner, and Miss Adams' voice and singing were an agreeable surprise. With our Hall and Organ, we should often hear similar concerts. The "minstrels" have nearly usurped the former of late. Happily, the "black cloud" cannot overshadow the Organ as well!

Another concert on the Worcester Organ was given on the 17th of June, by Mr. H. B. DANFORTH, who played Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor; Overture to Tell, and Batiste's "Thunder Storm" Fantasia.

A Concert—"Grand" of course—was to be given on the 28th ult. by Mr. F. ZITTERBART, of New York, a graduate of the Conservatory of Dresden. Mr. Zitterbart (how shall we translate the queer name? Shakes-beard? Wizzle-whiskers?) is a pianist, of what stamp will appear from his selections: "Grand Fantasia from Dinorah," Grand Valse de Concert from Faust; Fantasia: "Pearl Shower," (original.) Worcester seems favored with thunder storms this season.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- O rosy morn. Song. Abt. 30
How fair art thou! (Wie schön bist du.) Weidt. 30
Two capital German songs.
Earth, the beautiful Earth for me. S. Glover. 30
Glover has musically rendered a fine poetic idea, and of course the music is good.
Could I be near my boy! M. Keller. 30
A sweet, affectionate ballad, with music, perhaps, a little better than the average.
I always feared a married life. 40
Gentle flower, can't thou tell. 30
My own native vale. 30
Three songs from "Love's Ransom," by Hutton.
This opera contains a number of excellent songs, of which the above three are good specimens.
Thou who searchest the depths of the heart. (Dio, che leggi in fondo all' alma). Patella. 75
Of the character of the greater opera pieces, long, and difficult, but more worthy of practice on that account, as one rises by such practice nearer to the higher ranks of vocalists.
The lovely lass o' Inverness. (Die holde Magd von Inverness). Beethoven. 30
Words by Burns. The music very mournful, but—Beethoven wrote it.
Celestial Hope. Tenor Solo and Quartet. Arr. from Beethoven by A. Davenport. 50
This is the last of the series of quartets, which Mr. D. has, with fine taste and skill, "separated from a secular to a sacred use." They are all good, and are acceptable additions to choir musical literature.
My heart and hand are thine. (Mir ist so wunderbar). "Fidelio." 60
The celebrated quartet, in which Leonore, with Marcelline and her father, and the rustic lover, take part. Not very difficult for common singers.

Instrumental.

- Fragment of the Allegretto of Beethoven's 7th Symphony. Arranged by Batiste for Organ. 60
Fragment of Finale and Adagio, of Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Arranged by Batiste. 75
Fragment of the Allegretto of Beethoven's 8th Symphony, arr. for organ by Batiste. 50
These pieces must, of necessity, be good, considering the author and the arranger. Difficult, but not extremely so.
Sonata in F. Four hands. Diabelli. 75
Teachers, in the habit of using Diabelli's duets, think very highly of them. They are very "playable," have no awkward places in them, but the fingers go over them easily and naturally. As there is no better practice for pupils than duet playing, practical teachers will be glad to try this and the other pieces.
Barber of Seville. Fantasia Brillante. J. Leybach. 1.00
A brilliant opera, and a good "variationist" put together, are pretty certain to bring out a sparkling place. Try it.
Pas Redoublé. Morceau Brillante. Sidney Smith. 75
Smith's music has been already described as very sweet as well as brilliant. A fine piece.
Operatic Pot-pourri.
Il Trovatore. Piano and Violin. Eichberg. 75
Traviata. " " " 75
Mr. Eichberg continues his good work, and here provides acceptable practice for lovers of the violin and of operas.
The dream. Piano and Violin. J. F. Spaulding. 75
Love's messengers. Waltz. A. Birgfeld. 50
Cherry ripe. Galop. J. Cassidy. 35
Love's whispers. Song without words. V. de Ham. 50

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 634.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 9.

The Handel Festival at Sydenham.

[From Novello's Musical Times.]

The real love for the sacred compositions of the great masters—even of our own Handel—amongst the middle classes is of very recent date. When we remember the state of ignorance on the subject, even at the time the "Oratorio Concerts" at Drury Lane and Covent Garden Theatres were first projected; when the "Ancient Concerts" attempted feebly to uphold the cause to the exclusive few, and the Royal Society of Musicians gave its performance of the "Messiah," as the sacred musical event of the year, it must be obvious that some extraordinary influence must have been exerted to effect so important a change in so short a period.

That this great power was the establishment of the Sacred Harmonic Society can scarcely be for a moment doubted. Founded in the year 1832, it commenced its operations in the Lower Hall, Exeter Hall, creeping gradually into notice for the first few years, until in 1836 the first performance of the Society took place in the Large Hall; and from that date, it may be said to have formed one of the institutions of the country, spreading a love for sacred music not only throughout England, but indirectly inciting musical enthusiasts in the colonies to form similar Societies for the performance of works which had been sealed to the masses for years.

The statistics of the performances given by this Society in the recently published report, are exceedingly interesting, as showing the relative popularity of the composers whose works have been given. It is stated that since 1836, 463 concerts have taken place in Exeter Hall. Of these 463 concerts, 231 (or half the entire number) have been devoted to the Oratorios and other important works of Handel. Mendelssohn's compositions have formed either the entire or principal feature of 132 concerts; and it has been lately seen that the sacred music of Spohr (!) is likely at length to take as permanent a place in the Society's repertoire as the works of either the composers already mentioned.

But in tracing the cause of the widely spread love for sacred music, it must be remembered that Novello's cheap series of Oratorios not only supplied the demand which was caused by the constant performance of these works, but actually created a public of its own, by circulating, at the price of a common-place ballad, the entire Oratorios amongst the audience; so that, not only were they enabled to follow every note during the representation of the works, but a library of standard sacred compositions was almost unconsciously formed in thousands of homes, leading in a short time to the establishment of private and public choral societies, which have increased and strengthened year by year.

Although the influence of the Sacred Harmonic Society has been extremely beneficial to the cause of sacred music from its formation in 1832, there can be little doubt that its power has been enormously increased since Mr. Costa has taken the direction of its affairs. Not only has he labored hard to give the greatest effect to all the performances of the Society, but his indefatigable exertions in training a permanent choir, available at any moment to undertake the most abstruse compositions, cannot be too highly commended; and although it must have been long considered a reproach that London had no periodical musical Festival, like Birmingham, Norwich, Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester, we question whether this slur would even now have been effectually removed, had it not been for the personal energy and perseverance of Mr. Costa.

The experiment of a Handel Festival was gently tried in 1857, at the Crystal Palace; for with such an enormous outlay, it was necessary to feel the way very gradually before the Sacred Harmonic Society committed itself boldly to a triennial performance. The success of the undertaking, however, was so decisive that all doubt upon the matter was at once dispelled; and the performances of '59 and '62 have amply proved that the result may now be confidently relied upon.

The directors of the Crystal Palace having so energetically co-operated with the Sacred Harmonic Society in carrying out all the minute details connected with the Festival, it is scarcely to be wondered at that this triennial musical meeting should take place in a building so admirably adapted to accommodate the thousands of people who are attracted by so magnificent a performance. No doubt, acoustics has its fixed laws, which cannot be put aside by any amount of enthusiasm; but a demonstration of so gigantic a nature requires a building of commensurate proportions; and we may conscientiously say that everything has been done on the present occasion to remedy the defects inseparable from the performance of such an enormous body of voices in a space not originally constructed for music. The programme lately issued by the Crystal Palace Company tells us that it has taken three Festivals to complete the great orchestra, with its vast roof twice the diameter of the dome of St. Paul's; and that the number of executants falls little short of four thousand; statistics which must at once prove that the immense area required for the present Festival can be found nowhere but at the Crystal Palace, where beauty of structure, light and air, combine to give a cheerfulness to the scene which could never be found in a metropolitan concert-room, however colossal might be its dimensions. Without pausing to consider whether these periodical Festivals should be exclusively devoted to the compositions of Handel—a question, however, which we think worthy of consideration—there can be little doubt that, admitting the fact, the selection made for the three days' performance is the very best that could be devised. The Messiah, that deeply religious poem, which must ever retain its place in all English musical Festivals, has a right to take the lead, not only at the head of Handel's works, but at the head of all performances where sacred music is to form the distinguishing feature. Then for the next great Oratorio, which shall prove how masses of individuals can unite under one directing mind to interpret the most gigantic specimens of choral writing ever conceived, no work can be found like Israel in Egypt, a composition, the intricate beauties of which the Sacred Harmonic Society may certainly claim to have educated the people to appreciate. The middle day between the performances of these two Oratorios is devoted to a selection from the works of Handel, in which, in addition to the compositions which the general public always expects to hear, several pieces not so well known are given, with the intention of showing the universality of the composer's genius. The day fixed for this selection, the 28th of June, being the anniversary of Her Majesty's Coronation, the great Coronation Anthem, Zadok the Priest, appropriately forms a portion of the performance.

FIRST DAY, (MONDAY, JUNE 26. "MESSIAH.")

Of the general execution of this Oratorio on the opening day of the Festival it would be impossible to speak too highly. Few persons would go to the Handel Festival to pass a severe critical judgment on the solos—the immense space necessary for the due effect of the choruses preventing even the finest voices from reaching the auditors with sufficient tone to satisfy the ear—but many of the principal airs were on this occasion given with more success than we remember at any similar performance at the Crystal Palace. Mlle. Adelina Patti had already shown at the Birmingham Festival how much real feeling she possessed for sacred music; and although the immense area at Sydenham seems to demand the power of Mlle. Titiens, we had in its place a simplicity and purity of vocalization admirably adapted to the devotional melodies of the Messiah.

That calmness and freedom from the slightest tinge of theatrical effect, which can only be obtained by constant practice in Oratorios, could scarcely, perhaps, at present be expected from one who nightly wins the most enthusiastic demonstrations of approval from the audience at the Royal Italian Opera: but we have hope in her future, for versatility—which is the surest sign of a great artist—is possessed in an eminent degree by Mlle. Patti, and we have little doubt that she may eventually achieve a name as great in sacred, as she has already done in secular music.

The florid portions of the air "Rejoice greatly" were thrown off with the ease to which Mlle. Patti has accustomed us; but the words "and he shall speak peace unto the heathen," seemed wanting in that deep feeling which is required as a contrast. In the beautiful air "I know that my Redeemer liveth," passing over the hesitation in one bar, she sang in her very best style, and with an expression that proved she had thoroughly studied the meaning of the words. As an acknowledged favorite of the public, she was received with the warmest applause; and never did an artist more conscientiously strive to win it. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington was eminently successful in her solos, her clear voice penetrating every portion of the concert-room. The soprano solo, "Take his yoke upon you," (which forms the second verse of "He shall feed his flock") was most exquisitely delivered; and we can scarcely say, in the trial of strength between contralto and soprano—which it appears this song is always in future to be—whether Madame Sainton Dolby or Madame Sherrington bore off the palm. The air "How beautiful are the feet" was most chastely rendered by Madame Sherrington; and the recitatives which fell to her share were carefully and earnestly sung. Madame Sainton-Dolby is so well known as a practised and thoroughly competent singer in sacred music that we need only say that she gave the whole of the contralto music in her usual admirable style, especially the air "He was despised," which lies excellently within her register; and the bass air, "But who may abide," which it now seems the universal custom to give to a contralto. The principal tenor part in the Messiah seems so identified with Mr. Sims Reeves, that a great performance of the Oratorio would appear almost incomplete without him. There are few singers who have so thoroughly caught the Handelian feeling as Mr. Reeves, as his delivery of the opening recitative and air "Comfort ye," and "Every valley" will amply prove, even to those whose memory can carry them back to the best days of Braham. His recitative is as fine a specimen of pure English elocution as we ever listened to; and as he does not allow himself to be betrayed into the fatal error of displaying his voice at the expense of the composer, the listener is never checked in that devotional feeling which Handel's music, purely interpreted, never fails to produce. As an instance of the manner in which he reserves his voice for the power which is imperatively called for, we may instance the air "Thou shalt break them," in which the words "Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel" were declaimed with a force which proves that the upper notes of his register are fully at his command whenever he requires them. Mr. Santley's fine voice was heard to great advantage in the vigorous air "Why do the nations;" and Mr. Weiss sang carefully the recitative and air "For behold darkness," and "The people that walked," but with a tameness which too often mars some of his best vocal efforts. The playing of Mr. Harper in the trumpet obligato of the air "The trumpet shall sound" (sung by Mr. Santley), was as usual one of the features of the Oratorio; but we cannot reconcile ourselves to the omission of the second part of this air, in B minor, thoroughly settled though it may be by custom. We have a recollection of its performance in its entire state at the Hereford Festival; and we have no hesitation in saying that Handel knew what he meant best.

The chorus singing was, on the whole, so uniformly good, that we should do an injustice to Mr. Costa were we not to award him unqualified praise for his exertions. That a certain amount of unsteadiness is occasionally apparent to the listeners is not to be wondered at when we consider that, were it even possible to make four thousand people go together like a machine, it would be utterly impossible for such accuracy to reach the audience. Such gigantic effects as can be gained by the united efforts of an enormous body of voices, therefore, must be accepted as a compensation for that precision which might be gained in a smaller space; and, viewed in this light, we question whether such chorus singing has ever been heard before. The first chorus, "And the glory of the Lord," was a marvel of musical organization; and, indeed, was one of the most perfect specimens of choral singing in the Oratorio. The subjects were given by the several departments of the choir with immense precision; and the altos, especially, were remarkably firm throughout. The value of mere numbers in Handel's grandest choruses was never perhaps more fully shown than in "For unto us a child is born." Familiar as this is to an English audience, the effect is always equally grand and impressive; and, with the exception of its performance at the last Birmingham Festival,—a sensation which still lingers in our memory—we have never heard it so well sung. Whether Mr. Costa, with the huge mass of executants before him, found it impossible to adhere to his usual method of whispering the opening part, and reserving all power for the words "Wonderful, Counsellor," or whether he has thought better of it, and kept operative effects for the Opera-house, we know not; but certainly the chorus was immensely improved by following the score as Handel wrote it. An enthusiastic encore, which could not be resisted, rewarded the choir for this fine performance. The "Hallelujah" Chorus was given with extraordinary vigor and precision; and, indeed, the choral forces were thoroughly efficient throughout the entire work, every point being taken up with a firmness which could only be obtained by a perfect system of training, and a resolution to yield implicit obedience to the conductor. Previous to the Oratorio, the National Anthem was excellently sung, first by the Soprani, then by the Alti, and afterwards in full chorus.

A demonstration on so gigantic a scale as this Festival is not to be judged solely in a musical point of view. Looking from the vast orchestra, filled with the most talented executants from all parts of the kingdom, we behold an immense area, in which every available space is occupied by an audience, whose attention is as much rivetted on the music as those whose duty it is to interpret it. No ardent worshipper of the art should underrate the significance of such a fact. The love of Handel's Oratorios has sunk deeply into the hearts of English people; and the Messiah is so regarded as an earnest outpouring of Christian joy and hopefulness that those who listen feel that they are participants in the realization of the work itself; and hence a bond of union is established between audience and artists. Thus indeed should it ever be with the undying creations of genius; for, as true religion makes converts wherever its pure doctrines are felt, so should true art draw within its magic influence the sympathies of the people, until all are made to feel that the worship of such works should be not partial, but universal.

SECOND DAY. MISCELLANEOUS.

(From the London Times.)

The performances began with selections from Saul, an oratorio composed three years earlier than Messiah, and comprising, as those who attend the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society are aware, some of Handel's noblest choral pieces. First there was the introduction to the first part—the "Epinicion," or song of triumph, for the victory over Goliath and his armies; next the scene where the deeds of Saul and David are conjointly celebrated by the Israelites; next David's prayer for Saul; next, the choral apostrophe to "Envy;" and lastly, the "Dead March." The selection was altogether suitable and effective—containing a reasonable admixture of choruses with solo recitatives and airs. The chorus, "How excellent is Thy name!" the semi-chorus, "Along the monster atheist strode"—so full of character; and the chorus, "The youth inspired by Thee, O Lord," ending with a bright and cheerful "Hallelujah" (the Epinicion) formed one piece of music, connected together by the soprano solo, "An infant raised by Thy command," sung yesterday by Mlle. Parepa. Then the sinfonia and semi-chorus, "à carillons," "Welcome, welcome, mighty King," with full chorus, on the same theme, "David his ten thousands slew," interspersed with recitatives for Michal and Saul (Mlle. Parepa and Mr. Santley), formed another, in a more directly jubilant vein. Then the air, "O Lord, whose mercies," when David prays for Saul, whom he is about to console and divert with the music of the harp (admirably sung by Madame Sainton Dolby, and loudly applauded), imparting a graver coloring, which in the wonderfully impressive chorus, "Envy, eldest born of hell!" was deepened into a gloom bordering on the terrible. This and the incomparable "Dead March" were, strange to say, though the most sombre, precisely the parts which in yesterday's selection from Saul created the most marked sensation. The chorus was sung, the march played, in perfection. Both were encored and both repeated.

Next to Saul came Samson, which may be said to tread on the heels of Messiah, having, with the exception of three pieces—including the air "Let the bright Seraphim," and the chorus, "Let the celestial concerts," not originally forming part of the work—been completed about six weeks later. Both these added pieces were included yesterday, preceded, however, by the pathetic air of Samson's father, Manoah—"How willing my paternal love"—confided to Mr. Santley, who has rarely sung with more genuine and artistic expression. Great as the sensation produced at the rehearsal by Mlle. Adeline Patti's facile and brilliant execution of "Let the bright Seraphim" (trumpet, Mr. T. Harper), it was exceeded yesterday. There is nothing left for us to add to our previous description of this performance, one of the most faultless, as well as one of the most striking, we can recall; nor shall we attempt to describe its effect. Enough that a repetition was demanded from all sides; and that again the voice and the trumpet made music together to the intense satisfaction of the entire audience. The ingenious, grand, and truly picturesque chorus, "Let their celestial concerts all unite"—a splendid afterthought of the inspired composer—made a glorious climax to the brief and welcome selection from his Samson.

To Samson succeeded two pieces from the pastoral serenata, entitled Acis and Galatea, words by Gay, a better poet than it was often Handel's good fortune to find as co-laborer, and performed at Cannons, the seat of the Duke of Chandos—for whom it had been expressly written, in 1721, about twenty years earlier than the Messiah. These pieces were the respective love songs of Acis and Polypheme, the "star-struck" shepherd and the formidable giant, co-aspirants for the favors of the beautiful Galatea (who, by the way, might have been allowed to complete the picture with "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir"). Mozart himself never surpassed "Love in her eyes sits playing;" while, with "Ruddier than the cherry," nothing we know of can be compared, seeing that no other composer has set to music the burning passion of a Cyclops able to annihilate his rivals by hurling rocks at them. How Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley are accustomed to give these very oppositely-conceived love songs it is unnecessary to remind our musical readers. The first, which breathes the very breath of tender melody, affording the usual tranquil pleasure; the last, all fierceness and impetuosity, raised the usual enthusiasm and was unanimously called for again.

The epithalamium for Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, "May no rash intruder"—the "Nightingale Chorus," as it has been named, on account of a peculiarly characteristic feature in the orchestral accompaniments, one of the most popular things in Solomon—which came next in order, was so well sung, and the pianissimo, at the passage—sustained with such exquisite and unflinching truth of intonation, that it was asked for again, and another repetition was thus added to an already sufficiently long catalogue. The oratorio, Solomon, written in 1748, seven years later than the Messiah and Samson, shows, nevertheless, no diminution whatever in the vigor of the composer's powers or the freshness of his melodic invention.

"Ye zephyrs, soft breathing, their slumber prolong, While nightingales lull them to sleep with their song"—

The next piece—the Coronation Anthem, "Zadok the Priest," one of four composed for the Coronation of George II. and Queen Caroline in Westminster Abbey—took us back again more than 20 years (1726). Few composers can better stand this arbitrary mixing up of epochs than Handel; and, as every one had anticipated, "Zadok the Priest" was not only one of the grandest and most impressive, but one of the most completely successful performances of the day.

A selection from Judas Maccabæus, the martial oratorio intended to celebrate the victory of Culloden (1746), comprised more than one popular air, more than one admired chorus. The chaste and devotional "Pious orgies" was given in a chaste and devotional style by Mlle. Parepa; the florid "From mighty Kings," was perfectly executed by Mlle. Adeline Patti; and the heroic recitative and air, "Sound an alarm," was splendidly declaimed by Mr. Sims Reeves. This, the last encore, though vociferous and prolonged, was the only one not accepted. The choruses, "O Father whose almighty power," solemn and grand; "We hear, we hear," the response to "Sound an alarm;" and "We never, never will bow down," which in power, majesty, and elaborate contrivance even Handel has rarely surpassed, were one and all nobly given by the vast company of players and singers, whose exertions were directed by Mr. Costa with even more than his accustomed vigor, decision, and skill; the richly varied and uniformly interesting selection being triumphantly brought to a close by an execution of the familiar though never hackneyed "See the conquering hero comes"—solo trio (Mesdames Adeline Patti, Parepa, and Sainton), semi-chorus, and full chorus—which was of a piece with all that had gone before. As on Monday, the concert proceeded from the first chorus to the end without an interval of repose.

To-morrow, Israel in Egypt, always the most attractive performance of the three, will again bring the Handel Festival to a conclusion. In no other oratorio is the gigantic chorus assembled together from all parts at these extraordinary celebrations heard to such striking and continuous advantage as in this colossus.

A Friend of German Music.

(From the N. Y. Weekly Review.)

We find in the Revue Moderne, one of the most excellent publications of France, an article entitled "Chats about Music," which offers the somewhat novel spectacle of a Frenchman who with zeal and understanding has explored the sometimes dangerous depths of German music, and is not one of the narrow-minded critics whom we meet with almost everywhere among the foreign reviewers of German music. The author of this highly pleasing article is L. Viardot.

It is in the form of a conversation, which takes place at Baden-Baden. The author meets in that charming watering-place a Neapolitan gentleman whom he has seen before in Naples, and whose companion through the mountains he becomes. The Neapolitan confesses that the evergreen pine and fir trees, and the splendid meadows, are pleasant even to Italian eyes: but he cannot admire them, because they are part of Germany—and he hates Germany too much to love her forests. The author replies that Baden does not deserve the hatred of a man who loves liberty, as it is full of freedom-loving people; but his friend answers him, "It is all the same; I shall hate the Germans so long as they possess Venice."

"True," says the Frenchman, "you do not possess Venice, but you have not Rome either;" and he goes on to prove that Germany, by the Reformation, has rescued all nations from the pope-king of the world, and from the rule of the priests: and digressing upon the subject of the arts, he speaks about the influence which German art has had upon Italy. At these words the Italian exclaims:

"The arts! the arts! You want to compare German with Italian art! Albrecht Dürer with Raphael?"

"Calm yourself," says the Frenchman. "Dürer was in friendly correspondence with Raphael, and was the actual teacher of Raphael's best interpreter, Marc Anton Raimondi, who with the same chisel copied the frescos in the Vatican and Dürer's works."

Then he proceeds to state that German art has had two beautiful buds, painting and music.

"Music!" exclaims the irate Italian. "Do you want to take the palm from the country which Dante calls

"Il bel paese ove si suona?"

Yes, I will take the palm from Italy and give it to Germany."

And then Viardot proves with irresistible logic and by indisputable facts, that German music is superior to Italian music in every respect. The discussion first turns upon the origin of music as an art, which the Italian fixes at the time of Palestrina.

"Do you know who was Palestrina's teacher?" asks the Frenchman.

"Flamand Goudimel," replies the Italian.

"Well, then, and Goudimel's teacher was Martin Luther! That heretic has the honor of having been the father of music, who propagated it. It was he who drew it from the priests' cloisters, where it was shut up as a part of their paraphernalia. He divested it of the Latin language—he delivered it from prison, and causing his chorals to be sung in German, in the open squares of the cities and villages, he made music a free and popular art!"

The friends, after a lengthy discussion, agree to compare composers of the eighteenth century only—of the golden era of music. The Italian leads, as in a game of chess, by presenting an officer, Benedetto Marcello, to head the van; but he is met by Handel, whose twenty-six oratorios are compared to Marcello's fifty psalms. Handel's oratorios are fresh to day, everywhere, while Marcello's works are only to be found in libraries. The Italian now withdraws Marcello and puts Scarlatti in front. The Frenchman asks him whether he knows of the inkstand which is kept in the Conservatory at Naples.

"No," replies the Italian.

"Well—that inkstand has been kept there for two centuries, because all the celebrated Italian composers from Alessandro to Donizetti have put their pens in it. Eh bien! you take all that these masters knew, and you will not have a total result of what one German composer embraced in his mind—and that composer was John Sebastian Bach!"

The Italian had barely heard the name of Bach.

"That is all," says the Frenchman "that you in Italy know about him; and in France he is but little more known. He is the legislator of music!"

The Italian is compelled to withdraw Scarlatti, and mentions Boccherini, the inventor of the symphony, who however was beaten by Haydn with his one hundred and forty symphonies and sonatas. Porpora and Pergolesi vanish before Gluck. "He created the opera, which before him was a concert, and which he made a musical drama. Piccini is forgotten, but Gluck lives!"

The Italian then tries Cimarosa, but is answered that even Rossini bowed before Mozart, Cimarosa's contemporary.

"But Mozart is not a man, he is a host!"

"Call him Mozart, and you have praised him! A man who in a life of thirty-six years has composed six hundred pieces. He could have written what a proud Spaniard once wrote on his coat of arms, which showed a sun rising above the stars, and the inscription, 'What are they, when I rise?'"

The Italian agrees with the Frenchman, but mentions Cherubini, the author of operas and sacred music.

"True," says the Frenchman, "he is a great man, but what do you ever hear of him in Italy? If you want to hear something of Cherubini, you have to go to Leipsic, Vienna, or Berlin, and not to Italy, or to his adopted country, France. And against him I match Beethoven: against Cherubini's 'Medea,' 'Lodoiska,' and 'Faniska,' I match 'Fidelio,' 'Egmont,' and the 'Ruins of Athens'; against the 'Messe du Sacre,' the 'Missa Solemnis'; against Cherubini's three quartets, seventeen by Beethoven, besides six trios, six concertos, thirty-two sonatas, and his immortal nine symphonies."

The victory of Germany is completed by Carl Maria von Weber, and the conversation ends with a courteous and warm praise of Rossini; and now the author says the following true words to his friend:

"What does it matter whether these composers have been born on the right or on the left side of the Alps? All of them are men—all benefactors of mankind. In almanacs of future times, the days of the year will be marked by the names of great authors and artists from all nations, and Germans and Italians, French, English, Hindoos and Americans will be blended in one great family!"

"Amen!" says the Italian; and the friends return arm-in-arm.

Music Abroad.

London.

We have for some time, in our collection of foreign musical intelligence, been mainly attentive to what was passing on the Continent, letting our resumé of London music run very much behindhand. We were in fact discouraged by the enormous multitude of operas, oratorios, concerts of all sorts, going on there, and it seemed a hopeless task to try to report of them. We propose now to look back over a period of three months or more, and give a brief and general survey of the field (at least under its principal aspects), so far as we are enabled by perusal of the English musical journals.

Of the Operas, we have indeed already given the substance of what was notable up to a recent date, and may leave this branch of the subject to take its turn again later. The Oratorio societies—though we continually read of performances of the Messiah, Elijah, Judas Maccabæus, and Costa's Naaman, have bent all their energies for months past towards the great Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, which took place near the end of June, and of which an account will be found on our first page. We turn therefore to those concerts of classical instrumental music which fill so large a space in the musical life of London, and which we have so long neglected, beginning with Orchestral Music.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The 53d season of the old classical society began in the latter part of March, between which time and the end of June it had given seven concerts, as usual in Hanover Square Rooms, and under the direction of England's chief musician, Prof. William Sterndale Bennett. Programmes true to their old character: always two Symphonies (mostly from the old sources), commonly two overtures, a Concerto, and some sprinklings of song. But new things have not been entirely tabooed, and even Schumann's name is not the bugbear that it used to be in that quarter, as we presently shall see.

The Symphonies of the first concert were Haydn, Letter I, and Beethoven, No. 4. The Overtures, Weber's "Ruler of the Spirits," and the "scholarly prelude to Onslow's little-known opera," L'Alcalde de la Vega, which, they say, is written strictly in the style of Mozart, as if Beethoven never had been born. Spohr's 9th Violin Concerto was played, in a masterly manner it would seem, by Herr Ludwig Strauss. Miss Louisa Pyne sang things by Auber and by Wallace, and Mr. Renwick sang an Aria from Spohr's Faust.

The second concert was graced by Royalty (Prince and Princess of Wales, &c.) Symphonies: Mozart in E flat, Beethoven in C minor. Overtures: Oberon and Le Philtre (Auber). Joachim, the master violinist, played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and doubtless as no other man could play it. The singers were Mme. Emma Heywood, contralto, who sang an old air by Rossi, with happy effect, and a duet from Spohr's Jessonda with Mme. Parepa (that rival of Alboni in dimensions), and the latter sang Non paventar, from the "Magic Flute."

The third concert (May 1) began with a fine performance of the Pastoral Symphony, and closed with Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture. Mlle. Edenska, a Russian contralto, from the Imperial Opera at Moscow, sang the romanza from Linda; Mlle. Sinico, from Her Majesty's Theatre, gave Qui la voce, and the two combined in Rossini's Quis est Homo. The chief attraction, however, is thus described by the Musical World:

This was the new symphony in G minor, written expressly for the Philharmonic Concerts by their excellent conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett, and produced near the end of last season. Received with enthusiasm on the first occasion, it was still more enthusiastically appreciated now. In the interval between the two Philharmonic performances, the symphony in G minor had been adopted by the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipsic, where its composer, more than 20 years ago, used to play, to conduct when Mendelssohn played, and to hear his own overtures and other works performed so often and with such applause. A composition so original, so fresh, spontaneous, and full of genuine musical beauty, could hardly fail to please an assembly of connoisseurs like the subscribers to the Gewandhaus. The work gains much by closer acquaintance. The character of the allegro serioso, the opening movement, is only so far not symphonic inasmuch as the customary elaborations of the second part, or "free fantasia," as the Germans sometimes call it, is replaced by a wholly independent episode. This episode, nevertheless, reappearing unexpectedly near the end, at once vindicates its own importance and makes clear the design of the composer. The movement abounds in melody, has quite a romantic tone, and is instrumented with a master hand from one end to the other. The succeeding movement, a ripietito with trio in the old established form, is as perfect in its way as it is entirely unpretending. The two sections are contrasted with great felicity, the brass instruments in the trio giving a wonderful brightness of coloring after the quiet repose of the mainetto. The ronde finale is fully as original, fully as spirited, and fully as interesting as either of its precursors. The leading themes are not merely striking, but effectively opposed to each other; and the movement is conducted with a vigor and animation that never flag. The finale, in short, has only one fault, and that fault is its somewhat disproportionate brevity. If ever Professor Bennett can be induced to develop it, and, further, to compose a slow movement for the symphony, he will bestow still higher importance upon a work which, as it stands, is a credit to himself and an honor to the English school.

The fourth concert had certainly a great programme: Mozart's "Jupiter" and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphonies; Weber's Euryanthe, and Beethoven's Egmont Overtures; and Beethoven's Violin Concerto, played by a virtuoso of the first class, of good name in the classical concerts of Germany, Herr Lauterbach. Rare interest attached to the vocal pieces, for, says Davison:

Madame Joachim (wife of the eminent violinist) has not only a mezzo soprano voice every tone of which is rich and sympathetic, but sings with a style that proclaims her an artist born. Gluck's "Cho faro senza Eurydice" (Orfeo) and Mozart's "Deh! per questo" (La Clemenza di Tito) were ambitious selections for a débutante, before such an audience as that of the Philharmonic Concerts. But Madame Joachim, by the refined and expressive manner in which she delivered both, established her unquestionable right to come forward with such music under any circumstances. Notwithstanding a slight nervousness, quite intelligible under the circumstances, she produced an unmistakable impression.

Of the fifth concert (tainted perhaps with Schumannism?) our Musical World friend is silent; here is the Orchestra's report:

With a programme carefully and richly arranged, the Philharmonic Society's fifth concert was further interesting inasmuch as Clara Schumann was there to expound her husband's Concerto in A minor, and there awakened a sensation which proved the lealty of the piano loving world to the queen of the piano. Added to Schumann, Mlle. de Murska formed another strong attraction—an astonishing one. Those among the audience who had judged Mlle. de Murska's capacity in the opera-house seemed yet unprepared for her concert-capacity. She created a sensation such as this year has not yet seen—a fièvre which reminded one of the days of a warmer public and stronger auditorial passions. It was a wise step the directors made in securing the chief attraction of the season, for De Murska will become the rage. Premising that the performance of Mendelssohn's overture in C, composed when the maestro was a mere lad of 16, was most satisfactory at the hands of the Philharmonics, we give the programme:—Symphony (No. 2) in D minor, Spohr; Aria, "Gli angui d'inferno" (Il Flauto Magico), Mlle. Ilma de Murska, Mozart; Concerto in A minor, Mme. Schumann, Schumann; Aria "D'amor sull' ali rose" (Il Trovatore), Mlle. Ilma de Murska, Verdi; Overture in C, (MS.) Mendelssohn; Symphony in F (No. 8), Beethoven; Aria (with variations) Mlle. Ilma de Murska, Proch; Overture (Die Zauberflöte), Mozart.

There was a worse than Schumann to disturb the London orthodoxy at the sixth concert. The name of Wagner throws the critics into convulsions; for example, the Orchestra:

Ten years ago a certain empiric who now, under the patronage of a royal hobadehoy, fulminates mouthing decrees about his own genius, was conductor of the London Philharmonic Society. By a natural return of the old love which held fast before Wagner committed artistic infidelity with the future, the Society chose his overture to "Rienzi" for their pièce de résistance on Monday. "Rienzi" was written long ago, before the future and conceit had turned Wagner's head and fascinated a boy-king in Munich. The overture is rough for a room, for brass predominates, but the themes are at least in harmonious coloring and highly dramatic.

And one of the daily papers says:

The band did their best to render Herr Wagner's overture comprehensible. There is little in the overture to Rienzi to puzzle the plainest ear. This composition does not so much belong to the "Music of the Future" as to no music at all. When Rienzi was composed, Richard Wagner had not sounded the depths of the theory propounded in his Oper und Drama, and was not quite so mystic and unfathomable as in Lohengrin and Tannhäuser. The overture to Rienzi expresses little, but what it expresses is not beyond the reach of common understanding. The objection to it is that it is miserable stuff, without thought, purpose, or quality of any kind. The wonder is that such superlative stuff should have found a single director to recommend it.

The same writer is alarmed at the programme of this concert following the example of the "New Philharmonic" in giving only one Symphony (Mozart's in D, No. 2) and two Concertos,—and one of those only a Flute Concerto, although so eminent a musician as Molique was the composer. The other concerto was a great one, Beethoven's in E flat, for piano, played (to an audience "of course, rapt and enchanted beyond measure") by Mme. Arabella Goddard Davison. The other overture was Beethoven's to "King Stephen," a rare treat. Mlle. Tietjens being laid up by accident, Mme. Harriers-Wipern, the charming soprano from the Berlin Opera, took her place and sang the Romance of Alice from Robert, the Freyschütz scena, and Mozart's Deh vieni, non tardar, exquisitely, by all accounts.

For the seventh concert (June 26) was announced: Finale to Mendelssohn's Loreley; Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Overture to Dinorah and Les deux Journées; Spohr's E-minor Concerto and Bach's Chaconne, with Joachim for violinist. Vocalists: Tietjens and Signor Agnesi.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS (we do not know that there is any New Philharmonic Society) have already run through their fourteenth season of five. Their programmes are supposed to take a somewhat freer range, for Dr. Wyld, their originator and Conductor from the first, is unaided and untrammelled by a Committee of Directors. St. James's Hall is their locale. The critics report of them this year with even more enthusiasm than of the old Philharmonic, the orchestra being quite as large and admirable, and the solo artists quite as famous. The opening programme was particularly rich: Overture to Medea, Cherubini; Aria, "Per pietà," from Mozart's little-known Il Curioso indiscreto, sung by Mme. Sainton-Dolby; BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY, entire, (the vocal quartet being Mmes. Parepa and Dolby, Mr. Perren and Mr. Weiss); Spohr's Dramatic Concerto (Scena cantante) and Bach's Violin Fugue in G minor, both played by Joachim; Cavatina by Meyerbeer, sung by Mme. Parepa; and Overture to Preciosa. The Symphony was a triumphant success.

Schubert's Symphony in C (absurdly abridged by Dr. Wyld, making it appear longer rather than shorter, as a critic sensibly suggests) was the main feature of the second concert. Mendelssohn's first piano Concerto was played with "wonderful energy and fire" by Mme. Clara Schumann; and another treat was the "absolutely faultless execution, by Mr. Lazarus, of Mozart's delicious Concerto for the clarinet (with orchestra) in A major." The Overtures were Spohr's to Faust, and Beethoven's to the ballet of Prometheus. The singers were Mlle. Bettelheim, a rich contralto, who sang an air from Gluck's Ezio and another from Donizetti, and M. Joulain, tenor, who sang from Lucia and Trovatore.—Third Concert: Spohr's Symphony "Power of Sound;" Hummel's piano Concerto in A minor, played by Arabella Goddard; Concerto for Violoncello, by Gotterman, played by M. Paque; Overtures, Leonora and "Ruler of the Spirits;" Songs (from Mozart, Donizetti, Gounod, Meyerbeer, Bellini) by Tietjens and Mr. Santley.—Of the fourth concert we find only this brief notice in the Orchestra:

The success which has attended Mlle. Ilma de Murska at the Opera-house, followed her into the concert-room, where the new New Philharmonic Society held their fourth concert on Wednesday. A scena from "Lucia," a duet from "Linda" ("Ah tel destin"), and the shadow song from "Dinorah" raised the audience to a perfect fièvre of enthusiasm. We never heard an artist throw herself more into her art, or more completely carry the sympathies of her audience along with her. Mr. Barnett's symphony was a good feature in the programme, and together with Hiller's concerto in F sharp major, which Herr Jaell gave on the piano, went excellently. The Pastoral Symphony, and the overtures to "Ruy Blas" and Oberon were among the attractions of one of the richest programmes that this Society has ever set forth. Credit is due to Dr. Wyld, who conducted.

The fifth and last concert had for Symphony, Mendelssohn in A minor; for overtures, Der Alchymist, by Spohr, and Masaniello; Weber's E-flat Concerto, played by John Francis Barnett; Beethoven's Romance in F for Violin, played by Herr Strauss, an original Italian scena, composed by Dr. Wyld ("with a decided feeling for the style and manner of the great masters") and "splendidly declaimed" by Mlle. Tietjens, who also sang Qui la voce; Rossini's Una voce, by Trebelli; and Ah non giunge by Miss Laura Harris (American), creating "an immense sensation."

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON is in its seventh season, and gave its first Orchestral and Choral Concert at St. James's Hall, March 29, with Alfred Mellon as Conductor. Mr. Henry Smart's Cantata, "The Bride of Dunkerron," (written for the Birmingham Festival last year, and now presented for the first time in London) failed to create much enthusiasm. For the rest:

Beethoven's symphony, in C No. 1, was splendidly played, the lovely andante cantabile which forms the second movement being particularly fine. Beethoven's trio "Tremate! empi, tremate" was sung by Mme. Rudersdorff, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Weiss; the expression which was thrown into the adagio was exquisite. Herr Joachim gave a masterly performance of Bach's concerto in A minor, and of the recitative and andante from Spohr's 6th concerto. Auber's overture "Les noces" brought the concert to a conclusion.

About the principal features of the second concert (the minor ones being the overtures to Ruy Blas and Oberon, and some solo singing by Miss Pyno), let the Musical World relate:

The band of the Musical Society of London, unequalled in numerical strength, guided by a conductor whose superior it would be difficult to find, and comprising in its ranks, with very few exceptions, the best instrumental players in the country, must, nevertheless, look to its laurels. Such an execution, as that on the occasion under notice, of Herr Ferdinand Hiller's symphony in E minor, "Es muss doch Frühling werden," is not likely to sustain the reputation it has won by many really admirable, some quite first-class, performances. Although the symphony is not absolutely new, having been given at the Düsseldorf Festival of 1855, it has but recently been published, and is dedicated to the Musical Society of London. A compliment so marked from a composer of European fame, an honorary fellow of the society, Director of the Conservatory at Cologne, Mendelssohn's contemporary, friend, and in some sort rival, should, we think, have met with proportionate consideration. But the fatal system of presenting a strange composition, however elaborate, after the experience of one solitary rehearsal, obtains at the concerts of the Musical Society of London, as at those of other societies which do not pretend to half so much. The consequence was that the symphony of Herr Ferdinand Hiller shared the fate of Mr. Henry Smart's Bride of Dunkerron at the previous concert. It was for the most part coarsely performed by the orchestra, and altogether ill-appreciated by the audience. Mr. Smart's cantata, a composition of very eminent merit, was received with enthusiasm at the Birmingham Festival, last September, and more recently at the Liverpool Philharmonic. Herr Ferdinand Hiller's symphony has passed the ordeal of the severest judges in Germany. Both fell dead before the audience of professors and "connoisseurs," the Musical Society of London; and neither, it must be admitted, owed anything to the manner in which they were executed. The same was the case some time ago with Schubert's imaginative symphony in C, which Mendelssohn loved, and himself brought to England, of which Schumann wrote in terms of rapture, which Dr. Wyld has made thoroughly acceptable to the audiences of the New Philharmonic, and which was hissed by some of the members of the Musical Society of London—just as the superb overture to Rossini's Guillaume Tell was hissed in the "dark ages" of the elder Philharmonic Society, where now it would meet with its deserts. Under the circumstances, we shall merely say of the symphony of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, that it is the masterly work of a genuine master of his art, and that it merited both a more refined execution and a more cordial reception.

But the feature of the concert was, beyond comparison, Madame Clara Schumann's very fine performance of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat—"the Emperor-Concerto," as it has been appropriately styled. It would be difficult to imagine anything more intelligent than her reading of this magnificent work, from end to end. Every phrase was rightly emphasized, every passage, dominant or subordinate, allowed its proper significance; and thus the right balance was preserved throughout. The Clara Wieck of "Eusebius" and "Florestan," the wife of the intellectual and aspiring Robert Schumann, showed herself worthy of her fame. The music and the performance were equally well understood; and the applause bestowed upon Madame Schumann, who was unanimously summoned at the conclusion, was enthusiastic. Unqualified praise may, with equal fairness, be bestowed upon Mr. Alfred Mellon and the band, for the admirable manner in which the orchestral accompaniments were played.

The third concert offered the 7th Symphony of Beethoven; Overtures to Athalie (Mendelssohn) and Anacreon (Cherubini); Violin Concerto, No. 9, by Spohr, and Songs by Mr. Santley. The fourth and final concert had two Symphonies (Haydn in B flat, Mendelssohn in A); Arabella Goddard played Weber's Concertstück; an overture by Macfarren, "Don Quixotte," (pronounced uninteresting) closed the first part, and a Hungarian March by Berlioz the last part; Mme. Sherrington sang well-known bravura pieces; Mr. Mellon was loudly called for and cheered, and so the Society adjourned till next November, when it is to make an orchestral trial of new compositions.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE, also, had its orchestral concerts, for the many, every Saturday throughout most of the Spring. These too have been of a high order. For instance, on April 22d and 29th, Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" was performed entire, producing a great impression. The only other instrumental piece was the same master's early overture to Prometheus. Some of the first vocal artists sang from Handel, Schubert, &c. Herr Manns was the Conductor. Early in May, the orchestra gave way to operatic concerts.

Passing from the Orchestral to the classical Chamber Music, we are bewildered by the number and variety of such entertainments, this year more than ever, taking place in London. Let us glance for the present at the most important series, namely, the MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. Not content with the weekly evening concerts of the past six seasons, this year the large assembly of listeners at St. James's Hall have also patronized another every Saturday morning. Thirty-one concerts have been given during the past (seventh) season, closing on the 3d of July. We mention a few programmes to give an idea of their richness and variety, and of the kind of talent employed in interpreting the music.

March 27. A Mendelssohn night; all Mendelssohn—Octet, C-minor Trio, Quintet in B flat, Capriccio for piano, and part-songs. Joachim held the leading violin, with Piatti, Webb, Ries, &c., for colleagues in the strings; and Arabella Goddard was the pianist.

April 3. All Beethoven. Quartet in F minor, op. 95; Sonata in D minor, op. 29 (Charles Halle); Sonata, piano and 'cello, G minor, op. 5 (Halle and Piatti); Romance for Violin (Joachim); Trio in B flat, op. 97 (Halle, Joachim, Piatti); Songs: "Knowest thou the Land," "Farewell" (Miss Banks).

May 8. Quartet in D, Haydn (Joachim, &c.); Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata (Mme. Goddard); Sonata Duo in B flat, Mozart (Mme. Goddard and Joachim); C-minor Trio, Mendelssohn; songs by Sims Reeves.

May 15. Mme. Clara Schumann appeared, in a programme purely of her husband's compositions. Let the Musical World speak, he being no "Schumannite":

It was Madame Schumann's first appearance at the Monday Popular Concerts, and, with great good taste, the entire programme was made up of Schumann's works. It comprised the string Quartet in A minor (No. 1, Op. 41), its author's first composition in this style; the Douze Etudes Symphoniques for pianoforte solo, consisting chiefly of variations upon an original theme (not, however, by Schumann himself); the three Fantasiestücke for pianoforte and violin (originally intended for pianoforte and clarinet); the Quartet in E flat, for pianoforte and stringed instruments, and two of the songs ("Widmung" and "Ich wand're nicht"). For the lovers of Schumann's music here was a rich and varied selection. How each piece was executed may readily be understood when it is stated that in the string quartet the performers were Herr Joachim, Herr Wiener, Herr Grün and Signor Piatti; and that the pianist was Madame Schumann, who, as might be imagined, entered heart and soul into her task. Space will not permit, at this busy time, of our discussing the merits of so many works of importance from the pen of a composer, the question of whose claims to consideration still divides the opinions of thinkers on music. But the reception awarded to every effort of Madame Schumann, who stood valiantly forward as the champion of her regretted husband, and played from beginning to end with an enthusiasm that never flagged, was according to her deserts. She was applauded wherever applause could find a vent, and several times called forward. The two songs were assigned to Mr. Cummings. There was a very full attendance.

On a second occasion Mme. Schumann played Beethoven's Sonata in C, op. 53, and Trio in D (with Joachim and Piatti). The great violinist played Tartini's "Trille du Diable." Songs, from Rossini and Gounod, by Miss Edmonds.

May 27. (Morning). Beethoven's Septet, Joachim leading; Piano Sonata in C by Weber (Halle); Trio in F by Spohr. In the preceding evening concert Halle played a Partita by Bach.

June 3. (Morning). Quintet in A by Mozart; Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses" (Mme. Schumann); "Kreutzer" Sonata (Do., with Joachim); songs, &c.

June 12. Benefit of Sims Reeves, who sang Adeleida and lighter things. Madame Joachim, wife of the violinist, sang songs by Schubert; Herr Joachim played in Quartets by Mendelssohn and Haydn, also the "Devil's Trill"; Arabella Goddard played some "Musical Sketches" by Bennett and accompanied Reeves.

July 8. The closing concert (Directors' Benefit) offered fragments of a Quartet by Mendelssohn (Herr Strauss leading); Song: La Natade, Gounod (Miss Banks) Suite de Pièces, Handel (Halle); Duo Concertante, Spohr, (Joachim and Strauss); Song: Dalla sua pace, Mozart, (Reeves); Piano Sonata in A, No. 2, Mozart (Mme. Goddard); Beethoven's Serenade, op. 8, for violin, viola and 'cello (Joachim, Webb and Piatti); Songs: "The Savoyard," "The Stolen Kiss," Beethoven, (Reeves); Pensées fugitives, by Ernst, for piano and 'cello; Violin Prelude and Fugue by Bach (Joachim); Song by Haydn (Miss Banks); Rondo by Schubert for piano and violin, (Strauss and Halle).

We shall resume this summary with a peep at some of the other series of Chamber Concerts, especially those of Charles Halle.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 22, 1865.

The Past Musical Year in Boston.

(Concluded).

IV. CHAMBER MUSIC.

Under this head we habitually look first to the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who for sixteen years have been our principal, most of the time our only, medium of listening acquaintance with the stringed Quartets and Quintets, Trios, &c., of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, and the other masters in these most pure, essential forms of musical creation. This year again they have occupied the field alone; nor have their concerts been more numerous on that account, but on the contrary fewer than before. Formerly it was their custom to give eight concerts in a season; last year the number was reduced to five; this year to four, one each in the months of December, January, February and March. The programmes, however, were all choice and memorable, containing the following compositions.

a) QUINTETS (for strings). Mendelssohn in A, op. 18.—Onslow, in C minor, No. 15, (1. Moderato espressivo; 2. Presto, "Delire"; 3. Andante, "Convalescenza"; 4. Allegro Vivace, "Guarigione."

b) QUARTETS (strings). Beethoven, No. 13, in B flat, op. 130; in D, op. 18, No. 4.—Mozart, in F, No. 8.—Mendelssohn, in A minor, op. 13 (Adagio and Intermezzo).—Schumann, in F, No. 2, op. 41.

c) SEXTET. (For two violins, two violas, two violoncellos). Spohr, in C, op. 140. (the Allegro Moderato and Allegretto).

d). CONCERTO. J. S. Bach, in G minor, for Pianoforte (B. J. Lang) and Quartet accompaniment.

e) TRIOS. (Piano, violin and 'cello). Beethoven, in B flat, op. 97, (Lang, Schultze and Fries).—Schumann, in D minor, op. 63, (Pianist, J. C. D. Parker).

f) PIANO-FORTE. Schubert, Rondo Brillant, (Miss Alice Dutton, with violin, Schultze)—Chopin, Scherzo in B-flat minor (Miss Dutton).

g) SONGS. Robert Franz; "Supplication" (Weil auf mir), "Summer" (Miss Ryan); "The Angel's Call" (Mrs. J. S. Cary).—Schumann, "The Cottage" (Miss Ryan).—Mozart, Parto, ma tu ben mio, from Tuo, (Mrs. H. M. Smith).—Spohr, "My dream of life is over" (Do).—Schubert, "Hark, the Lark!" (Do).—Stradella, "Prayer" (Mrs. Cary).—Parker (J. C. D.), "I saw in dreams," from Heine, (Mrs. Cary).

The pieces presented here for the first time, in the above list, were the Schumann Quartet, the Sextet by Spohr, the Concerto by Bach, and the Trio by Schumann. The "posthumous" Quartet of Beethoven was as good as new, having been first presented by the Club four years ago and not again till this time.

OTTO DRESEL'S PIANO-FORTE CONCERTS have added very largely to our treasures in the way of Chamber Music. The thirteen programmes of the two series given by this admirable interpreter, as well as searching and fastidious explorer of the classics of his instrument, offer a list of the choicest works, and such only, written for the piano, which both for quantity and quality, and for suggestive contrast, has few parallels in the concert experience of any year in any city. We have only to enumerate the pieces.

T. S. BACH.

Concerto for three pianos in C major, accompaniments arranged by Mr. Dresel for a fourth, (Messrs. Dresel, Leonhard, Lang and Parker), twice given. Concerto for three pianos, in D minor (as above). Gavotte, from Orchestral Suite (arranged by Mr. D. for two pianos).

Pastoral Symphony, arranged (as above) from the Christmas Oratorio. Twice.

Sarabande and Rondo, from Partita in C minor. Fugue, in C minor, ("Well-tempered Clavichord," Part I. No. 2).

Prelude and Fugue, C sharp minor, (Do. I. 4.)

Prelude and Fugue, F minor, (Do. II. 12).

Organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor.

Fugue, in C-sharp major, (Well-temp. Cl. I. 3).

Prelude, in E-flat minor, and Fugue in G-sharp minor.

BEETHOVEN.

- Sonata, in D minor, op. 31, No. 2, ("Tempest")
 " " E flat, op. 31, No. 3, (twice).
 " " C major, op. 53, (twice).
 " " A major, op. 101.
 " " E major, op. 109.
 " " A flat major, op. 110.
 " " C minor, op. 13, ("Pathétique").
 " " A flat, op. 26, (Var., Marcia funebre, &c.)
 " " E minor, op. 90.
 " " G major, op. 31, No. 1.
 32 Variations on a Theme in C minor.
 Larghetto, arranged from Second Symphony.

MENDELSSOHN.

- Serenade and Allegro Gioioso, op. 43, (orchestral parts arranged by Mr. D. for a second piano).
 Presto Scherzando, (twice).
 Prelude and Fugue in E minor, (twice).
 Scherzo, from op. 16.

CHOPIN.

- "Krakowiak," Rondo, op. 14, (Orchest. accompaniments arranged by Mr. D. for second piano played by Mr. Leonhard). Twice.
 Adagio and Finale from Second Concerto, in F minor, (accompaniments as above). Twice.
 Notturmo, in B major, op. 9, (twice).
 " " D flat, op. 27.
 Adagio and Rondo from First Concerto.
 Three Mazourkas: in E minor, op. 41; E major, op. 6; and C-sharp major, op. 41.
 { Mazourka in B major, op. 56.
 Etude in G flat.
 Mazourka, in B minor, op. 33.
 Impromptu, in F sharp.
 Berceuse and Finale from Second Concerto.
 Three Mazourkas: G major, op. 50; A minor, op. 17; E major, op. 6.
 { Mazourka in C-sharp minor, op. 30.
 Valse, in D flat, op. 64.
 Three Mazourkas.
 Valse, in A flat, op. 31.
 Barcarolle, op. 60.
 Fantasie, op. 49, (twice).
 Prelude in D flat.
 Polonaise in F-sharp minor.
 Andante and Polonaise, op. 22.
 Etudes: in C-sharp minor, (twice); G flat; E flat; A flat.
 Scherzo, in B-flat minor, (twice).
 Rondo, op. 16.

SCHUMANN.

- Concerto. (Allegro appassionato; Intermezzo; Finale). Orchest. accomp. for second piano, (twice).
 { Intermezzo, op. 26.
 Adagio, from Carneval, op. 9.
 Finale from Kreislaria, op. 16.
 Novellette, in E major, (twice).
 "Child falling asleep," from Kinderszenen.
 Sketches for Piano with Pedals, op. 58, Nos 1 & 2: Extracts from.
 Allegretto in form of Canon, from "Studies for Pedal Piano," op. 56, No. 5, (three times).
 Fantasie, op. 17, (last movement).
 Selections from op. 28, 23, 24 and 20. (Romance; Notturmo; Scherzo; Andante espressivo; Allegretto).
 Scherzo, from op. 52.

MOZART.

- Gigue, (twice).
 Serenade from Don Giovanni (sung, with Mr. D's arrangement for two pianos).

HAYDN.

- Andante, arranged from a Symphony.

SCHUBERT.

- Sonata, in A minor, op. 42.
 Allegretto, arranged from Symphony in C.

LISZT.

- Transcriptions of Songs ("Der Schalk" and "Der Bote") by Robert Franz.

Transcription of Schubert's Hungarian March.
 "Valse Caprice," No. 6, after Waltzes by Schubert, (3 times.)
 Weber's "Slumber Song," transcribed.
 "Valse Caprice," in E major, after Schubert.

MOSCHELES.

Etude: "Kindermährchen," (twice).

HUMMEL.

Septet, arranged for two pianos.

FERD. HILLER.

Impromptu, in E flat.

Bolero, (twice).

STEPHEN HELLER.

Valse.

TAUBERT.

Andante and Etude.

JULIUS SCHAEFFER.

Three "Phantasie-stücke," op. 1.

O. DRESEL.

Intermezzo, and "Phantasie-stücke," (twice).

AUG. SARAN.

Fantasie Variationen, op. 1.

Fantasie-stücke (C-sharp minor, D-flat major), op. 2.

We have yet to see what the Organ Concerts have yielded us; and possibly something may be gleaned from the record of the miscellaneous concerts.

The German Saenger-Fest in New York.

"Frau Musica," as some quaint German poets call her, seems to be celebrating the summer solstice by grand musical festivals, on a colossal scale, in all parts of her dominions. Here, in her new world, never were such blessed auspices inviting to her cultus. Indeed the whole summer has been so glorious, the air so temperate and pure and sweet, day after day so beautiful, that were we Greeks, we should build temples to Fine Weather, as well as to the Muses. It really seems as if the War, in rolling off the Slavery nightmare from the Nation's breast, had purified the whole air and renewed the o'er-ripe dog-day summer after the pattern of the midsummer day and night dreams of our childhood, when time did not gallop quite so fast withal, nor hang heavily on our hands either, but flew tranquilly along with us through a clear, bright, peaceable forever. Such days as these should break out into song, as naturally as into leaves and flowers and fruits, over the length and breadth of the whole land. Our Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Festival of great Oratorio and Symphony, in the last week of May, came most opportunely. About the same time, on the other side of the water, the usual Pentecost musical festival of the Lower Rhine was held at Cologne; we translated a description of it in our last. To-day we give the reports of two of the three days of the triennial Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, where four thousand singers and grand orchestra were performing the "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," &c., before audiences of fifteen or twenty thousand people. These were festivals of high Art, of Music inspired by the most high and sacred themes.

The German part-song festivals, which now rule the hour, are of a more popular and unpretending character as to art, but perhaps even more significant, for they are a sort of musical expression of democracy; beginning in trusty social circles and widening over neighborhoods and nations. The people come together, from homes far apart, and feel the generous thrill, not merely of a common nationality or race, but of the common Humanity, in song. While the Liedertafels, Singvereins, "Orpheus" and "Arion" clubs, &c., of all Germany were holding colossal festival in Dresden, 20,000 voices strong (to which as well as to the Schützen-fest in — large delegations of our German Americans sailed, amid escort and cheers of their companions a few weeks since), here in New York, this past week, has been held a German singing festival, at which some two-thousand singers of the local societies entertained about the same number of singers from other parts of the Union, and united in a series of concerts with 4,000 voices. Our German fellow citizens had already held four such "Saenger-fests": in Philadelphia, 1850; Baltimore, 1852; New York, 1855; and again in Baltimore, in 1859. Then came the Rebellion, and four years of warlike interruption; and now under the rainbow of a Union saved and cemented in Freedom, with what new appetite and inspiration must the four thousand voices lift themselves in joyful gratitude and hope together!—It was not our good fortune to be present on this interesting occasion; we must therefore gather from the New York papers an account of it.

One or two words of comment naturally occur on reading the subjoined reports. However good the singing may have been, and however full of spirit, however excellent the social, patriotic, human sentiment of the occasion, it strikes us that the selections of music, on the average, were not up to the significance of such a time and such a meeting. Thus, for Overtures, in Monday's concert, we find Litolff's "Robespierre" and Wagner's "Rienzi"—both of an overstrained and noisy, superficial character as to art, and relating to restless, bloody, revolutionary themes. How much truer to the reach and meaning of our great revolution of to-day, and to that sublime thought of the blending of all peoples into one free people on this continent—the very thought which makes so many Germans love to prove themselves also Americans—would have been a performance of Beethoven's "Choral Symphony!"

"Seld umschlangen, ihr Millionen!"

All the powers of harmony, voice and instruments, employed to typify the embrace of all mankind!—The part-songs, too, seem to be mostly by composers, popular to be sure, but of a second order; the chorus from Mendelssohn's Edipus being almost the only specimen of real nobility of style and genius. What an opportunity was offered by that Sunday evening concert in the Academy of Music! What is there particularly "sacred" in the "Preludes" of Liszt, or a chorus from one of Marschner's operas, or even in the "Walpurgis Night" cantata of Mendelssohn, fine a work as it is? The spirit of the selections throughout seems to have been rather that of "Zukunft-Musik" and Young Germany. The concert was called "Sacred" merely to compromise with the police and satisfy the letter of an absurd restrictive law. Being obliged to choose between "sacred" or none at all, would it not have been better to accept the sacred in the fullest sense and made a programme of the highest order.

Now for our extracts. But we will not copy the list of names of all the singing clubs taking part as guests and as receivers; it would be like half a Canto of Homer filled with a catalogue of ships. Suffice it to say that the thirty or more New York Societies received eighty-four Societies from Philadelphia, Baltimore, Hartford, Boston, Springfield, Montreal, Buffalo, &c., and even Richmond sent six men! Our Boston "Orpheus" sent 27 men, who were the especial guests of the Liederkranz, and must have lived in clover, having "five tables a day set for them in the very best style!"—to say nothing of beer ad libitum. By the way, one is struck by the appropriate name of one of the Honorary Presidents, Herr Bierwirth (Beer-landlord)!—a most respectable personage, no doubt.—First, let our friend "Trovatore" of the Evening Post, describe the Committee of Honor:

The approaching festival, embracing thousands of singers, is under the control of a committee of honor, composed of highly intelligent German gentlemen and scholars, men of position and influence both at home and abroad; patriotic men, whose hearts glow with enthusiasm over the recent surprising and important victories of the glorious land of their adoption. But while they are Americans in their reverence of our institutions and obedience to our laws, they gaze across the Atlantic, and with the yearnings of the student for alma mater, they fix their eyes on the Fatherland, the land of the reformation, the land which for the last century has flooded the civilized world with mental wealth elaborated by her poets, her philosophers, her theologians, her musicians and her artists, and with a laudable pride they reflect, "we, too, are Germans."

Conspicuous among the veteran Germans who lend the weight of their influence in behalf of this genial national festival (representative of the mercantile interest) ranks Mr. John W. Schmidt, originator of the house of "J. W. Schmidt & Co." (established 1815) the oldest German firm in this city. Mr. Schmidt yet retains his mental faculties as vigorously as half a century ago, though now arrived at the advanced age of eighty-six years—and though recently he has retired from the active duties of mercantile life, still holds his official powers—being consul general of Prussia, Saxony, Baden and Oldenburg to the United States; privy commercial councillor of the king of Prussia; knight commander of the Order of the Red Eagle of Prussia, with the star of knight commander of the Order of the Kingdom of Saxony and the Grand Duchy of Baden and Oldenburg. He came to this country in 1805; marrying a Miss Bache, a descendant of Benjamin Franklin. Baron E. Von der Heydt, also Prussian consul, recently returned to Germany, is his son-in-law. Among the Sengerfest committee of honor we note the names of the following persons: Charles F. Looney, Austrian consul general; John W. Schmidt, Prussian consul general; Leopold Bierwirth, Wurtemberg consul general—old citizens and residents of New York; Phillip Bissinger, president of the German Savings Bank and of the German Society, president of the festival; Emil Sauer, vice president; Conrad Poppenhusen, A. Schleicher, H. Sturaberg, R. A. Witthaus, Friedrich Kapp, Fred. Schuetz.

On Saturday evening the visitors arrived. A letter written on Sunday says:

In anticipation of the torch-light procession, and formal reception by Mayor Gunther at the City Hall, of the German delegation from abroad, a vast multitude assembled in the Park, last evening, at 8 o'clock, the hour on which the column was expected to arrive; but it was quite 9½ o'clock before the throng had the gratification of seeing the Germans, with their Chinese lanterns, file into the Park. The Mayor's office was brilliantly lighted, waiting the coming guests, and the Mayor patiently waited with a welcoming speech, but did not have opportunity to deliver it before 10 o'clock.

The route down the Bowery was brilliantly illuminated, many buildings having a candle at every pane. Among these, the office of the New York Staats Zeitung was conspicuous, having a transparency over the whole front, with the word in large letters, while from the upper stories flags of the Union and the German ensign were hung, the whole presenting a neat appearance.

WILKOMMEN,

The scene in the Park, after the arrival of the societies therein with their torches, was one of surpassing brilliancy, the 2,000 flambeaux lighting the whole front of the Hall, and converting the wall into a sea of flame.

After a graceful welcoming address from Mayor Gunther, "Unsere Grusse" was sung by about 3,000 voices, and then the procession marched up Chatham street, Bowery, Grand street, Essex street, Avenue A, Fourth street to the Bowery and the Germania Assembly Rooms, where Philip Blasmyer and Fred. Kapp, Esq., received the societies with brief addresses, and the 1,200 active singers sat down to a collation provided by the host.

Extensive preparations were made at the headquarters in the way of decorations. For more than three days the ladies belonging to the New York societies were engaged in decorating the place with festoons, garlands, and bunting. The large hall was decorated with the coat of arms of every society in this vast gathering, and when, last night, the many flags and banners of the various societies were placed there, the hall presented a sight rarely met. On the outside of this building a pedestal fifteen feet high surmounted with the word "Wilkommen," was placed and lighted with gas.

After the collation, the different guests were taken in charge by the Committee on Quarters, Mr. Franz Fisher, chairman, who provided quarters in the neighborhood of the headquarters.

The programme of the fest is as follows:

Sunday, July 16—Meeting at the Germania Assembly Rooms, and reception concert at the Academy of Music in the evening.

Monday July 17—Meeting of singers at headquarters, at 8 A.M. Procession of singers to the Academy of Music at 8 1-2 A.M.

Tuesday, July 18—Meeting of delegates at 9 A.M. Meeting of singers at headquarters at noon, and excursion to the Park. Prize singing at the Academy of Music at 8 P.M.

Wednesday, July 19—Procession and Sanger picnic at Jones' Woods.

Thursday, July 20—Closing exercises and departure of the singers.

Mr. Hillenbrand has been appointed Fest Marshal, and can be recognized by a scarf with golden stars. His assistants are Messrs. Ladinsky, Trinkner, A. Schmidt, Luckhard, Vogel, Schaffer, J. Petri, Jos. Burger, Hasse, Beringer, Minkot, Himmer, M. L. Schader, F. Lutz, George Klein, George Maurer, Ringshauser and V. Scherer.

SUNDAY EVENING. SACRED CONCERT.

The musical critic of the Tribune writes:

The weather was most unpropitious, the rain coming down very heavily, which will account for the very slim audience present on the occasion. The parquet was not half filled, the second tier was literally empty, the family circle and gallery were partially filled, and the balcony alone was tolerably crowded. It is to be regretted that anything should have occurred to throw a damp upon the opening of this great musical gathering. The importance of this Festival in a musical point of view, cannot be over-estimated. It will direct the attention of our citizens to the fact that music is a great element in aid of civilization, and that, at least among one portion of our population, it is cultivated generally as a means of social enjoyment, and no one will doubt its genial and harmonizing effects when the habitual conduct of our German fellow-citizens is duly considered.

This Festival still further shows that the great city of New York—the Metropolitan City, as we delight to call it in our pardonable arrogance—has no public building capable of accomodating a chorus of a thousand voices—that this city is not fitted for the holding of a great festival, as its means are far inferior to Boston, and in every way insufficient. It is a blot upon our reputation for enterprise, and in more ways than one it is a positive loss to the city, for great musical occasions cannot be attempted in face of the fact that there is no hall in which they could be celebrated.

The programme of the first grand concert was as follows:

1. Les Preludes (by the Orchestra) ..... Fr. Liszt
2. Psalm (for Chorus and Orchestra) ..... C. Klein
3. Grand Chorus from the Opera "Der Templer und die Juedin," (The United Singers) ..... Marschner
4. Walpurgisnacht, (for full Chorus and Orchestra) ..... Mendelssohn

Mad. Zimmerman and Messrs. Bernhard, Steins and Trost.

The orchestra which was directed by Carl Bergmann performed Liszt's Preludes, in a manner worthy of all praise. Promptitude, precision, delicacy and brilliancy characterized his performances; the players felt the masters' hand, and followed its lead with utter faithfulness. We have rarely heard more delicate shading, or more poetic coloring than this performance exhibited. It is a pity that so much excellence in execution was wasted upon a work which is memorable only as a masterly piece of orchestration.

The chorus, which numbered perhaps 600 or 800, were behind the band and filled the stage up to the back wall. The greater portion of them stood on the stage, and sang right into the back of the heads of those who stood before them. Undoubtedly two-thirds of the power was lost by this means. The impression of all who heard the first chorus was that of disappointment at the absence of the expected grandure and sonority which so large a body of singers was expected to produce. But the multiplication of voices does not bring a corresponding increase of out-spoken power. The sound emitted by 1,000 voices, although it is more massive, is scarcely louder than that to be obtained from 500 voices. Besides, male voices are not penetrating in their quality, one-half the number of mixed voices, male and female, would produce double the tone. As the concert proceeded, however, the real power of that mass of voices was appreciated, and the grandure of the massive swelling harmony was felt by all. The voices were well trained and are of good quality; the general intonation is good, and promptitude in execution remarkably excellent. The light and shade in the compositions were well observed, and the crescendos were most effectively executed.

The Psalm by Klein and the grand chorus from Marschner's "Der Templer" were admirably sung, the latter especially, and were received with loud and most cordial applause.

The Walpurgisnacht, by Mendelssohn, was the crowning excellence of the performance. It is a work of rare beauty, full of exquisite fancy, and rich in strength of passion. The orchestration is replete with figures of rare beauty and of singular variety, so that the attention and interest of the hearer are retained to the closing note. The subjects are fresh and vigorous; some of the choruses can hardly be excelled in fancy and spiritual beauty. In this composition the female chorus is employed, and the soprano voices lighting or lifting up the mass of male voices, seemed to quadruple its power. The work was finely performed throughout; the pianos were strictly observed, the fortes were grandly sonorous, and the most delicate shades of color added a charm while they fully revealed the thought and intention of the composer. The solos were most creditably executed. The performance was loudly applauded throughout, and most enthusiastically at the close. It must be considered both as to selection and execution, a decided success.

SECOND DAY, (MONDAY, JULY 17).—Passing over the morning's rehearsal, and the various hospitalities of the day, we come to the second evening concert. 2,000 (?) singers took part, under the direction of Herr Agricola Paur, Herr Bergmann conducting the orchestra. Academy crowded. Programme as follows:

- 1 Overture—Robespierre (full orchestra) ..... Litolff
- 2 Thürmerlied (by the United Singers) ..... Rebling
- 3 Auf, greift zum Schwert ..... Kücken
- 4 (Sung by the United Singers of Philadelphia)
- 5 Overture—Kienzi (full orchestra) ..... Wagner
- 6 Hymn to Music ..... Lachner
- 7 Prayer of the Earth ..... Zöllner
- 8 Battle Hymn ..... Rietz

(United Singers and Orchestra.) The overtures were applauded,—at all events the fine execution thereof—while opinions differ as to their musical importance. "Robespierre" being finished, (the Post goes on to say:

The green curtain then rose, disclosing the vast company of singers, who were seated on the stage, completely filling it up to the rear wall. They sang the Thürmerlied by Rebling. The United Singers of Philadelphia followed this with a vocal composition by Kücken, Auf greift zum Schwert, which was favorably received; and a magnificent chorus by Mendelssohn, from Edipus in Colonus, by the united singers and the orchestra, closed the first part.

A "Hymn to Music," by Lachner, was sung by the full chorus, but failed to produce any marked impression. The vocal gem of the evening was Zöllner's "Prayer of the Earth," sung by the United Singers of Baltimore, who include in their number many superior voices, among them an effective first tenor, whose voice and style is very much like those of Lotti. The composition sung by this group of vocalists is unusually varied and striking, and at once took the fancy of the audience. Though sung without accompaniment, the singers never failed, hesitated or flattened; and their admirable performance was rewarded with the most cordial applause of the evening. The Baltimoreans will prove prominent competitors at the singing tournament this evening.

The concert closed with a battle-hymn by Rietz, the main theme of which reminds the hearer of a well-known phrase in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

The upper part of the house, the warmest and most uncomfortable, was the best in which to hear the music. The choral effects were full and satisfying, but not as overwhelming as the vast body of singers would lead one to expect. It is, indeed, a mooted point with musicians whether an increase in numbers produces a corresponding increase of choral sonority. According to some of the best authorities, six hundred is the maximum number of average voices which can be used effectively in a chorus. In England, at the Handel festivals, several thousands are, however, used; and at the great musical gathering to be held this summer at Dresden, there will be the enormous chorus of twenty thousand voices—the greatest ever known in the history of music.

The Tribune prefers the Philadelphia singers; let them have the benefit of it:

In delicate coloring, just emphasis and intelligent reading, the United Singers of Philadelphia have not yet been surpassed. Their voices are fine and harmonize well. Their efforts were rewarded by loud and long-continued applause, and the audience would have gladly heard it over again.

ERRATA. The making up of our last number was hurried on account of the "glorious Fourth," when we were off, and our type-setters' minds were off, so that the last page went to press unproved, and full of mortifying errors. To mention only two: In introducing a paragraph from the Transcript complimentary to Mr. Southard, we wished to allude to his manly three years' service in the war, and spoke of him as "one of our best musicians, as well as a tried patriot;" it was printed "tried pianist!" So too a mere play on names about a concert-giver in Worcester was spoiled; and the omission of the title of one of his pieces ("Thunder Storm") left the intimation that "Worcester is favored with thunderstorms" cloudy, to say the least.

Mr. Punch, or somebody, proposes to reward the chorus singers of the great Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace with a new title:

"The singers in the Handel choir
So well have earned their fame,
That each should have, if he desire,
A Handel to his name."

A PROVIDENT MANAGER.—Some years ago, says Le Nain Jaune, a vessel bound for America set sail from Havre. On board was an operatic company whose destination was New Orleans. One day, during a lull in the attacks of sea-sickness, five of the gentlemen met on the deck and began, without premeditation, trying their voices.

"O Mathilde, idole de mon âme!"
sang the first.

"Rachel, quand du Seigneur," replied the second, while the other three burst out simultaneously and respectively with

"Amis, la matinée est belle;"
"Il est à toi, ce prix de ton courage;"
and

"Asile héréditaire—"
"What is this? Five tenors in the company!" they exclaimed furiously, as they went in search of the manager. When they had found him, each proceeded to upbraid him, something in this style: "It is infamous! It is shameful! You promised me, most solemnly, that I should be your only tenor!" "Gentlemen," replied the manager, "pray be calm. Have confidence in my honesty, and just listen to what I have to say. Before the end of the first week after your arrival at New Orleans, two of you will be dead of yellow fever, and two more will die during the rehearsals. The survivor shall be my only tenor, I give you my word of honor!"

SARATOGA (writes a visitor from that fashionable watering place) "is destined to be a rendezvous of musical celebrities. The magnificent new Opera House, built by the Lelands—grand in architecture, and rich in appointments—is to be opened on the 10th of July, with a grand ball to Gen. Grant, who is to be present; after which, we have in anticipation, a season of German and Italian Opera, alternating with Wallack's New York Company, under the management of Leonard Grover, which is a sufficient guaranty of its complete success. Among the musical entertainments with which we are treated at this season, the June Concert at Temple Grove Institute, under the direction of Prof. G. D. Wilson, has a deep interest with the friends of that institution, which was made manifest by their re-union in full force, on Tuesday evening June 27th,

"We cannot speak too highly of the performances of all the young ladies, particularly in the 'Tell' Overture, which was given by eight performers on four pianos, in a style evincing careful study and true appreciation. The young Miss who performed Wallenhaupt's 'Dernier Soirée,' and who gave for the encore, 'The Last Hope,' of Gottschalk, is deserving of great credit. The vocal part of the entertainment was well selected and unexceptionably given. The entire entertainment was a proof of the enjoyment of high musical advantages at the institution, and reflects great credit upon both teachers and pupils."

G.

THE GERMAN OPERA. We hear ominous rumors of a partnership between Grover and Maretzek:—are German wines improved by mixture with Italian? Or any wine by mixture with another? Fitzgerald, in his Philadelphia City Item, gives the following intelligence. We hope it is not true that the charming Frederici and her artist-like husband (Himmer) are lost to Grover's company; and we trust that the operas named below—even the "Africaine"—will constitute only the least part of the next season's repertoire:

Mr. Grover's enterprise last season succeeded so well that he intends re-organizing his excellent troupe for a fall and winter season. He will visit all the principal cities, including Chicago (with its handsome new Opera House) and New Orleans, where he will do well, we are sure. His troupe, we are told, will have a larger chorus, orchestra and ballet than that of last year. The repertoire will be pretty much the same, comprising such operas as "Tannhäuser," "Robert le Diable," "Les Huguenots," "Faust," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "Mireille," etc., and a grand novelty in the shape of Meyerbeer's "Africaine," for which opera a new singer from Germany will be engaged.

We feel almost sure the Company will undergo many changes. Marie Frederici, Franz Himmer and Bertha Johannsen have returned to Germany, and we fear they will remain there. Habelmann, Formes, and Hermanns will probably be retained, although there is a constant warfare between the two celebrated bassi. Madame Rotter, a reliable singer, with a few mannerisms, will be of the troupe. As for Canessa and Dziuba—they are conscientious singers, and should be retained. Good singers are rare in Germany—exceedingly rare(?)—and we doubt whether Mr. Grover will recover his truant warblers. We hope he may catch better ones, but we think he was wrong to let them go until he had done so.

German Opera in America appears to be a settled fact. Thanks to Mr. Anschütz, who commenced it, and Mr. Grover who has carefully carried it on. Next, we shall be able to support a regular opera in our principal cities. New York ought to be able to do so now. If our Academies of Music were put to their proper use, we would soon have a Conservatoire of our own, and could afford to give opera to the masses—not the Seigniors de Boots and Lady Magnolias. America can do anything, and can surely support a popular Opera House. If one could only be started on a cheap plan—that is, good opera, for a small price—the Americans would soon prove by their hearty support that they were a music loving people.

MODERN CHURCH MUSIC. "Doesticks" has communicated to the Detroit Advertiser some of his experience in New York. Having exhausted the amusements of the theatre, the opera, the museum, and the concerts, he tried the church. The following is his account of the music:

"Pretty soon music—organ—sometimes grand and solemn, but generally fast and lively enough for a contra dance. B. D. said the player got a big salary to show off the organ, and draw a big house. He commenced to play the Old Hundred. At first, majestic as it should be, but soon his left hand began to get unruly among the bass notes, then the right cut up a few monkey shines in the treble; left threw in a large assortment of quavers; right led off with a grand flourish and a few dozen variations; left struggled mournfully to keep up, but soon gave up dead beat, and after that went back to first principles, and hammered away religiously at Old Hundred in spite of the antics of its fellow; right struck up a march—marched into a quick step—quick step into a gallop; left still kept at Old Hundred; right put in all sorts of fancy extras, to entice the left from its sense of propriety; left still unmoved; right put in a few bars of a popular waltz; left wavers a little; right strikes up a favorite polka; left evidently yielding; right dashes into a jig; left now fairly deserts his colors and goes over to the enemy, and both commence an animated hornpipe, leaving poor Old Hundred to take care of itself. At length with a crash, a squeak, a rush, a roar, a rumble, and an expiring groan, the overture concluded and the service began.

"At length, with another varieté upon the organ, and all the concentrated praise and thanksgiving of the congregation, sung by four people, the service concluded. I thought from the manner of the last performance, each member of the choir imagined the songs of praise would never get to Heaven if he didn't give them a personal boost in the shape of an extra yell."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Heller's Slumber Song. For the voice. 30

This is Heller's beautiful Nocturne, with the melody arranged as a song. The words are quite "Slumberous," and suggestive of the dreamy noon slumbers of the tropics.

Vocal beauties of "La Dame Blanche."

Song. I am old and very lonely. (Spinne arme Margarethe). 40

Duet. Ah! sweet love! (Dicse Hand so weich). 30

Two pieces from this fine opera. The first is the spinning wheel song of old Margaret, and is very simple and touching; the second is the duet between George and the White Lady, and is full of melody.

Ah! sure he'll ne'er deceive me. (Domani! oh me felice), from the opera of Osterio, by Lillo. 40

A very brilliant and sweet piece, Italian and English words. Difficult.

My mother's sweet good-bye. Ballad. M. Keller. 30
The words are in good taste, and the music is excellent.

Home the boys are marching, or, Ring the merry bells. Song and chorus. F. Wilmarth. 30
Quite spirited and pretty.

In better worlds. (Ench werde lohn). "Fidelio." 60
This melody occurs in the prison scene, and is full of pathos and simple beauty.

O joy, O, rapture past expressing. (O namen namen lose freude.) Duet. "Fidelio." 60
Full of rapture as the preceding was of a sadder shade of feeling. Too well known and liked to need a description.

I have listened for her footsteps. Song & Chorus. M. Keller. 30

One of the "Mother" songs, which are not yet out of date, neither are those about the wounded soldiers. Words and music very pleasing.

O, my heart goes pit-a-pat. S'g & duet. Gomersal. 30
A favorite comic song or duet, at pleasure. Quite popular with the audiences who have heard it.

Instrumental.

The Chough and Crow. Trans. B. Richards. 60
A fine old song by Bishop, neatly instrumentalised by Richards.

Nocturne. F. Chopin. Op. 62. No. 1. B major. 60
" " " " " 2. E " 50

These are, like a good proportion of Chopin's compositions, somewhat difficult to play correctly, so as to bring out the meaning and emotions intended to be expressed by the composer; but are worthy of careful study.

Constellation March. A. E. Pillsbury. 30

A new, good and easy march, and will be a treat to learners who have progressed far enough in the instruction book to take a piece now and then.

Martha. Fantasie Brillante. Sydney Smith. 1.00

No composer can afford to leave out Martha from his list of arrangements. Smith has taken hold of it with a will, and caused the melodies to shine with new brilliancy. Moderately difficult.

Mirella Quadrille. Coote. 60

Mirella. Bouquet of melodies. R. Nordman. 60
Mirelle, or Mirella, (as we use the French or Italian name), has a number of charming melodies. In the above pieces they are assembled for the pleasure of the dancer and the player.

La Reine Topaze. Polka. D'Albert. 50

Fairy footsteps. Mazurka brillante. L. Williams. 60

Dual waltz. A. O. Leary. 50

Three pleasing pieces.

Cedar Point march. H. C. M. Story. 30

Gen. Sherman's march to the sea. " " 20

These are two unpretending little marches, but are pretty, and just adapted to learners. Easy.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 635.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 5, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 10.

The Telegraph.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

I.

The world of the Past was an infant;
It knew not the speech of to-day,
When giants sit talking from mountain to sea,
And the cities are wizards, who say:
The kingdom of magic is ours;
We touch a small clicking machine,
And the lands of the East hear the lands of the West,
With never a bar between.

II.

We need not the lamp of Aladdin;
We envy not Solomon's ring;
The obedient lightning is safe and tame
As the carrier-pigeon's wing.
The girdle that Shakespeare's fairy
Would lay round the earth in an hour,
We hold in our hands, and day by day
We prove its miraculous power.

III.

Know ye the musical, mystic
Chords of the century's lyre,
Common as copy-book lines to a boy—
The wonderful telegraph wire?
Strings that seem drawn by Arachne,
So fine on the air they are spun;
Yet netting the state in fraternal embrace,
And binding the nation in one.

IV.

From Boston to distant Nevada—
From Texas to Labrador's beach,
They thrill with a fire that is born of a fire—
Thought flashed in electrical speech.
And the great World is dumb no longer,
Nor time nor space are a bar:
Minnesota is talking with Georgia and Maine—
There is no more a Near or a Far.

V.

Look anywhere out from your window,
Look anywhere up in the street,
Rumble along on the railroad track,
Go seek some shady retreat
By the road 'mid the blackberry bushes,
Where the wagons of hay pass by,
You will see those lines of music ruled
Along the blue of the sky.

VI.

These gossamer threads of the Summer,
These webs of ephemeral birth,
They are pulsing veins of the nation's life,
They are vital nerves of the earth.
Frail as æolian harp-strings,
And swaying in wind and storm,
Yet they bind the world in a Union strong
And give to the Age its form.

VII.

Though now four years we have battled
In strife and in agony sore,
The electrical chords of the Age shall thrill
With the message "Peace once more."
They will teach the old lesson of ages,
Once taught by Galilee's shore,
All men are brothers—the earth is one—
There shall be War no more!

—Evening Post.

The Handel Festival at Sydenham.

THIRD DAY (JUNE 30). "ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

[From the London Times.]

The threatening sky augured ill yesterday afternoon for the prospects of the third and last performance. Nevertheless, it did not scare Handel's true worshippers, who had looked forward to Israel in Egypt as the culminating point of this musically memorable week. The large majority, indeed, were on their way by rail or road, before the deluge of rain had set in; and thus, although the facility of ingress to the Palace was very considerably diminished by the untoward state of things, the great central transept, the galleries, and the places contiguous were speedily filled. The rain penetrated at intervals through the crystal roof, to the general discomfort; but this unwelcome visitation only lasted for a short time, and people were speedily reconciled to what might happen. As, owing to the delays and disasters of the journey, visitors had arrived with comparative slowness, if not by dribblets, at least in uncomfortable groups, that thorough disciplinarian, Mr. Costa—before all a rigid timekeeper—was persuaded to defer the commencement of the oratorio for more than a quarter of an hour. This was a great boon, and duly appreciated, for no one that cares a straw for Handel would willingly lose one phrase of his grand Biblical Oratorio.

Whoever was absent from the Crystal Palace yesterday—as whoever was present can testify—lost the very noblest performance ever heard at a "Handel Festival" of Handel's greatest choral work. From beginning to end it was one uninterrupted series of successes. Of course much of this may fairly be attributed to chance; and the more so as Israel in Egypt, though a far more difficult work than the Messiah, was, we say it advisedly, twice as well executed. From the outset a universal confidence seemed to prevail. No sooner had Mr. Cummings delivered the opening tenor recitative—"Now there arose a new King over Egypt"—which briefly and epigrammatically supplies the place of the orchestral overture Handel was accustomed to affix to his oratorios, than the double chorus, "And the children of Israel sighed by reason of their bondage," in which the woes of the Israelites under the rule of a King that "knew not Joseph" are eloquently set forth, gave promise of the sort of choral performance that was in store. The "cry" of the oppressed people "came up" in tones that went to every heart. "They loathed to drink of the river," where the first of the plagues inflicted by Moses on the Egyptians is portrayed with such terrible suggestiveness, was even better. In spite of its strange intervals and chromatic harmonies, so difficult to keep invariably in tune, not a fault could be named. The effect of the single chorus here, in direct contrast with that of the double choir, was remarkable, notwithstanding the division of the host of singers—sopranos, altos, tenors, and basses—with an express view to the antiphonal character of the double choruses which abound in Israel. Madame Sainton, in the declamatory air, "Their land brought forth frogs," then gave a forcible description of the plagues that ensue; and the climax was depicted with fearful reality in the wonderful double chorus, "He spake the word, and there came all manner of flies," &c. This which, at rehearsal on Friday last, was by no means satisfactory, now did not offer a single point for criticism. The emphatic reiteration of the simple and commanding sentence, "He spake the word," the passages, so suggestively accompanied by the fiddles, describing the plague of "flies and lice in all their quarters," and the distinct phraseology of the coda, where "the locusts without number" add to the discomfort of the Egyptians, came out separately and in combination with singular force and clearness. The audience would fain have had this picturesque chorus repeated; but the despotic conductor, who knew what was coming, happily showed a deaf ear to their entreaties. What was coming was no less than "He gave them hailstones for rain," &c., which immediately follows the other. Nothing so imposing as this was ever produced by means so simple. The episodic theme, "Fire, mingled with the hail, ran along upon the ground," and its subsequent treatment, stand alone in choral harmony. Of the execution of this familiar piece, we can only say that, in our remembrance, it has never been approached. The effect was such that the whole audience enthusiastically called for it again. This was naturally looked upon by Mr. Costa rather as a command than as a request; and so, at a well known movement of his baton, the performers turned back to the first page and went once more through their task.

The second performance, which seldom happens, was quite as good as the first. Another singularly fine display succeeded. The impressive choral recitative, "He sent a thick darkness," notwithstanding its bold and unusual progressions of harmony, was delivered from the first bar to the last without the intonation ever perceptibly wavering. When the concluding sentence—"Even darkness which might be felt," where the music rises to the sublimity of the words, had been uttered, a subdued murmur of admiration followed; and no wonder. The connected series of choruses that ensue, commencing with "He smote all the first born of Egypt," comprising "But as for His people, He led them forth like sheep," and ending with "There was not one feeble person among their tribes," was uniformly well given. The opening was marked by a vigor thoroughly in keeping, especially at the wonderful passage where a pause divides each emphasized monosyllable:—"He—smote—the—chief—of—all—their—strength," in which the expressive power of Handel as a word-painter is remarkably exhibited. The piano singing of each section of the voices, whenever the exquisitely melodious phrase, as truly pastoral as it is tuneful—"He led them forth like sheep"—occurs, was perfect. While the jubilant phrase, "He brought them out with silver and gold," went on, one might almost see the precious metals glitter and hear them clink; and last and best, the triumphant asseveration that "there was not one feeble person," was made convincing through the emphatic choral delivery of the sentence. Passing the quaint fugal chorus, "And Egypt was glad when they departed," we come to a second connected series, even grander than its predecessor. The sublimity of the phrase, "He rebuked the Red Sea," delivered by full chorus in a voice of thunder, with its deeply expressive sequel, pianissimo, "And it was dried up," can never fail to impress. But these are simple when compared with what follows—"He led them through the deep," and "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies." The stately, large, and solemn theme of the first—so graphically suggestive of the miraculous passage of God's chosen people through the divided sea—was given out by the basses with tremendous power; while the execution of the last, with its marvellous peroration, in which the fact that not one of the pursuing Egyptians was left, is iterated and reiterated with ever-increasing earnestness, was a triumph of choral singing from end to end. In vain, however, did the vast audience clamor for a repetition—Mr. Costa, wisely we cannot but think, proceeded with the final chorus of Part I., "And Israel saw that great work," a performance which would have been remarkable if only for the very grand enunciation of its most remarkable passage—"And the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and His servant Moses."

We cannot undertake, however impressed by so wholly exceptional a performance, to go through the whole of Israel in Egypt, piece by piece. The praise awarded to the execution of the first part, which Handel really composed last, and originally named Exodus, is fully as due to the second,—the Song of Moses, in which the miracles actually described in Exodus are recapitulated, amid songs of praise and thanksgiving to the God of Israel. The choruses of this part are in many instances the most difficult in the oratorio; but from "Moses and the children of Israel," with which it triumphantly sets out, to "Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously"—both, as all who know Handel's music are aware, including the famous apostrophe, "He hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea"—with which it as triumphantly terminates, chorus after chorus was all that could be wished. The two most complex, elaborate, and trying of all—"And with the blast of Thy nostrils the waters were gathered together" and "The people shall hear and be afraid"—were sung in absolute perfection. Never, even by a choir and orchestra of ordinary numerical force, and, therefore, much more easily directed, have we heard these magnificent pieces so well given—with such spirit and precision, such uniform correctness and unswerving intonation. This is, no doubt, attributable in a great measure to the intermediate practices carried on from time to time since the last Handel Festival at Exeter-hall and elsewhere. But it also says no little for the general improvement in choral singing all over the country. Among other noticeable choral displays must especially be mentioned "Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power," one of the most vigorous and brilliant of the double choruses, and the fugued choruses on ancient modes, "I will exalt Him," and "The earth swallowed them," which for clearness and decision of part-singing have rarely been surpassed. One of the most characteristic of them all—"Thou sendest forth Thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble," in which Handel's graphic pictorial genius shines marvellously, was scarcely so fortunate; though even this, but for a temporary unsteadiness, soon rectified, would have been irreproachable. Enough, however, of the choruses, which in Israel so predominate that we are sometimes tempted to overlook other parts of the Oratorio, of a different character it is true, but in their way of equal excellence.

The airs and duets in the second part of Israel are all good, and several of them are unsurpassed for effectiveness. The plaintive duet "The Lord is my strength" was extremely well sung by Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Rudersdorff; the purely devotional one, "Thou in Thy Mercy," equally so by Madame Sainton-Dolby and Mr. Cummings. The grand declamatory duet for basses, "The Lord is a man of war," in which Herr Schmid shone to much more advantage than at rehearsal, if still overmatched by our great English barytone, Mr. Santley, was, as rarely fails to be the case, unanimously encoored and as a matter of course repeated. Madame Sainton, who always sings Handel like a true Handelian, was more than usually happy in the air, "Thou shalt bring them in;" and Mlle. Adelina Patti added another to her brilliant successes of this week by her irreproachable singing of the air, "Thou didst blow with Thy wind," which won another unanimous encore. But as usual, the great sensation of the day, and, indeed of the Festival, was created by Mr. Sims Reeves, in the magnificent air, "The enemy said I will pursue," which he sang with a fire and enthusiasm, a power of voice, a truth of accent, and a well sustained fluency of execution impossible to surpass. The effect was indescribable. At the conclusion a storm of applause broke out from every part of the building. The air was, we need scarcely add, repeated, and declaimed with the same unflagging animation.

After the oratorio the National Anthem was performed, Mlle. Adelina Patti singing the solo verse with the fervor and emphasis of a loyal and genuine British subject—which she ought surely to be, or she could hardly pronounce English so admirably. Then Mr. Costa whose labors have been no less arduous and unremitting than invaluable, received the hearty demonstration which was justly his due.

RESULTS.

(Times, July 8.)

The financial issue of last week's unprecedented series of performances can hardly so soon be decided with accuracy. We believe however, that—notwithstanding the approaching dissolution of the old Parliament, the absorbing interest in the coming elections for the new, the extremely bad management of the railway transit most immediately in relation with the Crystal Palace (which has been the subject of general animadversion), the inexplicable absence of all patronage and countenance, direct or indirect, from the highest quarters, the untoward deluge of rain which deterred thousands of people from attending the performance of Israel on Friday, and other unforeseen eventualities,—the Crystal Palace Company will receive on account of the Festival something more than 5,000*l.*; while something more than 1,000*l.* will go to the Sacred Harmonic Society. Against the company's profits must be placed the exclusive occupation of the Palace during four entire days, and the tax upon the time and attention of the general manager, with his staff of assistants, for months in advance. That the 1,000*l.* can reimburse the Sacred Harmonic Society for its labor, time, and expense, for its preliminary practices, under Mr. Costa, at Exeter Hall, and for the temporary suspension of its ordinary operations is altogether out of the question. But this high-spirited body of amateurs—which by its ordinary proceedings has done so much and with such unexampled disinterestedness for Handel and oratorio in particular, for sacred and choral music in general—is satisfied with, nay, proud of the honor that accrues to it, and would, if necessary, with equal zeal and unselfishness have redoubled its exertions. But with the Crystal Palace Company it is naturally otherwise; the chief consideration in the eyes of the managers being whether a transaction "pays," or whether it does "not pay." It is difficult even to induce them to speculate as to what, under more favorable circumstances, might have been the result, or to allow for the fact that but for the drawbacks enumerated—some of which at least may be easily avoided, while others may not exist, at the next Festival—the receipts would in all probability have been twice as large. The company is of course the best judge of its own affairs; but the outside public would not hesitate for one instant in unanimously declaring its firm conviction that the Handel Festival does "pay," if only through the enormous prestige it gives to the Crystal Palace, not merely in England, but throughout Europe, wherever newspapers are read. Fancy alone the publicity waiting on the pens of no less than 460 reporters, who were invited to the Festival! For a week past the Crystal Palace has been written and talked about, not only in the capital, but all over the empire; and for a week to come it will doubtless still be the topic with London correspondents of our country contemporaries, as well as with local contributors who have attended the Festival. Moreover, the Crystal Palace being now regarded as an institution of which Englishmen may justly feel proud, credit and prestige are surely worth its seeking; and the same of having, four times within a brief period, held a musical festival on a scale of such magnificence as could by no possibility be attempted at any other building in the world, is something not lightly to be abandoned. If the Handel Festival dies on the occasion of its fourth anniversary, it will die in a halo of glory; for certainly nothing to compare with the musical performances of the past week has previously been heard in this or any other country. To refer to the third day alone, when the incomparable Israel in Egypt was the oratorio, the effect produced on that occasion can never be obliterated from the memory of any one who, alive to the impressions created by grand and beautiful music, was fortunate enough to be present. There can be but a single opinion among musical judges with respect to the great improvement in an acoustical sense, obtained by the new arrangements in the central transept, but one opinion about the wonderful progress of the chorus—a progress due to efforts simultaneously exerted in London and in all the large towns which sent delegates to swell the numbers and add to the efficiency of the choral force.

As a mere result of skilful organization the Handel Festival this year was more than ever a triumph of order and discipline. It is impossible for us to appreciate in detail those onerous duties gratuitously undertaken by the various gentlemen connected with the Sacred Harmonic Society, who afforded valuable assistance to Mr. Bowley, the able, zealous, and undaunted general manager of the Crystal Palace, to Mr. J. F. Puttick, of the Sacred Harmonic Society, whose charge was the by no means easy one of arranging the whole of the professional engagements, to Mr. George Grove, the pink of courtesy and the pearl of secretaries, and last, not least, to Mr. Costa, who directs the movements of vast orchestras like a musical Napoleon. The perfect success which attended their arduous exertions, and the perfect satisfaction with which those exertions were regarded, must, to such indefatigable and self-denying gentlemen, be a sufficient recompense.

(From The Reader.)

The Israel in Egypt, which concluded the Handel Festival, yesterday week, was, without doubt, the grandest musical performance which the world has ever seen or heard. The memory of that amazing music as it was sung by that wonderful chorus will be a thing to haunt, for many a long day, the imaginations of those who were wise enough to go and hear it. All the drawbacks of which we have before spoken were there, but from the nature of the work, and some other circumstances, they were felt so little, that they made a very slight deduction from the sublimity of the result. Of the measure and degree of that sublimity it would be vain to try to give any estimate in words. Nor is it much use to speculate as to how much of it was due to the intrinsic power of the music and how much to the grandeur of the performance. No music needs splendor of execution less than Handel's to make its power felt. It will sound sublime even when poorly, weakly, badly done; its greatness is perhaps never more convincing than when the material means employed are of the slightest, or even when there is no material presentment of it at all, when it is merely "read" by the eye from the printed page to the inner ear, just as a big mountain never seems so imperial as when seen dimly on the horizon from afar. But the impression left by the festival "Israel" was of a different kind to this. It was overwhelming and indescribable. Chorus after chorus came pealing out with a stateliness and majesty which seemed to give a new life to the familiar music, a new emphasis to its grandeur, and new tenderness to its pathos. For, never certainly can the antithesis between force and sweetness, terror and beauty, have been more wonderfully manifested in music. Perhaps what most helped to make this marvellous effect was the entire absence of all appearance of effort on the part of the performers. As the eye rested on such a host of singers, it seemed impossible to think of them otherwise than as making one huge instrument, which sounded at its director's will. One missed the fuss and flutter of ordinary orchestras. A certain sense of repose was never absent. The vast chorus seemed calm even in its grandest bursts of power, just as it seemed never stronger than in its lightest pianissimo. Israel is full of points which brought out these wonderful characteristics. The prodigious unison, to quote one example, which announces the coming of the plague of flies, "He spake the word," sounded supernaturally grand. Equally wonderful for its pathetic loveliness was the sweet strain, "He led them like sheep." The long-sustained notes, held successively by the soprano and alto parts in this chorus, made an effect which will dwell in the memory as one of the loveliest ever heard by mortal ears. But it was chiefly, as it seemed to us, in the second part of the oratorio—the Exodus-hymn—that the colossal power and beauty of the chorus were most felt. “The depths have covered them,” “Thy right hand, O Lord,” “And with the blast of Thy nostrils”—of these and one or two more choruses the effect was stupendous. We can but take refuge again in negation, and say it was indescribable. And of “The horse and his rider,” which begins and ends the hymn of triumph, and which perhaps to most hearers seemed to reach the crowning point of musical glory, we can say no more. The splendid success of the last day’s singing was mainly due, no doubt, to the effect of the three days’ previous practice. There was little enough to find fault with before, but by the end of the Festival the signs of timidity which marked the first attempts of the gigantic chorus had wholly disappeared. The conductor had thorough command of the whole body. It answered to the beat with a springiness of accent, if one may use the term, which showed that every component unit was under the government of that magical baton; that every one was singing completely at his ease. The admirable skill of Mr. Costa has been, indeed, in the way of personal distinction, the most conspicuous feature in the whole festival. If we are obliged to dissent from some points of what we may call his principles of editorship, it is the more incumbent on us to pay due acknowledgment to his splendid conducting. Neapolitan as he is, representing by birth and education schools of music the very remotest from all that English Handel-worship has to do with, he has yet conferred signal service on the national music of England. If we can claim, and we fairly can, to be now taking the lead in Europe in the matter of choral singing, the distinction is due in no small degree to the society which was wise enough, forgetting national prejudices, to put itself under the guidance of the most skilful conductor of orchestral music. To that happy choice the society mainly owes whatever success it has had. It is as well to recollect this, when witnessing such consummate leadership as Mr. Costa has been displaying in his place of command at Sydenham. The public behind a conductor is apt to forget that the less he seems to be doing, the more he is really doing or has done. Only by long years of patient discipline could the nucleus of that chorus have been brought so thoroughly into hand. The whole annals of music probably can show no more wonderful instance of successful organization than the singing of this great multitude, for the first time together. The easy way in which, on the very first day, they fell into their places, and were presently singing as steadily as if they had been practicing for months, was a marvel to see. And upon the last day especially, choruses of extreme difficulty, such as “The people shall hear,” were sung with a degree of steadiness and freedom such as have never been reached within our hearing by the Sacred Harmonic Society or any other choir.

Of the solo singing during the festival much might be written, but it would be chiefly a repetition of old eulogies. If the gathering of 1865 has any place in the history of English music, it will have to be recorded that the honors fell to two English singers, Mr. Reeves and Mr. Santley. Of Mlle. Patti’s performance it may be enough to say that she made her little voice heard to better effect in this large building than any one had anticipated, and sang the oratorio music of Handel in a style which was as faultless, vocally speaking, at it was admirable for simplicity and earnestness. Two persons alone excepted—Mlle. Titiens and Madame Goldschmidt—we knew not who could have better filled the place of first soprano.

Of the musical success of the Festival, this much must suffice. It is not a fraction of what might be easily written of an event so interesting. It is said that the undertaking was virtually a failure in a pecuniary sense, though a nominal surplus is shown. If this be so, every one will be sorry, but few need wonder. The expense of such music as this is necessarily enormous, and who is to pay for it? Not the middle class, for they cannot afford the cost; not the upper, for they do not care about the music. We do not see how such demonstrations are to be made to “pay,” unless means can be found for making the music audible to larger multitudes than have yet been attracted to the Crystal Palace. If this could be done, and the prices reduced to one-fourth of the present scale, the cost might be met easily enough; but of the first condition being reached, there seems at present but slight chance. On the whole, it would seem to be more reasonable to be content with a decennial celebration, which should be really a “festival.” This gathering has had nothing festival about it. The “commercial” impulse has been the motive of the undertaking. Grand music has been produced, but the sentiment of Handel worship has had little or nothing to do with it. The public, moreover, do not like puffing, and the puffing in this case has gone beyond all ordinary bounds. The thing has been over-advertised. Advertising may answer with dwarfs and tumblers, but a “Handel Festival” should be above it. You cannot advertise people into enthusiasm. A decent amount of publicity, and less of the gratuitous trumpeting which begets suspicion, would probably have answered better. As it is, the musical people of England have to thank the Crystal Palace Company for a magnificent display, which has been musically an honor to the country. There would have been more reason to sympathize with a partial failure, if a great name had not been dragged through mud puffery to swell a dividend.

For Dwight’s Journal of Music.

Music in Cincinnati.

CINCINNATI, O., JUNE 23, 1865.—There were five concerts this month, a fact which proves several things: first, for instance, that your correspondent was mistaken when some six or more weeks ago he thought the season closed; secondly that Cincinnati can stand a good deal more than Bostonians—for such thermometers as we had to endure in concert-rooms here, you could not—nor did you ever—stand.

To begin with the last: the “Cæcilien-Verein” gave the fourth concert of the ninth season, last night, Thursday, June 22d. The programme was as follows:

- 1 “Be not afraid,” Chorus from Elijah. Mendelssohn Bartholdy.
- 2 Fantasia for two pianos from Norma. Thalberg. Mr. Charles Kunkel and Mrs. (Mr. Andres).
- 3 “Ocean, du Ungeheuer,” Soprano Aria from Oberon. Weber. Mme. Caroline Rive.
- 4 Tarantella for two pianos. Fr. Kroell. Mr. Charles Kunkel and Mrs. (Mr. Andres).
- 5 “Requiem für Mignon,” from Goethe’s Wilhelm Meister. Rob. Schumann. Miss, Mme. O Rive. Lohengrin, M. Helmkamp.
- 6 Third Scene, first Act, from “Lohengrin.” Rich. Wagner.

The chorus was excellent, and especially in the magnificent scene from Lohengrin. It was the first concerted piece, excepting the Pilgrim chorus from Tannhäuser, that I ever heard from any of Wagner’s operas. On first impression the “music of the future” as represented here seemed good enough music for me. There are strange modulations, it is true; but so there are in Beethoven, a great many. There was melody too; and the magnificent combination of five soli with a chorus of six parts, (Soprani, Alt, Tenor primi e secondi, Bassi primi e secondi) was soul-stirring in the extreme. Of the other pieces, the Requiem for Mignon, which we heard repeatedly, was very finely performed. Especial praise is due to the composition of Mr. Kroell, yet in MS., which is a piece of music worth playing and listening to. The fine manner in which the different parts are carried, the effective melodies and harmonies make it a piece that ought to be known and played widely. Madame Rive is a teacher of music here; her voice is no longer fresh, her manner of singing not remarkable, and we have nothing especial to say about her. Messrs. Charles Kunkel and Andres played finely, and—personally, that is between you and myself—if they had played some other piece than “Norma” I would not have objected either. We have heard as much of Thalberg and his school as is wholesome. In fact the question ought to be solved by this time how far the finger-gymnastics introduced by Thalberg and Liszt, and followed up ad nauseam, are a proper subject for exhibition in a concert-room in general, and in the room of a society avowedly devoted to classical music in particular.

Now if Mr. Wehli, “the eminent piano-forte virtuoso and composer,” as the show-bills have it, plays Wehli one—two—three—four times each evening, and if the Wehli style resolves itself into Etudes and Fantasias by Thalberg principally, with the admixture of some Liszt, we have no right to find fault with it, nor with him, nor with Mr. Max. Strakosch. For their object is to make money. The public prefers high and lofty tumbling on the piano, to pieces that are worth hearing. Why then should they not have left-hand solo pieces à la Dreischock or Fantasias à la Thalberg and Liszt? M. Wehli has a mastery of the instrument that is remarkable; he plays what he does with fine taste; but for the improvement of true taste for the best music it is not at all necessary to hear what he plays. Sky-rockets are not generally considered works of art, nor are they looked upon as great incentives to improvement in the art of painting for example.

Mr. Strakosch exhibited twice, June 16th and 17th. Mademoiselle Helene de Katow plays simple airs with much taste, but has no strength for bravura-pieces. Madame Behrens excels principally in dwelling on very high notes an immoderate length of time—giddiness on the part of the audience is the necessary consequence—and sings various songs. Mr. Powers sings other songs and seems to be quite a favorite. I did not hear his “Adelaide” and cannot therefore judge. It ought to be added that the bills did not attract Cincinnati very violently; the houses were hardly half full.

The concert next in retrograde order was the concert of the Harmonic Society, June 13th.

- 1 Overture—Egmont. Beethoven.
- 2 “As the hart pants,” 42 Psalm. Mendelssohn.
- 3 Andante, Fifth Symphony. Beethoven.
- 4 Cantata, for Solo & Chorus “Hear my Prayer.” Mendelssohn.
- 5 Solo, Violoncello, Hymn from “Stradella,” arranged by A. Liedner.
- 6 Chorus, “Hallelujah to the Father,” from Mount of Olives. Beethoven.

The programme was excellent, and so were the singers. There was a vocal effect particularly beautiful in the chorus, which is rarely found, produced by an Alto numerous and strong, fine, sympathetic voices, in the place of that insufficiency and thin quality of tone usually found in the Alt of choruses. Another point of especial attraction was the fine singing of Mrs. D. in the Soprano-soli. That solo “O for the wings of a dove” yet rings in my ears, and I do not remember where I have heard it sung with more poetic insight into the character of the music, and with more true feeling. A society is fortunate if it have a member like Mrs. D., whose voice is so fresh and sympathetic, and whose reading and performance so true and tasteful.

The orchestra unfortunately did not at all well. We dissent altogether from the tempo which Mr. Barus took for the Andante of the Fifth Symphony, and hope we need never hear the piece again from the same orchestra, played in a manner as crude as it was our misfortune to hear it that evening. There is a characteristic tendency, it seems, of mixing up insignificant pieces with grand works of genius. The same Stradella transcription for Violoncello which we once reported as played in the “Cæcilien-Verein,” made its appearance here again. What its effect must have been, sandwiched as it was between Mendelssohn and Beethoven, I leave you to imagine.

The first concert of the month as to time was that of Mr. Jacob Kunkel, June 2d. Mr. Charles Kunkel, one of the few prominent pianists here, is a brother of the concert-giver, who is quite young. Mr. Jacob K. played his one solo, Gottschalk's Grande Paraphrase de Concert sur "Il Trovatore," with much brilliancy. It would be well for him to improve his touch, which is not yet varied enough, and—if his audience will stand it—to play something by somebody else when he gives his next concert. Gottschalk is well enough—elegant, dainty, sometimes enchanting—but after all it is small matter. There are some older masters and some young ones, say for instance Beethoven and Chopin, Mendelssohn and Ferd. Hiller, Hummel, and Moscheles and Field; and one so old, that our generation in this neighborhood at least, affects not to be able to see any beauties in him, old Johann Sebastian Bach. Now all these have written some music for the piano, which is fully as enchanting and elegant as Gottschalk's, and in addition there is the true fire of holy and immortal inspiration in their works, which compares to Gottschalk's music as the eternal fires of Baku to yon fire-fly. There were "Les Contrastes" for two pianos by Moscheles, which you in Boston well know, finely played by Messrs. Andres, Kroell, Charles and Jacob Kunkel. Mr. Hahn played a piece by David for the violin quite well. A little more certainty in high notes, some improvement in touch and bowing will make Mr. Hahn quite a good soloist on his instrument. Breadth and boldness of tone, fine shading and delicacy will follow as the legitimate fruits of study. Mr. Powers and Madame Rive sang various songs and duets. The house was very full and bouquets were plenty. The Messrs. Kunkel are decided favorites.

A noteworthy feature in Mr. Wehli's, Mr. Kunkel's and Mr. Andres' concerts was the Chickering Grand, which all these gentlemen evidently prefer to any other. Mr. Wehli carries two with him, Mr. Kunkel has one with which he is enraptured, and Mr. Andres thinks they excel all others. As your correspondent always held the same opinion, and as he cannot forget either old Mr. Chickering, or the present Messrs C., or Boston where these instruments are made, or the instruments themselves and their wonderful tone: he is really glad that competent judges in this part of the country are of the same opinion; and he hopes such opinions will tend to the benefit of good playing, of good music, and of the Messrs. Chickering. *

Very Shabby Worship.

(From the Presbyterian Standard.)

A country town. There is one Roman Catholic Church. There are five starveling Protestant Churches, all briskly competing with each other for such of the church-going population of the place as do not run after the attractions of Popery. Some of the houses of worship are neat and architecturally beautiful. Others are remarkably inelegant. Two or three lank steeples pierce the atmosphere, distinguishing the edifices which they deface, from market houses or barns.

The people who gather under the roofs of these several structures, exercise the right accorded to them by the Constitution of the United States, to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

The most glaring feature of their worship is what they call sacred music. To listen to it, one would think that some of them have no consciences at all.

To begin with the Presbyterian Church. The pastor gives out what he calls "the twenty-fourth Sa-a-am," which he reads in a sing-song manner from the beginning to the end, as if he feared his congregation could not read it in their books. Having read it, he says that we will sing four verses of it, and then sits down. Now the other end of the church begins its work. A wheezing is heard, as when the fire is blown by means of an aged pair of bellows. The instrument is getting up its wind. Some extemporized discord follows the wheezing. A few flourishes of "voluntary" are being played, preparatory to playing the tune as a sample of what is to be sung. One-half of the notes are incorrectly played. These interfere with the musical effect of the other half. Presently the tune is blundered through, and the singing begins. Singing? The angels in heaven don't sing in that style, certainly. Singing? No, it is howling. The choir consists of a large man with a voice like a calf, two women with cracked voices, and one with a defective idea of time. The instrumental help is a machine which the church bought for fifteen dollars less than they would have had to pay for a good "Mason and Hamlin." The man who had it to sell, told them that it would make a louder noise. So it does. Noise is not worship. We leave the place.

Then to the Methodists. Surely they will praise God in better style. They are not annoyed by the presence of such a wind instrument. That is a relief. The preacher gives out "the ten hundred and sixtieth hymn, on the eleven hundred and seventieth page, long metre," after which he, like his Presbyterian neighbor, reads the hymn through. The reading being done, he again announces the number, page, and metre, and lines out the first half of the first verse. Now for the singing. The deficiency of instrumental accompaniment is more than compensated for by the magnitude of the leader's voice. Although the church can hold but three hundred people, his lungs and throat are of a sufficient capacity to fill a cathedral, and he gives them full play. He cannot consent to hide his light under a bushel. With all his might he bawls forth the two lines, then comes to a halt. The fine, clear voice of the minister is then heard, in pleasant contrast to this great hull of Bashan, reading the next two lines. It is as if he would say: "My friends, I see you have your books before you, but I know you can't read the hymn, so I will read it for you." "Lining out" would be a miserable interruption, if the singing were good; as it is, it is a desirable thing to stop the eruption of that volcanic voice, on any terms possible.

Now for something more elegant and cultured. At the Lutheran Church they have an organ. It is an imposing little affair, with pretty case, and gilt pipes. A boy blows the bellows behind, and a young lady presides at the key-board in front. If somebody would put a small quantity of some lubricating substance on that part of the bellows apparatus which squeaks, it would remove a great annoyance. And if the fair organist would bring her fingers in contact with the keys with that gentle pressure which should characterize organ playing, rather than in the strumming, pounding fashion in which she learned to play jigs on her mother's piano, the result might be a style of music which would be more befitting the house of God than that which now grates on the ear. The time is good. The tune is well selected, and in keeping with the words. But the choir mouth and mumble their words so that nobody can understand what they are singing.

Away to the Baptist Church. Two streets off, their singing is audible. They all sing. That is an advantage and an excellence. It is better than in those churches where it is understood that the choir have the monopoly of it, and that it is ungentle to interfere. They sing pretty well, too. The minister happens to be the leader. Take care, though, good brother, or you may have an attack of bronchitis, some day, if you keep at that steady kind of work too long. Praying, preaching, and singing, all on a stretch, are too much for one man. Get a good man to take your place, as soon as you can find the right man. But meantime, keep at it, and make your people sing.

They are praising God at the Episcopal Church. A neat miniature cathedral. The walls of solid and pointed (plaster in imitation of) brown stone; a comely belfry on top. The rector stands with his tasteful robe of white, and the people with their prayer books in their hands. A well tuned organ, small, but of sweet tone, is played by a delicate young lady. The choir consists of three young girls and a small boy. There is no depth to the music; no richness; no fullness. The congregation is afraid to join in it, lest they should crush it out of hearing. The minister looks quietly on, as if to say that he would not on any account disturb it. It gently pursues its unruffled course till it comes to the end of the chant, when it gracefully subsides, and gives place to the next part of the service. Where are the men? Where are the big boys? Where somebody to take hold of it and help it along in good, earnest, wholesome burst of sacred song?

Was the temple worship of the Jews of olden time anything like any of these? Is the spirit of the Psalms such as to lead us to offend all musical propriety and all decency when we worship God? Why need we offer to the Lord of heaven and earth, such lame, halting, imperfect stuff as would not be listened to in a decent concert room? Aye, such as would be kicked out of the commonest beer-garden. If the preaching were as bad as the music, there would be talk of turning the minister away.

It is almost as easy to execute music well as to do it badly. There is no good reason why bad music should be tolerated in any Christian church. Let us give God the best. Let us train our people to the total abolition of all such unholy nuisances as have been alluded to. While we say with the psalmist, "let everything that hath breath praise the Lord," let us also say with the apostle, "I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also."

BACK WOODS.

The German Saenger-fest in New York.

(Concluded.)

THIRD DAY (TUESDAY). Visits to Central Park, &c. In the evening a minstrel Tournament, at which fourteen societies (from abroad) competed for a prize. Programme:

FIRST DIVISION.

- 1 "Only Thee," by Jost. The Philadelphia Singerrunde.
- 2 "The Singer's Greeting," by Fischer. Buffalo Liedertafel.
- 3 "Hunting Song," by Andre. Philadelphia Orpheus.
- 4 "The Meeting," by Kuss. Washington Singerbund.
- 5 "Wine Chorus," by Kruger. Hartford Singerbund.
- 6 "Good Night! Farewell!" by Kücken. Poughkeepsie Germania.
- 7 "The Grove," by Haaser. The Buffalo Singerbund.

SECOND DIVISION.

- 1 "The Sailor's Dream," by Abt. Baltimore Germania.
- 2 "Storm and Blessing," by Kallwoda. Philadelphia Singerbund.
- 3 "Eight Psalm," by Abt. Baltimore Liederkreis.
- 4 "Evening Fête," by Abt. Philadelphia Liedertafel of the Freie Gemeinde.
- 5 "Love," by Zoeller. Philadelphia Liedertafel.
- 6 "The Wanderer's Night Song," by Reinsger. Philadelphia Junge Maennerchor.
- 7 "How Mourn the Waves," by Abt. Baltimore Arion.

The Judges were Messrs. Timm, Theodore Thomas and Meierhofer. The Tribune, after special notice of each effort, ends with saying:

It will be seen that the singing, generally, was of a very high order of merit. We have designated seven societies as first class. They are the Liedertafel of Buffalo, the Saengerbund of Hartford, the Saengerbund of Buffalo, the Saengerbund of Philadelphia, the Liederkreis of Baltimore, the Liedertafel d. f. Gemeinde of Philadelphia, and the Junger Männerchor of Philadelphia. We do not presume to anticipate the judgment of the prize judges, but we think the victory will rest between the Liedertafel of Buffalo and the Saengerbund of Philadelphia. Both are equal in all points of excellence, excepting perhaps that the Buffalo Society displayed more delicate artistic perception of the finer shades of tone. The music they sang was of a simple character, while that of the Philadelphians was ambitious in its difficulties. The singing of both was equal in excellence, and with us the decision would rest in favor of Philadelphia, judging by this single hearing, which is hardly fair, because of the higher character of the music performed.

FOURTH DAY.

Wednesday, July 19th, was the first day of the Festival proper at Jones's Wood. We borrow from the Tribune's description of the scene, omitting, however, its learned disquisition upon "ankles!"

The morning dawned with puffs of white cloud in the heavens, upon a broad, bright field of blue sky. The breezes were afloat, but there was an abundance of brilliant sunlight, and the day promised to be fine.

As early as 9 o'clock in the morning, the up-going cars and East River steamers began to be thronged; by 9 1-2 they were crowded; by 10 they were crammed. The Germans were out in full force. They brought their wives and their babies. By every avenue they came to the wood. The Second and Third ave. cars were packed to their utmost, and there were hundreds of hacks, carriages, barouches, buggies and wagons in the thoroughfares. The lower part of the city was deserted, and the reservoirs of beer in the upper portion were opened, and seemed to be inexhaustible.

IN THE WOOD.

Making our way through the narrow entrance to the Wood, with the kindly assistance of a number of policemen who preceded us with their clubs drawn, elbowing and forcing our way through this wall of human beings, we at last found the coveted inside of the fence almost equally crowded. The upper side of the grove contained a general crush of hacks, carriages, buggies and almost every species of vehicle from the funeral hearse to the common cart. Hackmen were swearing, cartmen were replying with vigor and effect; little boys—the gamins of New York—were running hither and thither, with apparently no other object than to scream, shout, and make themselves general nuisances; while the main crowd of incoming Germans—men and women, children on foot, and babies in arms—continued to pour on toward the river, like a torrent toward the sea.

The dry grass was trodden into dust, and the roads and pathways were doubly dusty with the tramp of eager multitudes. The groves no longer presented green vistas of cool retreat and seclusion. Almost every square rod of green grass was taken possession of by some family group. The smooth, jutting rocks were transferred into impromptu tables, whereon the luncheon of the day was spread, with its attendant drinkables.

Now and then you would notice beside one party a keg or two of lager, with a temporary booth containing wine and other beverages. This indicated the down-town proprietor of a lager-beer saloon on a festive burst. He had brought with him his own wine, beer, and cheese, and was having a family time in a domestic, hearty way. Other groups would consist of several young fellows, who, with their three or four bottles of whisky, were making merry regardless of expense; and now and then the German shoemaker or tailor, with his family, was to be seen, having a more quiet and less expensive time with plain sandwiches and cheese, without the accompaniment of beer or wine.

Further on the crowd grew in density. It ceased to be groups of families, and became a succession of miscellaneous assemblages, seated on benches, with burdened tables before them, or lying in the grass with charming indiscriminate abandon, and with a regular lager beer booth in the centre.

The meadow, where the Caledonian Club chiefly resort for their cricket and ball games, and where the great target of the Schutzen Corps still remains, was a specially favorite place of resort. Upward of 20 minor booths had been here erected, around which thirsty throngs were gathering and going, and a band of music was pouring forth its mellifluous strains from the small dancing stand, where the mystic maze was being woven by men and women, boys and girls, with an energy worthy of the best and any cause. Flags were flying. From every bare branch fluttered a streamer or banner, representing various nationalities, but with the national colors of red, white and blue omnipresent. Almost all the men wore badges symbolic of the singing society to which they belonged, which were also represented on the persons of the ladies by graceful scarfs of appropriate colors.

It has been said that the German women whom we see in this country usually lack beauty. But there were many pretty girls at the festival yesterday, and the joyousness and heartiness of those who were not thus distinguished, amply made up for beauty of face and gracefulness of form.

We cannot follow the Tribune man's highly colored con amore description of the dancing stands, swings, hobby-horses, ladies' ankles (!), booths, &c., or his Homeric enumeration of all the Singvereins, Turners, drum corps, bands, &c., that composed the grand procession through the city to the steamboats, and again from the landing through the woods. We will suppose them all assembled at the place of their destination, ready to proceed to the grand business of the day.

Finally at about 3 o'clock the singers were summoned to the Green, where the distribution of prizes to the successful Society was to take place and the oration to be delivered.

After a patriotic air by Huschmann's Band, and a few introductory remarks, the President, Mr. Steffen, introduced the Hon. Frederick Kapp, the orator of the day, who spoke as follows:

THE ORATION.

The festivities which, for four days have united us within and without the walls of the great American metropolis, are drawing to a close. The hours of friendly intercourse, of cheerful mirth and recreation, have gone by. It remains to crown the winners in the race of song, to distribute these prizes among the most successful, to raise a parting song, a shout, words of farewell, a pressure of hands, and the gay throng will be among the things that were. May the remembrance of these fleeting moments beguile the journey homeward, and may the trophies won animate the victors and the vanquished to increasing effort in the glorious path of German song. I have had the honor of welcoming you on your arrival in our city, and the unavoidable absence of a valued friend, who was to have tendered you our farewell wishes, devolves upon me the duty of taking his place. How could this duty be better performed than in contemplating what we have attempted and attained in its bearings upon the position and the future of the German-Americans in the social and political life of this country and in the home of our fathers? It is not the first occasion, as we are well aware, on which the German singers of the Eastern States have held a festival, although it may be the first on which so large a number as 2,500 have attended. Within 15 years past, Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York have welcomed the German glee clubs in their midst no less than eight times, and the present celebration would have been held four years ago if the war had not intervened between design and execution. In the turmoil of arms the muses were hushed. At a time when the fate of a people rests on the point of the sword, the mind is not at ease to follow the airy flights of fancy, or the play of lighter humors.

In a free country where all sit in council who take the field, where the chances of war decide also the individual fortunes of every citizen, he willingly sacrifices the comforts of retirement to the political exigencies of the time, and holds his personal advantage subordinate to the higher interests of the community. Thus, from the first outbreak of Rebellion our countrymen fully appreciated the importance of the contest which was forced upon the country; thus every man hastened to the rescue of our liberties and labored in his sphere and to the utmost of his power without hope of favor or reward. More than all others the fighting men of German birth—Turners and Singers in the van—discerned the true state of political affairs, and poured out their blood on every battle-field of the vast theatre of war, absolving the debt of patriotism without stint or cavil. I do not say this with a view of claiming especial merit for us as Germans. We have done our duty, and conscience is our reward. But now that liberty and the republic have triumphantly demonstrated before the civilized world that their foes cannot prevail against them, now that a great cause has confounded all adversaries, it is fit that our pæans should be heard. It is not the choir of male voices merely that graces our festival; it is the chorus of freemen that we delight to hear. Shame upon the man who trills a song when he should fight a battle; but honor to him who first achieves his freedom, and then chants praises! Music was the form of combined expression first exercised by the German mind in this country. By the culture and spread of music the Germans have done much to invest American society with new life and manifold attractions. The effect had been to make many Americans regard a musician and a German as convertible terms even to this very day. There is a germ of truth concealed under this mistaken notion. Every German, though he be without musical culture, has musical intelligence, inhaled like the fragrance of wild flowers from the very atmosphere of his native country; his mind, long a stranger to the political activity of other nations, has found room and leisure for gentler tastes, more genial studies, and a more harmonious development, than the more callous Yankee, absorbed in the perpetual adaptation of means to ends. For ourselves we treasure song and poetry as the most palpable link between our Western homes and the joys of our distant home. At a bound they carry us back to the Fatherland, and revive the impressions that were wont to gladden the hours of youth; subduing for a season the ceaseless din of daily toil and traffic, they break the slumbers of those home-bred spirits that hovered around us when we dwelt among our own. They bridge the ocean, not alone to carry the backward march of memory, but to convey to us the new creations of our country's genius in their most popular and appreciable form; like an electric current, they preserve the burnish even of the dullest steel, and suffer not the rust to settle. They have proved themselves in history as the most efficient safeguards of our nationality in the land of strangers. Our countrymen whom the last century wafted to the shores of the Hudson, the Schoharie and the Mohawk, clung to their national manners, thoughts and feelings just as long as they perpetuated the mastery of the grand and simple strains of the German choral hymns. It was not until the third generation began to intone the English anthems, and in consequence to give ear to English sermons, that they lost the thread of national continuity with their fathers who lived before them. We do not need to be told that music is not the only badge of our nobility, but it is the broad popular foundation on which the structure of our greatness is erected. When thirty years of contest for the mental and moral emancipation of the world had prostrated the energies of Germany, music was the staff on which the nation leaned. She threw off the heaviest fumes of her lethargy, the asylum in whose pale for generations the common heart of the country sought a refuge. At length the ditty assumed larger proportions, and aspired to bolder flights, until the wondrous dramas of Schiller and Goethe reverberated from clime to clime; and then the serried phalanx of our mighty sages passed the light of thought from hand to hand, until our people took the lead in the mental development of Europe.

A like career must be run by each individual German; from the chastened sensational life to which music has introduced him, his way lies through the mazes of vigorous thought to the manly earnestness of action. Our countrymen at home are now called upon to realize in their public affairs the teachings of our bards and our thinkers, to translate words into deeds, the theory of the closet into the practice of daily life, to conquer for the national mind a home-stand in the land of its birth, to produce a German state, a free and united Germany. In the solution of this problem we cannot greatly aid them. We are in the midst of mature political institutions, of the advantages of which we have constantly partaken, which may at times require our services for their preservation, but where creative energy is without an object. Standing on American soil, we must share the political labors of our fellow-citizens in the spirit of that profound humanity in which we have been reared. For what is outside of politics our eyes are still turned homeward; we can never renounce the land of our fathers without renouncing our better selves. The times have happily gone by when the Germany, dazzled by the material achievements of the New World, made haste to cast his memories and his attainments behind him in his overweening anxiety to out-Herod the Herods of practical Americanism. The memorable occurrence known as the Know-Nothing movement made manifest to the dullest perception that the German does not rise in the scale of being by aping American manners and blabbing American phrases. The more firmly we cling to the intellectual treasures of our nationality, the more will we be respected by the native population. What firmness of character is to the individual, national pride is to a people; the source at one of self-esteem and of the regard of others. * * *

At our very doors, in the midst of our fellow-citizens of every clime, is abundant opportunity for our ablest efforts. Time was when a German poet sang:

"Germans, a nation to be your stars in their course have denied you; Wherefore? That ye might be freer to grow to be men."

Germany is exerting herself to falsify the predictions. Casting aside the swaddling clothes of cosmopolitan inanity, it has based its policy on the solid foundation of its interests. The festival of its marksmen and its singers, as held this year at Bremen and at Dresden, are protests against disunion and atrophy; they point the way in which the country will recover itself, slowly, perhaps, but surely. To us, on the other hand, as Germans in foreign parts, the dictum of Schiller is clearly applicable. To constitute a German nation in the bowels of the American, is impossible; but to lend our influence to the struggle for the best interests of man is not only feasible, but a solemn duty, and our influence will take the firmer hold, and wear for itself the wider bed, the more highly we prize the fruits of our German culture; that, though some justly or unjustly complain of neglect or even insult, what though a few may have been quieted by their country instead of quitting her, we must not speak ill of the fatherland. It is a froward child that maligns its parents, even for cause. We may leave it to piqued aristocrats and self-conceited refugees to belittle their country for having withheld from them a sphere of action, or because their fortunes are more promising abroad. True, Germany is apt to forget her children outside of her border, until such time as she needs a patriotic contribution; not knowing what she has lost, she treats them as an English squire regards his poor relations, wondering at their pertinacity in inviting themselves to the family gatherings, when their best prospect is the seat at the lower end of the table. It is natural for us to view the matter in another light. We think of poor Cordelia, thrust from her father's door, because she could not heave her heart into her mouth, yet ready to give succor when the favored ones fall in their duty.

No blown ambition do our arms incite,
But love, dear love, and our aged father's right,
Soon may we hear and see him!

Hail then to the land of our sages, our poets, our composers! Hail to the great Republic, which has given us a kindly welcome, which has crushed Rebellion, and reset the foundation stone of Liberty! Hail to the Ninth German Musical Festival! May it have a long and glorious line of successors for the honor of Germany and the good of America, shedding their refining influences on the spirit of the people, sustained by the favor of our worthiest citizens, and crowned with joy and gladness, as this has been!

THE SINGERS AND THE PRIZES.

Of course, the singing amounted to very little at the picnic; all were intent upon social enjoyment; they sang here and sang there, but no effort could bring any successful concerted effect out of such a chaos as presented itself on this occasion. Great interest was felt on the subject of the prizes, the friends of each society claiming for their favorite the right to carry home the banner or the cup.

We awarded the first prize in our article of yesterday to the Saengerbund of Philadelphia, giving them credit over the Liedertafel of Buffalo only on account of the more important music which they sang. The prize Judges, Messrs. Timm, Thomas and Mayerhofer, in accordance with our previously expressed judgment, gave the first prize to the Saengerbund of Philadelphia. This award gave general satisfaction, although some thought that the Buffalo Society was better entitled to it. To the astonishment of all, however, the Liedertafel of Buffalo was passed over on the second award, the Silver Cup being given to the Jungen Männerchor of Philadelphia. This was a most preposterous judgment, and one altogether unexpected by those who heard and considered the performance of the two Societies. We are glad, however, to learn that the most experienced member of the Committee was opposed to the decision, and though in the minority, fought against it as long as possible. So the Philadelphia Societies carry away with them the honorable trophies of the amicable and harmonious contest just ended in this city. The Saengerbund takes the elegant flag, the Jungen Männerchor the silver cup.

Music Abroad.

London.

The Musical World, of July 15th, sums up the operas at the two houses for the preceding fortnight, as follows:

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. On Saturday, the Huguenots.—Tuesday, Linda di Chamouni—last time this season—for Mdlle. Ilma de Murska. Madame Trebelli, Pierotto. —Wednesday, Medea.—Thursday, Il Flauto Magico for the first time. A grand success—the principal parts thus sustained:—Queen of Night, Mdlle. Ilma de Murska; Pamina, Madame Harriers Wippen; Papagena, Mdlle. Sinico; Attendants on the Queen, Mdlles. Redi, Moya, and Trebelli; the three Youths, Mdlles. Bauermeister, Zandrana, and Drasil; Papageno, Mr. Santley; Tamino, Dr. Gunz; Priests, Signors Foli and Filippi; Monastatos, Signor Stagno; and Sarastro, Herr Wolrath. Madame Harriers Wippen made her first appearance this season, and was received with distinguished favor. Mdlle. Ilma de Murska created an immense sensation as the Queen of Night.

On Saturday (July 8) the second performance of Il Flauto Magico—greater success for Mozart—greater success for Mdlle. Ilma de Murska, who was rapturously encoined in both arias of the Queen of Night. —On Tuesday, for the third time, Il Flauto Magico, with Signor Gardoni in place of Dr. Gunz as Tamino. Signor Gardoni greatly applauded and deservedly. —On Wednesday, Lucia di Lammermoor, for the benefit and last appearance this season of Mdlle. de Murska. House crowded in every part, and excitement at its highest. Mdlle. de Murska's reception at the end a real enthusiasm. The mad scene sung and acted better than on any former occasion. At the end of the opera she came forward again and sang the air with variations, by Proch, which she originally introduced in the last scene of Linda. —On Thursday, Fidelio.—To-night, Un Ballo in Maschera, with Madame Harriers Wippen as Amalia, Mdlle. Sarolta (her first appearance) as Oscar, Madame Trebelli as Ulrica, Signor Carrion as the Duke, Mr. Santley as Renato, &c., &c.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday (by special desire), the Huguenots.—Monday, Faust e Margherita.—Tuesday, La Favorita, for Madame Galetti, repeated. —Thursday, the Huguenots.—To-night Don Pasquale, first time for three years, with Mdlle. Adeline Patti as Norina, Signor Mario as Ernesto, M. Gassier, Malatesta, and Signor Ronconi as Don Pasquale, his first appearance in that character.

On Saturday, Don Pasquale, with Mdlle. Adeline Patti as Norina; Signor Mario, Ernesto; M. Gassier, Malatesta; and Signor Ronconi, Don Pasquale, his first appearance in the character. —On Tuesday, Don Giovanni.—On Thursday, the Barbiere.—To-night, Don Pasquale for the second time.—The Africaine is announced for Saturday, the 22nd inst.

Of Mlle. de Murska, after her great success in Lucia, the Times says:

"The appearance of the lady is marked by as powerful an individuality as her vocal and histrionic talent. The slender frame; the vacant, haggard aspect; the long, dishevelled tresses; the complexion ghastly white; the eyes, that from the front appear coal black, and contrast forcibly with the blond chevelure, produce a singular impression as Lucia runs before the lamps with strange, wild gestures, pouring forth the melancholy notes which Donizetti has put into the mouth of his demented heroine."

MAYENCE.—The fifth Musical Festival of the Middle Rhine was fixed to take place on Sunday the 2nd and Monday the 3rd, in the great Hall. The principal Associations or "Vereine," announced to take part in it, were those of Darmstadt, Mayence, Mannheim, and Wiesbaden, and the principal artists: Mdlle. Melitta Alvsleben, of Dresden; Mdlle. Philippine von Edelsberg, of Munich; Herr Carl Hill, of Frankfurt; Herr Gustav Walter, of Vienna; Herr Franz Weber, of Cologne (organ); and Herr August Ruff, of this place. The chorus was to consist of eight hundred, and the orchestra of one hundred and forty persons, with accompaniment on the organ erected by Messrs. Ibach Brothers, Bonn. The whole was to be under the direction of Herr Friedrich Lux. The following was the programme:—Sunday, July 2nd, 10 1-2 a.m., Overture to Die Zauberflöte and Handel's Judas Maccabæus. Afternoon, Procession of boats on the Rhine.—Monday, July 3d, 2 1-2 p. m., Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; "Adornamus Te," by Palestrina, and "Jean dulcis memoria," (a capella); air from Die Zauberflöte (sung by Herr G. Walter); the 63rd Psalm for women's voices, with harp, horn and organ accompaniment, by Franz Lachner; and the Lobgesang, by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

KÖNIGSBERG, also, has had its Festival (for Festivals are the order of the day in Germany); Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in D was the pièce de resistance.

But the most formidable of all must have been the SAENGER-FEST, near the end of July, in DRESDEN, of which we await an account from our own Correspondent. By last accounts, 22,000 singers were enrolled, and they were counting on 100,000 visitors.

The solis were to be executed by 200 voices designated in advance. An immense music hall, flanked by a restaurant, not less immense, had been erected. The city was divided into 35 districts, and a special commission charged with the lodging and comfort of the guests. They even went so far as to coin a conventional currency, to serve during the Festival, so as to equalize the different kinds of money and save visitors from loss by exchange.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 5, 1865.

Ode.

TO THE LOYAL SONS OF HARVARD WHO FELL IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

[Sung at Cambridge on "Commemoration Day," July 21, to the music of the Horatian part-song by Flemming].

"INTEGER VITE SCLETERISQUE PURUS."

Manly and gentle, pure and noble-hearted,
Sweet were their days of peaceful use and beauty.
—Sweeter than peace, or days, or years, is Freedom:
Thought our young heroes.

War's wild alarm drove sleep from ev'ry pillow;
Slavery, rampant, stalked athwart the broad land;
Prompt, at the call of Country and of Duty,
Flew the young heroes.

Darkly the clouds hung o'er a doubtful conflict:
—Out shone the rainbow: LIBERTY TO ALL MEN!
Lo! now a Country grand enough to die for!
—Peace to our heroes!

Rear we for them no cold sepulchral marble;
Fresh in our hearts their very selves are living,
Dearer and nearer now—e'en as God is nearest—Risen in glory!

Cease from thy weeping, rise, O Alma Mater!
Count thy young heroes tenderly and proudly;
Beaming with holy joy thine eyes confess them:
These are thy children!

J. S. D.

Public School Festival.

The Seventy-second Annual Festival of the Public Schools of the City of Boston was held at the Music Hall on Tuesday afternoon, July 25, and in the form, so successfully observed since 1858, of a musical festival, varied with addresses, presentations, &c. The children themselves—a select twelve hundred of them, of both sexes—were the singers; an excellent orchestra and band accompanied; also at times the Great Organ, played by Mr. LANG; and Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, for some years (in addition to all his other labors) chief of the corps of musical instructors in the schools, conducted the whole. The happy parents and friends of the medal scholars, and guests invited by the City Government or school committee, formed the audience; and of course there was not room for one in ten of those who would have felt joy and pride in being there.

We need not describe the beautiful scene, which was essentially what it has been for several summers past:—those terraces of blooming youth and beauty rising from the organ front to either gallery; the tasteful decorations of the Hall; the emblems, the banners, the bronze Beethoven in the centre of the mass of singers, &c., &c. Enough to say, it seemed more tasteful and more captivating than ever before. And the admirable order, the more than military, the fugue-like complication and precision, with which all those pleasant hosts were marshalled, school by school, from mysterious ubiquitous points of entrance and seated on their difficult and airy heights, and all so noiselessly, was in itself a model of discipline, of unity in variety, an example of manners (each one so perfectly subordinated to the whole), and a sort of lesson in what we might call musical form; the whole mass was informed with a common purpose.

But this in passing. With equal unreserve we praise the music. We have no doubt that this also was better than it has been before. There is a marked progress from year to year in the style of singing; in precision and ensemble; in prompt unanimity of attack; in right giving out of the voice and in musical quality of tone (although there is still much to be learned in this respect); and in light and shade. The intonation was almost always perfect. The leader seemed entirely master of the situation. In such a chorus naturally the boys' voices have the more blatant quality, for some purposes and in some degree good, but needing in the main to be subdued and civilized; their function relatively seems to be about that of the brass instruments in an orchestra, chiefly telling in the tutti fortissimo passages. We know not how far it is possible to overcome another somewhat disturbing phenomenon, always noticeable when the whole mass are singing loudly on a high pitch; we mean a certain sharp rough edge distinctly separable from the solid body of tone.—The selection of music, too, was uncommonly interesting and appropriate. Plain Chorals, in long, even notes, for the basis of singing practice, say we; and we have in past years commended the substitution, so largely, of solid Lutheran Chorals for the sing-song popular ditties which used to be the staple of all such festivals, whereby nothing was learned by the singer, and the hearer's respect for music not at all increased. But the point was gained in giving the Choral a foothold and placing it at the foundation of class practice; the art of fairly planting and sustaining tones, a true cantabile or singing style was thus to some extent secured. But to fill with Chorals the whole programme of a public festival, upon a gala day, the glad and free hour after rigorous examinations, would make the affair tedious and heavy; whereas a Choral, coming in the midst of lighter (not frivolous) music, is as refreshing as a walk by the sea-side at sunset. Rossini therefore was particularly in place; and so were the Chorales, all the more by contrast.—This was the Order of Exercises:

- 1.—The Lord's Prayer.
A Gregorian Chant, sung in unison by Twelve Hundred Pupils of the Public Schools.
- 2.—Invocation by the Chaplain.
- 3.—Address by the Chairman of the Festival Committee.
- 4.—Addresses.
- 5.—Trio. Rossini.
Song by Pupils of the Girl's High and Normal School.
- 7.—Choral. "How glorious beams the Morning Star," with Organ accompaniment.
- 8.—Addresses.
- 9.—Image of the Rose. Reichardt.
- 10.—Chorus from "Semiramide." Rossini.
- 11.—Address and presentation of Bouquets to the Medal Scholars, by the Mayor.
- 12.—The Hundredth Psalm.
- 13.—Benediction.

Of the music, what we would most willingly have spared is that Gregorian Chant to the Lord's Prayer. It keeps upon the third for a very monotonous length of time—an interval hard to sustain in tune so long (although it was remarkably well achieved)—and as music it is rather empty; it would have left room for one more good Choral. To one, however, who had not heard it year after year, the fresh, cool, even, wide expanse of tone, rising so calmly from twelve hundred child-like voices, must have been a beautiful surprise.

The Prayer from "Moses" seemed rejuvenated; the voices went well with the orchestra, and when the reserved boy force came in with the major of the key, the effect was very decided.—The Trio, sung by the girls of the High and Normal School, was the second of the three Trios, "Faith," "Hope," and "Charity," written by Rossini for female voices with piano accompaniment, which in this case Mr. Zerrahn had happily arranged for orchestra. The effect was delightful; the voices nicely balanced, and the quality of tone and style refined and delicate.—The fine old Choral: "Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern," sung in unison, with Organ accompaniment, was a new addition to their stock, and was cheerfully impressive.—"The Image of the Rose," by Reichardt, is a charmingly natural, melodious piece, which everybody enjoyed, the graceful orchestration adding not a little to the pleasure.—The Chorus from "Semiramide" is a triumphant and majestic burst of praise, which has long kept its place here in the mixed concerts of Oratorio Societies and Musical Conventions; it rang out with spirit, and the single chords ejaculated after bits of symphony were prompt, sure and unanimous.

Scholars and audience had reason to complain again of the old fault—a very tempting one—of these Festivals,—that of too much speaking. Why was it necessary that all those gentlemen should speak at all? Or any of them so long? With the single exception of Mr. Wendell Phillips, whose speech was music of another kind, more perfect in its kind, an exquisite felicity of oratory, at once enchainning every child, not excepting those of older growth; for he struck the keynote of the occasion, and every chord in every breast was responsive to the end. Excellent wisdom was discoursed also by Mr. R. H. Dana, and by our worthy Mayor, and by the Reverend Chairman of the Festival Committee; but it was too much of a good thing, where there was so much music.

Harvard College.—"Commemoration Day" and its Music.

The honors paid by our ancient University, on the Friday of Commencement week, to her five hundred and twenty-eight sons who had served in the armies of the Union during the late Rebellion, and ninety-three of whom had laid down their lives upon the altar of their Country and of Freedom, were all that piety, affection, gratitude, aided by taste and genius, could devise, and will remain, like the lives so nobly offered, a beautiful memory forever. All the exercises and the show of that day were in the highest degree significant and interesting. But we do not think that enough has been said of the inspiring prominence of Music among the other true expressions of the common feeling. Our academic festivals hitherto have had little to boast of in this particular. A band to march by, and to bray brass music in the church between the "parts," has been the only participation of the Divine Art therein. A teacher of singing has for some time been employed in the University,—a step very tardily and hesitatingly taken. In the hands of Mr. J. K. Paine, a thorough musician and most earnest artist, this office has acquired somewhat more importance, and the "Musical Director" of the College is making himself, his art and function more and more respected. Through him, Music as Art, and in a worthy academic sense, for the first time figured in one of Alma Mater's public solemnities, at the inauguration of President Hill. Who has forgotten the fine impression then made by a chorus from Mendelssohn's "Antigone" music, by a Lutheran Choral, and by a composition of Mr. Paine himself?

On "Commemoration Day," wider scope and more unstinted means were given to Mr. Paine, for music worthy of the occasion. A choir of sixty voices, male and female, was collected among students, graduates, members of the Harvard Musical Association, and other gentlemen and ladies of Cambridge and of Boston, and carefully drilled to sing, with orchestral accompaniment of 26 instruments, some pieces of the highest kind of music, during the morning services in the Church. The selections embraced: 1. A portion of Bach's Cantata on the Choral, "Ein feste Burg," consisting of the Choral sung first in harmony (Bach's) supported by the orchestra; then sung in unison, with rhythm changed to six-eight, in detached strains amid a figurative accompaniment, exceedingly impressive; and finally sung in harmony again without accompaniment:—did not the Choral seem transfigured, all the more itself in a diviner sense, in the power and beauty of Bach's wondrous setting!—2. The opening movement: Requiem eternam, &c., followed by the Sanctus, of Cherubini's Requiem; the first a deep, sweet, solemn, tender strain of such harmony as creeps over and inevitably wakes the most religious chords within us; the second a most brilliant, trumpet-toned, sublime ascription. 3. "Old Hundred," specially harmonized, with orchestral counterpoint. 4. A rich and stirring Gloria from a Mass which Mr. Paine has recently composed. When before has such music been known in a College in this land?

The performance was on the whole very effective, and it made a deep impression. And yet it was done under all sorts of discouragement; it was almost impossible, at this season, to gather the same singers together at any two successive rehearsals; it was hard to collect the materials of an orchestra; there was but one single chance of full rehearsal with the orchestra; and finally the organ-loft into which all these ninety musicians had to be packed was close and uncomfortable, and the place discouraging and deadening to all music. Yet earnest effort, as the event proved, was not thrown away; the spirit of the day carried it against all obstacles; and Dr. Putnam's earnest words sank all the deeper in an atmosphere so well attuned, as did the other services; while it would have seemed strange indeed if the air did not grow musical with the touching spectacle of that array of Harvard's heroes on the stage, all with the clear light of duty done and of new life begun so unmistakeable and beautiful in their rejuvenated faces.

At the dinner, under the great tent, amid speeches and poems and enthusiastic greetings of generals and admirals, and tributes to rare valor even in the common ranks, music also bore part in the shape of part-songs, sung, under the same direction, by a choir of about thirty male voices, as well as luscious strains from Gilmore's band. The part-songs were three. 1. After the President of the day, Mr. C. G. Loring, had gracefully and feelingly alluded to those whom we had met to honor, and after Gen. Devens had eloquently responded in behalf of our soldiers, "The Soldier's Oath," stirring verses by Rev. C. T. Brooks, was sung to a spirited part-song composed therefor by Mr. Paine. 2. The next speech was by our excellent Governor Andrew, who dwelt on the virtues and pure motive of the sons of Harvard who had fallen; this naturally suggested the text of the Horatian Ode: Integer vite, to which the German Flemming has composed a part-song, a strain of simple, solemn, noble harmony, often sung by students to the Latin words, but this time sung to words cast in the same metre for the occasion, which will be found above. 3. After fine poems by Mrs. Howe and A. Holmes, a characteristic speech by Emerson, who always goes so briefly to the point, speeches by Pres. Hill, General Meade, Admiral Davis, and others, the Russian Hymn was sung to verses by O. W. Holmes entitled "Union and Liberty." Other fine speeches and incidents, especially a very noble poem read by James Russell Lowell, followed or preceded this. Would that we might print them all!

The part-songs suffered from the vast size of the place, the pervading and distracting noises, and the insufficient numbers of the choir. From the same cause the speeches suffered still more. Imperfectly heard, many good things seemed dull. Besides, the greatness of the occasion weighed too heavily, no doubt, on some of the surest and best speakers, making their efforts appear labored and heavier than when they speak from instant impulse. For this very reason, Music is one of the fittest kinds of eloquence for such occasions; here preparation, balking so many speeches, is the true preventive of failure.

But there was no failure that was more than trifling and of course incident to feasts on so large a scale. All praise to the Committee for the admirable skill with which the whole thing was arranged! The wonderful scene within that tent it would require a reporter with an eye, a poet, to describe; and then he would need borrow the rosy fingers of the Hours to trace its shifting beauty into sunset.

But to come back to the Music—the Moral of all this is for our fellow Alumnæ,—those of them who feel the worth of Music. And of those who did not feel it before, perhaps some were led to think of it by what they heard in those memorial services. We wish to ask them: Will they, after that experience, longer ignore the claims of Music among the other "Humanities" which they are ever so ready to endow within the halls of Alma Mater? And shall the College go a-begging even for the means of putting the Chapel organ in repair, so that it may be fit to second the efforts of such a man as Mr. Paine to place high Music on its proper footing in a University of such renown?

MUSIC AND SMALL-POX.—Music is turned to odd uses in these days when every one who has no real fancy seems agonizing after originality. The inauguration of the statue of Dr. Jenner, which is to take place at Boulogne towards the end of July, will be signalized in part by a "Hymn to Beauty," written by M. Elwart, in which the great discovery of vaccination is to be successively illustrated by choruses of children, young men, mothers and patriarchs.—Athenæum.

Our German Correspondence.

CARLSBAD, BOHEMIA, JUNE, 1865. From this loveliest of spots I cannot write you much about music, although it is by no means without its musical associations; but of its beauty I would sing an unending song. And though your Journal is nominally one of Art, I am sure that a description of one of Nature's Paradises may claim a place in it, and that your readers will not take amiss, for want of something more strictly appropriate, some account of one of the oldest and most famous watering places of Europe.

Carlsbad lies in the narrow valley of the Tepel, a gushing, sparkling little stream, which reminds one of a pretty New England "creek." It winds exceedingly, forming several right angles in different directions within quite a short distance, and its valley is in some places so closely shut in by hills, that there is room for but one level street on either bank, the backs of the houses frequently leaning against the rock. Where the basin is wider, the streets are built up in terraces one above the other, which together with the fact that the town lies along the angles of the river, the different parts being, as it were, "round the corner" from each other, gives it an exceedingly picturesque appearance. Add to this that the valley is shut in on all sides by lovely green hills, thickly covered with pine and beech woods, which in a measure dove-tail with each other, and you can imagine that the eye does not easily tire of all the loveliness that surrounds one. But if Nature has done much for Carlsbad, Art, or rather Skill, has done quite as much in its way to make Nature's work most accessible to man, and present its charms in the most favorable light. In every direction, deep into the hearts of winding vallies, running in easy zigzag to the tops of the highest hills, traversing the woods in a perfect network, following, high upon the slopes, the curves of deep, dark, wooded ravines,—everywhere, in fact, where it is possible to penetrate, there are excellent paths, as perfectly kept as in any private park. Every few rods a pretty bench, in a charming nook, or commanding a beautiful view, invites the wanderer, whether weary or not, to rest and quiet enjoyment; at all high points, or wherever there is a fine prospect, there are bastions, pavilions, or the like, and the woods are cut away so as not to hinder the view. In short, everything possible is done for the comfort and enjoyment of the visitor, in this respect, and all these arrangements are accomplished in such perfect harmony with the natural features of the region, that they do not detract in the least from its original romantic wilderness. It is said that there are 13 German miles (about 60 English) of promenades in and around Carlsbad, in a circuit of about three; and I can well believe it, for in four weeks hardly a day has passed, but I have discovered some new lovely path. The woods everywhere are beautiful, mostly free from underbrush; they are full of birds which make the air musical with their song. Now and then you suddenly come upon a lonely chapel or shrine, with a peasant, male or female, kneeling before it, absorbed in devotion. All is silent around you in these grand old woods; the song of the birds, the voice of the cuckoo calling from afar, the rushing of the treetops as they sway in the wind, the distant sound of the woodcutter's axe, or that of hills coming up from the valley; these only seem to enhance the stillness. Or go with me out into the open country early in the morning; the narrow path leads through the waving cornfields; at every few steps a lark rises up from the grain near you, and, mounting straight up towards the sky, pours forth indefatigably her exquisite song. Often the air is fairly filled with these sweet sounds, so new to an American ear, that it never tires of hearing them. The lark, the nightingale, and the cuckoo are all unknown to us, and, altogether, Europe has many more lovely singing birds than the northern part of North America, at least.

The most peculiar feature of Carlsbad, however, is its springs. There are about a dozen of them, which issue from the ground at different points, within an area of perhaps half a mile by a quarter. Their chief difference lies in their temperature, which varies from about 70° to 170° F. Their properties, principally muriate, sulphate and carbonate of soda, are alike. The main spring is the Sprudel, which rises from its artificial basin, like a fountain, in a thick jet three or four feet high, and in regular jerks, as if it were being pumped up. It is a most curious object. Close by is a bridge, beneath which the rock from which the Sprudel issues juts out into the river, covered with a variegated incrustation deposited by the water running over it from two so called "tap-holes" which have been bored to prevent forcible eruptions of the spring, such as have in former times taken place. This incrustation is found in a very short time upon everything with which the water comes in contact, however frail and delicate the object is; and it is quite common to expose small articles, such as carvings and statues of wood, alabaster or composition, baskets, and even bouquets of natural flowers or grasses, to the influence of the water for a few weeks, when they will be covered with delicate yellow or brown frostwork.

Carlsbad is very much frequented, but, as the régime forbids all excitement, it is not at all gay or fashionable. People live mostly in the open air, if the weather admits. From 6 to 9 a crowd is assembled around the springs—each individual with cup or glass in hand. At the Sprudel and at another of the principal springs there is music for two hours, and good music too, performed by Labitzky's band, who spend the whole summer in Carlsbad. Three times a week the whole band (in the morning it is divided) plays at one of the coffee-saloons in the town, and twice, for a small admission, at a pretty coffee-garden about a mile off. Their execution is masterly; of course they play chiefly light music, but also a great deal that is really good. In the mornings, for instance, they will give single movements of symphonies, one day the Allegro, the next the Andante and Scherzo, and the third the Finale, or the like. You can also hear fine transcriptions, and good overtures, etc. At every other one of the admission concerts, the programme is excellent throughout, and always contains a symphony. Carlsbad lies so far off the regular route of travel that few artists come there to give occasional concerts, as in other watering places.

To return to the mode of life of the patients. After drinking from three to eight cups or goblets, at intervals of at least a quarter of an hour, they are obliged to wait at least an hour before breakfasting, which is usually spent in walking. Many walk again during the forenoon, attracted by the beautiful surroundings. Hardly any one dines at home, but à la carte, (after the Austrian fashion) at one of the many restaurants and hotels. The afternoon is again devoted to walking, driving, and taking "coffee" (an indispensable meal in Germany) at some coffee-garden, of which there are several dozen, more or less finely situated, in the neighborhood. One of the driving excursions is to the Hans Heiling Rocks, the peculiar grouping, and pillar-like form of which have given rise to the legend which furnishes the text for Marschner's opera of Hans Heiling. Schulhoff has also composed a series of Salon-pieces called "Souvenir de Carlsbad," each bearing the name of some favorite spot well-known to the frequenters of the place. Among these are people of all nations and from all parts of the world. Quite a number appeared in the daily list of arrivals as "from Amerika;" others from Australia, Africa, Jerusalem, not to speak of Russia, Norway and Sweden, or Greece, Turkey, and the many nearer countries. And all ranks are to be met there; from kings and emperors down to the humble peasant in national costume; young and old, rich and poor, all come to seek relief from these wonderful waters, which are said to have been accidentally discovered by the Emperor Charles IV., of Germany, on a hunting excursion, and of which chronicles still extant attest the existence over 500 years ago.

My next I hope to write you from Dresden, when I can tell you more about musical affairs, particularly about the Musical Festival which is to take place there next month.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson &amp; Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Let thy loving mercy. (O salutaris hostia.)

Terzetto. L. H. Southard. 35

A very beautiful trio, for Soprano, Tenor and Bass.

Latin and English words.

We are marching to the fight, love. The Hussar's parting. Claribel. 30

A Hungarian love song. Simple and easy.

Vocal beauties of "La Dame Blanche," by Boieldieu.

A Soldier's life for me. (Ach welche lust.) 40

Come, gentle lady. (Komm, O holde Dame.) 40

The Maid of Avenel. (Die weisse Dame hahn uns hören.) 30

O, house of Avenel! (Lay tön das Siegeslied.) 30

The first of these is rather the more brilliant, but each of the others has its own wild, sweet melody,—one of those which continue to vibrate in the memory long after having heard them. The last contains the Scotch air known as "Robin Adair;" but in the opera it is the commencement of a clan-ship war song, to which is affixed a melodious chorus.

The watching mother. Song. C. M. E. Oliver. 30

Contains fine words, united to a melody of classic beauty.

O, days of summer bloom. Ballad. G. Linley. 30

A song which one is tempted, at first glance, to call common-place; but on playing and singing, it wins upon one, until there is a solid satisfaction in performing and repeating it.

When I am far away from home. G. H. Lee. 30

A pleasing "home" song, with a good melody.

Home the boys are marching, or Ring the merry bells. Song and chorus. F. Wilmarth. 30

Worthy of a good place among the "return" songs, now so popular.

The war is over. Ballad. W. Kittredge. 30

Mr. Kittredge's ballads are extremely simple, but he seems to have a peculiar tact in hitting the taste of the "people," and this will probably be a popular song.

Instrumental.

The Dream. (Un Song.) Reverie. M. Bergson. 50

Reverie sur Semiramide. J. C. Hess. 50

The above two are in the ordinary dreamy style of Reveries and Nocturnes, and are of about equal merit, the last one having the most striking melody. Both good pieces.

Reve Angelique. Bercense. Sidney Smith. 50

A well chosen melody, varied and accompanied with semi-legato chords and arpeggios in the composer's well known style, but of a more subdued character than his brilliant pieces.

Croyez moi. (Believe me.) Melodie. F. Baumfelder. 25

A short but very pretty piece, containing a sweet melody with accompaniment, in Nocturne style.

The Caledonian Quadrille. Jullien. 75

A Caledonian Quadrille is simply a collection of Scotch airs arranged so that one may dance by them, and there are a number of such collections; but this is, perhaps, the best selected, and the most pleasing.

Impromptu. Op. 29. No. 1, in A♭ major. Chopin. 50

Similar in difficulty and character to those lately noticed.

Bellagio for piano. B. Richards. 50

One will have to refer to a musical dictionary, to find what "Bellagio" means; but Richards interprets it very prettily by his graceful notes.

President Johnson's grand union march. G. R. Herbert. 40

Autumn leaves. Polka Redowa. A. H. Fernald. 30

Two good pieces, of which space forbids a full notice.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 636.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 19, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 11.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Rondo.

BY W. S. B. MATHEWS.

At the basis of all musical composition lies the song, or simple melody. At first, perhaps, it consisted of but one period, but has now been extended to two and even three.

A succession of tones having a determinate relation to each other, yet not making complete sense, even when any portion of the succession is taken, forms a Passage. Such a chain of tones serves to divert the mind from melodies that have gone before, to modulate into new keys, or to lead around to the introduction of more weighty matter. Introductions to pieces of music often consist largely of passages.

If now we take a melody of, for example, two periods; let this be followed by a Passage; let this lead to a repetition of the original melody; we shall thus have a composition complete and satisfactory, possessing great unity, yet more variety than the simple song-form. Such a composition is the simplest form of the Rondo; which derives its name from the fact of the constant recurrence of the original theme, as in a circle; and this theme constitutes the pill of the rondo, so to speak. The Rondo forms the basis of the Sonata, Chamber Quartet, Trio, etc., and Symphony. It is therefore, worthy of careful study.

There are five forms of Rondos.

A Rondo of the first form consists merely of a theme of say two or three periods, a passage of any length the composer may deem in good taste, leading to a recapitulation of the theme, thus ending the work. The formula for this Rondo form is, therefore,

THEME, PASSAGE, THEME.

Extending our scheme to a minuter analysis, we might have a theme of two periods, each of four phrases; a passage of, perhaps, three phrases; and again the theme as before. A short coda is often appended in order to make the ending less abrupt. We find an example of this kind of Rondo in "Zwei leichte Sonatinen, G-dur and C-dur," in Holle's edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, Book 36. We refer to the moderato movement of the first of these Sonatinas. It consists of a theme of eight measures, a passage of eight measures, the theme as before, and a coda of ten measures.

The Rondo of the second form consists of a theme of two or three periods, followed by a subordinate theme, or Episode, of two or three periods, and this, again, by the theme. A coda is usually added, and the theme and episode are often connected by passages. The formula for this rondo-form is:

THEME, EPISODE (passage), THEME, CODA.

The episode is always in a key different from that of the theme, but related to it.

The Andante from Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, Op. 2, No. 1, is a rondo of this kind. The following is a schedule of it:

THEME { Period I. 8 meas. } 16 meas.
          { " II. 8 meas. }
EPISODE { Episode 10 meas. } 15 meas.
          { Passage 5 meas. }
THEME { As before. } 16 meas.
CODA . . . . . 14 meas.

The Largo from the Sonata Op. 2, No. 2, in A, is another example in point. Its scheme is:

THEME { Pe. I. 8 m. } 19 meas.
          { Pe. II. 11 m. }
EPISODE { Pe. 6 m. } 12 meas.
          { Pass 6 m. }
THEME { As before. } 19 meas.
CODA . . . . . 30 meas.

In this case the coda itself is quite a complete composition. Its motives are partly original and partly taken from the theme, and are put together according to the following scheme:

ORIG.	TH.	PASS.	TH.	CODA PROPER.
7 m.	7 m.	3 m.	8 m.	5 m.

The Rondo of the third form consists of a theme and two episodes. It may be regarded as being composed of two Rondos of the second form, which, so to speak, dovetail into each other, as in this scheme:

THEME, EPISODE, THEME,
THEME, EPISODE, THEME.

Calling the theme A, the first episode B and the second episode C, we have the following scheme as that of the new form; A-B-A-C-A. An example of this form of rondo is the Rondo from Beethoven's sonata in C, op. 53. An analysis of this composition gives the following plan: THEME, 62 measures; FIRST EPISODE with its passages, 52 measures; THEME, as before, 62 measures; SECOND EPISODE 138 measures; THEME to Prestissimo, 90 measures; CODA (Prestissimo) 141 measures. The Adagio from Sonata in E $\flat$ , Op. 10, No. 1, is another example of this kind of rondo.

The Rondo of the fourth form has the following scheme:

THEME, I. EPISODE, THEME, II EPISODE, THEME, I EPIS., CODA

This rondo-form is divided into three chapters, as we have indicated in the plan. The theme, first episode, and repetition of the theme form a small rondo, complete in itself. Complete, yet not perfect. A further development is given by the second episode, which, in consideration of its importance, is usually nearly as long as the theme and first episode together. This forms the second chapter of the work. The recapitulation of the theme, first episode, and coda, forms the third chapter. It is to be observed that in order to avoid monotony the first episode is put in a new key at its second appearance. The finale of the Sonata in A $\flat$ , Op. 26, by Beethoven, is an example of this kind of rondo. Another beautiful example in point is the finale of the great Sonata in C major, Op. 2, No. 3, Beethoven. The motives of this rondo are especially delightful, and in particular, the treatment of the second episode is hardly surpassed in beauty by any other of the Sonatas. The plan of this work is:

Chap. I. { THEME 29 m. }
          { EPISODE I. 33 m. }
          { THEME 34 m. }
Chap. II. { EPISODE II. }
          { 78 meas. }
Chap. III. { THEME 37 m. }
          { EPISODE I. 35 m. }
          { CODA 60 m. }

The Rondo of the fifth form, like the preceding, consists of a theme, two episodes, and coda, or conclusion. The coda, however, instead of being a comparatively unimportant part of the composition, as in the forms previously considered, assumes here a dignity and importance only subordinate to that of the theme. In this form we shall designate it by the term CONCLUSION. We have already seen that the rondo of the fourth form is divided into three parts, or chapters, each somewhat complete in itself. It is to be observed however, that these chapters do not come to a full close save at the end of the piece. In the fifth rondo-form it is otherwise. The first chapter comes to a full close, and this part is to be repeated before the next is played. The theme is not repeated between the first and second episodes, but the Conclusion is given instead. As this omission of the theme detracts somewhat from the unity of the piece, it is customary to construct the second episode from motives very similar to those of the theme, but differently treated. We have, then, the following as the plan of this rondo-form:

THEME, EPIS. I., CONCLU. EPISODE II. THEME, EPIS. I., CONCLU.

A well marked example of this kind of rondo is the finale of the little F-minor Sonata, Op. 2, No. 1. Its plan stands thus:

Part I. { THEME 23 m. }
          { EPISODE I. 12 m. }
          { CONCLUSION 23 m. }
Part II. { EPISODE II. }
          { 30 m. }
Part III. { THEME 23 m. }
          { EPISODE I. 13 m. }
          { CONCLUSION 23 m. }

All of the rondos in Beethoven's Sonatas in which the first part is repeated belong to this rondo-form.

Following up the plan of development we come next to the Sonatina, of which we shall treat in another article.

A Letter from Richard Wagner.*

TRISTAN UND ISOLDE.

My Esteemed Friend—You are still the only editor of a political newspaper of any importance on whose support I can reckon, whenever it is necessary for me to be put, in any way, in communication with the public. It is for me a real piece of good fortune that we should be connected by friendship of long standing; were this not the case, on this occasion as on previous ones, I do not know to what means I should be obliged to have recourse, in order, as I naturally very much desire, to inform the more serious lovers of my art, who are scattered far and wide, that they will, in a very short time, really have an opportunity of witnessing a performance of my Tristan und Isolde. While, therefore, I earnestly beg you to do all you can for the propagation of this intelligence, I must beg you to allow me to accord myself the small satisfaction of directing your attention to the peculiar significance which I may fairly attach to the performance, that is actually coming off, of my work. Perhaps in giving a short history of the obstacles which have hitherto prevented this performance, I shall be furnishing you with a contribution, not unworthy of notice, to the history of modern art generally.

* Addressed to the Editor of the Vienna Boten.

In the summer of 1857, I determined to interrupt the execution of my work on the Nibelungen, and commence something shorter, which should renew my connection with the stage. Tristan und Isolde was really commenced in the above year, but the completion of it, from all kinds of disturbing influences, was deferred till the summer of 1859. With regard to the first performance, of which I could only hear in connection with my taking an active part in it myself, I entertained, as I was then still excluded from the territory of the German Bund, the notion of coming to an understanding with some theatrical manager, and giving a series of German operatic representations during some of the summer months in Strasburg. The manager of the Grand Ducal Theatre at Karlsruhe, Dr. Edward Devrient, whose opinion I asked upon the subject, represented to me the great difficulties of such a scheme, and advised me rather to wait and see whether the noble exertions of the Grand-Duke of Baden would be successful in procuring me a summons, for the period required by the study of my work, to Karlsruhe, where every appliance for a good performance would willingly be placed at my disposal. Unfortunately, the steps taken in Dresden for this object by my most illustrious patron had not the desired result. My absence from Karlsruhe rendered an understanding with the singers chosen to represent my work so difficult, that, in consequence of the great and altogether unusual obstacles in the way, from the moment my presence in Karlsruhe was proved to be an impossibility, all further attempts to carry out my design had to be abandoned. Had my presence at Karlsruhe been then possible, I should have there found for the principal parts in Tristan the very singers who, even after six years, and when I am at perfect liberty to choose whom I like, could, as the only ones calculated to carry out my views, have been selected by me from the great numbers of artists attached to the opera-houses of Germany. I allude to those admirable artists, since then my most intimate friends, Herr and Madame Schnorr von Carolsfeld.

You shall now hear, with a smile, probably, of astonishment, what round-about ways had to be taken for me to obtain what I had been on the point of attaining and what I had failed to attain solely for the reasons I have already given.

In order to render possible a first performance, in which I myself should take an active part, of Tristan und Isolde, I migrated, in the Autumn of 1859—to Paris. My scheme was to collect a model German operatic company there during the months of May and June, 1860; the Italian Operahouse, unoccupied every year at that period, was to have been engaged for the performances. As I found most of the artists, with whom I was acquainted and on friendly terms, inclined to take my offer into consideration, the first thing I had to do was to think how to ensure the material possibility of the enterprise. It was not difficult to find a business-director in the person of one of the proprietors of the Italian Operahouse; it was more difficult to procure the financial guarantee of a capitalist. To get a person to give it, I had to provide courage for a well-disposed wealthy man, a friend of one of my Parisian friends; at my own risk. I arranged three grand concerts in the Italian Operahouse, when I had fragments of my music executed by a grand orchestra, and—for it is not possible to do anything of the kind otherwise in Paris—at a very heavy expense. The only advantage I wanted to derive from the indisputably great and significant impression produced by these concerts on the public was to gain the confidence of the capitalist on whom, as I have said, I had fixed to support my proposed operatic enterprise. Unfortunately, this gentleman, somewhat advanced in years, was quite unable to attend the concerts; my friend's speculations ended in nothing. But, though it became, moreover, evident that it was impossible to get together at the right moment, on account of the different dates when they would be at leisure, the German singers I intended to invite, and though the sacrifices and efforts the three concerts had cost me deterred me from any further similar attempts, the success of my appearance in Paris was, to my astonishment, eventually proved in another quarter. The Emperor of the French gave orders for the performance of my Tannhäuser at the Grand Opera.—You know pretty accurately in what new and strange complications I was involved by this affair, which made a tolerable noise throughout Europe: it cost me a deeply anxious year of my life. While I really should not have known what to do, had I achieved a great success, had that been possible, I felt in the midst of the raging storm of a most frightful failure, as though freed from some pernicious source of uneasiness that had, till then, stopt me on the right road, which, as, on the other hand, Paris had helped me to open up Germany once more, conducted me direct to Karlsruhe, to bring about there, if possible, the first performance of my Tristan.

May 1861 had arrived. Immediately assured of the most gracious desire, on the part of the illustrious pair, the Grand-Duke and Grand-Duchess, to promote my aim, I had to deplore the departure, which had meanwhile taken place, of my two artists, the Schnorrs, who had accepted a permanent engagement—in Dresden. I was now, in conformity with the kind intentions of my noble patron, to select what singers I liked, so that they might be summoned to Karlsruhe, to take part in the model performance of my work. I was not yet allowed to visit Dresden; I hastened to Vienna, to make myself better acquainted with the resources there. You, my dear Uhl, were then present with me at the first, and for me fine, representation of my Lohengrin, and will feel that what I experienced on that intoxicating May evening could not fail to give suddenly a new direction to my previously stormy life. It was at once evident that the task of securing the admirable singers of the Imperial Operahouse for a performance of my Tristan in Karlsruhe was an impossibility. On the other hand, it was my interest not to raise any objections to the offer made by the first authorities of the Imperial Theatre to produce Tristan forthwith at Vienna under my personal superintendence.—You know what was my principal cause for hesitating. It was expecting too much of that favorite singer, Ander, whose recent death filled us all with such heartfelt sorrow, to suppose he could go through the exceedingly fatiguing effort of representing the principal part in Tristan. But as all the other parts could be admirably cast, I was able to consent to alter, cut, and adapt the character so as to render it possible for this artist also to fulfil the task allotted him. The rehearsals were to begin in the autumn of 1861. You remember that a prolonged affection of the voice rendered Ander during the whole winter incapable of any fatiguing effort whatever, and there was then no one else to be got; Tichatscheck and Schnorr were both in Dresden and could not leave. The affair had to be postponed for another year. In the summer of 1862, I had already despaired of the work being again taken in hand at Vienna, when, to my astonishment, the management informed me that Herr Ander felt completely recovered, and had declared himself ready to resume the study of Tristan und Isolde.

This summer I became acquainted with the admirable, and in my opinion, extraordinarily sympathetic performances of that excellent artist, Schnorr von Carolsfeld, a really vocal musician and actor; he and his wife, formerly esteemed in Karlsruhe as a true and noble artist under the name of Fräulein Garrigues, had already, from pure inclination, so far mastered, with the greatest love and the most thorough intelligence, the principal parts in my works, that, when they paid me a visit on the banks of the Rhine, where I was stopping for a short time, we were enabled, in my little room, to get up complete musical performances of my opera, with Bülow's inimitable pianoforte accompaniment. This happened in my room, at a time when no one offered me the opportunity of doing so much on any stage. I was now allowed again to visit Dresden, where there were all the means for bringing out my work; but, when, in the autumn of the same year, I was stopping there for a few days, I could not help feeling at once certain, from the peculiar behavior of the management of the Theatre, that there was not the slightest probability of anything being arranged with me about my work. I learned, moreover, what hopes I might build upon the managers of the larger German theatres generally, when, not long afterwards, on my way through Berlin, I sent to say I wished to see the Intendant-General of the Prussian Theatres Royal, and he simply refused to let me call upon him.

Under these circumstances I was compelled once more to turn my hopes, much weakened as they were, to Vienna. Since the first delays in the production of Tristan, the musical press there had applied itself with especial alacrity to the task of proving that my work was generally not adapted for performance; and that no singer could either hit my notes or retain them. This theme became the watchword throughout Germany for all who furnished information, wrote, or spoke of me. A fair French vocalist—Madame Viardot, it is true,—expressed to me one day her astonishment that it was possible such assertions as, for instance, that this or that could not be sung, etc., should be advanced about us; were the musicians in Germany not musical as well, she asked. Well, I did not quite know what answer to give, especially for the information of a fair artist, who had once, by the way, expressively sung a whole act of Isolde, at first sight, in Paris. But matters were not really so bad with my German singers; guided by the extraordinarily intelligent industry and zeal of my worthy friend, Herr Esner, the Capellmeister, even my Viennese singers at last afforded me the great satisfaction of hearing them sing the entire opera, free from faults, and in a really touching manner, at the piano. How it could afterwards come into their heads again to assert they could not learn their parts—for so, I am informed, they said—is a riddle which I will not puzzle my brains in solving; perhaps they acted as they did to please our celebrated musical critics at Vienna and elsewhere, who were exceedingly anxious that my work should be considered impracticable, and for whom the practicability of the performance must of course be an insult; perhaps, however, the information I received was itself not true; everything is possible, for, now-a-days, the German press is not conducted in exactly a Christian spirit. Enough: I received at Moscow, in March 1863, from the management of the Imperial Opera, a communication, telling me I had no need to hurry my return to Vienna to attend the general rehearsals, fixed for that date, of Tristan, as, in consequence of illness, the performance could not take place before the theatre was closed for the vacation. The vacation passed and there was no more question of Tristan. I believe that among the persons in the theatre, there was a general opinion that, with the very best will, Ander would not be able to "get through" his part, far less perform it frequently. In this dubious state of affairs, the "Opera" could not possibly strike the management as a gain to the "repertory." I thought that this, as well as a great deal more, was so correct and so natural, as things stood, that I no longer troubled myself about the reports brought me at various times. To speak frankly: I had had enough of it, and thought no more of the whole business.

Thus then my Tristan und Isolde had become a mere fable. I was treated in a friendly manner here and there; Tannhäuser and Lohengrin were praised; otherwise, however, it seemed to be all over with me.

But fate had ordained otherwise. Had every plan I had previously made been successfully carried out, the principle at stake in the performance of this work would still not have been quite definitely decided:—on the other hand, the opportunity of arriving at such a decision, as completely as the circumstances of the present time render it possible to do so, was yet in store for me. When all else forsook me, a noble heart beat the more strongly and warmly for the Ideal of my art: it cried to the artist, abandoned by the world: "What thou createst I will accept!" And this time the will was itself creative, for it was the will of a—King!

The wondrous beauty of the exciting and promoting power which, for the last year, has entered into my life, and obtained possession, with smilingly coercive force, of my thoughts and endeavors, I cannot manifest to my friends except by the fact of its active existence. Such a fact I announce to day. And what the nature of the power here at work is, you must conclude from the mode of its manifestation, when I inform you in what fashion Tristan will be presented to my friends.

The performances of Tristan und Isolde, of which three at least are fully guaranteed, will be of a completely exceptional and model kind. For this purpose, in the first place, the representatives of the two extraordinarily difficult leading parts were especially summoned to Munich in the persons of my dear friends, Ludwig and Malvina Schnorr von Carolsfeld; they are accompanied by my trusty old comrade on the battle-fields of art, Anton Mitterwurzer, true and genuine as can be as Kurwenal. As far as circumstances will allow, too, the most judicious measures have been most magnanimously taken for the cast of the other parts; every person concerned is friendly and devoted to me. In order that we might not be annoyed by the disturbing influences existing in a theatre open every day, the cosy Royal Residenz-Theatre was placed at our exclusive disposal: everything has been carefully fitted up there for the requirements of an inward, clear, and snugly intelligible representation according to my directions. Here, almost daily, the magnificent Royal Hof-Orchestra, Franz Lachner's model creation, is placed at our service for numerous rehearsals, at which, caring for naught but the attainment of the highest artistic delicacy and correctness, we have plenty of leisure and time to effect this without undue exertion. In order to lighten for me the promoting survey of what every one is doing, my dear friend, Hans von Bülow, has been given me to conduct the orchestra—he and no other, he who once effected the impossible, when he compiled a playable piano-forte arrangement of this score, though no one can yet understand how he did it. With him, who is so well acquainted with the score, which still appears enigmatical to so many musicians, that he knows by heart the very smallest fragments of it, and has made himself master of my intentions, down to their most delicate niceties—with this second self by my side, I can take into consideration every separate item of the musical and scenic representation in that quietly confidential artistic frame of mind rendered possible only by affectionate relations between myself and artists connected by the ties of the firmest friendship. The zeal displayed in providing beautiful scenery and highly characteristic costumes is such that it seems as if the question was no longer one of a mere theatrical performance, but of a monumental exhibition.

Transported thus from the desert of our ordinary tradesman-like system of conducting theatres to the refreshing oasis of an art atelier, we prepare the work for a dramatic performance, which, purely as such, must form an epoch for all who may witness it.

The performances, for the present—as announced—only three, perhaps, in number, are to be considered as art-festivals, to which I am permitted to invite the friends of my art from far and near; they are thus removed from the category of ordinary theatrical performances, and taken out of the usual relations existing between the theatre and the public of our age. My gracious patron desires that these significant representations shall be offered not to ordinary curiosity, but wholly and solely to a more serious interest in my art; I am, therefore, empowered to issue far and wide, wherever the latter has gained men's hearts, invitations to these performances.

They will take place somewhere in the second half of this present May, and the exact days, as far as they can be settled before hand, will at the proper time be announced in the most largely circulating papers. We presume that whoever is not deterred from undertaking a journey to Munich expressly for this purpose, does not combine with it any superficial object, but manifests by it the earnest interest he feels in the successful solution of an important and noble artistic problem; and every one who, in this clearly defined spirit, sends in his name to the management of the Hof and National Theatre, Munich, may rely on finding a place kept for him at the theatre for the performance indicated by him. An invitation similar to, and having the same object as, the one I have now given to persons at a distance, I give also to the friends of my art here.

To any raillery to the effect that by such measures we appear to have taken into consideration an especially friendly public whom it would certainly require no great art to please, we quietly reply that on this occasion the question is not one of pleasing or not pleasing, that wonderful theatrical game of hazard of modern times, but exclusively one of deciding whether artistic problems, such as I have proposed in this work, are to be solved, in what way they are to be solved, and whether it is worth the trouble to solve them. That the last question does not mean that we wish to learn whether a great deal of money can be made by these performances (for this is the signification of anything pleasing or not pleasing in theatres now-a-days), but, simply, whether by admirable performances, with works of this description, it is possible to produce the anticipated right influence generally upon the cultivated human mind, is something that must be emphatically stated; that, consequently, the first object in view is the solution of a purely artistic problem, and that, therefore, only those should be summoned to that solution who, by serious interest in the matter, are really prepared and able to co-operate in it. Should the problem be solved, the question will be widened, and it will then, too, be shown in what way we are ready to accord to and prepare for the people, properly so-called, a participation in the Highest and the Profoundest even of art, though, as yet we do not think we ought to take into consideration the actual theatrical public of the present day.

If you are now of opinion, my dear Uhl, that I have been treating of no unimportant event in art, and that it is worth while to do something for the announcement contained in what I have said, may I beg you to employ, as you may consider best, your connections as a publicist. I am modest enough to know that I am issuing my invitations to only a few; but I also know that those few are surprisingly scattered at great distances. I should like my summons to reach those thus scattered; for what principally summons them to an extraordinary meeting is: even though the artistic effort should be inferior, at any rate so rare, beautiful, and glorious a deed, that it should certainly be noticed far and near. Let our watchword be: Hail to the noble doer of this deed!—With the most friendly greetings, I remain yours ever devotedly,

RICHARD WAGNER.

Munich, 18th April, 1865.

Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

1. THE LEGEND.

The old Breton legend, of the twelfth century, which Richard Wagner has taken for the subject of his opera, is thus given in Dunlop's History of Fiction.

In the court of his uncle King Marc, the king of Cornwall, who at this time resided at the castle of Tyntagil, Tristram became expert in all knightly exercises. The King of Ireland, at Tristram's solicitations, promised to bestow his daughter Iseult in marriage on King Marc. The mother of Iseult gave to her daughter's confidante, a filre, or love potion, to be administered on the night of her nuptials. Of this beverage Tristram and Iseult on their voyage to Cornwall unfortunately partook. Its influence during the remainder of their lives regulated the affections and destiny of the lovers.

After the arrival of Tristram and Iseult in Cornwall, and the nuptials of the latter with King Marc, a great part of the romance is occupied with their contrivances to procure secret interviews.—Tristram being forced to leave Cornwall on account of the displeasure of his uncle, repaired to Brittany, where lived Iseult with the white hands. He married her—more out of gratitude than love. Afterwards he proceeded to the dominions of Arthur, which became the theatre of unnumbered exploits.

Tristram, subsequent to these events, returned to Brittany and to his long-neglected wife. There, being wounded and sick, he was soon reduced to the lowest ebb. In this situation he dispatched a confidant to the Queen of Cornwall, to try if he could induce her to accompany him to Brittany, &c.

II. WAGNER'S LIBRETTO.

This libretto, in small octavo, 110 pages, was published in 1859, in Leipzig, by Breitkopf and Härtel. From a severe review of it by Prof. L. Bischoff, which appeared at that time in the Lower-Rhine Musik-Zeitung, we take the following abstract of the plot, omitting most of the reviewer's criticism, which, however may be found in the numbers of this Journal of November, 1859.

In the very first scene, as in Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, Wagner gives evidence of his great talent as a stage-manager and scenic artist. The stage represents the fore-castle of a ship—a tent-like apartment, closed at the back by curtains. Isolde is lying on a sofa with "her face buried in the cushions." Near her is Brangäne, her confidante. The song "of a young seaman is heard in the air, as if from the mast." The sailor yearns for his "Irish child," and at once gives us a specimen of the poetic bombast, and the mis-use of the German language, which we meet all through the poem.

Isolde now starts up, and, cursing the coast of Cornwall, on which she would willingly never land, implores the winds to dash the vessel to pieces. On her expressing a wish for air, Brangäne opens the curtains at the back, and thus exposes to our view the entire deck to the stern of the vessel, with the sea, stretching to the horizon, beyond it. Around the mast are stretched the crew, and behind them, knights and squires. At a slight distance from them is Tristan, gazing down on the sea, while his companion, Kurwenal, is lying at his feet. The song of the young sailor is again heard from the mast. This is admirable! Well merited applause cannot fail to be obtained by this scenic effect.

Isolde now despatches a message, couched in the peculiar and exceedingly eccentric German of the "Future," for Tristan to come to her. He refuses, however, very politely, to accede to her request, and kindly seizes the occasion to inform us that he is conducting her, as bride, to King Marke. But Kurwenal, who, it would seem, is not so refined in his manners, answers the bearer of the message, Brangäne, rather coarsely, or, to use a familiar expression, sends her back "with a flea in her ear." Besides this, "he sings after the confidante, as she hesitatingly leaves, with all his strength," a sarcastic ditty on a certain Morold, deceased, who once entered the lists for Isolde, and was killed by Tristan.

Brangäne returns to the forepart of the vessel, and draws the curtains close. Isolde, "on the point of the most fearful outburst," restrains herself, and questions her attendant. The latter replies, in the eccentric lingo to which we have already alluded, that Tristan would rather be excused. Hereupon Isolde tells her that Tristan is the same "party" who killed her betrothed, Morold, and then fell into her hands. The sword which menaced him she, however, let fall, and cured his wounds, that he might be restored to health, return home, and not annoy her any more with his presence. In return for all this, Tristan, she goes on to inform us, expressed his gratitude and swore fidelity to her, but he subsequently despised her, and recommended her to King Marke as a wife. This slight narrative takes up eighty lines! Hence her hatred, her torment:

"Unbeloved, this man of men Always near to see!"

The "unbeloved" applying to Isolde and not to Tristan.

Brangäne represents to her mistress that the match with King Marke is a very good one after all. With regard to Tristan's dreaded coldness, the faithful maid observes that she is sure there must be some remedy against it among the potions which Isolde's mother, who is skilled in all magical arts, has given them!

But Isolde selects from the "shrine," or, in other words, her family medicine-chest, a drink of death. She determines to pledge Tristan in this, and perish with him. As the vessel is now approaching the shore, she sends for him to share the "draught of reconciliation." After a long dialogue, spiced with dialectical beauties, and inextricably entangled in a labyrinth of constructions, compared to which the most crabbed unintelligible style of ordinary writers is a clear crystal stream—on what is past, and on the reconciliation which is, in consequence, needed, Isolde imperiously commands Brangäne to fill the golden goblet with the fatal potion, and hands it to Tristan. He drinks. As, however, he does not fall down dead, Isolde exclaims: "What! treachery here, too? The half is mine! Traitor, I drink to thee!"

Upon this, Wagner favors us with the following: "(She drinks, and flings away the goblet. Both, seized with affright, gaze, with the greatest emotion, but with fixed glance, and without moving, into each other's eyes, in the expression of which the defiance of death soon gives way to the glow of love. They are seized with a fit of trembling. They put their hands convulsively to their hearts, and then pass them over their foreheads.—They next seek each other with their glances. They cast down their eyes confusedly, but, afterwards, fix them with increasing desire on each other. ISOLDE (with trembling voice): TRISTAN (quaveringly): Isolde!—She (sinking on his breast): Faithless heartless one!—He (encircling her with warmth): Most blessed woman! (They remain in a dumb embrace)."

Trumpets are heard without. The vessel has reached the land, and King Marke approaches. The curtains are suddenly drawn on one side. The deck is filled with men. At the back is a new scene: "The coast, with a castle crowning the summit of the cliff." The lovers, who have just sung a duet, concluding: "Joy in the breast | exultant pleasure! | Isolde! Tristan! | Tristan! Isolde: | Rescued from the world! | Thou art won for me!" start up, and Isolde exclaims: "Ha! what draught was this?—BRANGÄNE (in despair): "The love-draught."—Isolde faints, and the sailors cry: "Hail to the king!" Great tumult and activity; some disappear over the side, some run out on a bridge. What will happen when the king comes on board?—That is a mere trifle.—The curtain falls rapidly, and certainly it was high time it should.

During the space between the acts, all has settled calmly down again. Isolde is King Marke's wedded wife. In the second act, we behold her, in the garden before her chamber, with Brangäne. It is a pleasant summer's night. Hunting sounds, that die away. They come from a "nightly hunt," to which the king is proceeding with Melot, his own friend and Tristan's.

Tristan is awaiting the signal agreed on: the extinguishing of the torch burning at the entrance to the garden. Brangäne warns her mistress against Melot's treachery: "O, leave the warning wick! let it show you the danger! O, do not put it out, to-day, at least!" It is all in vain! Isolde's glowing passion conquers, and she extinguishes the torch. Brangäne mounts a watch-tower behind the scenes.

Tristan "rushes in"—"glowing embrace." Both now pour out their hearts, by speaking or singing their feelings, at one time in the form of a duet and then in solos, to a text of one-and-twenty pages, interrupted save by a short cry of warning from Brangäne (behind the scenes) of thirteen lines, during which a "long, silent embrace, with heads sunk backwards," on a flowery bank, is prescribed, in the stage directions, to the lovers.

This long, lyrical scene is, in every respect, so unpleasant and disagreeable as to be actually disgusting. The sentiments and language are artificial and stilted, and, when this is not the case, immeasurably flat and commonplace. The affectation of old German terms is as repulsive as the abuse of the language is offensive. The toying with antitheses of "far" and "long," "near" and "far," of "day" and "night," in which love pours out all its pretty sayings for seven dreary pages, in order to calumniate the day and exalt the night (the lovers call themselves "Night-hallowed"), the playing with the "sweet woelet and" ("Is not our love called Tristan and Isolde?") the everlasting subtleties, surpassing in enigmata and vapidness the most insipid poetical scribbling of the later troubadours, the forced ornamentation and affected artificiality of thought—all this is not only incapable of supplying the deficiency of real feeling and imagination, but absolutely shows it in the most glaring light. All this is presented, moreover, in a form so unshackled and slovenly that it is distinguished from the most insipid prose only by the employment of rhymes generally trivial, frequently false, and, here and there, consisting of mere assonances. Every page offers proof of what is now asserted.

The "one-conscious" lovers, as Wagner terms them, are disturbed by the king and his retinue, conducted to the spot by Melot. Isolde feels ashamed "involuntarily;" Tristan stretches out his cloak, "also involuntarily" (sic!) before her. Marke, an honest old fellow, first proves dialectically to Melot that the latter is mistaken if he supposes his advice has saved the royal honor, for the "freest deed (!)" of Tristan's truth has touched his heart. He now, for the first time, addresses Tristan. "To me—this! this, Tristan, to me?" Hereupon he favors him with a mild sermon of four pages, concluding with the question: "Why this disgrace to me?"

Tristan, "in whose mien there is perceptible gradual-increasing grief" (indeed!), answers very poetically, "O King, that—I cannot tell you." He then asks Isolde whether she will follow him into the "magic realms of night," appending to his query four lines which are unintelligible to ordinary mortals. Isolde answers in the affirmative, with similar mysterious circumlocution. Good old Marke says nothing, but Melot bursts out. "Tristan rushes on him. As Melot stretches out his sword against him, Tristan lets his fall, and sinks down wounded. Isolde flings herself on his breast, while Marke holds back Melot—the curtain falls rapidly."

The third act shows us the garden of Tristan's castle. The sea is visible over the wall. "A plaintive pastoral tune is heard on a shepherd's pipe."

Tristan is lying, as if without life, on a couch. His faithful Kurwenal—who, by the way, is the only characteristically treated figure in the whole drama—has conveyed him to the place, and now stands behind him. He has, also, despatched a trusty sailor "to the only physician—as that is of any good." Tristan awakes. His honest companion does all he can to nudge Tristan recognize his home, but Tristan's thoughts are roaming in other regions. "I was where I always have been, whither I go forever—where only one knowing is ours: divine-eternal, ever-forgotten!" The poor "day" of course, comes second best off again. Kurwenal announces to the enthusiastic dreamer that he has sent for Isolde. This rouses him up, but, as the shepherd-boy still continues playing upon his pipe the mournful strain—as a sign that no bark is visible—Tristan relapses into his melancholy fit, and what is more, faints. But he recovers: a merry strain is heard. "The ship! the ship!" He is unable to contain himself. Isolde approaches. Even while behind the scenes she exclaims: "Tristan! beloved!" He springs up: "how do I hear the light!" (!) rushes into her arms, and sinks, lifeless, at her feet.

This scene takes up in the book twenty-three pages, the rest extending over eleven more. It will, we should say, be a rather tough job for the singer, since Tristan is not, like Tannhäuser, in the last act, shattered merely internally, but bodily wounded to the death. The narrative, too, in Tannhäuser, possesses more variety and interest than the dreamy, mystical expression of one and the same sentiment, although Wagner has, with a certain amount of skill, endeavored to relieve the monotony by the sounds of the shepherd's song, and, also, by making Kurwenal observe and describe, from the watch-tower, the course of the vessel, and the danger it runs from the rocks that line the shore.

Isolde's grief bursts forth; the mode in which it is expressed is pervaded by a strain of real feeling and true poetry. She falls, in a fainting state, upon the corpse.

"Tumult and clashing of weapons heard from the shore below." King Marke, having landed, forces his way up. Behind the scenes, the voices of Brangäne and Melot. Kurwenal, placing himself at the castle-gate (at the back), cuts down Melot, and rushes on Marke and the armed men. He is wounded, and dies by the side of Tristan's corpse. Brangäne, who "has swung herself sideways over the wall" (!) busies herself with Isolde. She brings her to her senses, and informs her that she has confessed to the King "the secret of the drink," and that he has come to renounce her and give her in marriage to Tristan! The good Marke, also, speaks a few words, which commence with his favorite mode of address: "Why, Isolde, why this to me?" In conformity with Wagner's dramaturgical code, he resigns himself to a miracle, to magic, but it is too late. Isolde listens to all that is said, without taking any interest in it, and breathes out her soul in a state of enthusiastic clairvoyance, which concludes as follows:

"In the joy-sea's
Surging swell,
In the fragrance-billows'
Resounding tone,
In the world's-breath's
Waving all—
To drown—"

To sink—Unconscious—
Supreme bliss!"

"She sinks, as though transfigured, upon Tristan's corpse. Great emotion and transport among the bystanders; Marke blesses the bodies. The curtain falls slowly."

III. THE PERFORMANCE.—GASPERINI'S ACCOUNT.

MUNICH, 11th June.

SIR.—After numberless postponements, the first performance of Tristan und Isolde took place yesterday evening, Saturday. People no longer believed in it. The German papers, most of which evince but little sympathy with Wagner, had spread reports that fresh obstacles had arisen since the last general rehearsal; that the young King himself, the avowed patron of the author, had given the matter up as a bad job; and that, most decidedly, this "unperformable" opera was indefinitely adjourned.

These rumors had been complacently re-echoed everywhere; Wagner's friends had at last doubted, and I am not quite certain that the composer himself had not yielded to the universal scepticism. However, the unactable opera has been produced.

The house was filled at an early hour. People expected exhibitions of violence, hissing and an awful hubbub; the Germans, who do not often have the chance of such treats, hurried to the theatre, so as to lose nothing of the festive proceedings in store for them. They invaded every available place, and those who could not obtain anything in the shape of a seat did not hesitate paying very dearly for the privilege of standing, packed together like herrings, along the sides of the orchestra, and of the pit, not to speak of the recesses of the corridors. I have often seen the theatre during the three weeks I have been obliged to spend here, while awaiting the long promised performance, but I never expected to behold such eagerness and such wide spread animation; I should never have fancied that worthy individuals apparently so pacific could have become so excited, and await in feverish agitation the first bar of a score.

At a few minutes after six, the young King entered his box; at the same moment, Herr von Bülow took possession of the conductor's seat. The King had scarcely reached the front of his box, before the applause burst forth from all parts of the house—enthusiastic and passionate applause. . . . After bowing several times to the audience, the King sat down; and the overture began.

I do not mean, in this place, to enter into a profound study of Tristan und Isolde, and of Wagner's new style; still less is it my intention to give an account of the theories of which this last work of the composer's is the confirmation.

My opinion of the work in its entirety is as follows: On many points the theoretician is wrong, and the path he has opened up is thickly strewn with dangers; on the other hand, the artist has risen, in various instances, to a height he never previously attained, and his errors are those of a man of genius. More than in his other works, he has rejected tradition, consecrated formulas, and the usages which obtain on the stage; more than ever, he has sacrificed tonality, the rhythm and melodic form which our ears require, and which our instincts expect. Side by side with deliberate examples of obscurity and of inextricable complications, you see a striking, sovereign thought suddenly arise before you, seize hold of you, subjugate you, and carry you away to the greatest heights ever haunted by the human soul.

The "endless" melody, as it is called, annoys, irritates and exhausts you; suddenly there is a flash of lightning and indescribable beauties start from out the darkness. The introduction, of which I spoke a short time since, is one of the finest pages of the work. It is a song of love; now moderate and discreet; now violent and unbridled; the whole idea of the musical drama is contained in it. Tristan is a long love-story, full of anxiety, fever and dazzling effects. Subject to the dominion of certain preconceived philosophical notions, of which I endeavored to give you an idea in a former letter, the author has flung over this amorous hymn the expression of an incurable sorrow; it is night that the two lovers call to them; it is death that they go to enjoy, closely united, eternal peace in the darkness of the grave. Hence, a certain tinge of uniformity, an inevitable monotony; hence also, at times, examples of exquisite languor and incomparable harmony.

At the conclusion of the first two acts, the audience applauded, but not very enthusiastically, I confess. The young King, who was sitting alone in his box, did not lose a single note of the work. After each act he withdrew without manifesting in any way the impression produced on him, as if to leave the audience perfectly free to make what demonstrations they pleased. It was only at the end of the opera that, rising from his seat, and leaning over the front of his box, he applauded several times. The most lukewarm then decided on the course they would take. They followed the example set by the sovereign, and four rounds of applause, beneath which certain timid protestations were lost, proclaimed the master's victory.

Is it a definite success? Not in my opinion. I have heard people talk of three representations only, and I do not think that the work will be got up anywhere else for a long time to come. In all Germany only two artists could be found to run the risk of it, and though they got gloriously through their formidable task, they are not likely to have many imitators.

To perform such a work, it requires the persevering will of the master, and the devoted courage of the great artist, Herr von Bülow, who conducted; but, above all, it needed the brilliant patronage of Ludwig II. These are elements we rarely find combined in the history of art.

(From the Vienna "Presse.")

The more do the artists, who were compelled to waste their energies upon so thankless a work, merit our best acknowledgements. The performance of Herr and Madame Schnorr, as Tristan and Isolde, stood out in really brilliant perfection; equal to them, as far as singing went, was Herr Mitterwarzer as Kurwenal, though he was at times rather exaggerated in his acting; Herr Zottmayer could not do justice to that pitiable being King Marke, though he must be commended for that very desirable quality, a clear pronunciation. Finally, Mlle. Deinet was very pleasing as Brangäne. The orchestra, under the wonderful conducting of Herr von Bülow, rivalled the singers in their zealous exertions, while the management got the piece up with an amount of brilliancy and good taste worthy of something better.

Tristan's earthly career may be short, but it has, at any rate, been brilliant, and the hero has really repaid with interest what he cost, for he has procured the Munich people the joy of "world-escaped rapture," a joy that money cannot purchase.

(From the Vienna "Neue Freie Presse.")

We confess that, after having read the book, we expected but little from the dramatic effect of the action as such, and, since it is an essential principle of Wagnerian opera not to afford independent musical gratification apart from the action, the hopes with which we looked forward generally to the performance were by no means extravagant. But we feel bound to confess with equal candor that the impression made upon us far exceeded our expectations, in fact so much so that to judge by it, we cannot help considering this latest work by Wagner, despite many great defects, which it undoubtedly possesses, as one which, of its kind, is of great importance and carried out with high artistic talent. As it is unfolded before us in pictures and tone, it keeps up in us, from beginning to end, a feeling that there is manifested in it a mind which, though in many things eccentric and wrong, is powerful, and intimately acquainted with the pinnacles as well as the abysses of life, the light and sombre portions of which it portrays in glowing colors and with a bold pencil; nay, more; this feeling does not desert us even in those passages which repel or weary us. Again and again we are beyond measure wearied, but our weariness is so far of an elevating kind, inasmuch as it keeps in check the feeling which would fain rebel against it, just as extraordinarily great events always do.

If we ask ourselves by what means this general effect is brought about we must, it is true, attribute a great portion to Wagner's poetically plastic power; to his felicitous calculation of the effectiveness of certain situations; to his taste for scenery that shall enchant the senses, and more especially to the admirable acting and singing of Herr and Madame Schnorr, from Dresden, who sustained the two principal parts; but the chief reason still seems to us to consist in the peculiar character of the music, and more particularly in the elemental wildness and passion, in which, like the waves of the sea lashed by the storm, the music rushes past us, now rising and now sinking with headlong suddenness, and, whether we will or not, dragging us with it into that deeply tragic mood to which man is subject in presence of the toying or raging of those powers of nature and fate from which escape is hopeless.

Herein, indisputably, consists the peculiar power and grandeur of the opera, as well as, at the same time, of that quality by which it is most emphatically raised above other compositions. I cannot, at any rate, for the moment, remember another opera which ever plunged me with equal force into such a frame of mind, and the music and songs of which offered from beginning to end, an equally true and vivid picture of the fatalistic life of nature.

This notion is excited even by the overture. A kind of supernatural roaring and bellowing, pregnant with evil, and interrupted by deceptive tones of seductive flattery, is hurled onward like a mass of rising and falling billows, and prepares us for the storms and tempests which burst out in the opera itself. As far as the fact of conveying a general impression is concerned, we reckon this overture among the most characteristic compositions of its class.

In the course of the story, which, though only, it is true, in three acts, takes, including the pauses, full five hours in performance, the treatment of the music cannot naturally be always maintained at the same height, but it is never untrue to the general character. Of course anything like melodies and pieces independently prominent and complete in themselves, is out of the question, perhaps even more so than in any of Wagner's former productions. But we cannot for this reason call the music absolutely unmelodious. There are, in fact, an unusual number of beginnings of melodies; and in the manner in which a motive employed for the purpose of individualization quickly sinks back again into the primitive elemental movement, or is merged into a motive of another fashion, there is, certainly, evidence of great melodically, harmonically, and above all, rhythmically plastic art. The picture, too, of the movement which swallows up the separate forms is, in its turn, connected with other forms, which, in their way, follow necessary laws, though the latter be with difficulty recognized. That which is offered us by Wagner merely as the symbol representing the purport of a thought is also a species of playing with forms, and, therefore exactly in that whereby it produces its effects, most like the music which the composer would supersede.

Of the three acts, the first is decidedly the most effective. In the beginning however, there are some portions too long, especially in the dialogue between Brangäne and Tristan. Thenceforth, however, the action continues to rise steadily, the music, vocal and instrumental, adapting itself to it in the most vivid manner.

The impression produced at the conclusion of the second act was, on the other hand, very doubtful. Despite the romantic beauty distinguishing the commencement of the act, and despite the vivid coloring of the music and acting that accompanied the interchange of love's delights and love's woes, in the lovely moonlight night, one felt, in consequence of the length to which the scene was spun out, as if paralyzed by some narcotic, while still more painful was the effect of the preachy lecture, which seemed as though it would never end, delivered by the King after surprising the two lovers, and the conviction which steals over you, that a couple of lovers with a love-potion in their inside, and a deceived husband would, under the circumstances, pursue a very different course to that which the author makes his characters pursue for above an hour. The hisses were, naturally, much more audible at the end of this act, and, though drowned in a doubly strong outburst of applause, the latter was prompted more by an idea of propriety than by the inspiring effect of the piece.

Far more animated and drastic, again, were the action and music of the third act, though it exhibits Tristan constantly on a couch of sickness and concludes with his death and that of Isolde. As the book led us to expect, a strong effect was produced by the alternation between hope and dread, concerning the arrival of Isolde, and the admirable manner in which this fluctuating state has been portrayed, and with the exception of a few instances of overlength, the only thing that detracted from this effect was that, towards the end, Marke has to make another tolerably long musical speech. But this was forgotten, thanks to the extraordinarily beautiful way in which Isolde sang her dying strain and then expired. The termination met, in consequence, with a most glowing reception. The performers were called for and so was the composer.

In what has preceded, we have truly described, according to the impression produced upon us, the power and significance of the music characterizing this opera, but we must not omit to mention also an uncomfortable sensation we constantly experienced as the work proceeded. It was of a double kind. On the one hand, we were dissatisfied at being able to perceive in the musical picture no sharply marked individual elements by the side of the chaotically elemental ones, nor any of an elevating and really gratifying description side by side with those of a tragically crushing kind; on the other hand, we always felt that the tragic resources on the stage were far too great for the subject, and that the story and the characters were not of sufficient importance for us to allow ourselves to be affected so profoundly and so long on account of them. The subject and the means strike us, therefore, not to be at all proportioned to each other, and, though effective, the pathos produces an impression of something overcharged, at variance with a sense of the Beautiful.

Music Abroad.

LONDON.—The performance of L'Africaine, at Covent Garden, is the last event of interest. The Musical World says that "the opera" (abridged one-third by Costa, so as to last only four hours) "was received with unanimous favor from beginning to end"—the World always admires Meyerbeer. Other accounts indicate something like a failure. For instance, here is the Orchestra's (July 29) account:

If the "Africaine," brought out on Saturday, has not succeeded on this side the Channel, its fate is only in accordance with what might be anticipated. In the first place, the opera had been promised so long; so much expectation was rife concerning it; it was the posthumous production of a man whose death endeared him more to art than his continued life would have done. Again, it had been for some quarter of a century the reservoir out of which Meyerbeer drew his choicest melodies for other works, leaving the lees and dregs behind. Further, it had notably a bad libretto, made worse by an infamous doing into Italian.

We will not say the English public are disappointed, for perhaps they never formed a mistaken estimate of the success of the opera; but the fact remains that the "Africaine" is far from a success. True the seats let: with but two performances over it could scarce be otherwise; but there is nothing in the opera which will stand the test of time with a British audience to hear and a British public to purchase. Absence of melody cannot be made up for by the most musicianlike instrumentation in the world. The acts are artistically managed; one number frequently following another without sufficient introduction. The fourth act is distinguished for its beauty, for it contains the march—the one morceau of the "Africaine" which bears transcription; and the duet which ends this act is a magnificent number. Otherwise, tameness of melodic form and powerful orchestration characterize the opera from first to last.

The chorus on Sunday were not up to the mark—the soloists fell short. Fri. Lucca is by no means an impressive Selika. She is energetic—frequently extravagant; but in dignity she is wanting—queerly gesture she never has. Her gesticulation was throughout uneasy, ungraceful. Herr Wachtel gives out high chest notes, which occasionally wake up the apathetic audience; in other respects he is an indefinite artist, whose singing is never likely to improve. Signor Graziani did his best for the part of Neluso, but his best was never very effective. The character is a strong, nervous one, with much of the Satanic element about it, an impersonation beyond Signor Graziani's ideas. Mlle. Fioretti is a pleasing and careful Inez. The rest of the characters, which are subordinate, demand no special mention.

Here, too, is the opinion of the Standard, July 24.

The long-promised and long-awaited Africaine has at length been produced, but by no means with the effect which had been anticipated. The declaration of the Parisian public that Meyerbeer's last opera is his greatest masterpiece is, we venture to predict, not likely to be endorsed by the English public. Tried on Saturday night, with all the resources of the theatre made to bear on the execution, and put on the stage with, in some respects, lavish expenditure, the Africaine did not altogether satisfy the thinking part of the audience that it was destined to a great and lasting success. The performance, indeed, was received throughout with applause that might be called enthusiastic, and the theatre was crowded "to suffocation" literally in every part, showing the extraordinary interest and excitement created by the new production; but there was no furor elicited by any individual number of the opera, and there were two encores only, one given to a concerted morceau in the first finale—by no means universally called for—the other bestowed on the symphonic prelude for the stringed instruments in unison which precedes the grand air of Selika in the last scene, and which was the "sensation" of the evening. In a long five-act opera, which abounds with all kinds of movements aiming at effect, this, to say the least of it, is sufficiently surprising. Nor can the fault be charged against the singers, who, though by no means all that might be desired, exhibited every possible care, and, had the music permitted, must have made their mark. The truth is, the Africaine possesses less melody than any opera Meyerbeer ever wrote; and if any one piece gains more than a passing celebrity it will not be from its tunelessness. Whether this be attributable to the fact of the utter senselessness and insuggestiveness of the libretto, or to the absence of melodic inspiration in the composer at the moment the opera was written, it is impossible to divine.

The music for the most part, is uninviting, if not wearisome; and the lack of bright, fresh, sparkling, and spontaneous tunes, to be found in Robert, the Huguenots, L'Etoile, Dinorah, and even the Prophete, is, to say nothing more, extraordinary. At the very commencement of the Africaine the want of musical interest is sensibly felt and the ear is disappointed. The duet for Inez and Anna, in the opening scene of the Africaine, is a weak instalment to begin with, although the air of Inez, "Del Tago sponde addio," has some striking melodic bits. The Grand Inquisition scene, in which the chorus of basses in unison makes a good effect and which never fails to create so powerful a sensation at the Opera in Paris, was scarcely noticed on Saturday night, and the whole scene would have fallen flat, but for the concerted piece alluded to above, which was redemanded, but which did not impress ourselves with an idea of anything particularly new or beautiful. The second act is the weakest of the five, and might with eminent advantage be omitted from the representation. The third act comprises the great ship scene, about which, as regards its construction on the stage in Paris, and the time involved in its setting, so much has been written. Very little can be said for or against the ship scene mounted by Mr. Augustus Harris at Covent-Garden. It is a most ordinary and inexpensive "set," and nothing whatsoever has been done for it to create a "sensation." No doubt, great was the expectation formed about this scene in the Royal Italian Opera representation of the Africaine, and the disappointment was great in proportion. For our own part, we cannot help thinking that Mr. Augustus Harris was right in not making a grand pictorial display, and leaving the music to be adjudged on its own merits without scenic interferences. Unfortunately the music in this scene is not particularly attractive, if we except a chorus of women and prayer in double choirs, which, however, must be heard more than once to appreciate their beauties thoroughly, and for that reason a grand spectacular exhibition might be desirable. The fourth act is beautiful almost from first to last, and the march which ushers in the procession is as melodious and original as if it had been indited by Mozart in one of his happiest moments. It is not often Meyerbeer can be compared with the author of Il Don Giovanni, but the march in the fourth act of the Africaine might, without derogation, find a fitting place in Il Flauto Magico. This act is brought to a magnificent conclusion by the duet for Selika and Vasco, which is entirely worthy of the composer of the grand duet in the Huguenots. The fifth act did not realize our highest expectations, and the death scene of Selika in which it is said Mlle. Marie Saxe creates so powerful an impression, was made but little of by Mlle. Pauline Lucca.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 19, 1865.

The German Saenger-Fest at Dresden.

Our columns have been crowded with reports of musical festivals throughout the summer; but the festival of festivals—if not in a purely musical sense, at least in social, popular, national, and more than national, in humanitarian significance—was the great gathering of the part-song singers of all Germany at Dresden, on Saturday the 22d of July, continuing three days. It went by the name of the Saenger-Bundesfest—Festival of the Bund or Union of the Singers. It was equally a festival of German song and German patriotism. The heart of the whole German people, from all the politically separated kingdoms and petty principalities, was represented in this meeting, and the longing for the one free united Fatherland found utterance in its songs and cheers and speeches. We believe no part of Germany was unrepresented; each sent its singing clubs and circles, or large delegations from them. Never before, even in Germany, were so many singers brought together; never did Music look at once upon such a countless army of her votaries. We can hardly trust any estimate which we have seen of the number of the singers; nearly every account (in anticipation) has set it as high as fifteen, and even twenty thousand. It is difficult, too, as yet to form any clear notion of the size of the great Festival Hall erected for the purpose on the right bank of the Elbe—a glorious site! One says it held 40,000 people. Another account makes a more precise show of figures, but leaves several elements in the reckoning quite in the vague; it says: "The hall contains 5,969 numbered seats, 3,360 of which are in the parterre; the rest, standing-places in the galleries, are not counted. The podium is calculated for 11,000 singers, on the right and left side of which are galleries for singers only, where also from five to six thousand persons might find room."

Reports of the great success of the Festival are beginning to arrive; but as yet we have no complete account of the three days. While awaiting the letter of our own Correspondent, we must content ourselves, and we trust, our readers, for the present, by translating part of a description of the grand procession and concert of the third day (Monday) from a Dresden paper kindly sent us by a friend.

"From the earliest hour there was a stir and commotion in the city, a streaming in from all parts of the world, as if 'mankind were on a pilgrimage,' all travelling to the heavenly kingdom." And all Dresden was a "heaven hung full of fiddles," full of inspired musicians too. Hundreds of thousands of men animated the streets, the bridge, the terrace, and the way to the Festival place, on foot, in carriages, on steamboats. And ever new troops, some by land and some by water, poured into the city, and the confusion grew still more gay and more motley, and yet never the least irregularity or overstepping of the bounds of order. It was as if every man were a police over himself, making the duty of the officials light.

"At 6 in the morning the waking call resounded in the streets of our festal city, doubtless unheard by many a singer, inasmuch as their nocturnal dalliance with the noble juice of the barley had gone deep into the morning; hence the attendance of singers at the seven o'clock rehearsal was remarkably small; but the pieces went with such precision that no serious rehearsal appeared necessary.

"From 9 till 11 o'clock, the Turner boys were busy in conveying the flags and escutcheons of the various societies, by steamboat, from the Singers' Hall to the city. At 12 the several societies, corporations, &c., had formed themselves.

"On the Altmarkt (old market square) the Fest-maidens appeared, hastening to the Rathaus (town hall). At a quarter to two, the trades unions come and form in line, with a choir of musicians, and the guilds, also with music, take up their position at the main entrance of the Rathaus. Meanwhile all the windows, partly too the roofs, and even the church towers are filled with spectators. Soon after two, the 372 Fest-maidens, amid cries of hoch!, and tusch (flourish of trumpets, &c.), and waving of banners, are led out of the Rathaus by two older ladies of honor and form a line.

"The chief marshal of the procession, mounted, followed by the trumpeters and riders of the horse-guard regiment, all according to programme, appeared at half past two. The gentlemen greeted the city authorities seated on the balcony by taking off their hats. A universal hoch welcomed the new Union banner, which had to be borne by five men, and was followed by fifteen men in showy uniform as a guard of honor.

"At length when the actual singers appeared, amid music, the public broke out in enthusiastic cries of 'America hoch!', 'France hoch!', &c. The Fest-maidens saluted by throwing bouquets and received richly ornamented gifts in return, especially on the part of the elegant Berliners, while the genial upper-Bavarians took from their hats and flung the little blossom Edelweiss. It was already half past three when the second division, headed by the mounted trumpeters of the foot artillery, arrived at the Rathaus. The Hungarians in their tasteful costumes, and with their lively bearing, enjoyed an especially warm greeting. Cassel distributed a poetical greeting to Dresden, and greeted the magistrates by singing.

"And now came on the Leipzigers, a host of them. Floral gifts rained upon the students in abundance, particularly from the hands of the Fest-maidens. One lady reached a bouquet to Roderick Benedix and was obliged, for the crowd allowed no escape, to accept a kiss in return. This whole division was in the freshest spirits, full of humor. The Magdeburgers carried a cask of wine upon an elegant frame, out of which they pledged a full silver goblet to the Fest-maidens.

"The Lower-Austrians, especially the Venetians, were received with the greatest jubilation. The bands of the connecting Trades Union played the air: Dast ist mein Oestereich, and a tune similarly appropriate as the Holsteiners passed by. Hannover greeted Dresden's maidens, women, men and magistracy with harmonious hochs.

"It was striking four, when the trumpeters of the mounted artillery rode by the Rathaus at the head of the third division. As Rammenau came up, the pine was greeted, and the greeting returned. The Upper-Austrians maintained their lively, genial character. The Riesengebirg Union, with their shawms and their singers' badge—Rübezahl's head with long plaited beard—gave occasion for the greeting: 'Rübezahl and his neighbors!' Halle was welcomed with the cry: They give salt to our bread, hoch!; Breslau with: The cradle of the war of Freedom!—And now came the lusty Tyrolese. They struck up before the Rathaus balcony: 'Dresden, thou art my delight,' and won thankful hochs by their splendid yodling. Their first tenor had a splendid voice.

"Before the Dresden Gesangverein, which wound up the procession, rode a herald in superb ancient costume corresponding to the colors of the Empire (black, red and gold), surrounded by squires, &c. The bands made the Saxon hymn resound: 'God bless the King,' the public cheered. After the last Gesangverein, followed the trades and guilds, and by a few minutes after 5 P.M. the Altmarkt was again free for its usual purposes. The Turners, who had been on duty in preserving order, gathered themselves together and escorted some of the Fest-maidens to the Fest-platz, where by 20 minutes after six the last Turner bands had arrived, and the ringing of bells ceased. The new Union banner was displayed before the main entrance of the Fest-hall, so that all the companies filed in before it. . . .

"Scarcely had the singers brushed the dust from them a little and refreshed themselves somewhat by a mug taken standing—for there was no hope of a place in the tents near the hall—when the call resounded: 'Singers, this way!' And now in long trains the crowd of singers poured into the hall, where the concert at once began with the prize composition by H. Mohr of Berlin: 'Jauchzend erhebet sich die Schöpfung,' which was rewarded with lively applause. Then Dr. Gerster of Ratisbon, as representative of the German Saenger-Bund, made an inspiring, kindling address in praise of German Song and German Fatherland, giving utterance, amid repeated thundering bravos, to the German hope of Unity!

"Next in order came the festival part-songs; 'Night,' by Schubert; 'Die Geisterschlacht,' by E. Kretzschner of Dresden; 'Wandlers Nachlied,' by Reissiger; 'Auf der Kirchweih zu Schwytz,' by Tietz; and 'German Song of Victory,' by Tschirch of Gera. The solos occurring in these songs were taken by singers from Vienna, Prague, and Teplitz, who placed themselves worthily by the side of the soloists of the day before. After a longer pause, the second part began with the Motet by Hauptmann: 'Glory be to God in the highest'; followed by 'Herzensweh,' by Rietz; 'Burschenlust,' by Krebs; the 'Thürmerlied' by van Eyken; 'The Chapel,' by Kreutzer; the 'Sword Song,' by Weber; and finally the 'Te Deum Laudamus,' by Rietz. In these the solos were sung by Berliners and Hanoverians, and all so admirably that it would be hard to decide between them.

"All the songs were received with more or less enthusiasm, and now the hall was cleared of listeners, to prepare for the Commers of the evening. * * * Out in the Fest-platz, meanwhile, the most jovial life went on. Fraternizations and invitations, speeches and toasts of all sorts alternated, the huge drinking horns circulated, added to all which, they heard the mighty tones of the performance in the hall. Until eight o'clock in the evening there were always at least 50,000 people on the Platz; a never ceasing pouring in and out. Never before, unless possibly when the strong military force was quartered here in 1813, were there so many men at once in Dresden. Then bloody conflict was the word; this time it was the brotherly reunion of all branches of the German family; if they were not united in 1813, today they were, and so may they remain!"

An interesting letter in the Transcript, from a Boston lady who had the good fortune to be present, must help to fill out the above picture; we are sorry that we have only room for extracts.

The building for the concerts has been erected expressly for the occasion and stands on the banks of the Elbe. It was finished in six weeks, and is capable of holding over forty thousand people. It has four towers, and though airy elegant in its architectural design, it is strong as well as capacious. It has already been photographed in large and small pictures; stamped on commemorative medals, on watches and silken badges, and bids fair to be as universally known as the cathedrals of Antwerp or Cologne, or the Crystal Palace of London, which it somewhat resembles. The whole week has been a festive one for all classes of the population, and people have poured into the city from every direction to be present at the festa. Rooms commanding a view of the procession have been engaged at large prices, and the owners of lodging-houses understand the full value of their apartments! Market-women could be seen braiding the long wreaths for the streets at each interval that could be spared from their sales, whilst fancy flowers to twine with them had been industriously made elsewhere. The open square of the market was a pretty sight with its busy twining of oak leaf, evergreen and spruce, and the happy faces of the women so employed; but the result of their work, which literally embowered the streets, for the thick festooning passed from side to side, evinced the earnestness of the occupation.

So much to give you an idea of Dresden in gala dress, the character of the Singers, and the animation of the people. You must now imagine that the day for the procession has arrived, with the throngs in the streets—the prettily and proudly-dressed peasants—ladies in carriages and on foot, all carrying baskets of flowers or gay ribbons with the favorite national colors to throw to the singers in procession, who are expected to catch them in their hats. At two o'clock the countless delegations which have been passing the streets since the hour of ten, with melodious voices, have formed three streams from the Prague Strasse and now unite near the Victoria Hotel. Their hands of music are fine, but "du edler Deutsche Männer-sang" (the noble German man-song) is finer, and it fills the air with surpassing melody as the patriotic march goes on. Each society has a difference of dress and they wear their own colors, but they pass beneath German banners which everywhere float over their heads. The procession was nearly three hours in passing one point.

I cannot refrain here from giving you an incident that I saw with my own eyes whilst a part of the procession was passing one of the side streets to unite with the mass in front. A young American girl at the hotel had had a small United States flag presented to her on leaving her home, which she promised to wave in every place whither her travels might take her. On this occasion she did not forget the little banner of her country; but, appreciating the feeling of the Germans for a larger independence, she tied to her flag the colors of Germany—black, red, and yellow. From a back window in a retired position, she held out the stars and stripes thus decorated. No sooner was the flag recognized, than it received from the Prussian body a reverential raising of the hat—and when this was acknowledged by a wave of the hand, they broke out in a general waving of hats, and viva! viva! The Austrians did the same, and the men of Frankfurt and Leipsic—each recognized at a distance a small silken banner not half a yard long which bore their own national streamers.

I ought to have said that there was in the procession, a small delegation bearing the standard "AMERIK," and having representatives from Boston, Buffalo, Cairo, Milwaukee and Prairie-du-Chien—a small band of brothers whom the strange chances and changes of life had probably induced from their homes to follow fate and seek fortune elsewhere. They hailed our little excelsior banner with an ecstasy of delight, and tears, falling like rain, embalmed it!

"TRISTAN AND ISOLDE."—We take advantage of this summer vacation in our own musical year to make up, in some degree, for neglect of a topic which more than any other, for some months past, has occupied the musical journals of Europe, and of which fragmentary and contradictory notices have found some corner-room in American papers. We need no other excuse to devoting so large a space in to-day's number to Richard Wagner and this last strange chapter in the strange history of "the Future." How the composer of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, the author of 'Oper and Drama,' &c., has been for years a political exile from Saxony, and, until of late, from all parts of the Fatherland; how his operas have still kept the stage in most German cities, admired by many, scouted by the most, perpetually discussed by critics and by know-nothings; how inhospitably the Tannhäuser was received in Paris a few years ago: how he has since wandered from place to place with small encouragement for bringing out his later works in which, for the first time, his peculiar theories are understood to be illustrated; how at last he has found a protector and an enthusiastic partisan in the young King of Bavaria, who has installed him like a prince in Munich and placed all the royal means of music there at his disposal; how now at length the new opera was to be brought out under every possible advantage (quite "regardless of expense"); what slanders and cabals there were in hope to oust the new favorite; what announcements and rehearsals, unexpected difficulties and delays in bringing Tristan to performance:—of all this the readers of the newspapers have been kept informed. But that Tristan was actually brought out in the Munich Court Opera-house on the 10th of June, and three times after that, and that it was indeed a "model performance" after Wagner's own heart, is the last musical news of the day (apart from popular festivals), and the curious reader wishes to know with what result—artistically, of course, and not in the vulgar money sense—and what this music, or this musical drama (as its author would rather call it) really was.

We have brought together (thanks to the industrious translators of the London Musical World) a series of articles which will help to throw light upon it; though unfortunately only the favored few who were present in the Munich theatre can feel authorized to form any opinion of the real value of the opera, and it looks very much as if the opportunity had passed away forever with those four "model performances." We print first, in full, Wagner's famous letter, from which so many catch-words have been drawn, and to which so many sarcastic allusions have been made; it is characteristic of the man, relates a strange experience, and will repay perusal. Next we reprint an abstract of the plot and the libretto of Tristan, that what follows may be the better understood. Finally, passing by the grand rehearsal before an audience of friends, we copy two of what seemed to us the fairest reports of the impression made by the actual performance of the opera upon intelligent listeners. And so, for the present, we acquit ourselves of further duty in that nebulous quarter of the musical firmament; indeed our telescope is not long enough.

SCHNORR VON CAROLSFELD.—The same Dresden journal, which brings us the above account of the great song Festival, contains also a touching poetic tribute to this sweetest of German singers, whose young life was just then passing away in that same festival city. He died suddenly of typhoid fever induced by nervous excitement after the immense strain of mastering and sustaining, as no other tenor could have done, the principal part in Wagner's new opera at Munich. Poor Wagner! his mainstay of a tenor gone; where is Tristan now?

No artist in Germany was more respected for refined intellectual and social qualities than Schnorr. He was the son, we believe, of the distinguished painter of the Niebelungen frescoes, now director of the Dresden galleries. We heard him as a concert singer in the autumn of 1860 at Dresden in a choice series of concerts given by Mme. Clara Schumann and Joachim, and we think that among German tenors we have never heard his equal in warmth and sweetness of voice, purity and nobility of style, and delicate truth of feeling and expression. He showed it at that time in the rendering of Schumann's songs. But he was also an important singer at the Royal Opera in Dresden, and perhaps no man has done so much, and so heartily, to make the most of Wagner's lyrical heroes.

ORGAN CONCERTS.—The Great Organ of the Boston Music Hall still continues to pour out roaring floods of music many-voiced, alternately with soft sweet strains, every Wednesday and Saturday noon and Sunday evening; and the attendance through the summer, especially in these days when our city is full of visitors, has averaged much larger than ever before. Of the organ itself it is enough to say that it keeps its temper wonderfully, and that the beauty, the richness, the really musical quality of its tones, blended or in separate registers and choirs, grows both by hearing and by use. We only begin to realize how admirable an instrument we have. We know an old organ-builder, one who has built many organs for our churches, a man of real taste in music, who although living some way out of town, is among the most constant listeners to the Great Organ and who always says: "The more I hear it, the more I like it; such voicing never was heard before in this country."

The organists too have not worked and studied at this instrument for nothing. They have continually gained new mastery over its almost unlimited resources. We are sorry to be sure, so are all lovers of Bach and the great organ music, that we never hear Mr. Paine of late. And even Mr. Thayer seems to have broken off his intimacy with the Great Organ, since his mind has been made up to go Germany,—in which wise plan we wish him a most musical God-speed! Mr. Lang takes his turn occasionally, in the intervals of his many labors, repeating essentially his old programmes, of which one may serve for a sample: Third Sonata by Mendelssohn; Overture to Egmont (transc.); Quartet from Fidelio, arranged for Vox Humana; March from Zauberflöte; Improvisations, Variations on "God save the Queen" (give the programme credit for not calling it "America"!).

The weight of the Organ labor for this summer seems to rest mainly on the shoulders of Mrs. Frohock and of Mr. Whiting, both of whom have done good service. To the lady belongs the credit of the more earnest, rich and classical selections, and the greatest variety of good things. One of her last programmes embraced: Bach's D-minor Toccata; Pastorale (from Prometheus), Beethoven; Sonata, No. 2, Mendelssohn; Improvisations on National Airs; Variations on "The Harmonious Blacksmith," by Chipp; Schubert's Lobder Thränen (Vox Humana); and the Oberon overture. She has also several times played the other great Toccata of Bach (in F), and an interesting one more seldom heard, in C; besides the Prelude in E flat, &c. Her renderings are admirable, among the very best; except that sometimes in the ambition to represent, for instance, a Beethoven Symphony movement, the time drags, and the shifts are not got smoothly over.

Mr. Whiting played last Sunday evening a Prelude in E minor by Bach (though such things occur comparatively seldom on his list); the introduction and finale from a Quartet by Spohr, of which the first was charming and charmingly treated; the air from Israel in Egypt, "Thou shalt bring them in," revealing the melodic feeling of Handel to great advantage; Mendelssohn's Overture for Wind Instruments, effectively handled; some of the pretty pastoral effects with Santa Maria chorus from Dinorah; and roaring variations on the Russian Hymn. Not altogether "sacred" music, but much of it quite edifying. Mr. W. has given an ingenious variety of selections, well suited to display his ingenuity and taste in the blending and contrasting of stops.

CHICAGO.—A correspondent (Aug. 12th) writes us:

"Nothing of interest in music has occurred since the opera left us, until the present week, in which Mr. Geo. W. Morgan, of New York, has given two Organ Concerts. The first, at St. Paul's Church, was very poorly attended owing to the weather; but the second, which took place last evening, was quite well patronized, by an audience composed of lovers of real music.

The following selections were included in his two programmes:

Fugue in E flat major, and Toccata in F.....J. S. Bach
Offertoire in G.....L. Wely
Tema and Variations.....Hesse
Fl-w movement in F. from Symphony.....Mozart
Movement from P. in forte Lessons.....Handel
Fragment from Symphony.....Beethoven

Overtures to William Tell, Men of Prometheus, Oberon, and Midsummer Night's Dream.

Mr. Morgan is too well known to you in Boston for me to make any special notice of his playing, except to say that it was marked by the expression, beauty and artistic taste characteristic of all his performances. Most of the music was of a class which we would like to hear more of here. If our organists and others would give us more selections from Palestrina, Bach, Handel and Mozart, they would be doing much to elevate the musical taste.

Mr. Morgan will give us four more concerts next week, on a new organ built by Messrs. Pilcher and Chant of this city and temporarily erected in the Opera House. He will be assisted by an orchestra and large array of vocal talent.

Carl Formes is residing at Hyde Park near the city. He is undergoing medical treatment for disease of the throat. His voice is in a much better condition than it has been for some time past.—The Opera will probably open some time next month. Mr. Graa promises a new and powerful company."

CHICAGO.

MRS. PAREPA, a prominent soprano singer in the London concerts, as well as in Italian and English Opera, is to give concerts in this country, beginning in New York about the middle of September. She is a woman of Alboni-like proportions and an accomplished artist. Her husband, an officer in the British army, died only a few weeks ago. She brings with her a new violinist, Signor Rosa, of whom Joachim is said to have spoken highly, and Mr. Danreuther, the young pianist from Cincinnati, who made his mark at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and has had quite a career during the past year in London. The Tribune learns that the concerts will be supported by a grand orchestra.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.—The Choral Union gave a concert on Thursday evening, Aug. 3, with T. W. Meekins as director, and Miss K. E. Prince, pianist. The programme included: a Mass, by Mercadante, for four voices (alto, two tenors and bass); overture, "Poet and Peasant," by Suppe, (piano, Miss Prince and Mr. Clarke); "Jewish Maiden," by Kücken; Trio, "Protect us," &c., by Curschmann; song by Lachner, "Thou everywhere," with clarinet accompaniment; choros from "William Tell"; Rossini's Una voce; Quartet for brass instruments, by Mendelssohn; song, by Amiri; and, last and best, Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," the solo parts by Mrs. Meekins.

MENDELSSOHN'S CHILDREN.—"Agindos," writing to the Transcript from Heidelberg, says:

Dr. Carl Mendelssohn Bartholdy is a private do-cent here, and is delivering lectures in Greek history. Some of my readers will remember his name as one of the editors of his father's (the composer) letters. No one of Mendelssohn's children inherits their father's musical abilities, but they are all of them, Carl, perhaps, excepted, remarkable for personal beauty. The Heidelberg doctor is the oldest of the four, the second son is now studying in Berlin, the oldest daughter is married and lives at London, the youngest daughter lives with her grandmother at Frankfurt. Mendelssohn's wife died two years ago. The son who is a teacher in the Heidelberg University is a young man of great learning, of a highly excitable temperament, and of exceedingly agreeable manners. One can hardly tell what his future may be, for the life of a private do-cent is one of the most discouraging character. I attended one of Mendelssohn's lectures a few days ago, and found myself one of an audience of two. The substance was the modern Greek revolution. The lecture was written out in full, and was delivered with great spirit. The young doctor is so nervous that it becomes painful to watch his intensity, his clutching at his manuscript and hair and cravat, but his matter is excellent. Through his published works, at least, the world will probably hear of him from time to time.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The steamer brings news that Mr. Manager Max Maretzek has engaged the following artistes:—soprani, Signora Anna Tiecona, Signorina Elena Bozzati; tenori, Signor Guiseppe Cassetti, Signor Cesare Chiverrini; baritoni, Signor Et-tore Cornuti, Signor Chiavacci; bassi, Signor Antonio, Signor Rovere, and Signor Papini. When these ladies and gentlemen arrive on our shores, Mr. Maretzek will probably inform us who they are,—Exchange.

MAX MARETZEK publishes a card in reply to the assertion of a morning journal that the artists he has engaged for the next season of opera are unknown to fame. He writes thus:

"To the Editor of the New York Herald:

"Dear sir: Your editorial in Friday's Herald about the artists for the next opera season calls for some explanation, which I hope for the sake of justice you will not withhold from your readers. First of all, I desire to state that no official list of the artists engaged for next season has yet been published, and all that until now has been said or printed about the company is mere guess-work, and incorrect. I believe, therefore, that your onslaught on those innocent strangers would have lost nothing of its intended effect if you had waited till you really knew who they are. All that I can inform you for the moment is, that more than half the principal artists engaged for the next season have already sung in New York, are established favorites, and the Herald has been the most enthusiastic of all the New York papers in its praise of their merit. I hope they are still the same, believing that the merit of an artist does not change so suddenly as the opinion of the Herald. Concerning those who will be new to the New York public, you state that 'you never heard of them before.' I beg to ask whether you had heard of Bosio, Stefanone, Laborde, Medori, Carozzi and many others before their arrival in this country? Or have you perhaps heard of Mazzoleni, Brignoli, Amodio, Graziana, Bellini, before their appearance in New York? Each of them was unknown, but they came, sang, and triumphed! Perhaps those who will come next season may do the same. Anyhow, they are entitled to a fair trial before a damaging verdict is given against them. The public will hear them, and is able to judge for itself.

"About your remark that 'we pay enough for opera,' I beg to state that in London the price for a reserved seat is about five dollars in gold, and the best artists you can hear there are precisely those who have come from New York, where they have been heard for one dollar and a half in paper money. This undeniable fact is the best proof that the public in New York, even in paying enough, does certainly not pay too much for the opera.

"Your censure of my management, and your allusion to the 'Bohemians' who, in your opinion, have led me from the right path, reminds me of the old proverb, that people who live in glass houses must not throw stones at other persons, inasmuch as your determined opposition to my management has, to my my best knowledge, no other cause and reason than my decision to retain for next season some favorite artists who have incurred the displeasure of a certain party who seems to have more influence in the columns of the Herald than yourself. Therefore, take away first that beam from your own eye before you try to remove the splinters from mine.

"Finally, your assertion that I have become useless since I have been successful, and that public opinion shall compel me to leave this country in disgrace, gives me an opportunity to declare publicly that after many years of vicissitudes and hard struggles to establish opera, my real success dates from the day that your opposition began last year; and if ever public opinion should be able to compel any one to leave this country I think the exodus will have to start from the corner of Fulton and Nassau streets.

"You may, therefore, continue for a few years more your opposition, and, in return, I will then be ready to make room to any other manager better suited to your taste. A little personal abuse from the Herald may even increase my success, and is, therefore, respectfully solicited. Any small favor in that line will be thankfully received by Yours, truly, MAX MARETZEK."

Social Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Warrior's welcome home. Handel. 30

This is an arrangement of "See the Conquering Hero Comes," and appears at a convenient time, when so many soldiers are receiving ovations. The old and manly melody still remains a favorite.

The old clock on the stairs. Song. Dolores. 30

Longfellow's poem set to music, with an accompaniment representing the measured beat, "never, forever, never, forever" of the old time monitor.

Dear old songs of home. Song. Alt. 30

Beautiful melody and a good subject.

I'm thinking of my boyhood once more. Ballad. Kittridge. 30

The music is well managed. Bids fair to be one of the best liked of Mr. K's productions.

The Weepin' Willer. Song. Harry Clifton.

A capital comic song, about the Miller's daughter, who "sat beside the babblin' water" "under the weepin' willer tree." Her "very short note" to her faithless lover, with the postscript, "please excuse bad spellin'," her half formed determination to drown herself, which was given up for fear of taking cold, and other little points, are very laugh-provoking. Pretty melody.

Instrumental.

Tell me my heart. Transcription. B. Richards. 50

A song of classic merit, by Sir. H. Bishop, which loses nothing by adaptation to the piano.

Overture to L'Africaine, by Meyerbeer. 40

The music of the new opera begins to pass through the publisher's hands. The overture is quite short, and has a tinge of a shadow "Arabian" quality, which appears to pervade the opera.

Romance d' Ines. Paraphrase from L'Africaine.

Jaell. 60

One of the striking airs, arranged in a somewhat difficult manner, by the great pianist.

L'Africaine. Bouquet of melodies. H. Cramer. 1.00

Contains nine or ten airs from the opera, and will give a very good idea of its "flowers of melody."

Canary Waltz. Mozart. 25

Easy and pretty. Good for beginners.

La Cavalcade. Valse Brillante. A. Talex. 1.00

Marche Styrienne. Caprice de Concert. Ketterer. 70

Two pieces of sterling merit, by veteran composers.

Nocturne. No. 1. In G minor. Op. 37. Chopin. 35

" " 2. " E major. " 62. " 50

" " 3. " B " " 9. " 50

" " B " " 9. " 35

" " B " " 62. " 40

Impromptu. " Ab " " 29. " 50

Fantasia Impromptu. " 66. " 75

The above need no introduction to lovers of Chopin. No one afraid of hard study should attempt to learn them, but faithful workers are richly rewarded for their endeavors.

Don Giovanni. (Op. Potpourri.) Piano and Violin. Eickberg. 75

Books.

Fifteen Etudes, progressive for Piano. J. Concone.

In two books, each $1.25

The public are already familiar with Concone's exercises and solfeggios, which are very extensively used. The present Etudes show the same taste as the vocal compositions. They may be termed Instrumental Solfeggios, and are well calculated to forward the aesthetic culture of pupils on the piano.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 637.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 2, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 12.

The Present State of Music.

(Translated for this Journal from Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

What has been created and spread abroad in the domain of Musical Art, down to the middle of this century, is incalculably vast in quantity. Especially in Germany has an immeasurable wealth of all kinds, and all times and countries, been accumulated. Whither does it all tend and what shall we make of it?

We shall see by examining the sources of this wealth.

Two sources have always been the most prolific for music: the People's Song and Church Music. In Germany, the Reformation, under the influence of Luther, who had so warm a love for music and so fully recognized its influence upon the people, gave to the church song of the people, and through that to music generally, a diffusion entirely unparalleled in any other country. Up to the middle of the seventeenth century there have been counted more than 8000 hymns with 1900 or 2000 melodies. In the middle of the 18th century Moser made a register of over 50,000 printed German religious songs or hymns; and Natorp and Kessler satisfied themselves of a number of more than 3,000 church tunes. In all the cities, and for all the churches, were formed town choirs of singers artistically trained (the Thomas-schüler in Leipzig, the Kreuz-schüler in Dresden have become famous), and Kurrenten, or choristers singing Chorals in procession through the streets. The secular people's song (as Erk's, Irmer's and other collections testify), as well as the popular dance music, had at the same time acquired the widest diffusion and variety; the guilds of town musicians (Stadt Pfeifer), the travelling choruses of mountaineers and other strolling bands carried the seeds, as industriously as birds of passage, into all parts and corners of the world.

To this add that unpretending fidelity, that self-renouncing, real love of Art, familiar with starvation, of the Cantors. With small means and sparing economy, for two whole centuries, in all places, they produced church music upon church music,—never once with any view to public diffusion! Of Sebastian Bach it is known that, besides his constant church and concert occupation, besides accumulated lessons, besides numerous volumes of instrumental music and other larger works (Masses, Oratorios), for five years through he wrote church music for solo, chorus and orchestra (Cantatas) for every Sunday and festival day. The uncelebrated Cantor of Hohenstein, Tag, in addition to twelve daily lessons and church service, set also a Cantata every week (and various other things besides), wrote out the parts himself—for where was the money for a copyist to come from?—conducted their rehearsal and performance, and ("free gratis, of course!") gave a copy to any one who wished it. How many names of more or less importance might be added to these two!

If we take into the account also the Court Operas and Court Kapellen (orchestras) of our Fatherland so wondrous rich in Courts, the town theatres and orchestras of the free cities and other places possessed of the means, by which not only German operas, but all the Italian and the French that became in any way remarkable, as well as so much Symphony and concert music, were brought out and spread abroad, it will be seen that Germany in the course of three centuries has accumulated and put in operation a mass of music, with which even the former wealth of Italy and the Netherlands bears no comparison. For these countries, at the time of their artistic bloom, lacked the all-penetrating, all-pervading popular church song of Germany, the Choral.

Another very painful circumstance coöperated to the same end: namely, the suppression of all true popular life and freedom; the exclusion of the people from all conscious, self-determined participation in public affairs; the gagging of all free movement inward or outward; the shutting up of the sea, after autocracy and the Louis XIV policy had found such favor and such imitation in Germany, after the splitting asunder of the national unity with its consequences, the thirty years' war and all the other mischief, had crushed down the freedom, the rights, the national consciousness of the German people to the brink of the grave. If all chance of deeds, of great outward movements, was cut off in this way, if even the whole current of thought in individual thinkers was thus restricted to the inner life, the effect was, that the inextinguishable spirit of the people wrought all the more within and in an inward direction; the inner life, the yearning of faith and consolation of devotion, and, with all this inner life and inward brooding, the Art of the inmost—Music—became the chief sphere of interest and active energy. At the period when Great Britain fortified her constitution, her naval power, her trade throughout the world, when France completed her unity and encompassed it in triple armor, when Russia gathered up her strength for empire of the world and Westward pressure,—at that period it was that we Germans, already closely hemmed in, poured out our soul's energy in floods of tone; we sang—giving voice now to raptures streaming up to heaven, now to wordless anxiety and anguish, now to the sweets of self-forgetfulness. Indeed these were the purest, truest and sublimest songs that ever yet were sung. And this period, the period of Bach and Handel, never saw in any other field of life, from the highest so-called to the lowest, a personality of equal growth with them. Invaluable must their heritage remain to us, dearly as it was bought by all these losses and privations, so that Germany might become the successor of Italy, the lap in which the tone-life was nursed.

How has all this musical activity of the period we have been describing affected the present state of things? How stands our music now? Let us, with rapid survey, follow its develop-

In the general intellectual and political progress was involved a loss of ascendancy and influence both on the part of the Church music with its institutions, and of the musical guilds. In the Catholic church the priests themselves frequently desired the abbreviation and simplification of the Masses and other liturgical compositions; in the Protestant service the music became less frequent; in the liturgy of the United Evangelical Church of Prussia, from a purely musical point of view, one can perceive only an exceedingly meagre, utterly unartistic and (artistically) ineffective apology for what was once the music of the Lutheran church. The only important new foundation on this ground is the cathedral choir (Dom-chor) in Berlin, designed expressly for divine service in the Dom and at the Court-Sprung from royal munificence, and not from the impulse of the church or congregation itself, it has resulted in the production of a series of compositions for its own use, as well as in the bringing back to life again of many older works (especially middle-age works of Palestrina and others). On the whole, naturally, the composition of church music, both in extent and in intrinsic power, has had to fall off in comparison with the preceding period. Already Haydn's and Mozart's Masses and Hymns make us feel, that unchurchlike modes of expression and purely personal moods and conceptions mingle in their composition; that mere natural (deistical) devotion reigns in them, rather than the fervor of a firmly believing ecclesiasticism. Beethoven, in his last Mass, has, by the side of old St. Stephen's, reared for himself his own cathedral in the starry night with mystical rapture. How he maintains his Credo, at the risk of life and death, in resolute conflict with the want of faith around him, calling the music of the spheres to witness! How with weeping and with bitterness he confesses the Crucifixus! How in the whirlwind of thought flying before the incomprehensible, he has transfused the Incarnatus, the antiquated dogma, with a new, strange glow in the storm and jubilee and dying away of all the voices of his magic realm! But this is never the old church faith founded on the rock of Peter; this is revival, in the free realm of tones, of the old confession crucified by doubt and modern enlightenment; this is mystery instead of settled dogma, like the Indian blending of the natural and supernatural; and secretly within gnaws the embittering undeniable consciousness: "Faith is wanting!"

Shall I speak also of the gallant Hummel, of Cherubini's Restoration and Coronation Masses, and similar achievements? Nearest to the old stands Mendelssohn. But only externally. For the very reason that the Church did not stand so near to him as it did to a Haydn, who preserved his child-like devotion to it, or to a Mozart, who was zealous enough to deny the possibility of a genuine feeling for it in a Protestant, he could all the more easily attach himself thereto outwardly. Here as everywhere he is an intellectual and most skilful imitator, or rather eclectic out of Bach, Handel and more recent masters. The peculiar ground feature of his church compositions, apart from the power which his great talent and rare skill have won from the forms created before him, is a certain feminine and tender yearning and striving after prayer and devotion, rather than that quickening, strong-souled piety which has its rock-firm basis in the immediate personal steadfast faith, in the unquestionable uniform conviction of the great congregation, in a fixed place in the actual church service.

Of Mendelssohn's and of most of the modern compositions it may be said: That the churchlike devotional contents of the text and the form chosen in accordance therewith serve only for an occasion for artistic modelling; that the end and impulse have been, not religion, not the church, not divine worship, but merely the artistic creative impulse or outward occasion (something to meet the wants of Sing-akademies). The naive extreme point of this direction may be found perhaps in a work performed in Berlin and elsewhere, by H. Dorn, who has ingeniously made use of the text of the Requiem for a succession of dramatic-symphonic scenes. But the same judgment is unavoidable in the case of more serious undertakings; I may name, if only in reference to the position of Mendelssohn, his "Hymn of Praise." This composition, set to a biblical text, is in form and subject a church Cantata. But it is preceded by a complete Symphony, which in form and matter is to be regarded as essentially the first part of the Cantata which follows. Here again the form of church music is abandoned, thereby gaining double playroom for the exercise in tones; the creative impulse means no harm here in committing the most downright pleonasm, by first sounding a hymn of praise instrumentally and then the same thing vocally. How came Mendelssohn to do it? At the instance of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which operated upon him merely formally, as a significant and comprehensive form. But what with the younger master is mere eloquent repetition of the same matter, was with Beethoven a deep and personally ingrained idea, the thought: That, beyond all play of fancy, beyond the farthest flight of thought, Man still remains to Man the most peculiar, nearest object, the only one that satisfies the heart and quiets every longing; that beyond all the mysticism of the instrumental life of nature, the song, the human voice, the fraternal greeting of the "embracing millions" calling from heart to heart, fraught with peace and full of inspired devotion, can lift us to the "starry canopy" of immortality.

In all this there is no especial fault of individuals; it is the mighty current of the age itself in those who have not the power or candor to attach themselves thereto with joyful consciousness. But the consequences are none the less decisive for all that,—let those persons take it to heart who have allowed one of those half-truths of the æsthetic theorists to stamp itself upon them, to wit, that in Art nothing depends upon the What but all upon the How. If the artist can not seize the What, the object, in full honest earnest and abandon, inevitably will halfness and unverity pervade the How, the manner of his presentation. In detaching the word and form of the church from their own proper place and using them for the gratification of a foreign purpose or of a general passion for creating, one gets the habit of straying away from the positive, distinct truth into the indefinite and general, dis-accustoms himself to what is striking and characteristic, grows shy of it and flies from it at last, and, by the use of general phrases, like a cosmopolitan man of all the world, seeks to secure favor with the countless host of characterless, distracted, superficial people. For the phrase really satisfies no one, and yet no one is repelled by it—except the minority who have character and who see and think for themselves.

(To be Continued).

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Musical Forms.

II. THE SONATA.

From the last Rondo form we go on to the yet higher development, the Sonatina. In the Rondo of the fifth form we saw that there were three grand divisions, each somewhat complete in itself, yet all united by a central idea, viz. the Theme. We saw that the Theme, first Episode and Conclusion formed a whole, somewhat complete. Then came the second Episode with its passages, making another complete division of the Rondo. And, finally we had again the Theme, first Episode and Conclusion, making a third chapter in the work. If now, after the first part, that is at the end of the first chapter of the Rondo, we go on, in the place of the second Episode, with a movement quite different in time and style from the first part, but still in Rondo form, and then, again, instead of the recapitulation of the Theme, first Episode, and Conclusion by way of third Chapter, take still a new Theme and construct on it a new complete Rondo, we shall have a Sonata, or Sonatina.

Each separate chapter of the Sonata, or Sonatina, may be a rondo, complete in itself, and of either of the five forms already analyzed. Between these different movements the law of contrast must be observed. If the first movement is quick, the second should be slow, and the third quick. And this order is usually observed.

In the Sonatina, which is now our especial subject of consideration, the second part may be omitted. When that is the case, there should not be a violent contrast in respect to tempo and style between the two remaining movements; for this would dissipate the impression of unity, which is an element of beauty, as we shall presently see. The first part may be Moderato, the second, Allegro. The first may be a Rondo of the third form; the second, for example, one of the fifth.

In the Rondo a unity is attainable by means of the repetition of the Theme; and the Episodes are frequently founded on motives taken from the Theme. In the Sonatina, however, a motive is never used in one movement that has appeared in either of the others. The unity of the composition must be, therefore, purely an ideal unity. That unity does exist, every student of the classical Sonatas must be deeply conscious; but it seems impossible to point out the manner in which it is attained.

The SONATINA, we may now define, is a composition consisting of two or three separate parts, or chapters; each part being a complete Rondo in itself, and differing from the others in time, style, and in the motives on which it is founded.

Yet there must be a sufficient similarity in tone and execution to make it evident that the movements, though separate, form parts of one consistent whole. The Sonatina of Beethoven, Op. 49, No. 2, in G, is a beautiful example in point. It consists of two movements, one in common time, Allegro non troppo, and the other in 3-4 time, Tempo di Menuetto. The first movement is a Rondo of the fifth form. The second division of the work is a rondo of the third form. The whole forms a light, very pleasing composition.

The SONATA is a larger Sonatina. It must consist of three parts, or movements, of which the second is usually much slower than the other two. More commonly, indeed, the Sonata consists of four movements, of which the first, second, and fourth, are rondos, while the third is a Minuet or light Scherzo. We may learn more about the Sonata by studying the works of Beethoven, for he is the great master in this department of composition. We proceed to an examination of some of these works.

The first example is the Sonata in F minor Op. 2. It consists of four parts: Allegro, in 4-4 time; Adagio, 3-4; Menuetto Allegretto, 3-4; and Prestissimo, 4-4. The Allegro is a rondo of the fifth form. The Adagio was analyzed in our remarks upon the second Rondo-form. The Allegretto is a Minuet with Trio. The Prestissimo is a rondo of the fifth form, and was analyzed in our remarks on that head. The unity of this Sonata is very striking. Although these various parts contrast with each other, and are in different keys, tempos, and on different motives, we find it to make upon our minds the impression of a single composition—a distinct, well-defined impression of unity of tone and design.

A very interesting and pleasing composition is the Sonata in G, Op. 14, No. 2. It has only three movements: an Allegro, 2-4, in G; an Andante, 4-4, in C; and a Scherzo, 3-4 in G. The Allegro is a Rondo of the fifth form—a delightful movement. The Andante is a theme of two periods, which is varied three times. The Scherzo is a Rondo of the third form—full of fun and mirth.

Another example is the Sonata Pastorale, Op. 28, in D. It consists of four movements: Allegro, 3-4, in D, rondo of fifth form; Andante, 3-4, in D minor, a rondo of the second form; an exceedingly playful Scherzo, Allegro vivace in D; and a Finale Allegro ma non troppo, 6-8, in D, a rondo of the fourth form. In the second movement the contrast between the tone of the theme and that of the Episode is quite remarkable. But to select examples where all are so excellent is an ungrateful task.—We refer the student, therefore, to the complete edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, for it is there one must study the Sonata.

Sonatas are written for piano-forte solo, or for piano and violin. They have also been written for violin solo, and for the organ.

Sonatas written for Piano, Violin and Violoncello are called Trios. Those written for Piano, two Violins, and Violoncello, are called Quartets. Other instruments are sometimes added, making Quintets, Sextets, Octets, &c. All of these, from the trio to the octet, are classed under the general term Chamber Music, because they are written for solo instruments on each part, and are especially appropriate to be played before a small appreciative audience. In this Chamber Music are found the most delicate ideas of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and other eminent composers.

A Sonata written for the orchestra is called a Symphony, and is the noblest form of instrumental composition, because, being played by a large number of performers, noble ideas can be brought out with the requisite strength, while the variety of instruments gives opportunity to have every thought enunciated in tones of appropriate coloring, or timbre. The Sonata for piano solo differs from the Symphony as the pencil sketch differs from the oil painting.

Of all the forms of instrumental composition the Sonata affords the most complete satisfaction to the cultivated taste. The reason of this we shall hereafter attempt to show.

W. S. B. MATHEWS.

Paxton.

Lay him among the flowers and trees;
He cherished them all as children dear;
Let the fanning hush of the woodland breeze
Play over his bier.

Let diamond glints of prismatic domes
Rainbow his grave-sward's mossy grass,
Like the light that he flashed through a thousand
From his halls of glass. [homes

Many a stumbling task-choked brain,
Many a panting aching breast,
Flung off its load in his fairy fane,
And the maker blest.

Equal, in those fraternal bounds,
Master and servant, lord and churl;
Freely for each the music sounds,
And the fountains curl.

Camps unbloodied and armies mild
Trampled his temple's flowery skirt;
In the thick of the press a yearling child
Oft has strayed unhurt.

Was it not godlike thus to scheme
A glorious boon for his fellow men,
To work fruition of Art's fair dream,
And to vanish then?

What could he further seek on earth
Than daily huddled beneath his eyes?
A nation's simple spontaneous mirth
In its purest guise.

Year by year as the crowd outflows
From noisome alley, from sottish lane,
When the dull blood quickens, the weak heart glows,
He will live again.

Live in each upward strain of thought,
Live in each innocent pulse of bliss.—
If ever God's work was nobly wrought,
I think 'twas in this!

Lond. Mus. World.

Crystal Palace, June 15th, 1865.

Cherubini's Medea.

From The Saturday Review, June 16.

It is pleasant to record the success of such a work as the Medea of Cherubini. Highly as it is esteemed by good judges, it has hitherto been a myth to the large majority of musicians and amateurs in this country. Even in Germany it is but seldom given, and the announcement of Medea at one of the few theatres which still preserve it in their list of immediately available operas is temptation strong enough to induce any enthusiastic tourist with a leaning towards music to prolong his sojourn in the town which can boast of such a theatre. The chance of hearing Medea even tolerably played has always been considered too precious to neglect, inasmuch as it might not occur again in a lifetime. And yet, strange to add, every one lucky enough to obtain that chance, comes away from the performance firmly convinced that he has been listening to a masterpiece with few equals, and perhaps not a single superior. None ever thought of comparing Medea with either of the tragic operas of Mozart—Idomeneo or La Clemenza di Tito. Its loftier merits as a dramatic composition are denied by very few who have enjoyed the rare opportunity of testing them. How, then, account for the almost universal neglect into which it has fallen?—how explain the fact that, though originally composed for the Théâtre Feydeau in Paris, it is never to be heard at the Opéra Comique, or indeed at any theatre in France? True, some time ago, there was a talk of its revival at the larger theatre in the Rue Lepelletier, with a spoken dialogue thrown into accompanied recitative for the occasion, by M. Salvatore Cherubini, a son of the composer; but the recitative was not forthcoming, and the design fell through. In the country where Cherubini should be honored as one of the most illustrious of illustrious Florentines, as the greatest pupil of the great Sarti—a pupil who far outstripped his master—the Medea was never produced, though another Medea, not to be named in comparison, was once popular all over Italy. This is the Medea of John Simon Mayr, an Italianized German, who composed upwards of seventy operas, now buried in oblivion—the same Medea to which the English public were forced to pay homage by the histrionic genius of Pasta. Cherubini never heard any of the works he composed for Paris sung to his own plaint, beautiful, and harmonious language. That in England, where we have transplanted the operas of Meyerbeer, Auber, Spohr, and even Halévy to the Italian stage, and where the love for what is regarded as “classical” is so general that both our Italian lyric theatres found it expedient in the same year (1851) to appropriate to their purposes Fidelio itself—the aspiring effort of the most aspiring and uncompromising of musicians—no thought should ever have been bestowed upon a dramatic composer of such repute as Cherubini, is singular. His requiems and masses for the Church have long been received and admired among us; while his operatic overtures are familiar to frequenters of orchestral concerts, wherever orchestras can be found sufficiently well trained to execute them decently. But the operas to which these overtures are merely preludes remain unknown. And yet they have been warmly and repeatedly eulogized by authorities looked upon with excellent reason as trustworthy. While citing Beethoven, indeed, a contemporary might have adduced Beethoven's own words in the famous letter about the Second Mass—the fact of which having called forth no acknowledgment from Cherubini was inexplicable, until accounted for by the other fact of its never having reached Cherubini's hands. For though, as Mendelssohn tells us, the composer of Medea said of Beethoven's later music, “C'est une fait éternuer,” he entertained a genuine respect for the elder and middle productions of that magnificent genius. The rest were perhaps not exactly in his sphere. But, apart from Beethoven and other distinguished Germans, there are those at home on whose opinions sufficient reliance might have been placed to justify long since a trial of one of the operas of Cherubini, either in Italian or in English. The time is come at last, however, and the result surpasses what could, under any ordinary circumstances, have been expected.

Since Mr. Lumley first ventured on presenting Beethoven's Fidelio in an Italian dress, no such event has signalized the history of Her Majesty's Theatre as the production of Cherubini's Medea under similar circumstances. An opera better calculated to introduce with dignity this eminent master to a public hitherto only acquainted with his dramatic music by report, could hardly have been selected. The story of Jason's heartless infidelity, and Medea's terrible revenge, was just suited to Cherubini, in whom the gift of flowing melody was not by any means so conspicuous as that of dramatic expression, and whose genius, always soaring, could seldom gracefully lend itself to the illustration of ordinary human character, or of the common feelings and incidents of ordinary human life—which appears even in his admirable comic opera, Les Deux Journées. Happily the poet, F. B. Hoffmann—“Méhul's Hoffmann,” chiefly remembered for his zealous advocacy of Méhul's music, a sort of literary jack-of-all-trades, who wrote verses, criticisms, pamphlets, and opera-books—followed Euripides, rather than Seneca, in his portrait of Medea, and thus afforded Cherubini an opportunity of putting forth a giant's strength. The Medea of Euripides is sublime even amid her cruel acts of vengeance—a woman, metamorphosed by fate into an inexorable Nemesis. She is not the commonplace fury portrayed by the Roman philosopher in that dull tragedy which, with its tedious declamation, prosy rhetoric, and childish incantations, must surely have been read, from a “presentation copy,” by Petronius Arbiter, who was otherwise not the man to hold up Seneca to ridicule under the grandiloquent name of Agamemnon. By the side of his abandoned spouse, the fickle Jason, chief of the Argonauts, looks contemptible, and all his smoothfaced sophistry fails to convince the spectator that his doom is not well merited. In Creon, the Corinthian king, whose daughter is the cause of the alienation of Jason's affections from the Colchian princess, we have one of those lay figures peculiar to Greek tragedy. In Dirce, the talked-about but never present Glauca of Euripides—the Creusa of Seneca—little better than a nonentity can be recognized, her dread of Medea ill consorting with her ready consent to wed the father of Medea's children. The Athenian Ægeus—in Mayr's libretto, the sentimental adorer of Creon's daughter, which accounts for the sympathy he shows for her rival—is happily discarded by Cherubini's dramatic poet, who really could not have fashioned him into anything like a shape amenable to effective musical treatment. But, as in Euripides, every other character is made subordinate to the one commanding personage of Medea; and in adopting this view of the Athenian poet, the French librettist showed not merely a great deal of common sense, but a true instinct of poetic beauty. At any rate, he handed over to the composer a classic model capable of the loftiest treatment; and it must be confessed that Cherubini's musical embodiment rivals the antique conception. In points of less significance, wherever the libretto of Hoffmann incidentally differs from the tragedy, it is to the studied advantage of the musician; and as these for the most part are limited to visible representations of what in the original is supposed to take place behind the scene, there is no violation of strict tragic decorum. The celebration of the marriage rites between Dirce and Jason, with all the characteristic pomp and ceremony, the paraphernalia of the temple, the canto fermo of the priests, alternately taken up by the voices of men and women and ever and anon mingling with the majestic harmony of the procession march—the whole witnessed behind a pedestal by the forlorn Medea, already breathing vows of death and desolation—may be cited as an example of what the poet has done for the composer, and of the extraordinary skill with which the composer has availed himself of the opportunity thus presented. There is not a more splendid and masterly finale than this in any opera that could be cited. Spontini's great scene in La Vestale is scarcely, in comparison, better than so much empty noise.

The whole musical setting forth of Medea proves that Cherubini had mentally grasped the subject before putting pen to paper. He has presented us with Euripides in music. His Jason is weak and vacillating; his Dirce is a pale abstraction; his Creon is abrupt and rugged as the Scythian king of Gluck; his Medea is sublime. Even Neris, Medea's constant and attached follower, has an air, when she vows that she will follow the fortunes of her mistress to the end—“Ah! nos peines seront communes” (we quote from the original)—which endows the character with a strong and touching individuality. Gluck was Greek in his two Iphigénies, his Alceste, and his Orphée; but Cherubini is still more supremely and superbly Greek in his Medea. Not one of Gluck's heroines stands out so rock-like as this marvellous creation, which is to high tragedy what Beethoven's Fidelio is to the drama of sentiment. That Beethoven could have given us a Medea it is hardly safe to doubt, admitting, as all are bound to admit, that he was the Shakespeare among musicians; but whether he could (or would) have cast his heroine in that severely classic mould which in Cherubini's creation exhibits the daughter of Æetes as something more than earthly—a veritable descendant of the sun—is questionable. Beethoven, like Shakespeare—all of whose characters, no matter what they say and do, are unmistakable sons and daughters of Eve—leaned too lovingly to human nature; but the Medea of Cherubini, like the Medea of Euripides, woman as she appears in her impassioned moments, shows a touch of the demi-goddess that places her apart from the actual sphere of humanity.

To enter into a detailed analysis of the music of Medea would take up far more space than can be allotted to a single article. Our present object is merely to record that a signal success has attended an uncommonly bold and creditable venture. That so poor a production as the Italian Medea of the Bavarian Mayr, composed in 1812, should have superseded so true a masterpiece as the French Medea of the Florentine Cherubini, composed in 1797, and have held the stage for nearly half a century, amid general applause, in almost every considerable town of Europe where Italian opera existed, is one of those problems not easy to solve, and which alone can find precedents in the history of the musical art. It affords an instance, among many, of how execrants, particularly singers, have been regarded as everything, while what they where appointed to execute has been slurred over as of small importance. Madame Pasta created and established the Medea with which the last half-century has been familiar and yet, illustrious as is her name, who, now that she is gone, remembers or would care to remember a single bar of the opera? Madame Pasta could not, it is true, have sung the music of Cherubini, which, according to M. Félics and others, laid the seeds of a pulmonary complaint that ultimately robbed the Theatre Feydeau of the services of the renowned Madame Scio*: but happily there is a singer at Her Majesty's Theatre to whom Medea comes as readily as Fidelio. No performance of Mlle. Tietjens, since Mr. Lamley first introduced her to the public in 1858, has so emphatically stamped her as a great and genuine artist. Her Medea must take a higher rank than her Fidelio, inasmuch as it belongs to sublime tragedy: while the music of Cherubini, still more trying and difficult than that of Beethoven, requires greater skill to execute, and greater physical power to sustain with unabated vigor to the end. The last act of Medea—one of the grandest last acts in opera, ancient or modern—exhibits Mlle. Tietjens no less as a consummate tragedian than as a consummate vocalist in the particular school to which she belongs. Each gesture has its meaning, each accent tells. But in almost every other respect the performance of Medea at Her Majesty's Theatre is excellent. The Jason of Herr Guns, the Dirce of Miss Laura Harris, the Neris of Mlle. Sinico, and, above all, the Creon of Mr. Santley, are thoroughly efficient. The orchestra and chorus are nothing less than splendid; and the utmost credit is due to Signor Ardit, not only for the efficient manner in which he has produced a work of almost unexampled difficulty, but for the discreet and, at the same time, musician-like manner in which he has set the spoken dialogue (an indispensable element at the Opera Comique) to accompanied recitative. Mr. Telbin, too, has supplied some appropriate scenery, and the opera is altogether well put upon the stage. That Medea will, like Fidelio, take a permanent place in the repertory of Her Majesty's Theatre, is, we think, certain; and with this conviction we hope shortly to find an opportunity of speaking of it again. No unknown work was ever received with more spontaneous and undisputed approval.

Herr Engel Abroad.

Under this head, the London Musical World prints the following amusing letter.

Heidelberg, July 31.

Off to Paris: writing quand même—Mme. Arabella Goddard—Hop Poodle—Master Davison—English perseverance and German sentimentality—Rossini—Albion—Madame Rossini—Rubinstein—Madame Rubinstein—Rossini's quartets—His party—Wagner's Tristan—Theresa—Diemer—Mlle. Battu—L'Africaine—Barbers at Nancy—French speed and German speed—No light!

MY DEAR SIR,—Si vales bene est, ego valeo. This is the first interesting news, but you will find more which you are at liberty to give to the readers of the Musical World if you think it is of sufficient interest, and if you will take upon you to risk the criticizing anger of some Rhadamanthus among your collaborators for publishing articles of one "whose business it is not, or ought not to be," to write for publication. This I leave entirely with you, only I shall know nothing about it before my return to London, since in these happy mountains the cholera, the Italian Opera, omnibuses, even the Musical World, are perfectly unknown.

I left London under very happy auspices, being so fortunate as to meet Mme. Arabella Goddard Davison en route for Boulogne, with two boys who understand travelling much better than we do, as you will see presently.

After having traversed the sunny country between London and Folkestone, where next year's beer grows beautifully, Mme. Arabella Goddard showed me a dog who had all the fields to himself, and said:

"You see he follows you where you go."

"Who?" I asked.

"Hop Poodle," she said.

Well, I will say so much for this dog, he did not bark at me then, and we reached Fouguesonne, as the French say, without polemic.

As we went on deck of the Alexandra, Master Davison, who appears to take comfort as much as any Pasha of Egypt, looked up and said: "Halloh, he's Capt. Folly," and going straight to the captain he showed him the door of the private cabin and said: "Captain, will you open this door for me?" The captain, who little knew whom he had to deal with, replied, "Yes, yes," and went off to give his orders for departure. A quarter of an hour afterwards he came on deck again, as we were out at sea with beautiful weather, but he had no sooner made his appearance than he was got hold of by Master Davison, tapping with his little hand against the locked door and repeating his words: "Will you open this door for me, captain?" The captain laughed at the perseverance of the boy and went away: but after a few minutes he came back, looked smilingly at the boy, put the key in the door, and opened the cabin, which Master Davison at once, and as a matter of course, took possession of, as if his will could not be opposed. That is all right, and his is the way to succeed: "Il veut bien ce qu'il veut." Let us hope he will go through life with the same struggle of will and perseverance, and many a door will be opened for him that may remain shut for others who don't know how to get the key for it. We met with no particular accident, except that a sentimental German whom I had seen the day previous at the house of a great singer, at once thought himself called upon to change all his route in order to surprise me with his amiable company—a human "blister." Madame Arabella Goddard remained in Boulogne with her mother and two boys, the one being a perfect picture, while the other showed himself to be a dashing reality. All the rest went off to Paris.

There is no need telling you what Paris is at this moment, where the rarest appearance to be found on the Boulevards is a Frenchman, dusty, hot, empty—a bore. Paris is exactly like "ces demoiselles" of whom the Senator Dupin made such a great speech, charming to look at when in full dress, but beware the aspect in the morning gown, without rouge and toilet and all the prestige and the great bustle of the season.

Of course I went to dine with my old friend Rossini, who, I told you on a former occasion, is as great a gastronome as he is a composer, making the "honneurs" of his house with as much esprit as the inexhaustible humor of that eternally young mind will allow him to do. Madame Albion dined there too. She looks very careworn and low-spirited, since there is very little hope for the recovery of her husband, who is at this moment raving mad at Dr. Blackie's. Having written to Rossini that there were quartets of his published in England, which he denied having any knowledge of, he expressed a wish to see what they were, so I brought him the whole collection. But he had no sooner set his eyes on them than he declared the whole "pastorale" to be a mere speculation and not a composition of his. However, on reading them through he found that these quartets were made out of some sonatas which he had written in olden times for an amateur, Signor Triossi, who played the double-bass; the sonatas being arranged, out of gratitude to this patron, who was very kind to Rossini, for two violins, violoncello, and double bass. You can form an idea of Rossini's memory who wrote these pieces when a boy of twelve years, and recollected them at once now in his seventy-fourth year.

Rossini said that he had never in his life written any quartets, for to do so after Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven would have required something he had not got—that is to say, "une botte de folie." Rossini is in best spirits and health, younger than ever and knows everything, to the utmost detail, that happens in the musical world of London. He regretted already that Ardit would not come to Paris to conduct the Italian band, and asked me whether the Italian paper, Il Trovatore, was right in stating that Adelina Patti's concert in St. James's Hall had brought 32,000 pounds, or the Gazette des Etrangers in stating £3000 as being the receipts, or the private news stating £700 as the probable sum.

There was on Saturday night the usual musical party in his house at Passy, of which I give subjoined the programme:

1. L'Ancien temps. Afterpiece, M.S. .... Rossini
Monsieur Diemer.
2. Chanson Espagnole, M.S. .... Rossini
Mlle. Battu.
3. Andante pour Violoncelle, M.S. .... Rossini
Mons. Lasser.
4. Overture to Egmont ..... (Beethoven)
Barcarole ..... (Rubinstein)
Valse ..... (Chopin)
5. Air, Gasm Ladré ..... Rossini
Mlle. Battu.
6. Feuille d'Album, M.S. for Harmonium ..... Rossini
Herr Engel.
7. Noël, Duet for Pianoforte and Harmonium, M.S. .... Rossini
Monsieur Diemer and Herr Engel.

The violoncello playing of Herr Lasser calls as yet for no remark. Mlle. Battu, who keeps up a great position in Paris (though I humbly beg to say that neither in her voice nor execution I can discover anything particularly extraordinary), sang the Spanish song with grace and taste, the Italian air with anything but a superior style. Diemer is an excellent pianist, though not of the crushing Liszt grandeur. Rubinstein displayed a most marvellous power of touch, a striking mechanism in his arrangement of the Egmont overture; he astonished everyone, but he charmed nobody; a poetic style was never the prevailing quality of his performance, but what he had of it is diminished still now, and he is more than ever an Attila and less than ever a Nightingale. His wife—a most charming, graceful, amiable young Russian, (though not handsome)—said a wonderfully naive and loving word. Some one asked her, "did she know Liszt?" and she replied: "Je voudrais l'entendre pour ma tranquillité," which evidently shows that she has no doubt that hearing Liszt would quiet all her possible uncertainties as to the supremacy of her husband. The duo and solo on the harmonium which followed pleased, as Rossini's music in Paris and in his saloon must please, played by anyone who understands his instrument a little, and expresses himself in a way that appears Dutch to English dogs. By the bye, Rubinstein spoke to us about Tristan und Isolde, which he, who is one of Wagner's great admirers, does not like at all, so you may imagine what remains to be said by those who do not like Wagner's compositions, generally speaking.

Rossini is certainly one of the happiest men on earth, drinking the full cup of his glory and wealth in the most agreeable way, daily renewed and refreshed by continually changing new comers from all parts of the world, enjoying the most wonderful strength and youth of mind, and, thanks to Madame Rossini, of health; for, whatever Parisian tongues, those professors of the university of médisance, may say, who must criticize like Ovid's frogs:

Sub aqua, sub aqua maledicere tentant, if Rossini lives, it is owing to the devoted, ever-watching love of his wife, who every minute of her life, in the days of his severe illness as well as in his healthy days, had only one care, one thought, one study, how to protect him from physical and moral unnecessary wear, and preserve his days through the most ingenious forethought and perseverance. I know very well that her manners are often rough and brusque; but the difference between her and those who blame her so severely is, that she shows her only fault at once, while they do not.

Would you believe that in this distinguished Paris, boasting the taste and elegance of its manners and productions, and the artistic refinement of all its entertainments, no one keeps up in public favor as well as Mlle. Theresa, whom her greatest admirers and eulogizers know nothing better nor more true to say of, than that she is "Le génie de la canaille." I can see "la canaille," I can't see the "genie." She sings with a pure intonation, she pronounces very distinctly, her voice is so deep a contralto that you might fancy you hear a man, but certainly to call her any "genie" whatever reminds one of what Lessing said: "If you don't want to insult me and to have your face slapped, don't call me a genius."

I left Paris on Sunday morning, Rossini giving me his blessing, as he always does for the last ten years, with the same words: "Soyez sage et ayez la crainte de Dieu." I don't know whether he always served as a model with regard to these two things, but I shall try to follow his advice.

I say nothing of the Africaine, performed in Paris on Friday last, since all London papers will probably be full of it this week; suffice it to say, that not more in Paris than in London, I found many people convinced that Robert, the Huguenots, and the Prophète were mere nothing when compared with the Africaine. What can such exaggerations prove? Where does the man live who will produce a score, compared to which the Huguenots will prove anything else than what it is, an astounding gigantic original work of one of the greatest dramatic composers?

From Paris to Heidelberg nothing interesting, except a strike of the barbers in Nancy, who all at once demanded three pence instead of two for shaving. Indignation and determined resistance of the loyal Nantois citizens, who one and all grew big beards, rather than submit to tyrannic exigencies. After four or five days' useless expectation, the barbers seemed to submit, and when called to a client, declared to give in. But fancy the horror of all Nancy when these good provincials beheld each other, only one side shaved, the other remaining in its uncultivated state, unless the higher fare was agreed to! Such is ' affairs now, and the future Parliament only will know how the great question has been settled.

From Paris to Kehl, a journey of 522 miles, is performed in ten hours; from Kehl to Carlsruhe, 18 miles, in three hours and a half, and fourteen stoppages. Heidelberg is a very nice little town in daylight; at night it is rather dark for two reasons: first, because there is a distance of half-a-mile between two lanterns, and second, because lighting those lanterns is considered a luxury left to such corrupted towns as Paris or London, but irreconcilable with the simplicity and moral character of various German citizens who go home to their supper at sunset, and not going out at night, want no lights.—

* Who, nevertheless, was strong enough to aid in the success of an opera by the same composer, brought out three years later (1860)—no other than Les Deux Journées—in which Madame Scio played with extraordinary success the part of Constance.

Yours in virtue and darkness, LOUIS ENGEL.

Opera without Subvention from the Herald.

[LETTER NO. II.]

To the Editor of the Herald.

DEAR SIR.—Having repulsed your attack on the new artists engaged by me for the forthcoming season, you have taken a week to search for a new base of operations; and now, having intrenched yourself behind the walls of a "contemplated new opera house," you open your masked batteries, not daring to attack me in open field. You substitute the Emperor of Russia for the editor of The Herald, and the imperial intendant of musical matters in St. Petersburg for your humble servant.

You inform the public that the Emperor of Russia has withdrawn his subvention from the manager of the opera at St. Petersburg, who, you say, is probably nothing more than "a German adventurer." This is a very pretty piece of news; it lacks, however, one great essential truth. The Emperor of Russia has not withdrawn his subvention from the opera of St. Petersburg, which will go on as before, nor is the impresario there a German or a Scotch adventurer, but a Prince of the Russian Empire, General in the Russian army, and a man of such power that he would probably, in a similar case, have sent you to Siberia (without much regret on the part of the public) for your insolence in prejudging persons whom you admit you have never heard.

As to your paltry attempt to injure my business because I determined to carry on the opera without advice or assistance from the petticoat government of The Herald, I will in return do good for evil, and inform you that it is not St. Petersburg, but Moscow, where the opera, after a three years' trial, is to be abandoned; not, however, for want of a subvention, but from the difficulty, even with the Emperor's subvention, of finding, now-a-days good singers. After you have heard my opera company for next season, you will probably be obliged to confess that the business tact and musical knowledge of a New York opera manager can accomplish more than the subvention of the Emperor of Russia. Why will you not, then, help the Emperor of Russia out of his difficulty, by sending those surplus managers and singers under your paternal care to Moscow, instead of letting them run loose in the streets of New York?

Your story about St. Petersburg being incorrect, the parallel you attempt to draw cannot apply to the present operative situation in New York; but I am willing to give you the benefit of your fiction.

I am, therefore, to understand that you withdraw your subvention from the New York opera! This is really a terrible blow for the manager! for the opera! for the public! and for the proprietors of the Academy!! As a matter of course the opera, without The Herald's subvention, is a preposterous idea!!! As impossible to succeed in New York without The Herald as in St. Petersburg without the Emperor! These are the ideas which The Herald tries to disseminate. Let us now calmly investigate the items of The Herald's subvention. They are as follows:

1st. The Herald deigns to take a private proscenium box, for 10 persons, which, at the rate of $25 per night for about 80 nights in the year, would bring to the manager.....	$2,000
2d. To 10 of the best reserved seats for "The Herald's staff," $2 per night—80 nights.....	1,600
3d. Extra seats and admissions for matinees, and for Brooklyn, &c., say.....	600
4th. Advertising and printing, at double that charged by any other establishment in New York, say $800 per week for about 25 weeks.....	7,500
5th. For black mail to reporters, roving diplomats, &c.; for being forced to give employment to persons not wanted; for silk and velvet dresses borrowed from the theatrical wardrobe and not returned; for extra advertisements in The Play Bill , and other like superfluities.....	8,000
Total.....	$14,700

These are only the direct contributions, or subventions, as The Herald more properly calls them. Add to this the indirect contributions in the shape of interferences from The Herald's petticoat government, with orders that such and such artist shall be engaged, though utterly useless, and such other dismissed, though absolutely necessary; that Traviata should be given in preference to Robert le Diable, to the prejudice of the treasury; beside other vexatious demands of this character, and we shall find that The Herald's subvention from the opera will not be less than $20,000 per annum.

The Herald therefore costs the managers, directly and indirectly, more than the entire rent of the Academy of Music.

Is it then astonishing that the Opera could not flourish when The Herald swallowed up double its earnings? Is it strange that all the other managers who bent their knees before the "Juno" of the would-be-thunderer of Nassau St., have utterly failed? I shall, therefore, in future do without The Herald's subvention, believing that one Prima Donna more and one Herald less will be more to the taste of the patrons of the Opera.

Let me say a few words about "the contemplated new opera house." You know as much about this as you admit you know about the new artists engaged for next season; as much as you know about the St. Petersburg opera; and just as much as you usually know about things pertaining to art. It would be unjust to take advantage of an ignorant adversary. I will therefore inform you that the more you puff and herald "the contemplated new opera house" the more, perhaps you are "grinding my own axe."

In conclusion, if you are still without information in reference to the new artists engaged for next season, and are desirous to know something of them, I should recommend you to pay 40 cents currency, and go, on their first appearance, to the amphitheatre of the Academy, and you will obtain all the information you require. Yours truly, MAX MARETZEK.

States Island, Aug. 21.

Music Abroad.

London.

The Opera, at both houses, came to a close, as usual, with the month of July, and was followed, as usual, by Alfred Mellon's promenade concerts in the Covent Garden Theatre. The opera season is summed up as follows.

ROYAL ITALIAN. We copy from the Times of July 31.

The operas performed in the course of the season have been, successively, Faust et Margherita, Il Trovatore, Guillaume Tell, Le Prophète, Un Ballo in Maschera, Rigoletto, L'Etoile du Nord, Martha, Il Barbiere, L'Elisir d'Amore, La Sonnambula, Don Giovanni, Linda di Chamouni, Les Huguenots, Norma, La Favorita, Don Pasquale, and L'Africaine—besides the first act of La Traviata on the occasion of Mlle. Patti's benefit. The three grand French operas of Meyerbeer—thanks to Messrs. Costa, Beverley, and Harris—exhibited all their pristine scenic, spectacular, and orchestral pomp. A new interest was added to the Prophète by the fact of Signor Mario resuming the part of Jean of Leyden—his own exclusive property in 1849; while the deserved and always increasing popularity of Mlle. Pauline Luca helped materially to sustain the vogue of the Huguenots. The loss of M. Faure was undoubtedly felt in L'Etoile du Nord, although Signor Attri was an extremely intelligent substitute. But Signor Attri in comparison with M. Faure stood much in the same light as M. Faure in comparison with Herr Formes, who first took the part, ten years ago. The most admired work of the fortunate M. Gounod enjoyed a fresh reign of popularity, not only on account of the piquant, original, and charming Margaret of Mlle. Luca (who supplanted Mlle. Berini), but on account of Signor Mario's Faust, an impersonation not to be excelled, and the extraordinary merits of which were never perhaps so vividly declared as at the last of the many representations of the opera, when association with Mlle. Patti, the Margaret of Margarets, seemingly inspired Signor Mario with more than ordinary enthusiasm and thus contributed to what was the most remarkable performance of the season. Linda di Chamouni gave Mlle. Adelina Patti a rare chance of determining how true genius may enliven the duldest of operas, while Don Pasquale (one of the liveliest of operas), afforded a new and favorable occasion for Signor Ronconi to exhibit his singular versatility. Indeed, some of the old pieces—such as Il Barbiere, Don Pasquale, and L'Elisir d'Amore, where Mlle. Patti, Signor Mario, and Signor Ronconi (admirably supported in the last two by M. Gasier) could be seen together—have proved the most delightful of the repertory. Don Giovanni has been frequently if not very efficiently represented; and Guillaume Tell, the gorgeous masterwork of Rossini, was again one of the chief attractions of the early season. In this as in other operas—Rigoletto, Linda, and the Africaine—Signor Graziani has desperately striven to assert his histrionic talent, to show, in fact, that he is not only possessed of a superb barytone voice, but of dramatic power. Nevertheless, in spite of his earnest and praiseworthy endeavors, "Il balen del suo sorriso" remains, and is likely to remain, his "capo d'opera." The music of Verdi has been this year in less request than usual; Bellini has only spoken through the eloquent tones of Mlle. Patti's Amina, and the truly pathetic and womanly Norma of Madame Galletti; Rossini's most musical voice has only been heard in the glowing strains of the Swiss patriot and the livelier melodies of the Spanish barber; while Auber, the most tuneful of French musicians, has been altogether silent. Nevertheless, the production with becoming splendor of the latest opera by the composer of Robert, the Huguenots, the Prophète, the Etoile du Nord, and Dinorah—the long and eagerly anticipated Africaine—was enough to impart a special interest to the season 1865, and to render it memorable, even had the programme offered no other point of attraction.

HER MAJESTY'S. The Times, Aug. 7, says:

The theatre opened on the 29th of April, with La Sonnambula, in which Miss Laura Harris, from the United States, made her first appearance on the English stage. The extreme youth of the American Amina, combined with her unaffected demeanor, predisposed the audience in her behalf, and while timidity very sensibly detracted from the effect of her performance, she did quite enough to show the possession of a voice which, if deficient in power and volume, was, nevertheless, of rare compass in the higher register. With Miss Harris were associated Signor Carrion, of whom we have spoken; our admirable barytone, Mr. Santley, of whom it is unnecessary to speak; Mlle. Redi, a serviceable "comprimaria" (also a new comer); and Signor Bossi. The Sonnambula was followed by Lucrezia Borgia, in which that universal favorite, Mlle. Titiens, made her first appearance, the other parts being sustained by Signor Carrion, Mlle. Beitelheim, the vivacious contralto from Vienna, already known to habitual frequenters of Her Majesty's Theatre, and Mr. Santley. In Norma, the inevitable sequel, Mlle. Titiens was ably supported by Madame Sinico (Adalgisa), Signor Marcello Junca (Oroveso), and Signor Carrion (Pollio).

But these hackneyed operas, together with another—Il Trovatore—even more hackneyed, to swell out the list, did not throw much lustre on the earlier subscription nights, and prospects looked anything but bright. On the 12th of May, however, a new star arose, and speedily riveted the public gaze. Mlle. Ilma de Murka's first appearance caused much the same kind of impression, as the first appearance of Mlle. Adelina Patti, at the Royal Italian Opera, four years previously. Something fresh and startling was at once recognized, and the graphic portrayal of the mad scene in Lucia di Lammermoor became a town talk. Mlle. de Murka's second performance confirmed the opinion elicited by her first. An entirely original artist was acknowledged, with voice, appearance, dramatic genius—everything, in short, in her favor. That practised connoisseurs, less easily moved to raptures, should criticize the singing of Mlle. de Murka and protest that she had yet much to acquire before she could rank with thoroughly accomplished mistresses of her art, was quite natural. But though their criticism was unquestionably just, it in no way abated the excitement of the general public, who, rarely critical, are disposed to give way unconditionally to their feelings, and blindly to worship that in which severer judges are often disposed to admit at best extraordinary endowments united to extraordinary promise. However, argue as we may, Mlle. Ilma de Murka took the audience "by storm," and her success was unqualified. She was but gloomily matched with an Edgardo, in M. Joulain—a new tenor, as inferior in every respect to Signor Carrion as the latter to Signor Giuglini. In revenge, Mr. Santley, who played Enrico, brother of Lucia, made ample atonement for the deficiencies of her lover.

The revival of Fidelio followed quickly upon, and substantially propped up, the new success. We need not dwell upon the superlative merits of the Leonora of Mlle. Titiens, nor upon the qualities that fairly distinguish the Marcellina of Madame Sinico, the Rocco of Signor Junca, the Forestan of Dr. Guns, and the Pizarro of Mr. Santley.

Mlle. de Murka's third part was Amina. In the bedroom scene she roused her audience to a pitch of enthusiasm scarcely less inflammatory than that which attended her celebrated scene in Lucia. Her position was, by this third essay, so firmly maintained, that to the end of the season her attraction remained unimpaired. In the same opera Signor Gardoni, always and deservedly a favorite, took the part of Elvino, and Mr. Santley that of the Count.

The first performance in this country—and the first performance in any country, to Italian words with accompanying recitative—of Cherubini's grand tragic opera Medea, will, perhaps, even more emphatically than the strange apparition of the new Lucia, cause the season 1865 to be remembered as one of the most notable in the annals of Her Majesty's Theatre. This took place on the 6th of June, with a success that—hyperbole apart—may be pronounced triumphant.

The perennial Barbiere, a masterpiece of another calibre, brought back that admirable vocalist, and, in every sense, true artist, Madame Trebelli, whose Rosina, judged from the point of view of the music, is the most legitimate, because the most nearly approaching the composer's ideal, now on the stage. The performance was further remarkable for the Dr. Bartolo of Signor Scialese, unquestionably the raciest and the best since the Bartolo of Lablache. A very indifferent Figaro, in Signor Zacchi, and a very indifferent Basilio counterbalanced in a great degree these excellent points; but such tuneful and exhilarating music can hardly, under any conditions, sound dull. The Huguenots came next—with Mlle. Titiens and Mlle. de Murska as Valentine and Marguerite de Valois. Of the first we need say nothing. Mlle. Murska proved herself able to execute with brilliant facility the bravura music which the composer has assigned to the Queen. The two chief characters, indeed, were perfectly filled. The cast was further strengthened by Mlle. Trebelli, whose Urbain has now no equal.

Meanwhile, Linda, Lucia, La Sonnambula, and Medea were alternately repeated, preliminary to another great revival—Il Flauto Magico, which had not been heard in London since 1852 (at Covent Garden). The romantic opera of Mozart—produced on Thursday, July 6—was again a credit to the theatre. The performance, however, behind the lamps, was chiefly remarkable for Mr. Santley's admirable singing in the character of Papageno, and for the surprising execution of the two great and difficult airs of Astarte, Queen of Night, by Mlle. Irma de Murska, who through this display won the sympathies of all the musicians, as already she had won the sympathies of all the amateurs. Madame Harriers-Wippen, who last year had made so good an impression as Alice in Robert le Diable, was Pamina; Dr. Gunz, Tamino. Sarastro was undertaken by another new German bass—Herr Wolrath; and Papageno by Madame Sinico. The first two were more than acceptable; the last admirable.

Un Ballo in Maschera—with Madame Harriers-Wippen as Amelia, Mlle. Trebelli as Ulrica, Mlle. Sarolto as the Page, Signor Carrion as Riccardo, and Mr. Santley as Renato, and Semiramide—with Mlle. Titiens, Mlle. Trebelli, and Signor Agnese, as Semiramide, Arsace, and Assur, have been too recently described to make further mention of them necessary. Nor is it requisite to say more than that the operas played on the extra nights, at reduced charges were Faust, Lucrezia Borgia, and Robert le Diable.

It will be seen from the foregoing that of the operas positively promised by the manager in his prospectus all were given with the exception of Le Nozze di Figaro and Tannhäuser.

The Orchestra dissents from the general admiration of one of the young debutantes:

Miss Laura Harris has not proved invaluable in service; but then nature never intended her for a prima donna. There has been a general disposition on the part of the press to excuse her shortcomings on the score of youth; but we think Miss Harris sufficiently matured to make her inefficiency chronic. She is not actually an infant, though she looks and sings like one; her formation is such that the lapse of ten or twenty years will scarcely alter. If we seriously believed that Miss Laura Harris would grow out of her incapacity, we should only advise her to grow as fast as she could and return when she was developed; but we fear she is now as old as she will ever care to be, and that advance of years will not bring advance of merit. Prime donne are not port-wine that they should always improve by keeping; and we do not think either a sea-voyage or cellarage would ever benefit the American young lady.

Mr. Mellon's first "Classical Night" was celebrated on Thursday, when the whole of the first part was devoted to the music of Mendelssohn. The programme included the Meeresstille overture, the march from Athaliah, the first pianoforte concerto (Mlle. Krebe), the "First Violet" (Mlle. Liebhardt), with the overture and instrumental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. It was a splendid concert. The march from Athaliah, Bottom's march and the "First Violet" were encored.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 2, 1865.

New Music.

Music is taking her siesta. The concert rooms are silent, and we have some months to wait for opera, oratorio, symphony and chamber music. Meanwhile in other ways there is no suspension of musical activity. The love of music, the desire for culture, the study and practice of the inspiring works of great composers, (to say nothing of the vast magazinery of music of mere fashion) which was stimulated by the hearing of good music in the concerts, still lives on and works on, with more or less enterprise and constancy, in private. And a fair measure of this sort of activity, a gauge of its depth and earnestness, an open confession of its spirit, taste and general direction, multifarious to be sure, is found by looking into the new lists and announcements of the music publishers. Let us consult these signs a little, looking, in the first place, for what is first in order of intrinsic value: let us see what really valuable music is finding publishers among us just now for the first time. Of course, the endless multiplication and diffusion of all sorts of ad captandum, fashionable, light, showy, popular sheet music, and popular collections in books with fancy titles, "gems," and "lyres" and "silver chords" "showers," "shawms," &c. always goes on; even the war could not stop it, while it created an immense business besides out of the demand for national and patriotic choruses and songs and marches. The mechanical makers and re-shapers of music are always busy; it is not ideas, it is not inspiration they require; it is only an occasion, a taking title, a market, and some convenient composition to imitate, steal from, or travesty and torture to the huge delight of the little worlds in which they pass for geniuses. Each fashionable opera has to be ground up into fantasias, as well as ground out on barrel organs.

But with all this we have nothing to do at present; we are looking, among the new publications, for encouraging signs of a more advanced culture and a higher interest in music. And we are soon gratified. If for a number of years past there has been a falling off in the disposition of our publishers to bring out standard classical works, the better spirit seems to be reviving now. Let us call attention to a few of the good things recently completed or in progress.

1. CHOPIN. Messrs. Oliver Ditson & Co. (our publishers), not content with having already issued such a nice edition of all the Mazourkas and Waltzes of this rare poet of the Piano—and this means that the admirers, the students and players of Chopin are not content, for your live music publisher has always a shrewd eye to what will sell—are now rapidly engraving and bringing out all the Polonaises and all the Nocturnes; so that we shall soon have quite a complete library of all the more practicable Chopin creations in our own cheap American editions, very desirable while foreign music is only to be had here at twice or thrice the European price. Of the Polonaises there already lie before us the splendid and impassioned one in C-sharp minor, op. 28, No. 1; No. 2 of the same opus, in E-flat minor, plaintive, heroic, patriotic, full of Polish fire and chivalry; Op. 40, No. 1, in A major, trumpeted, full of brío, dash and energy; and No. 2, in C-minor, mystical and dreamy. Read what Liszt says of the Polonaise and of these Polonaises in his finely appreciative "Life of Chopin." We may remark that Ditson's list includes three more Polonaises than are named in the Leipzig Catalogue Thematique of Chopin, unless that has been enlarged since 1852. Of the Nocturnes, four also are already out, the two respectively of op. 37 and op. 55. Thoughtful, delicate, imaginative, charming compositions they are. The list will include nineteen Nocturnes. By the way, we would suggest a comparison with the very much simpler, but really graceful and poetic Nocturnes of John Field, who has the credit of originating this form of writing; they were published by a Boston house some years ago.

Verily, for a young musical country like this, the Ditson catalogue of classical piano music counts up handsomely:—Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words"; Schumann's "Album"; Haydn's and Mozart's Sonatas; and the two all-important inexhaustible fountains of pianoforte wisdom and inspiration, musical gospels for all time, the "Well-tempered Clavichord" of Bach, and the Sonatas of Beethoven. It is surely a good sign that the demand for these keeps increasing. Innumerable are the editions of the Sonatas in Germany, France, England, and already we have two in Boston. That of Ditson, complete some dozen years ago, has recently been critically revised and conformed to the new Breitkopf and Härtel edition, which is the final standard. The other one referred to is in progress with a Boston house distinguished for the neatness and accuracy of its engraving.

2. Before leaving the subject of piano-forte music, we must allude to a very important work, or series of works, which we have just had great satisfaction in examining and hope to find a lasting rich resource in studying. It is an educational work, but made up from the pure, sterling classics of the art. It is published in Leipzig and New York by J. Schuberth & Co., (at present only with German text and titles), and is called "Classische Hochschule für Pianisten, redigirt von LOUIS KOEHLER" (Köhler's Classical High School for Pianists). It is a formidable work, a mass of material for practice all of the most solid and enduring stuff. In twenty numbers, each a cahier of some twenty pages, is given a series of exercises, to be taken in their order, sufficient for several years' study, and wholly from the best works of Cramer, Clementi, Scarlatti, Handel and Sebastian Bach. In an excellent preface, explaining the rationale of his order and selection, Köhler maintains that the true foundation of all solid pianism rests on the study of just these old masters; know these, have them at heart, by heart and at your fingers' ends, and the whole glorious world of Beethoven, Chopin and all the rest is open to you to march in. The selections from each master are introduced with a brief biographical notice, and judicious hints about the character and mode of playing each piece, or practising each lesson.

CRAMER'S Etudes, it is needless to say, are among the most admirable exercises ever written for the student; each aims at the mastering of some mechanical point, and yet they are not mechanical, they are true tone poems, deep in feeling, exquisite in grace, various in mood, charming the student away from what is frivolous and giving him a taste of what is deep and true in music. Thirty of the best of these are given, all carefully fingered; no one can learn them and readily forget or cease to love them.

CLEMENTI is represented by 24 studies from his best work, the Gradus ad Parnassum. In these the technical side is more prominent, in some it is all in all, and therefore we may question whether the natural order would not have been Clementi and then Cramer. But this is left to the discretion of pupil and teacher, as circumstances may dictate.

DOMINICO SCARLATTI. Here we go back to something a century older, to a simpler practice in the fugue form before trying to fathom its great masters, and to that naive, graceful, less profound, less developed, but quite enjoyable Italian clavessin music, and in which the rudiments of the modern Rondo and Sonata are discerned. These twelve selections are all called Sonatas, or else Fugues. The latter are curious, ingenious, clear and graceful,—not much more. The so-called "Katzen Fuge" (Cat Fugue), the theme of which is said to have been furnished by his cat running over the key-board of his instrument, is the best. In the little Sonata pieces there are quaint and happy movements. One, called "Concert Sonata," Prestissimo, in A major, has been often played in concerts by Liszt, Clara Schumann and others, and with not a little effect.

HANDEL. Something considerably deeper and larger. First come 15 Preludes, Variations (including of course the "Harmonious Blacksmith") Fantasias, Gigue, Allemandes, &c., taken from his Suites de Pièces. Then follow a dozen Fugues, some of his best, some broad and solemn, some humorous, and ending with his grandest one, in which he comes very near to Bach, that in E minor, the subject of which announces itself so positively in three strong calls upon the fifth of the key. There is also among them a fugue on the same subject with the chorus in Israel: "They loathed to drink."

"Deeper and deeper still." BACH occupies the remaining "undivided half" of the whole series. And the editor gives us a good essay on the educational uses of Bach's Piano works, with explanations of his forms, &c. First he draws largely from his lighter forms, so endless in variety, beginning with the easier little Preludes, Inventions, Dance pieces, &c., for two and three voices,—24 of them; these initiate the student at once into strict part writing, familiarize him with the polyphonic style, in which each part is a responsible individuality, a melody as much as the upper or soprano part; here lies the soul, the secret of all musical consistency and charm that never palls. Then we are taken a stage further, and set to studying his so-called little Symphonies (or "three-part inventions,") his Fantasias, Suites, Concertos, &c., including the famous "Italian Concerto," the fiery Fantasia in C minor, and the wonderful Chromatic Fantasia, so rich in chords that one might think it came after Beethoven and Chopin. Endless variety, felicity and beauty in these little things. Then we have an essay on the Fugue, an introduction to Bach's Fugues, and then a liberal selection from the Fugues themselves, namely one half of the 48 fugues in the "Well-tempered Clavichord," the greatest and the finest ever achieved in this line, fugues in which science has become fluent mother tongue and is forgotten in the poetic meaning it subserves. The editor is right in maintaining that these works never can be too much studied; whose is perfectly at home with them sits at the very heart and centre of the whole world of music. But it is not enough to know them mechanically.

The last two numbers of the Hochschule contain several "hitherto unprinted works of Bach," namely: two Fugues, a Phantasie in C minor, four "Choralvorspiele" or fantasias on the groundwork of some Choral heard intermittently (such as Mr. Paine plays on the organ); and finally an arrangement for four hands of the great Passacaglia in C minor and the great Organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor;—quite a help will these last be to those who like to hear them played on our Great Organ.

The text relating to all these works and authors is in German. We are glad to hear that Messrs. Schubert & Co., propose to issue it also in English.—This is a School, of course, for more advanced and earnest scholars. Köhler is also a prolific author of easier and earlier courses of exercises, many of which have been reprinted by Ditson.

3. FRANZ AND SCHUMANN. The songs of Robert Franz are taking a deep hold among refined music-lovers in this country. Especially in Boston the vogue they have acquired is quite remarkable. Before they were heard, scarcely at all, in concert rooms in Germany, and while they were only known there in the circle of the composer's friends and by here and there a few in other cities, here (thanks to Mr. Dresel) they had become the choice delight of music parties, sung by amateurs and much imported from abroad, and (thanks to Mr. Kreisemann) have been frequent and welcome visitors of the concert room. So much in demand are they, that several of our publishers have issued collections of the simpler and more practicable ones, which have sold largely. And now Messrs. Ditson & Co. are preparing a much larger collection of them for the press, which will include a dozen or more new ones, with careful English versions of the words (true little poems, most of them, which may not be trifled with) made expressly. Such "gems" of song as "Die Harrende," "Er ist gekommen," "Des Mondes Abbild," &c., will figure in the list. Simultaneously with these, or immediately after, will come a similar collection of the songs of Robert Schumann; so that our singers will be rich in song.—More in due time.

4. MASSES. We have only room to mention now, that the same publishers have, within the year, issued a large number of the popular Masses of MOZART and HAYDN, and the two well-known Masses by C. M. von WEBER, following the Novello edition, vocal and piano score, in neat, convenient octavo form.

5. MENDELSSOHN'S "ST. PAUL," the oratorio complete, in the same convenient form, (also by Ditson), is one of the most important additions to our treasury of easily accessible standard oratorio music. There will be no excuse now for longer postponing the study and performance of Mendelssohn's other noble oratorio, on the part of our societies which have made "Elijah" almost a household word. Indeed we count this publication among the good omens for our next musical season, for we suspect it to mean that there is a demand for copies among the members of some large Choral Society. The Paulus is the work to which Mendelssohn was inspired by the Passions and Cantatas of Bach, and in which he most shows the influence of Bach. It holds at least equal rank with Elijah, is what the Germans call ebenbürtig therewith, and is sure to win the musical heart of our people when once fairly, fully and repeatedly brought out. We have waited too long for it. The Paulus will be a good stepping-stone to Bach; we commend it therefore to our Handel and Haydn Society, trusting that, by the time they have learned the Paulus, they will be ready without fear to make a vigorous beginning upon Bach. The Magnificat would be a good thing to begin with; and we hope by another year to see that also (Robert Franz's masterly piano score of it) in an American reprint.

6. And this brings us to the right place for introducing an extract from a letter showing where the few, who seek acquaintance with Bach's larger sacred works, may find them in a cheap, convenient, though not an American, edition:

A popular "edition of Bach's master-pieces. Opera und Oratorien im Klavierauszuge mit Text von Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Gluck, Cherubini," (Operas and oratorios in vocal score, with orchestra accompaniments arranged for Piano or Organ, of Bach, Handel, &c. G. F. Peters, Leipzig and Berlin.) Of Bach there are published the "Passion according to Matthew;" the "Passion according to John;" Christmas oratorio; "High mass in B minor;" "Magnificat in D." The first four cost each one thaler, or about 75 cents of our money: the "Magnificat" costs a half thaler. These editions are in the same style as Novello's octavo editions of Oratorios and Masses of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, &c., which is certainly the most convenient possible shape for printing music as well as books intended for general popular use. The modern G clef is used for all the vocal parts except the bass. This obviates a great difficulty hitherto felt by musical students. It was an immense labor to read in the ancient ecclesiastical clefs 4. 5. 6. or 8 parts handled in the powerful, independent manner of Bach. Every one who has tried it must confess this. And I leave out of account the grand and unequalled orchestral accompaniments. The pianoforte or organ arrangement of the latter far surpasses Novello's arrangements, which are often paltry, intended for very poor players. In Peters' edition the instrumental parts are carried out with clearness and fullness, making use of arpeggios and obligato pedals. Wherever such music can be sung a musician can easily be found to play such accompaniments. Herein we certainly have a great improvement on Novello's editions. Moreover when there is any peculiarity in the choice of instruments this is indicated in this arrangement. Novello does this in a less degree. In this direction all our piano-forte and organ transcriptions are very faulty, though in different degrees. The instruments used should in some brief way be indicated, for on the organ and even the piano-forte we can imitate many orchestral instruments.

The works now printed in cheap and popular style are among the few sublime masterpieces of musical genius. The "High mass in B minor" is, like the Cologne Cathedral, the greatest, mightiest effort of Gothic art, unequalled in solemn magnificence, in intensity of deep, northern, religious feeling. Bach is a kindred spirit to Luther and Shakespeare, combining wonderfully intellect, imagination, and passion. The "High Mass" is incomparably his sublimest work. Nothing in Palestrina, Handel or Beethoven equals the tremendous power, the thunderstep, of the Sanctus and Credo. Next in rank we put the "Passion according to St. Matthew." In the "mass" Bach shows himself in all the pride of his glorious strength. In the "Passion" he shows the sweet strength of Christian humility. In the former the church triumphing, in the latter the church suffering.

Third in order we rank the Magnificat. No other composition of the kind will compare with it in splendor and effectiveness. I would advise the young student beginning Bach, to purchase the High Mass and Magnificat first, as being most brilliant and modern in style.

ORATORIOS.—The Handel and Haydn Society have an excellent plan for the next season. It is to give at stated intervals, four oratorio performances, on a grand scale, with a chorus nearly as large as that of the Festival last May, say 600 voices, and an orchestra of double their usual strength, the price of tickets being one dollar. In this series they propose to make a point of bringing out the "Israel in Egypt" for once in its completeness; and besides the "Messiah" and the "Elijah," to revive perhaps the "Jephthah," or the "Judas Maccabæus" of Handel, taking more time for the study of "St. Paul." We are sure such concerts would be hailed with eagerness by as large a public as the Music Hall can hold, and we trust that nothing will defeat the execution of the plan, although the programme may be open to some modification.

OPERA. Maretzsk's Italian Season at the New York Academy will open on the 25th. Of his company the Tribune says:

The three prime donne will be Signora Caracci Zucchi, Miss Clara L. Kellogg, and Signorina Bosellio. Signorina Ortolani is also engaged. Signorina Bosellio is an artist in the very freshness of her youth, and is said to possess a charm of feature and manner altogether irresistible. She was a pupil of the Conservatorio at Milan, where she obtained the first prize. The Maestro Petrella prepared her for the stage and she was his favorite pupil. Her debut was in Petrella's celebrated opera "Jone," in which her success was so complete that the gratified Maestro composed for her a comic opera called "Il Fioletto di Geely," or the "Will-o'-the-Wisp." Mr. Maretzsk has secured the score of this new opera, and will produce it early in the season.

The tenors are Massolenti, Massimiliani, and a new tenor di Grazia, Signor Irre. He is well known in Italy, where, during a career of ten years, he has won an enviable reputation, and since the production of "Faust" has been recognized as the most competent representative of that character. The contraltos are Miss Adelaide Phillips and Signora Bine de Rosel. Signor Bellini will resume the position he so ably filled last year, and Ardavani is also engaged. The new bass is Signor Rovere, who was here some few years since with Madame Alboni, and was highly esteemed, and Signor Antonucci, who has a fine European reputation, and who for the last two years has held a brilliant position in Paris, in connection with the most celebrated vocalists of the age. This is a most important engagement, and makes the company far more complete than it was last year. To this remarkable strength of bass singers will probably be added Hermanns, the best basso of the late German Opera.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, AUG. 23. Musical life in our city seems to have been at a stand-still for the last year or so; and to report to you the entertainments given by travelling troupes or artists would only be to repeat the correspondence from other places which they have visited. Within the last week, however, we have had some concerts which have furthered the cause of music in this city.

Mr. MORGAN, the organist, came here and gave two Organ concerts in two different churches. Messrs. Pilcher & Co., the organ builders of this city happened to have an organ finished, designed for the first Universalist church (and a very fine organ it is), which fact suggested the idea to put the same into the Opera House and give a series of concerts. The enterprising agent of Mr. Morgan engaged an orchestra, telegraphed for C. ANSCHUTZ, and the result was three concerts which rank among the finest ever given here. Mr. Morgan's ability is well known in the East, and we are glad he undertook a journey West to plant the standard of good organ playing among us. As a general thing, the man who pumps the swell pedal the liveliest, seems to be the man. Mr. M., with his complete mastery over his instrument, however, produces the most diversified effects, without forever treading the pumphandle; and nothing but his reputation will save him from a suggestion or two from some of our "church-music-committee-men," to give us a little more of the swell. His selections, also, are very good, although we must confess his playing of Bach's fugues seems to lack that quiet self-possession and consequently does not create that satisfaction in the listener which I experienced from Mr. Padi's playing of the same class of music. I do not think it best to give us Bach at the start in his grandest and most intricate compositions. There are many of his fugues which are easier to understand (and no doubt easier to play) than those performed by Mr. Morgan; but I think he would gain the great end of an artist, that of a public instructor, more surely by selecting the simple ones; especially as he has plenty of other things at his fingers' ends wherewith to astonish the people and show them what he can do.

But now for the Orchestra part of the concerts. The band is made up of thirty-two musicians, mostly members of our Philharmonic Orchestra, and under Anschutz's magic authority, quickly assumed the shape of, I will not say one of the greatest orchestras in the world, as the phrase goes, but one of which we may well be proud. The performance of Wallace's Loreley Overture, at the opening of the second concert, created among those that have watched the progress of music in this outpost of civilization the most agreeable surprise. Without meaning to detract one iota from the credit due to those who have worked hard and faithfully amongst us to prepare the way for such results, the influence of that species of genius, "a musical conductor," has seldom been so brilliantly exemplified as in the case of our orchestra under Anschutz's direction. The selections were almost entirely new to Chicago audiences. Titi's Overture on National airs, the march from Spohr's "Consecration of Sounds," a magnificent composition, Beethoven's Prometheus Overture and March from the Ruins of Athens, Hohnstock's Overture on "Hail Columbia," &c., with the Oberon and the Finale of Beethoven's 5th Symphony, made up a rich treat for a midsummer's entertainment. Mr. Morgan played also a Duet for Violin and Piano with Mr. Lewis, our Violinist par excellence, while some vocal performances very creditably performed by some of our home singers, pleasantly relieved the instrumental performances. Many thanks to our visitors, and may they soon favor us again with their presence. M.

Blind Tom.

AURORA, ILLINOIS, July 30, 1865.—MR. EDITOR: Just now there seems to be some sensation again about "Tom," the blind negro boy of Georgia. Tom was born in Columbus, Ga., and was owned by Gen. Bethune. He is perfectly black, or rather what is called in the South a "dark negro," about five feet two or three inches high, and sixteen years old. I have had the opportunity of seeing Tom several times within the last five years, and of satisfying myself by repeated experiments as to what he could and what he could not do. A plain statement of what I have seen him do will not, I believe, be uninteresting to your readers.

In 1861 "Tom" was advertised to give a concert in Macon, Georgia. It was announced that he would play the most difficult pieces of music after once hearing them, extemporize an accompaniment to any piece simultaneously with first hearing it, and a variety of other impossible feats.

It was easy to conceive how a negro like him, with a remarkable ear for music, might be able to play any striking melody after once hearing; but it was not easy for me to credit his ability to play any severe piano composition after only once hearing. My doubts on this point I intimated to his agent. He said he could not be sure of what Tom would do, but would bet on him every time, and authorized me to try him. So at the concert I was prepared to play the fugue in Bb. No. 21, from Bach's "Well-tempered Clavier." The event proved that I was right in my doubt, for Tom did very well through the theme, and the second giving out of the theme with the counter-subject, but when the third voice came in poor Tom broke down. Evidently there were more irons in the fire than he could tend. Still he knocked on, hitting a right note now and then, especially when the subject came in the soprano voice; and I have no doubt he would have played it after a few times hearing. I afterwards played him a simple polka, then new and unpublished (by a friend), and he played it at once without difficulty.

Some two years later I saw Tom in La Grange, Geo. Again I tried him with some compositions of ordinary ability which I am sure he had never heard, for they were original and not published, and he acquitted himself excellently well. I had the curiosity to ask him if he remembered the Polka I had played him in Macon two years before. He thought a moment and then played it perfectly well. His master said he did not think Tom had played it before in the two years. Tom said he had not. I believed him, because it was an insignificant piece, while he has a fine repertoire of brilliant pieces. At this concert a ludicrous circumstance happened. An old Swiss cabinet-maker, much given to singing those curious songs of the Fatherland, which have the inimitable yodling choruses, was asked to sing for Tom. So he sang one. The words were French. Tom "tried it on." For a time all went well. But when he came to the refrain, which demands those sudden transitions from the natural to the falsetto tones, poor Tom was nowhere. His contortions and the anomalous sounds to which he gave utterance produced such a ludicrous effect as I have never seen (or heard) surpassed. My sides were sore for three days afterwards.

Tom is a wonder. The noticeable point, I think, is his wonderful memory of sound. Any sound he hears, he remembers. A speech in a foreign tongue will be readily recited by him after once hearing. He will hear a piece of music one day and not try to play it then, but several days after he will play it better than he would just after hearing. This shows that the impression comes out plainer in his mind by meditation. He never forgets a piece he once hears; nor the name of it, if given to him when he first hears the piece. He plays compositions by Ascher, Prudent, Thalberg, Gottschalk, &c. It will be an era to Tom when he first hears Gottschalk. Would that I might be there to see! If my readers shall go to hear him they will be glad I have written.

W. S. B. MATTHEWS.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Lady Hildred. Song. Balf. 50

The legend of the fair lady, who imagined that she would have no one for a lover but some strong, fierce knight, but finally much preferred the suit of the gentle wandering minstrel, is well told by the poet, and finely interpreted by the composer, who seems to have a special talent for this kind of piece.

The Golden Wedding Day. Song. Virginia Gabriel. 30

A well-written song, which married people are advised to purchase and lay by, in case they should use it on their fiftieth anniversary.

L' Africaine. Meyerbeer.

Child of the Sun. (Air du Sommeil.) 30

Hours of Rapture. (O douce extase.) 40

Old composers, like old people, are somewhat apt to draw upon their memories; and their music of to-day must needs remind one of their music of yesterday. The "Air du Sommeil" is a kind of lullaby, with a resemblance to the Shadow Air of Dinorah, and a few measures that might have been suggested by similar ones in Mozart's "Flauto Magico." It is, however, a very pleasing song, and one of the most attractive in the opera.

"O douce extase," is a bright "enthusiastic" piece, with brilliant runs near the end.

The Girl with the Waterfall. Ballad. F. Wilder. 30

An unpretending little song about the new fashion, which, very likely the "boys" and "girls" would like to sing.

Instrumental.

Overture to L' Africaine. Four hands. Arr. by E. Wolf. 60

A very agreeable instrumental duet. Not difficult.

Fantaisie de Salon. L' Africaine. Op. 170. E. Kettner. 75

A rapid perusal of the music of Meyerbeer's last work produces the impression, that there is a great deal of fine instrumentation in it. Kettner has worked up his materials skilfully, and produced a very musical fantasia, sufficiently brilliant, and quite graceful. Not especially difficult.

Memories of Home. Brinley Richards. 60

"If I could only play well enough to perform Thalberg's 'Sweet home,' I should be satisfied." This, or some similar exclamation, is quite common among learners, as teachers will testify. The above piece contains variations on the same air, and is about one half as difficult as Thalberg's composition, which it somewhat resembles, and will therefore, be a good and encouraging lesson for pupils.

The Spinning Wheel. (La Fileuse.) Sidney Smith. 60

The accompaniment, and the "ornamentation" of the melody, keep up the idea of a whirling wheel. A rapid, lively, pretty piece.

Die Schönsten augen. (Brightest eyes.) W. Krüger. 50

A sort of fantasia on the very popular German song of the above title. Very pretty.

March Indienne. From "L' Africaine." B. Richards. 60

A wild Arab march, which is one of the marked features of the opera.

Books.

DITSON'S BRASS BAND MUSIC. For full bands.

On cards. Per set, $1.00

Now is the time to revive your band or to get up one, if the town is so far behind the age as not to possess such an organization. These convenient sets contain each about fifty airs, embracing all the popular tunes a band needs for common use. Supply yourselves and begin the fall rehearsals.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 638.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 16, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 13.

Cleopatra.

BY WILLIAM W. STORY.

(From Blackwood's Magazine.)

Here, Charmian, take my bracelets,
They bar with a purple stain
My arms; turn over my pillows—
They are hot where I have lain:
Open the lattice wider,
A gauze on my bosom throw,
And let me inhale the odors,
That over the garden blow.

I dreamed I was with my Antony,
And in his arms I lay;
Ah, me! the vision has vanished—
Its music has died away.
The flame and the perfume have perished—
As this spiced aromatic pastille
That wound the blue smoke of its odor
Is now but an ashy hill.

Scatter upon me rose-leaves,
They cool me after my sleep,
And with sandal odors fan me
Till into my veins they creep;
Reach down the lute, and play me
A melancholy tune,
To rhyme with the dream that has vanished,
And the slumbering afternoon.

There, drowsing in golden sunlight,
Loiters the slow smooth Nile,
Through slender papyrus, that cover
The sleeping crocodile.
The lotus lolls on the water,
And opens its heart of gold,
And over its broad leaf-pavement
Never a ripple is rolled.
The twilight breeze is too lazy
Those feathery palms to wave,
And yon little cloud is as motionless
As a stone above a grave.

Ah, me! this lifeless nature
Oppresses my heart and brain!
Oh! for a storm and thunder—
For lightning and wild fierce rain!
Fling down that lute—I hate it!
Take rather his buckler and sword,
And crash them and clash them together
Till this sleeping world is stirred.

Hark! to my Indian beauty—
My cockatoo, creamy white,
With roses under his feathers—
That flashes across the light.
Look! listen! as backward and forward
To his hoop of gold he clings,
How he trembles, with crest uplifted,
And shrieks as he madly swings!
Oh, cockatoo, shriek for Antony!
Cry, "Come, my love, come home!"
Shriek, "Antony! Antony! Antony!"
Till he hears you even in Rome.

There—leave me, and take from my chamber
That wretched little gazelle,
With its bright black eyes so meaningless,
And its silly tinkling bell!
Take him,—my nerves he vexes—
The thing without blood or brain,—
Or, by the body of Isis,
I'll snap his thin neck in twain!

Leave me to gaze at the landscape
Mistily stretching away,
When the afternoon's opaline tremors
O'er the mountains quivering play;
Till the fiercer splendor of sunset
Pours from the west its fire,
And melted, as in a crucible,
Their earthly forms expire!
And the bald bleak skull of the desert
With glowing mountains is crowned,
That burning like molten jewels
Circle its temples round.

I will lie and dream of the past-time,
Æons of thought away,
And through the jungle of memory
Loosen my fancy to play;
When a smooth and velvety tiger,
Ribbed with yellow and black,
Supple and cushion-footed
I wandered, where never the track
Of a human creature had rustled
The silence of mighty woods,
And, fierce in a tyrannous freedom,
I knew but the law of my moods.
The elephant, trumpeting, started
When he heard my footsteps near.
And the spotted giraffes fled wildly
In a yellow cloud of fear.
I sucked in the noontide splendor,
Quivering along the glade,
Or yawning, panting and dreaming,
Basked in the tamarisk shade,
Till I heard my wild mate roaring,
As the shadows of night came on,
To brood in the trees' thick branches
And the shadow of sleep was gone;
Then I roused, and roared in answer,
And unsheathed from my cushioned feet
My curving claws, and stretched me,
And wandered my mate to greet.
We toyed in the amber moonlight,
Upon the warm flat sand,
And struck at each other our massive arms—
How powerful he was and grand!
His yellow eyes flashed fiercely
As he crouched and gazed at me,
And his quivering tail, like a serpent,
Twitched curving nervously.
Then like a storm he seized me,
With a wild triumphant cry,
And we met, as two clouds in heaven
When the thunders before them fly.
We grappled and struggled together,
For his love like his rage was rude;
And his tee h in the swelling folds of my neck
At times, in our play, drew blood.

Often another suitor—
For I was flexible and fair—
Fought for me in the moonlight,
While I lay couching there,
Till his blood was drained by the desert;
And, ruffled with triumph and power,
He licked me and lay beside me
To breathe him a vast half hour.
Then down to the fountain we loitered,
Where the antelopes came to drink;
Like a bolt we sprang upon them,
Ere they had time to shrink.
We drank their blood and crushed them,

And tore them limb from limb,
And the hungriest lion doubted
Ere he disputed with him.

That was a life to live for!
Not this weak human life,
With its frivolous bloodless passions,
Its poor and petty strife!
Come to my arms, my hero,
The shadows of twilight grow,
And the tiger's ancient fierceness
In my veins begins to flow.
Come not cringing to sue me!
Take me with triumph and power,
As a warrior that storms a fortress!
I will not shrink or cower.
Come, as you came in the desert,
Ere we were women or men,
When the tiger passions were in us,
And love as you loved me then!

The Present State of Music.

(Continued from page 90.)

(Translated for this Journal from Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

The same remark is equally true of a form of Art which has long been exclusively counted, more persistently than justly, with Church music, —the Oratorio. One branch of it appeared in those solemn readings of the Gospel (on Good Friday and other Festivals) in recitative dialogue, intermixed with singing by the choir and congregation. These, which reached their consummate flower in Bach's Passion according to St. Matthew, did belong to the actual divine service. The other branch, which Handel transported from Italy to England, and raised it up with his great power, never from the first belonged to the religious service, but only availed itself, according to the propensity of that time, of incidents in the old and new Testament for artistic and partly for devotional effect. Partly, I say. For in some of these oratorios (Handel's "Messiah" for instance) the subject was exclusively religious; but in others (like "Judas Macchabeus," "Samson," "Saul") the sentiment of freedom, heroism, love—as in the Bible itself—have found powerful expression and wide sympathy, so that it is difficult to decide which chord vibrates the strongest: that of devotion and waiting on the Lord, or that of human consciousness of power and passion. For the constant reference of this self-sufficient feeling to the higher rule of God, according to the ruling sense of that bible-believing time, decides nothing; else we might reckon among devotional works the "Alexander's Feast" with its utterly unexpected turn to Saint Cecilia.

The tendency to the secular stood out decidedly in Haydn. He describes to us in the first place the Creation; the praises of the angels form the shining points, the biblical narrative the connecting thread of the work: yet we feel ourselves all the time upon our earth, Nature's own children in the midst of Nature. In "The Seasons" this direction has become complete; in blissful abandon the poet paints us the idyllic life of the country, the labors of the field, the chase, the vintage, love, the tranquillity and the terrors of Nature; devotion also finds its expression as a natural moment in every human breast, but by no means as having the exclusive or principal prerogative. For distinction's sake, one may call this work and others of a similar direction (for example, among more recent works, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri") Cantatas; it is all the same, the overstepping of the churchlike circle is decided; even the later Oratorios which still adhere to biblical incidents or myths (like Schneider's "Last Judgment" and "Deluge"), or keep near to them (like Spohr's "Babylon," Hiller's "Jerusalem") are foreign to that circle, and aim at artistic rather than ecclesiastical effect. Mendelssohn alone in his Paulus has made Bach's church-like Oratorio his model; and in his Elijah he has treated a piece of biblical history in the manner of that Handelian time, which the contemplation of the literal subject matter could still satisfy. His great imitative talent and his whole artistic importance have here too concealed from the eyes of the multitude, how far behind the original truth every imitation must remain; to an age more strong in character and less sophisticated it will be clear what a falling off there is here from veracity, and how deeply the unveracity of the general standpoint of these now so highly lauded works has penetrated into their smallest details—and has indeed pervaded the whole present life of Art.

As in creative art, so also in executive; the same tendency has wrought the same decided consequences. In the place of the church choirs, or overshadowing them, we have everywhere Singvereine (choral societies). The first one of importance was founded by Fasch in Berlin; now, after half a century, there is not a little village without its Verein, and not a middling-sized town which has not (thanks to German individualism and passion for division) two or three of them; Berlin counts ten or twenty; every singing teacher, every Cantor or organist tries, if possible, to form one. Church music, oratorios, Cantatas of all sorts and of all times, occasionally also opera music, furnish material for these "Academies;" their direction is determined not merely by the spirit of the leader, but also by an inevitable regard to the capacity, the constancy and the strength of will of the members; and this consideration becomes still more controlling when the Societies of different towns unite in those "Musical Festivals," which, beginning in Thuringia, have spread all over Germany.

The strict school, the unity, the discipline of firmly established paid choirs cannot be expected of these free Vereins; still less the steadfastness of end and character imparted to the old church choirs by their very destination. This need not prevent our recognizing a mighty progress in their springing up. They have given Art over to the people, although sometimes only through the possession and the facilitated culture of more favored classes. They have drawn the people into actual coöperation; and that is always worth the most to Man, always the most efficacious and most quickening, which he takes an active part in of his own free will and inclination. What I hear, passes into my life, awakens and enriches it. What I sing, is my life, is the blooming of my soul; in song its energy breaks forth, refreshing, elevating me and others. To this we have the testimony of composers, who even in the creation of instrumental works sing involuntarily; Beethoven has been heard to sing excessively loud even in his deafness. That is what gives endurance for months of practice on the same work to choirs of amateurs, who so often come together unschooled and unskilled;—while on the other hand this constant practice makes them more acquainted with the work, and with the art in general, than any transient presentation by others.

This is the wholesome side of the Singvereins; they have also the advantage, that their members have as a rule more of general culture, than was possible in church choirs and others of that nature. The latter were, and are, more skilled in a technically musical sense; the former have more of cultured humanity and susceptibility. Nor is the other side entirely wanting. Want of technical skill makes one timid, shy of every difficulty; but in Art everything that is new, every instance of progress is doubly difficult, because the new thought brings necessarily a new form with it. Thus people once found Handel's violins too hard; Haydn's Quartets were called "Haydnish" hard [probably a pun on heidnisch, heathenish]; Mozart's Quartets were declared full of "errors of the press," while Don Juan and Figaro were scolded about as being overloaded and difficult. So the Singvereins confine themselves within the circle of the easy and familiar, robbing themselves and their listening friends ("kindness becomes a bore") of what is refreshing, strengthening and conducive to progress. To the composer it becomes in a certain manner a condition of his recognition, that he adapt himself to the level of the weaker ones and write such things as they have been accustomed to sing. This is incompatible with progress, truth and individuality, those prime conditions of all genuine Art. The field of Art becomes a worldly resource, a seat of Philistinism, or at the best a stronghold for some sort of mannerism or one-sided tendency. In this way a wide circle formed itself a decade or two since about Frederic Schneider, and now in the same way about Mendelssohn.

Next to Church Music, in wealth of means and effect, stands the Opera.

The Opera must be an actual drama, a stage piece, since its persons move and act before us bodily. Of this first condition of its nature those who are the most musically cultivated cannot but be mindful. They must be fully conscious of the dramatic nature of all higher musical development; in the characteristic carrying out of one voice in its relation to another in every duet, in every sterling Sonata, in every Quartet, they recognize a really dramatic conversation; the parts to them are ideal personalities, signaling and asserting themselves, now in opposition, now in union with others. In this sense every Quartet of Haydn, every Symphony of Beethoven is a drama; and the operas of Mozart and Beethoven are dramatic beyond all others.

But all this, precious as it is, does not yet fulfil that first condition. The men themselves who tread the opera stage must move before us life-like, characteristic, true, according to their characters, passions and actions; the drama itself, in all its presuppositions, movements and unfoldings, must become truth and reality, just as we have always demanded of the poet. Only the language is another one, it has become music. This was originally the design of the Opera; it was to be the resurrection—so Galilei, Peri and Caccini viewed it—of the old Greek tragedy. This was, throughout, the leading thought of Gluck; by word and deed he recognizes the drama—action and character and strictest fidelity of speech to truth—as the very heart of his problem, for which he boldly and joyfully flings away mere music-making, mere revelling in sensuous melody, with all the toys of embellishment and bravura, and all the commonly received and settled forms for purely musical effect. The thought is one of undeniable necessity. For, where a man steps before us, he draws our attention to himself par excellence, he becomes the chief concern to us, he is superior to all else in intellectual and bodily might and significance, and to him all else must be postponed.

Let us confess it: No one of all the German composers, great and imposing as their artistic endowments otherwise may be, has had the resolution and the force of character to dedicate himself, like Gluck, unconditionally to this requirement of the drama and to follow that sublime forerunner, with the exception of the exiled Richard Wagner. Whatever objections may be made in this or that regard to musical shaping and truth of language, or even to the intellectual standpoint which he would fain give to his dramas; to him belongs the glory of being true to his idea of representing nothing but the drama, of being willing to work through nothing but the drama, as he understands it. No small honor, when you compare it with so much untruthfulness and venality, so weak in thought and character, with which our times are forced to make acquaintance even in the sphere of Art.

The purely dramatic feeling has never been able to maintain the mastery in German Opera; the musical element, purely or for the most part, the expression of moods and feelings, has predominated. But then the nation itself, at the time when it shaped its Opera, from its own impulse and after foreign precedent, lacked two preliminary conditions: namely, a free, pronounced, eventful life; and, with that or in place of it, that constant pricking of intrigue, that petty warfare, which keeps our Western neighbors lively and active even in times of political ruin. Indeed the more deeply the tone-world opened itself to the German, the more his soul was filled with it, the more strongly was he drawn away from all outwardly active life and absorbed in inward dreaming and brooding. Mozart, the happiest creator in this field, to which he owed especially the admiration and the love that wreathed his early grave, Mozart, in all his operas, has discovered the most manifold traits, not only of the inmost, deepest feeling of the moment, but of what is most strikingly characteristic. Who needs to be told of the grandeur and tragic power of many a chorus and more than one aria in Idomeneo, of the characteristic portrait of Osmin, of the glowing love of Belmonte, of the sharp delineation of Leporello between Don Juan and Masetto—rich treasury of most speaking and most subtle traits? Yet even with him the idea of being through and through dramatic and nothing but dramatic,—of shaping a drama which, from its ground-thought to the expression of the single word should be a true whole, a drama, and admit into itself nothing not in accordance with and necessary to its end and nature—this idea, even with him, never ripened into any fixed resolve. To be sure, he has by no means failed in real dramaturgic insight; his letters about the scenic presentation of Idomeneo, and many single expressions elsewhere give shining proof of it. But so too his correspondence (read Nissen's Biography) furnishes full proof that all he wanted, after all, was always a "libretto" which should be grateful for the musician—he even allowed himself to be pleased with Don Juan as a "Drama giocoso"—and that moreover he was very willing to serve the capacities of certain singers. His operas—not merely the bravura arias in Idomeneo, Belmonte, the Zauberflöte, and the whole of them—everywhere prove, that in him the sweet power of music, the lyrical element of his own life, the bliss of the purely musical creative impulse, which filled and transported him so powerfully and inexhaustibly, never consented to be so far restrained as to subordinate themselves permanently to the strict requirements of the drama. Drama and music should blend in equal right and reciprocity—such was the paramount law of all his highest striving. But that is impossible. The wavy outline of mood and the introspective life of feeling are directly opposed to the sharpness of character and the downrightness of action; active energy and character and living scenic progress are dissolved in the mollifying wave-like play of tones.

Perhaps there is no more striking proof of the want of dramatic calling in the German people of that time, than their conception of the Figaro. The trilogy of Beaumarchais (re-appearing as the lively, merry Barber of Rossini) is the most bitter, downright, deadly war against the monstrous and demoralizing privileges of the nobility and their contagious corruption, that France had ever seen before the actual outbreak of the Revolution; it was a mighty impulse in the same direction, and well might Maria Antoinette exclaim prophetically: Cet homme nous perd. And this same drama, in the hands of the German and his poet, becomes a harmless musical farce, woven of tenderness, lustfulness and roguishness, in which there is no inkling of any serious, not to say of any political, thoughts; the most morally fastidious mothers with their daughters listen to it and sing it over afterwards. The sense of the words is veiled; the stinging diction, the rapid blows, the sharp recoil of the action, all by which the Frenchman presses on to victory, is softened and subdued, dissolved in gentle melody; the hatred, which laughs and foams from Beaumarchais, becomes sweetly pearly Champagne foam, as airy and evanescent as ever a gallant Louis XV. pledged to a Dubarry, or as was ever sipped by diplomatic lips at neutral race-courses.

(To be Continued).

Beethoven's Newly Discovered Letters.

Herr von Köchel, the respected editor of the Thematic Mozart Catalogue, has just published, at Beck's University Library, Vienna, "Eighty-three Letters of Beethoven," addressed by the composer, between 1812 and 1823, to his patron and pupil, the Archduke Rodolph, Cardinal Archbishop of Olmütz. These letters were found among the papers left by the Archduke Ludwig Joseph, who died on the 21st December, 1864. They became the property of his heir, the Archduke Leopold, who, at the request of Herr von Sailer, formerly burgomaster, and of Dr. Sonnenleithner, gave his permission for their publication. So much for the origin of the present pamphlet, which is got up with an amount of care and elegance reflecting credit upon the publishers.

With regard to the intrinsic value of the discovery, it consists principally, perhaps, in the fact that the letters emanate from Beethoven. Important views upon art, and opinions displaying Beethoven's intellect, or supplying materials enabling us to form an idea of his character, the reader will not find in these documents, which treat mostly of material subjects or the state of the writer's bodily health. Most of the letters are excuses for having, through illness, failed to put in an appearance (for the purpose, probably, of giving lessons, to which, as we all know, Beethoven was not at all partial). We learn that Beethoven suffered at one time from fever, at another from the jaundice, and at another from pains in the eyes; it is a remarkable fact, however, that, throughout the whole correspondence, there is not a syllable about his principal complaint, deafness. But, however insignificant most of the letters are as far as regards their purport, taken as a whole they throw an important light upon the really large-hearted kindness shown by the Archduke Rodolph to Beethoven. Speaking of the relations of the two towards each other, the editor says:—

"This connection was based upon mutual necessity and concessions, and stood therefore upon a permanent foundation; Beethoven gave no less than he received, while the Archduke accepted and granted. Beethoven knew that the works of his mind were appreciated and enjoyed by the impressionable prince who himself wrote; it must, therefore, have afforded him the purest pleasure to present each newly-created work to the Archduke, certain that it would be received in the most friendly and appreciative manner; he knew too, that his musical influence excited the Archduke to write original compositions, of no ordinary kind, and he often, very emphatically, expresses his delight and satisfaction at this. But Beethoven had many wants, and these the Archduke endeavored to satisfy with as much perseverance as gentleness. Though it is to be regretted, as far as regards our obtaining a clear insight into the relations between the two, that only a single letter has been published out of all the Archduke's replies, still that one letter enables us to form an idea—and we can even read it still better between the lines of Beethoven's own correspondence—what allowances the Archduke made for Beethoven's angular peculiarities, which rendered it, even for his most intimate friends, such a difficult task to maintain a good understanding with him. If we reflect that, supposing the statement in Thayer's Chronological Catalogue of Beethoven's Works to be correct, Beethoven's connection with the Archduke existed as far back as 1805, and it is proved to have continued till his death, it is apparent how indispensable each had become to the other, and then, if we throw into the scale Beethoven's feeling of ascription, which increased with his deafness and failing health, and his isolation of himself, we shall have no difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to which side it was, on which, at a subsequent period, the concessions were most numerous."

We are involuntarily reminded of the analogous connection between Göthe and his princely friend. The fact that the Archduke carefully preserved, even after the composer's decease, every letter, even such as were most trivial and could be considered valuable only because they emanated from Beethoven, is of itself a striking proof how greatly he prized everything belonging to the illustrious musician.

Among the business matters to which Beethoven frequently alludes in these letters, the principal are the affair about the pension, and the negotiations concerning the guardianship of his nephew. We will add a few words for the better comprehension of these two subjects.

In the year 1809, Beethoven received an offer from Westphalia. As soon as the fact was generally known, measures were taken, in the dread that Vienna would lose so great a master, to dissuade him from accepting the offer, and, for this purpose, three lovers of art, belonging to the first rank, offered, without asking for anything in return, to pay a yearly pension of 4,000 florins, in bank notes, the Archduke Rodolph rendering himself, by a written declaration, liable, from 1809, for 15,000 florins every year; Prince Ferdinand Franz Joseph Kinsky for 1,800 florins, and Prince Franz Joseph Lobkowitz, for 700 florins. In consequence of the eventual proclamation or "Patent" of 1811, bank-notes fell to a fifth of their nominal value and all agreements made in previous years (as, in this instance, in 1809) were calculated according to a certain scale. Meanwhile, immediately after the publication of the Patent, the Archduke Rodolph and Prince Lobkowitz declared themselves perfectly ready to pay in redemption-notes the sum they had promised in bank-notes; Prince Kinsky, too, promised to contribute his share on the same conditions, but he suddenly died, on the 3rd November, 1812, of a fall from his horse before he had given his cashier the orders requisite for carrying out his promise. From this arose the wearisome negotiations with the trustees of the deceased prince, in Vienna and Prague, which, after the lapse of many years, were finally settled by Beethoven's receiving, as an annuity from the family, the sum of 480 florins in silver, while the Archduke continued to pay to the day of Beethoven's death 600 florins in silver as the equivalent of the 1500 florins redemption notes he had promised.

The above 1080 florins in silver Beethoven received to his dying day. The pension promised by Prince Lobkowitz, and amounting to about 280 florins cash, was, it is true, stopped on the occasion of a great crisis in the Prince's finances, somewhere about the year 1815, but it was resumed at the beginning of 1816, and, after the Prince's death, 26th December, 1816, paid by his trustees as long as Beethoven lived. Thus Beethoven received an annuity for life of 1360 florins in silver.

The second matter which occasioned Beethoven great worry was the guardianship of his nephew Carl, son of his brother of the same name, which brother died on the 15th November, 1815. In the first place Beethoven had an action at law, extending over several years, about his assumption of the guardianship, with his brother's widow, of whom he spoke in very harsh terms, and whose influence upon the young man he declared to be absolutely ruinous. Then, it was the very individual committed to his care who caused him endless anxiety and profound sorrow. The youth, gifted and thoughtless, returned with contemptuous ingratitude the self-sacrificing love of his uncle and guardian, and yet the latter, after all, made him his heir.

Matters of less importance, in which advantage was taken of the Archduke's mediation, are not unfrequently to be met with in the course of the letters.

Thus Beethoven begs the Archduke to aid him in procuring the large hall in the University buildings for his two concerts; he further hopes the Archduke will prevail on the Court to appear at the performance of Fidelio given for the composer's benefit; then again he asks him to interfere in the Kinsky matter in Prague; to persuade the Grandduke of Tuscany and the King of Saxony to subscribe to his Grand Mass; and to give a testimonial as to the merit of the same. Finally, he writes about a lodging for Herr Kraft, the violoncellist; about the removal of instruments by a pianoforte-maker, not named; about a place as Court Organist, for Herr Drechsler, the Capellmeister, etc.

As the pension assured to Beethoven, in 1809, by the three Princes, was granted without the stipulation of any return being made, we may, knowing as we do the delicacy of the Archduke, most reasonably conclude that he would not have had lessons given, or musical entertainments got up in his apartments without such lessons or entertainments being separately paid for. In one letter we find special thanks for a present after a concert.—We may assume a similar arrangement in the case of the many dedications to Beethoven's works. Despite the fact (or shall we rather say precisely on account of it?) that, in these dedications, Beethoven protests that he "has no ulterior object in view," the generous Archduke most assuredly never failed to make a fitting return for such a mark of attention. The act of dedication was repeated in the case of nine important works, though in the letters we find mention only of the dedication of the Trio, Op. 97; the Sonata, Op. 96; the Sonata, Op. 106; the Sonata, Op. 111; and the Mass in D, Op. 123.—With reference to the dedication of the Trio, Beethoven writes: "I herewith send the dedication of the Trio to your Imperial Highness; it appears upon this, but all works on which it is not expressed, and which have any value in my eyes, are mentally intended for your Imperial Highness."

Allusion is made, for the most varied reasons, to Beethoven's compositions, especially to those just written; at one time, he wants to have them copied for the Archduke; to borrow them; at another, they are mentioned as being proceeded with, or likely to be so; he refers most frequently, however, to the grand Mass in D, which was completed two years post festum. There are, also, two compositions mentioned but not cited either in Breitkopf and Härtel's or in Thayer's catalogue; a piece that Beethoven was to compose at the request of the Archduke for a "Pferdproduction" (Carousal, Tilt), and a canon: "Grossen Dank, —."

We find generally from the letters that Beethoven had every new work copied out for the Archduke, if it was not immediately engraved. The musical entertainments which he had to arrange at the Archduke's consisted mostly of his own works. In one letter we read that he was to play at the Archduke's with the violinist Rode; in others, we find allusions to small bands, under Wrangitzky's direction, intended to perform Beethoven's Symphonies.

It is not clear from the correspondence that Beethoven gave the Archduke instruction on the piano, on which his Highness appears to have been at that period very advanced. According to witnesses still living, the Archduke frequently played in aristocratic circles, and probably at the musical entertainments given by Prince Lobkowitz. The following passage seems to refer to this: "Your Imperial Highness would perhaps not be doing wrong if this time you made a pause as regards the Lobkowitz concerts; even the most brilliant talent may lose by use."

Though we may assume that Beethoven was in earnest when he so frequently protested that nothing could be more agreeable to him "than by his art to afford the Archduke pleasure," in as far as concerned the production of his works by the Archduke, the matter assumed probably another aspect directly there was any question of instruction in the art of composition. If the large number of excuses for not attending to give lessons—40 or more letters out of 80 contain such excuses—did not somewhat excite our suspicion as to their value, we should be led to adopt this opinion by Beethoven himself, who addresses medical certificates which the Archduke most certainly never expected; repeatedly admits that appearances are against him, and that his health is not in so bad a way as he had asserted. One feeling very strong in him was his decided aversion to be compelled to perform certain fixed duties; of this description was more especially the task of giving lessons and still more lessons in strict style, which, as we all know, was not his strong point, and for which he was obliged to make especial preparation.—He manifested, on the other hand, enthusiastic delight, when the Archduke dedicated to him some Variations on a theme of his, and acknowledged himself "his" (Beethoven's) "pupil" on the printed title-page. Some of his letters are filled to overflowing with this. He calls the Variations "a masterpiece"; the Archduke "a competitor for the laurels of fame"; "his noble pupil, a favorite of the Muses," and continues thus: "My thanks for this surprise and favor," (the dedication) "with which I have been honored, I dare not express either orally or in writing, since I stand too low, even if I wished, or desired ever so ardently, to return like with like." The Archduke composed other Variations for Piano, which, we are informed, were "charming" and would please lovers of music, but they were not published.

Worthy of attention, in reference to instruction, are the letters in which Beethoven recommends the study of Handel and J. S. Bach, and which contain certain other things unfortunately not intelligible; furthermore those wherein he advises the Archduke, when at the piano, "to note down, shortly and instantly, the notions that strike him. Not only is the imagination strengthened hereby, but a person learns the art of immediately retaining the most out-of-the-way ideas. It is likewise necessary to write without the piano—when you see yourself thus in the middle of art, it affords great pleasure. Gradually comes the power to convey only just what we wish and feel, a power so essential to every man of noble mind."

We could not entertain the slightest doubt of the genuineness of Beethoven's attachment to the Archduke even though we did not possess the letters which express this feeling with the greatest warmth, and just as little can we suspect the truth of the regret he so frequently expressed at the continuously recurring attacks of the nervous disease from which the Archduke was relieved only by death. It would have been difficult for any one to remain insensible to the indescribable gentleness and forbearance, despite all Beethoven's peculiarities, displayed by the Archduke; yet, on one occasion, and on one occasion only, the over-excitability of the master breaks out, "when, while selecting the music in Vienna, he met with some opposition from the Oberhofmeister," and thus proceeds against the Archduke, who had nothing to do with the affair: "So much I must say, namely, that by treatment of this kind many a good, talented, and noble-minded man would be scared away from your Imperial Highness, were he not fortunate enough to be intimately acquainted with your admirable qualities of mind and heart." We see how difficult it must sometimes have been even for the Archduke himself to remain on good terms with Beethoven. We find many incidental references to men and things scattered here and there through the letters. Thus the meeting at Töplitz, in 1812, with Göthe, is cursorily mentioned, and in the very same letter we read of a concert with which we were previously not acquainted, and which Beethoven gave in company with the violinist Polledro, at Carlsbad, for the benefit of the town of Baden, that had just been burnt down. His opinion of Rodé the violinist is piquant. Mention, also, is made of Madame Milder, of J. M. Vogel and Forri, who were then singing in Fidelio, and likewise of Herr Wranitzky, the Capellmeister.—Lond. Mus. World.

Meyerbeer.*

(From the London Athenaeum.)

Few more confident gentlemen are to be found in the squadron of musical critics than M. Blaze de Bury. There are few whose dissertations will so ill bear discussion. He belongs to a class of writers of late pretty numerous in France, who trade on a few great works, and names, and catch-words, such as "Faust," Hoffmann's "Kreisler," the trio of the masked guests in "Don Juan," the Willow Song in "Otello"; and who, in the strength of their quasi-enthusiasm, define and assert, with a hardihood, distinct from experience, which exercises no small authority over those who are frightened by long words—and shadows. He professes to have been beloved, trusted, and consulted by Meyerbeer; yet he is often incorrect. He gives us very few new facts. On the other hand, certain of his opinions are to be protested against; as when, for instance, speaking of Madame Lind, he praises Mlle. Lucien as the better singer; and again, while characterizing the Swedish lady's performances in opera, says never a word of her Amina, Lucia, Julia, or Alice, yet can praise her Norma. He is bitter on M. Anber, to exalt his idol: blaming the author of "La Muette," on the score of Elvira's bravura, in the first act, the while pointing out, in contrast, the "Ah, mon fils" of Fides in "Le Prophète" as the work of a man and a poet, superior to such ad captandum devices of trills and roulades. It is unfortunate that "La Prophète," in its last act, when the catastrophe is hurrying on, should contain one of the most florid specimens of parade music existing in Opera—we mean the bravura of the agonized and religious Fides; which is a prayer to Heaven for the conversion of her impostor son. Compared with this, M. Anber's aria, done in as an offence, is mere child's-play. Meyerbeer had need, as we heard him own, of a piece of brilliant vocal effect at that stage of Scribe's dark story; and was the more willing to yield to the seduction, from having in his hands such a mistress of exorcutive art as Madame Viardot. Lastly, to close accounts with M. Blaze de Bury's want of knowledge, let us point out odd misprints—in the list of early operas "Abimelech" for "Alcimelck,"—to name but one example.

A hazy preamble, containing allusions to Sebastian Bach, which makes nothing clear, save the writer's want of comprehension, is given instead of welcome detail concerning the Berlin banker's son in his early home days. Here, however, are a few lines worth keeping, concerning his mother; though they are introduced by a grand paragraph, a little in the "Groves of Blarney" style, grouping together Madame Mere, Goethe's mother, Schiller, and the muse Melpomene. Meyerbeer's mother, says M. Blaze de Bury, —was a strong woman—an antique Jewess of superb stature! No muse, but a genuine woman of the Bible, which, from his cradle, looked at him through the eyes of his mother! * * * They say that during the last rehearsal of "Robert," Meyerbeer received from her a letter with this address: "To be opened after the first representation of Robert." So soon as he got home, on the evening of that triumph, the son broke the envelope, and read the biblical benediction, in the simple majesty of its text, "The Lord bless and keep thee." So. This letter Meyerbeer thereafter always carried about with him, as a talisman.

That Meyerbeer was timid and superstitious through his terrors as well as his affections, was shown by his strangely minute mortuary dispositions. Let that pass. When we recollect what manner of scenes there are in this "Robert," thus solemnly inaugurated by a mother's talisman—that persons, in no respect strait-laced, have recoiled from the orgies of the reassociated nuns, as too puritan for reverence and taste to endure,—when we call to mind the tales of craft and courtiership—of purchased success (faintly admitted by even M. Blaze de Bury) with which the highways of Paris ran over, in regard to Meyerbeer's arrival at his throne—this anecdote adds another to the strange contrasts of a life closed by those pompous, flaring railway obsequies, which were so graphically described by a French correspondent at the moment of their occurrence. Verily, there was enough in Meyerbeer's career to make such merciless mockers as Heine sarcastic. But to the mother of the man of genius and success, the sincere story adds a new claim on our respect. As we said a few weeks ago when dealing with Weber's life and adventures, every late revelation of the Beer family is calculated to set them right with a world by whom they have been too much undervalued. Of Meyerbeer's father, little or nothing has been told.

As little new do we find contributed by M. Blaze de Bury, concerning Meyerbeer's days of study, by the side of the author of "Der Freischütz," under the empirical Vogler. But we wonder at the inaptitude of the biographer, who, to deck out a paragraph couples the courtly Abbe with the honest, homely Zelter! Concerning the operas written by Meyerbeer for the Italian theatres, the following tale may be given:—

* Meyerbeer and his Times.—(Meyerbeer at son tempo, par Henri Blaze de Bury). Paris, Levy; London, Jeffs.

One evening, hard upon the first representation of "Le Pardon de Ploermel," Prince Poniatowski, meeting Meyerbeer in society, sat down to the piano, and, while talking to him aside, began giving out ad libitum a series of themes, among which, if they were common ones, there were also many "piquant and original."—"What are you humming there?" said Meyerbeer; "It seems to me that I know those old soldiers."—"I should think you did," replied the Prince, continuing to sing under his breath, "and that you have met them on the field of honor."—"In Italy, it must have been then; for that is Italian music."—"Yes, marcia! Italian music, from the 'Emma di Robergo' of Giacomo Meyerbeer."—"Ah!" said Meyerbeer, a little at a nonplus, "you know then the clash of my youth quarum hodie pudet ac penitet?"—"You are wrong, master, for the air is charming!" Meyerbeer listened for a moment, smiling and pensive; then, with his hand softly on the Prince's arm—"Well, then, brother in art," sighed he, "since you play me the bad trick of knowing by heart everything about my Italian operas, I hope you will not be too loudly scandalized if you meet, in passing, with the fragments that I have served up again in 'Le Pardon.'"

The above dialogue has clearly been favored with "the cocked-hat and walking-cane" with which Scott used, avowedly, to dress out his stories; but it throws a gleam of light on the nature, attributes, and habits of the composer. So little affluent was Meyerbeer in original ideas, so ill had he been prepared by the teachings of Vogler to nourish the fancies which presented themselves, so as to give them life and importance, that his later works, especially, might and, we should be disposed to believe, would prove full of phrases thrown off by him in the days when he attempted cavatinas and cabalettas in emulation of careless, Italian-born opera-mongers. The theme of the chorus of Inquisitors in the first act of his "L'Africaine," which some French critics consider a marvel of invention, because it is given by many voices, not one—is such as might be found by the score in the level operas of Mercadante, to exhibit the singer, were it taken in quicker tempo.

To get over the ground between the commencement of Meyerbeer's career and the production of "Il Crociato," which may be said to mark its turning point, M. Blaze de Bury fills his pages with more fine writing than with discrimination, with a rhapsody about Malibran and a portrait of Nourrit and with sketches of the plight of French grand opera, the regeneration of which he maintains is due to Meyerbeer; "Le Siège de Corinthe," "Moïse," "La Muette," apparently go for nothing with him—nor even the superb trio and Gathering of the Cantons, in "Guillaume Tell." Yet had not these two last-named scenes been written, there would have been no "Blessing of the Swords," in "Les Huguenots."

M. de Bury claims for Meyerbeer, as it were, the discovery of Nourrit, Levasseur, and other singers who figured in "Robert," by figuring that they had been all (Madame Cinti-Damoreau not forgotten) assembled by Signor Rossini. There is no doubt, however, that the production of "Robert" was a marking event,—no doubt that that opera has run from one end of the world of Music to the other; leaving its least trace of success in England. Here, our public, which accepted "Les Huguenots" at a first hearing, after years of indifference has never taken kindly to its predecessor. But, with all its intrinsically brilliant qualities, something of haphazard had a share in its popularity. Dr. Véron, the then manager of the Opera, has told us, in his Memoirs, by what a stroke of stage invention the Nun scene, from being a ridiculous display, was converted into the terrible, and shocking, and voluptuous pantomime which, aided by Mademoiselle Taglion's dancing, was so delightful to the Parisians. M. de Bury says, that this was invented by the master, and then cites an anecdote from M. Charles de Boigne's Memoirs, of a directly contrary import:—

At a general rehearsal of "Robert," on seeing the admirable scene of the third act, in the cloister of Sainte Rosalie, the decoration, the idea, and the execution of which, by the way, are due to M. Duponchel, . . . poor Meyerbeer quivered with pain. "My dear Director," said he, to M. Véron, "I see clearly that you do not count on my opera, but run after the success of stage effect."—"Wait till the fourth act," answered the Director. The fourth act arrived—the curtain rose. Meyerbeer perceived Isabelle in a small chamber, which one would have said was borrowed from the Theatre Gymnase. He had dreamt of vast and splendid apartments for the Princess of Sicily—something dampling. "Decidedly," he cried, bitterly, "you do not believe in my score. You have not dared to go to the expense of a scene."

The whole man, with all his ingenuity, inventiveness, and talent, afraid of every wind that blew—and, with all his courtiership and courtesy, suspicious of every one around him—is displayed in this little anecdote. His want of independence in judgment amounted almost to a disease. Solicitous as he was in the selection of the artists whom he meant to strain to the utmost by the unheard of length and complication of his works, and the difficulty of his music, he would still allow himself to be seduced by some peculiarity into a total forgetfulness of the gross defects and dangers which accompanied it. Hence many of his balancings and delays. He could be turned this way and that by a remark from some one scarce worth listening to,—by any rumor of popularity gained (little matter how)—with an indecision which increased as life advanced, and which told on all his operas subsequent to "Les Huguenots." We join issue with his panegyrist, who thinks "Le Prophète" the highest expression of his genius, unless that be "L'Africaine."

Then Meyerbeer wasted time, hope and purpose in such diplomatic courses of proceeding, which were consequent on the disposition of mind adverted to. He winced under criticism as though he had been a woman. No person was for him obscure that wielded a pen. A rich man thus organized was a valuable possession to the gentlemen of "the fourth estate." To compass their favor was a large business of his life. He would write elaborate propitiatory letters to those whose judgment was less favorable than he wished. He would discuss projects of works to be done, and even give commissions for the same, which there was no earthly possibility of being carried out, but which gratified the self-love of the inferior man; for who would not have felt it an honor to be invited as fellow-worker with Meyerbeer?

So well-known are these peculiarities, that to dwell on them as having been a hindrance, not a help, to the master's freedom of action, is no breach of confidence. Nay, some glimpse of a story of the kind will be seen in the book we are reading. Meyerbeer was always on the stretch to find, and to subjugate. There was a talk, as Béranger's Memoirs told us, of his working at a musical drama to be written for him by the luckless composer of "La Marseillaise," Rouget de L'Isle; but the treaty came to nothing. M. Blaze de Bury began his career as a very young critic, by an article on "Les Huguenots," in the Revue des Deux Mondes, in which he says he took pride in showing that he did not write under influence, and disputed the composer's possession of melody (as many another independent judge has done). We recollect his essay well; by the side of Madame Duvivier's remarkable dissertation in her "Lettres d'un Voyageur," and in conjunction with the effect produced on us by the opera—one of the strongest musical impressions in our recollection, recorded by us as such at the time,—and can re-assure its writer by asserting that the criticism contained nothing to repent of, and little to unsay. He had advanced in pretension, not in acumen, as years have gone on; yet he cries peccavi—having, he says, sown his wild oats, and fallen into that tone of enthusiastic adulation, which was more agreeable to the master. The latter he says, felt the former qualified praise acutely; and it was years ere the two came together over a piece entitled "Goethe's Youth," for which, after some hesitation, Meyerbeer consented to compose the music. The drama was completed some years ago, and contains, we are told, an "Erl King"—a "Chorus of Fates," from "Iphigenia"—the scene of Margaret in the church—the immense seraphic Hosanna, from the second "Faust." The drama which, by the author's own showing, must be a hazardous and mystical piece of business, has been talked of as coming out at the Odeon Theatre ever since it was finished, having been postponed on one ground or another; the last being to give place to "L'Africaine." Much has been said on the subject by the Boulevard gossip of Paris; "but," sums up M. Blaze de Bury, "the score of Meyerbeer exists—complete, finished, authentic. Others than ourselves have had it in their hands. There is no question, therefore, of its being a thing which he projected. The project is realized; the idea has become a work; and the work will have its destiny."

Ere leaving this matter, we may recall that Goethe is said by Eckermann to have spoken of Meyerbeer as the only composer to whom he could wish "Faust" should be entrusted—passing over Weber and Schubert. This may have disposed the composer to entertain M. Blaze de Bury's invention. Among his well-known "Forty Melodies," one of the least significant is "The Poet's Gretchen," to words by that gentleman. So far as we can make out the matter, the treatment of the "Erl King," in the drama alluded to, is a quotation, under arrangement of Schubert's immortal Lied. For ourselves we cannot but think that Meyerbeer came as near the idea of conflict between Good and Evil as he could have done, in his "Robert." It may not be impossible that he was held back from giving to the public his scene of Margaret in the church, by the dramatic powers and felicity of M. Gounod's setting of the same, to which M. Blaze de Bury does not make the slightest allusion, when rambling among the suggestions to musicians furnished by Goethe's drama—speculating what Mozart might have made of such a theme, and what Signor Rossini; who, we are told, once absolutely played with the idea of setting the story. M. Blaze de Bury, too, significantly ignores the compositions to which the German poet gave occasion, by Schumann, and M. Berlioz, and Dr. Liszt. The world will look with no common curiosity for the sequel of the anecdote, when his Goethe drama shall appear.

Let us paraphrase another passage, not without calling attention to the delicious self-importance of the writer. M. Blaze de Bury was associated with Meyerbeer in a plan much talked of at the time, namely, his completion of an opera sketched by Weber, "The Three Pintos;" but the scheme came to nothing, owing to the impossibility of finding a poem. We have been told by himself that Weber's music was so vaguely indicated as to offer no common difficulties. Further, save in their preference for fragmentary over constructive writing, which they owed, possibly, to the false influence of Vogler, no men could be much more unlike one to the other in aim, genius, and expressive style, than Vogler's two most famous pupils:—

I remember, (continues our author, after having made the most of the confidences and consultations held on the subject), a series of troubles and pangs which, without meaning, I caused him in the early days when he began to occupy himself with "L'Africaine." The relations in which we lived had led me to note in my course of reading everything that I thought might interest him. In those days, as now, I have loved to wander from the high road across in wild by-places of the field of intellect; and every time when it befell me to find in my path a flower more or less calculated to fix his attention, I took it to him for his herbal, with "Look—this one, do you know it?" One day they brought me a singular drama from London. The scene passed in Java, and the famous poison-tree figured at the close. "Read that, I have an idea that something musical could be made of it." "Bah!" cried he, "it cannot be possible. Does such a situation exist?" "Yes, master, and you did not know it. Hang yourself, Crillon!" "I did not know it? Who has told you that? Perhaps, on the contrary, I know too much about it." Then correcting himself suddenly, "Don't go and suppose that that is the subject of L'Africaine."—"I have supposed nothing; but if I had, the words dropped from you would prove that I had guessed right."—"And what do you pretend the piece is called?"—"The Law of Java."—"Have you spoken of it to any one?"—"Certainly not."—"Then don't breathe a syllable, and leave it with me. The situation, in fact, appears to me dramatic, and we must see, later, if we cannot turn it to account." "One would believe that you imagine the situations to be the same."—"Not the least in the world, since in the English piece it is an upas, whereas in 'L'Africaine' the question is,—"The question is of what, pray?"—"Of a man-baited tree." "But how did you come to know? Excepting Sorbie, Duponchel and myself, nobody has an idea of the piece."—"It is from yourself, for I swear to you that when I came in I knew nothing, and but for your emotion and your hesitation." "I repeat that you deceive yourself," said he with a smile of intelligence; "but in any case do not tell any one of such a supposition, and keep your English piece to yourself."—"Keep it to myself! Pleasant of you to say so! Do you forget that you have looked it up in your drawer?"—"Looked it up, have I?"—"Yes, in a fit of absence, while we were talking."—"Well, then it shall remain in my drawer."

Subtle M. Blaze de Bury! He does not seem to recollect, if he ever knew, that Colman's "Law of Java," was already an opera set by Bishop. One of Miss M. Tree's great effects was in the braava, "Tyrant, I come!" and the drinking part-song, "Mynheer Van Duncck," flourishes even unto this day.

Among the other projects entertained, and some even commenced by Meyerbeer, M. Blaze de Bury mentions a "Hero and Leander," an "Apprentice Sorcerer," "The Life and Death of Charles the Fifth," and the stranger idea still of basing an opera on "Le Tartuffe." Progress, too, he tells us, was made by Meyerbeer in a "Judith," destined for that eccentric lady, Mlle. Cruvelli; and we are able to state that he toyed with the fancy of converting that opera into the Biblical Cantata, which he long hoped and feared, and at last half decided, to write for Birmingham. It was curious that, as the end of his life drew near, and his health was solicitously watched by himself, and he became more and more infirm, his plans seemed to increase and multiply. When we last spoke with him, he mentioned works, the execution of which, at his habitual rate of proceeding, would have required the life of half a century.

M. Blaze de Bury writes in pleasant phrase of Meyerbeer's relations with his veteran brother-composers, Signor Rossini and M. Auber;—doing only justice to his urbanity of manner, the cautious and choice neatness of his conversation, and further, to his powers as a correspondent. He was finished and courtly as a letter-writer: but he was a man to whose intimacy few could penetrate. However skillfully hidden was his self-occupation, the same existed in quantity so large and engrossing as to prevent him from giving himself out genially and spontaneously to any one. If he ever talked nonsense in his life (and what man of humor and genius is there who has not done so?) it must have been in his days of comradeship with Weber, and the habit must have been laid aside ere he came to France to mix with its courtiers and critics. One devoted friend and follower, however, he won in Paris. This was M.

Gouin, who became his alter ego, his confidant, his agent, his purveyor of news, a man who believed that there was—there had been—only one composer in the world, and who consecrated every hour of his leisure to anticipating the master's wishes, to satisfying his exigencies, and to sounding abroad his praises.

Such are some of the principal traits of M. Blaze de Bury's volume. It closes with an elaborate analysis of "L'Africaine," rhapsodical and ringing hollow, to which further reference need not be made, at a moment when our public is sitting in judgment on the work.

Music Abroad.

MUNICH.—According to report, the Committee charged with drawing up a plan for the reorganization of the Royal Conservatory has completed its labors. They purpose that the entire institution shall be divided into 3 schools, namely: 1. School of Singing (obligatory: choral singing; special branches: solo singing, dramatic style and acting); 2. School of Instrumental Playing (obligatory: elementary instruction upon the piano; special branches, pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, for professional musicians and teachers; organ, with study of its structure, for the church as well as for the concert-room (should there be sufficient pupils and funds, to these will eventually be added the other more important orchestral instruments); 3. School of Theory: a. Harmony (obligatory) with the special branches of the higher departments of the theory of music, such as counterpoint, doctrine of forms, and instrumentation; b. history of music (obligatory): general history of music; special branches: history of vocal music, history of instrumental music.—It is said that the King has addressed Herr von Bülow a very flattering letter, in which he thanks him for the genial manner in which he conducted the Tristan and Isolda performances. With the letter, his Majesty is reported to have forwarded a magnificent brilliant pin. He, also, sent the late Herr Schnorr von Carolsfeld and his wife valuable brilliant rings. On them is the simple letter "L," surmounted by a Royal crown.

The Gazette Musicale informs its readers of the discovery, by Professor Nohl of Munich, of an autograph manuscript of a pianoforte composition by Beethoven, hitherto entirely unknown. It is in the key of A minor, and is inscribed: "Pour Elisa. April 57." M. Nohl has entered into communication with the house of Breitkopf and Haertel at Leipzig, with a view of having the new found piece included in the edition of the complete works of Beethoven now being published by that eminent firm.

VIENNA.—The Abbé Liszt is expected here very soon. After a short stay, he will proceed to Pesch, where his oratorio St. Elizabeth is to be produced at the approaching musical festival, and under his personal direction. He then returns to Rome to accept the post he has been offered of Kapellmeister at St. Peter's. According to good authority, he does not intend to take higher orders than those of deacon. His aim is not to celebrate mass, but simply to compose music for it.

To the above we may add the following extract from a letter from Paris:

There is always something to be said about the Abbé Viennet-Liszt. It is now given out the Celebrated ecclesiastical pianist will receive the title of "Monsieur" at the next Consistory at Rome, to be held in September. This is the first step to the triple Crown; and who knows but that in the end the keys of the piano will have to be exchanged for the keys of St. Peter. Viva! Papa Liszt! May I live to see your Holiness's great toe kissed by all the potentates of the keyboard in Europe, Asia, Africa and America.

TRIESTE.—The Lower-Rhine Musik-Zeitung has a letter about musical affairs in this Austro-Italian city, from which we take the following:

Down to about the middle of the present century, the dance-tunes of our Kings of the Waltz, at Vienna, were about the only things in the way of German instrumental music to be publicly heard in our seaport town. In the year 1852, however, a number of lovers of music and dilettanti, mostly Germans, met and founded an Association for the cultivation of classical music, designating it by the simple title of "Società Musicale." Every month the members were to meet four times for instrumental practice. In the course of two years, however, the number of the members, which had previously risen from twenty to two hundred, fell to eighty, but rose again to one hundred and fifty-seven. In the year 1857, an advertisement was published in the papers for a Capellmeister, such an officer having been considered necessary. The musician whose services were in this manner secured for the Association was Herr Julius Heller, a highly-educated and naturally gifted young musician from the Vienna Conservatory. Working, at first, exclusively within the Association itself, he collected several energetic musicians, and gave performances of German quartet-music at public concerts. As yet, however, musically-educated persons, who could appreciate what was done, were too much scattered; Heller was in earnest, but he still wanted a secure point as a centre from which his future efforts might radiate. This was at last furnished him by the Schiller-Association, founded on the occasion of the centenary festival in honor of Schiller's birth, in the year 1859. The Società Musicale was merged into the latter Association, to which it ceded its furniture, its music, and its Capellmeister, Herr Julius Heller.

A Symphony by Beethoven, and a Symphony by Mozart, were now heard, for the first time, in Trieste, and heard, too, at a performance which satisfied competent judges. With the same zeal and earnestness, Herr Heller undertook, somewhat later, the direction of the "Liedertafel" connected with the Association, and though only very recently, succeeded in adding to the male chorus a female chorus, which has already given good proofs of its industry. Herr Heller's excellence as a conductor is universally acknowledged. An admirable quartetist, he is, also, esteemed as a soloist upon his own instrument, and his assistance is welcome at every concert.

With the musical system pursued under his direction,—the importance of which, considering the number of persons who take an interest in the Association, and the fact that the latter gives public concerts, can no longer be looked upon as a private matter—a sharp contrast is formed by another musical system, which considers itself as specifically Italian. Its principle is the exclusive cultivation of operatic music, not merely in the theatre but also in the concert-room—of course, Italian operatic music, with some few modest exceptions in favor of Meyerbeer. Some persons have felt inclined to discover in national antipathies the reason of the consequent strict exclusion of German music—which is naturalized in all other parts of the educated world—and of instrumental music, properly so called; but we ourselves feel convinced that what has given rise to this system of exclusion is simply a want of feeling for every kind of music not presented under the form of an operatic air; it is the inability, freely acknowledged on all occasions, to feel anything when listening to the most moving German song, or to the most touching of Beethoven's adagios. No moral accusation can be based upon natural deficiencies; we can only pity such an inborn narrowness of musical feeling, just as, on the other hand, we must pity the zealots on the banks of the Spree, and on those of the Danube, who have no ear for the melodies of Bellini and Donizetti. But that such a restricted taste for art must not be considered as specifically Italian is clear to every one who knows that, while in Trieste German music can be cultivated, so to speak, only with closed doors and by Germans, in Milan, Florence, Naples, etc., it is cultivated by the Italians themselves; that there Quartet-Societies are being everywhere established, and that the hitherto narrow-minded musical views of the Italians are conforming more and more to those entertained by the rest of the civilized world.

WIESBADEN.—It was a hazardous experiment to give to such a public Gluck's Iphigenie in Tauris as well as Die Zauberflöte; but the manager's praiseworthy artistic feeling was rewarded, at three performances, by tolerably well-attended, if not full houses. Madame Bertram-Mayer sustained the principal part in Gluck's opera very satisfactorily, both as a vocalist and as an actress, though her voice has become rather sharp in the high notes in which the part lies, and requires careful management. By the side of this lady, so good as a dramatic vocalist, Madame Brenner is effective as a bravura singer, though she has not succeeded in gaining a firm footing here.

Our theatre boasts of two tenors: Herren Caffieri and Borchers. Herr Caffieri especially is distinguished for a full, fine voice of extensive compass. He, and that excellent barytone, Herr Bertram, are without doubt, the main support of the opera here. It is true that the deep, sonorous bass of Herr Klein (Sarasstro) is, now-a-days, an astounding novelty, but, unfortunately, our satisfaction is marred by his so frequently singing out of tune.

Of newer operas, Maillart's Lara has been exceedingly well placed upon the stage, and, moreover, three or four performances were numerous attended on account of their taking place in the height of the season, which had at length arrived, amid the crowds of pleasure-seekers coming and departing. But it was not a great success.

The programmes of the Cursaal Concerts are, as usual, drawn up with an eye to virtuosos and well-known names, in the selection of which the administration, it must be confessed, is, on the whole, fortunate, though it makes mistakes now-and-then. The extraordinary concert given on the 26th of last month, in honor of the Duke's birthday, is worthy of being mentioned. The programme included Beethoven's Overture, Op. 124, well played by the band from the theatre, under the direction of their Kapellmeister, Herr Hagen; F. Hiller's Concerto in F sharp minor (Herr Alfred Jaell); Violin-Concerto by Piat-ti (played by himself); and Violin-Concerto by Paganini (Herr Wilhelm)—three entire concerts in the Cursaal! This was, indeed, a circumstance of rare occurrence. The greatest amount of applause was achieved by Herr Jaell, with Hiller's concerto, and two "Salonstücke" (one of which was a paraphrase of the "Chœur des Evêques" from L'Africaine); on this occasion, as always, his efforts were followed by enthusiastic applause, and repeated recalls. In addition to the instrumental virtuosos, there was Mlle. von Edelsberg, who sang two songs and the air from La FAVORITA, while Herr Nachbauer, a tenor, from Darmstadt, pleased the audience by his rendering of Tamino's air, and two or three songs. Herr Wilhelm of this place is raising himself gradually to the rank of a great violinist, but what is Paganini's music—without Paganini?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 16, 1865.

Musical Literature.

A period of creation is naturally followed by a period of criticism. There are no more Bachs and Beethovens, no more Mozarts and Rossinis, no more Schuberts, Schumanns, Chopins. The field is either occupied by a far inferior, though for the time perhaps more dazzling, class of what we call "sensation" or "effect" composers, or by the hosts of feeble imitators, variation-mongers, and small manufacturers of fashionable pretty music by the yard. It is natural that, in the interim before another flood-tide of true musical inspiration, the more earnest worshippers at Music's shrine should occupy themselves with study and discussion of the exhaustless wonders which the last great tide left upon the shore of this our century; analyses of great works and great musical characters, biographies of the master composers, devout attempts to find out everything than can be known about them personally, speculations as to the origin and meaning of favorite Symphonies, Sonatas and what not; questions of taste; comparison of schools; new attempts to read aright and put together intelligibly and instructively the history of the musical art; speculations about the "Music of the Future," and so on. Our day may not produce much music that will live; but certainly there never was a day when there was so much written about music and musicians. There is a general scramble among musical litterateurs to see which shall unearth the greatest number of facts and first bring out a full biography of, for instance, Beethoven.

We are struck every day by the increase of musical literature; it seems to go on in geometrical ratio. Not to mention the continual appearance of new musical journals, good, bad and indifferent (in this country every enterprising music-publisher seems to think it necessary to have a musical paper of his own—his organ, and therefore not much to be relied upon as an organ of sincere Art feeling and conviction), let us enumerate some of the new books on musical subjects which have recently appeared or are announced as soon about to appear. The remarkable interest (which every true music-lover must regard with joy and thankfulness) excited in Germany, in England, and so widely in this country, by the Letters of Mendelssohn has doubtless stirred the emulation of writers and of publishers to venture voyages to these comparatively unsought shores. Immediately after Mendelssohn (Liszt's "Chopin," too, and the "Polko" stories may be mentioned as regards this country), came the Biography and Letters of von Weber, by his son. German papers were full of extracts from it, when presently it put on an English dress and came out as: "Carl Maria von Weber. The Life of an Artist, from the German of his Son, Baron Max Maria von Weber. By J. Palgrave Simpson, M. A. 2 vols. London: Chapman & Hall." It is a formidable and rather heavy, prosy book, and yet there is much interesting matter in it; plenty of material for a right sort of book, shorter and sweeter and more satisfying to a healthy hunger after knowledge.

2. BERTHOVEN seems to be the theme par excellence. While waiting for the thorough and exhaustive life of him by our friend Thayer (we verily expect to see a volume of it out, in German, this very autumn), we see frequent intimations that Jahn, who wrote the ponderous life of Mozart, is engaged in the same way on Beethoven, while various new books are already out. We have already given some space to Nohl's "Youth of Beethoven." To-day we copy a review of Köchel's publication of "Eighty-three Letters of Beethoven to the Archduke Rudolph." A Frenchman, also, has been trying his hand at it; we see announced "Beethoven: sa Vie, son Caractère, sa Musique, par M. Edouard Pompéry. Paris."—Marx's work on Beethoven, which has been several years before the world, lays itself out more on appreciation of the artist than on exactness of personal details. We have a strong impression that we have seen one or two more attempts to take the life of Beethoven announced, but cannot recall the authorship.

3. A most desirable work, if it shall prove to have answered its purpose—we have not yet seen it—is a life of J. S. BACH, in German of course. ("Das Leben und die Werke Joh. Seb. Bachs, von C. H. Bitter, Königl. Preuss. Geheime Regierungs-rath. Berlin.") It would seem a matter of course that any life of Bach, to be of much worth, must have incorporated into itself the admirable monograph by Forkel.

4. The Dr. Nohl aforesaid has edited MOZART'S Letters, and they have been translated by Lady Wallace (who translated Mendelssohn) and published in London, by Longman and Co. This translation has also been announced as in press by Leypoldt and by another publisher in New York. We shall be incredulous until we see; for who that ever read Mozart's letters, full as they are of that peculiar German fun and nonsense, all the point of which is inseparable from very word and spelling, can conceive of their being translated? Of course, there are serious passages of great interest.

5. There was need of a Life of ROBERT SCHUMANN. That by Wasilewski, published six or seven years ago, and never yet done into English, although extremely interesting, seems to have failed to satisfy the composer's nearest friends, and deals too much in labored metaphysical analysis of many of his works. Whether the want is met by a new work just published, we are unable to say. We give the title: "Robert Schumann: sein Leben und seine Werke," von August Reissmann. Berlin: Guttenburg; London: Asher & Co."

6. "FRANZ SCHUBERT. Von Dr. H. Kreissle von Hellborn. Wien: B. Grolld & Sohn, 1866." This we take to be a revision and expansion of the shorter biography by the same author, which we translated for this Journal in the summer of 1862.

7. The life of MENDELSSOHN, as it now can and should be done, is yet unwritten. Meanwhile, Leyboldt, of New York, has done a real service by the publication (in Mr. Gage's translation) of the early tribute to his memory by Lampadius.

8. MEYERBEER was not the man to leave the world without provision for a plentiful biography. Several sketches of his life have been reported as in progress. The authentic work, we presume, will be that entrusted to his friend M. Georges Kastner. Meanwhile another of his friends, M. Henri Blaze de Bury, airs his personal reminiscences of "Meyerbeer and his Times," whereon we to-day copy some interesting notes from the Athenæum.

9. BERLIOZ, it is said, has completed (!) his "Memoirs," to be published after his death (!)

And now for a string of works of musical history, criticism and gossip;—not half of all that we have seen announced, but such as we happen to recall:

10. General History of Music ("Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik," von AUGUST REISSMANN.) Numerous examples in notes and drawings. Vols. 1 and 2 published by Bruckmann in Munich; Vol. 3, by Gebhardt & Reissland in Leipzig. Price of the whole work 11 Thalers.

11. "A General History of Music," by Dr. SCHLUTER. Translated from the German by Mrs. Robert Tubbs; carefully revised by the author; and published, in crown 8 vo., in London by Richard Bentley. Announced for reprint in New York by Leyboldt. Purports to be a popular, convenient, simple treatment of the subject.

12. "The Third or Transition Period of Musical History:" A second course of Lectures on the History of Music, from the beginning of the 17th to the middle of the 18th Century, delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain in 1864, by JOHN HULLAH, Prof. of Vocal Music in King's College and in Queen's College, London, and organist of Charter-house. Post 8vo. (London: Longman & Co.) pp. XVI, 302.

13. History of the Court Opera in Munich. ("Geschichte der Oper am Hof zu München," von F. M. RUDHART. 1st Volume: "Italian Opera, 1654-1757").

14. Essay on the Beautiful in Music. ("Vom Musikalisch-Schönen," von Dr. EDUARD HANSLIK." 3d Edition, improved. Leipzig: R. Weigel.)

15. The learned and voluminous Dr. A. B. MARX, lecturer on Music at the University in Berlin, and author of so many valuable works, despite their clumsy German style, (so hard for the translator—witness a desperate effort in this number), now follows up his theoretic treatises, his "Music of the Nineteenth Century," and his book on Beethoven, with two volumes of his own personal Reminiscences ("Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben"), which doubtless cast a good many useful sidelights upon the musical history of Germany for several decades past; for Marx of course has known all the leading artists and composers, and has observed them closely. We hope to give some extracts ere long.

16. Mr. Athenæum Chorley has edited his musical experiences more than once; and now we have announced by Murray: "Studies of the Music of many Nations," including the substance of a course of Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution, by HENRY F. CHORLEY."

—But it is time to make an end. We forgot to name, among "the Lives," the Autobiography of SPOHR. Many other works we might name, especially of the more chatty and ephemeral sort; for it has become quite a fashion for retired singers, opera managers, &c., to make a book of what they have seen and been a part of; and every week, almost, we see some musical critic of London or Paris collecting his brilliant, honest, sapient reviews of operas and concerts, virtuosos and composers, out of the files of newspapers, and flinging them at us en masse in the book form. The late M. Scudo made his annual book.

ITALIAN OPERA. The New York Weekly Review, speaking of the nomadic troupe of Mr. Strakosch, who sang the other night in Hartford and will sing (see below) in Worcester, pays them the following compliment: "Mr. Strakosch's great merit consists in relieving the city of New York of some artists, who, by a strange misapprehension on the part of the impresarii and the public, were out of employ," &c. We are almost tempted to wish that New York would keep all the Italian Opera to itself, for who ever wants to hear again, or to hear of, the Trovatores, Traviatas, Don Sebastians and Iones, after having had a finer sense awakened and a deeper chord stirred by last year's experience of Fidelio, the Freyschütz, the Zauberflöte, &c., by so clever a German company as that of Mr. Grover? Now that beautiful bubble is burst, and who knows why? It was proved that a truly good thing, pervaded by a true Art spirit, could succeed in America; the taste for it was rapidly developing; a sound and admirable nucleus of a first-class German Opera was here, all realized, in active operation; true economy would have been to keep it together at all hazards and keep adding to it; and now it is allowed to go under, like the Atlantic Cable, and hardly an attempt to buoy it up for future availability. For Opera we must fall back upon the humdrum Italian concern; tame enough it will seem, much of it, however good the singers whom Max Maretzek has been vindicating against the Herald's disparagement—as if its praise or dispraise were of the smallest possible account!

We should be tempted, we say, to talk in this way. But then we remember that even the Italian companies do not always harp upon the Trovatore string; that sometimes they give us good performances of Don Giovanni (better than the Germans did in that instance); that we have been delighted by them in the Nozze di Figaro, and in Rossini's Barbiero too: that in the barren repertoire of last year there was at least one charming oasis in the shape of Fra Diavolo; that Max might perhaps, if he only would, give us William Tell; and that in the comic element the Italians are generally good and genial, if they have run too much into the overdone, muscular Verdi-ish exaggeration of passion in the opera seria. We hope therefore, for a fair modicum of genial entertainment from Maretzek's new company. His official announcement is in the New York papers. The strength of the company in principal singers was stated in our last. The chorus is declared to be entirely new in the male department, an important addition having been made to it from Her Majesty's Theatre, London. Bergmann will conduct the orchestra, which has been "selected with great care." The repertoire, besides "the usual works of the Italian, French and German schools," will offer for a foremost novelty Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine"; also a romantic opera by the brothers Ricci, called "Crispino e la Comare," and a comic opera, "Folettto di Gresly," by the author of Jone.

The season in New York will open on the 25th of this month; the season in Boston will occupy the month of January.

COLUMBUS, O.—The "Saengerfest" in Columbus was successfully brought to an end on the 1st of September, the two prizes for singing having been obtained by the "Cincinnati Maennerchor," and the delegation of the New Yorker Liederkrantz. There were 28 societies represented, and 300 singers sang under the direction of Mr. Barna, of Boston. Mr. Dresel, of Boston, made a very good speech, and also presided over the meeting of delegates, which adopted rules and resolutions in regard to the management of the future festival of the "Saengerbund." The next festival takes place in Louisville.—N. Y. Mus. Review.

We think the above will be news to "Mr. Dresel of Boston," who has innocently fancied himself all this time ruralizing on the green banks of the Merrimack and Artichoke. And the Secretary of the Handel and Haydn Society, whose name is here misspelt, probably does not yet dream of the dignity he has attained to out West, of conducting a German Saengerfest. There is a musical Herr Dresel in Columbus, we are told; and for "Barna" we presume we should read Barus, the name of the well-known musical director in Cincinnati.

WORCESTER, MASS.—Mr. Whiting, of Boston, gave an organ concert on the 7th inst. on the great organ in Mechanics' Hall, built by the brothers Hook. "Stella" says of it:

Mr. Whiting played well, especially in his performance of the Andante movement of Beethoven's Symphony in C, and an Overture by Mendelssohn. In the Bach Toccata, the themes were brought out with much distinctness, and the Coprice on a theme by Mendelssohn was creditable to Mr. Whiting, both as player and composer. The "Russian National Melody," and the Fugue Variations on the "Star Spangled Banner," had, of course, a favorable reception. Mrs. Smith's singing gave unqualified delight. A voice so fresh, yet well-cultivated, a style so artistic, it is rare to meet. Her singing of an air from Verdi's Nabuco was worthy many a prima donna of wider fame; her English Song, sweetly and naturally sung; and, in the duet, "The Siren and Friar," she sang like the true Lorelei of the Rhine. Dr. Guilmette surprised those who knew not his good qualities of old. One of his finest efforts was the "Prayer" from Elijah. He was encored in the duet with Mrs. Smith, and also in "The Last Man"—by Callcott, to which he lent a thrilling effect by that magnetic power which few singers now-a-days exert upon their audience. Our undemonstrative Worcester audiences have accorded few vocalists such heartfelt applause as Dr. Guilmette received on Thursday evening.

A "State Musical Convention" has been in session in Mechanics' Hall nearly all this week under the direction of L. O. Emerson, author of the popular books, the "Harp of Judah," and "Choral Wreath." A grand final concert was announced for last evening.—Another Convention, under the charge of Messrs. E. H. Frost and Solon Wilder, author of the "Praise of Zion," will commence in the same hall on the 24th of October.

Worcester is also alive with expectation of a real Italian opera performance—just a single night—E-nani—by the travelling troupe recently organized by Max Strakosch, who began in Hartford, and is dropping in upon a number of the larger towns and smaller cities on the way to Canada. The soprano is Signora Ghioni; the contralto Mme. Patti Strakosch; tenors, Maccaferri and Tamaro; principal basso, Susini; Conductor, Sig. Rosa.

Music in New York.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, the coming season, will be under the conductorship of CARL BERGMANN. The programmes are not fully decided upon, but the Weekly Review, "upon the best authority," names the following as among the pieces to be performed:

Liszt's "Mazeppa" will be performed in the first concert, when Schumann's Symphony in D minor will also be played. Furthermore we are going to hear "Episode de la vie d'un artiste," by Berlioz, "A Faust Overture," by Wagner, Schumann's Third Symphony, Symphony by Bargiel, Overture "Melusine," Overture "Prometheus," a Symphony by Mozart, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, and solo pieces, or pieces for piano and orchestra, to be performed by Messrs. Mills, Mason, Hoffmann, and probably Wolfsohn.

THEODORE THOMAS will begin his new series of classical concerts, at Irving Hall, on the second Wednesday in November. The instrumental portion of the feasts will be choice and appetizing, rich in things old and new, if the following promise in the Review shall be realized:

CONCERT. I.—Symphony, No. 4, Beethoven; Allegro de Concert, op. 46, Chopin (Mr. Mason); Mazeppa, symphonic poem, Liszt; Invitation à la danse, by Weber, Berlioz.

CONCERT. II.—Symphony in E flat, No. 1, Schumann; Concerto in E flat, Liszt; Scherzo in B minor, op. 57, Chopin; Overture Lenora, Beethoven.

III. Symphony, Bargiel; Fantasia, F minor, op. 49, Chopin (Mr. C. Wolfsohn); Overture, Melusine, Mendelssohn; Fantasia for Piano, Chorus, and Orchestra, Beethoven.

IV. Overture, Manfred, by Schumann, Concerto in G flat for two pianos, by Mozart (Messrs. Mills and Mason), Introduction "Tristan und Isolde," by Wagner, Symphony No. 5, by Beethoven.

V. Overture in C, op. 124, Beethoven; overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann; Child Harold, Berlioz.

Mr. Thomas will also give concerts of a more popular character on alternate Saturdays throughout the winter.—The famous Quartet concerts of Messrs. Mason, Thomas, &c., are eagerly looked forward to as usual, by the finer musical public.

MR. MILLS, the admirable pianist, will give one or more concerts for piano solo; and Mr. GOLDBECK, it is thought, will produce some of his own new orchestral compositions in a concert which he intends to give.

The HARMONIC SOCIETY, under the able conductorship of Mr. F. L. RITTER (our "Lancelot," now happy in the bonds of matrimony with another valued correspondent of this paper, Miss Catherine Francis Malone Raymond—joy to them and no end of harmony!), propose, we are informed, to take the initiative in this country in a good work too long delayed. That is, they mean to devote themselves, among other things, this winter to the study of some one of Bach's great choral works. We hope they will find it so interesting and so richly rewarding, (in a higher sense at least), that all the Oratorio societies will soon be following their example.

MRS. PAREPA's first concert at Irving Hall, last Monday evening, may be regarded as the opening of the musical season. We have already briefly alluded to her coming from England, with Messrs. DANREUTHER, pianist, and ROSA, violinist, for a concert tour in this country under the business management of Mr. Bateman. The Tribune "answers a few questions" about their antecedents thus:

Madame Euphrosine Parepa was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, and is the daughter of Count Demetrius Parepa, a Wallachian nobleman of high rank, who left his country for political reasons, and his wife, née Elizabeth or Lisbeth Seguin, the sister of the celebrated and popular basso, Mr. Edward Seguin. The mother had a beautiful voice, was a fine artist, and her devotion to her profession, probably, influenced the destiny of her daughter, Euphrosine Parepa.

Her musical education was acquired during her long residence in Spain and Italy, whither her mother's musical engagements led her, but in neither of these countries did she commence her artistic career. Her debut was made in the island of Malta, at the Opera House, in 1856, where her success was very brilliant. From thence she took the tour of the provincial operatic cities, Naples, Milan, and Florence, where, with the unfortunate but great tenor Giuglini, she created a furor, in Tanti's Sonnambula. She was equally successful in Lisbon, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Wiesbaden, Frankfurt and Hamburg, and at the Gewandhaus concerts, Leipzig, she commanded the admiration of the most critical audience in Europe.

In London, which has been her home for the past few years, she has always held a first position, and the criticisms of the journals of that city have constantly been of the most flattering description. She sings with equal facility and correctness in Italian, French, Spanish and German, and her English ballad singing is said to possess the true national ring, which has descended from Mrs. Bland and Miss Stephens. All concurrent testimony goes to prove her an accomplished artist.

Carlo Rosa, though not much known in Paris or London, has met with marked success in the other principal continental cities. He is said to be a brilliant and impassioned player, and one whom Herr Joachim, now the foremost violinist of the world, pronounces to be a genius on his instrument. We shall soon hear and know.

The new American pianist, Mr. Dannreuther, has already made a mark in the art world of music, having achieved a signal success on his appearance in London. Although educated in Germany, he is a native born citizen, Cincinnati being the place of his nativity. His style is said to be of the classic school, with a sufficient dash of the romantic to meet the popular taste. As the concerts will have the advantage of an orchestra, we may hope to hear, from him, some of the great concertos.

The concerts are arranged upon a generous scale, having the aid of an orchestra under the direction of Theodore Thomas. This was the programme of Monday:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn. The two last movements of the Concerto in F minor by Chopin, Mr. Dannreuther; "Ernani involami," Madame Parepa; Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin, Mr. Rosa; Serenade by Gounod, Madame Parepa; Overture "Freischütz," Fantasia "Rigoletto" by Liszt, Mr. Dannreuther; Fantasia and Allegro by Vieuxtemps, Mr. Rosa; Nightingale Song by Gaus, Madame Parepa; Polonaise by Vieuxtemps, Mr. Rosa; Il bacio by Ardit, Madame Parepa; Overture "Merry Wives."

And here is the Evening Post's impression of the concert:

At the opening concert of the Bateman series at Irving Hall last night, the heat of the atmosphere, intensified by the glare of gas lights and the presence of a large audience, indisposed those in attendance to pay much attention to anything but phenomenal performances, such as that of Parepa may be called. The tasteful pianoforte playing of Mr. Dannreuther, and the creditable efforts of Mr. Rosa on the violin were, under the circumstances, endured rather than enjoyed, and those gentlemen must wait for another appearance under better auspices before their genuine talent can be fairly recognised, or their performances justly come under the scope of criticism.

But Parepa, the new prima donna, was quite unaffected by the altitude of the mercury. No singer who has ever been on our stage is more thoroughly at home before an audience. Her manner, her person and voice are each consistent with the other. Ample, easy and genial, she possesses all the traits required to evoke the heartiest enthusiasm. A voice of vast compass and power she manages with admirable skill, and while her natural tendency is towards a brilliant, passionate and broad style of singing, she is yet fully capable of those contrasted effects which are obtained by a judicious use of the sotto voce and by delicacy of expression.

Parepa sang last night Verdi's aria Ernani involami, a subdued serenade by Gounod, a slow piece by Gaus, called the Nightingale, and the deliciously brilliant hit of Ardit's—the Bacio waltz. In all of these she was tumultuously applauded; and, in the latter, lavished all the chief attractions of her noble voice, her dashing style, and her bold courageous vocal execution. She ended the piece with an extremely high note (E flat in alt.) which few singers of her massive voice are physically able to accomplish, the feat usually lying within the capabilities only of the lighter class of high sopranos.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.
Expectation. (Die Harrende). Op. 25. R. Franz. 30
A choice melody, and simple; but a good deal of skill is displayed in weaving the harmony of the accompaniment, which forms an integral part of the song; differing in this from our common ballads, where the melody is everything, and the accompaniment nothing. The pretty German words are by Osterwald, and are rendered into English by J. S. Dwight.

Yesterday. Song. J. Blockley. 30

Very fine melody, and graceful words.

Sing to me a merry lay. Langton Williams. 30

A pretty affair, which has been honored by being sung in public by Adeline Patti.

The cot where the old folks died. Song and Chorus. M. B. Leavitt. 30

A very pleasing ballad, of that kind which bids fair to be quite popular.

The Southern Contraband. Song. M. B. Leavitt. 30

Simple and pretty in its way, and showing a very good spirit in our Southern (colored) brother.

I've no mother now. Song and Chorus. T. Smith. 30

I cannot sing the old songs. Ballad. Claribel. 30

Two very acceptable songs, the first of the "mother" species, and the second of classic beauty.

Instrumental.

Union Grand March. A. P. Clark. 30

Simple and pretty, and will find a good use among the first pieces given to learners.

Gaité de Cœur. Op. 24. Sydney Smith. 30

As often happens, the name of the piece, which signifies "a gay heart," does not quite accord with its character, which is melodious rather than merry, and of rich harmony, rather than light and gay. It is in waltz time, and, although in five and six flats, is, perhaps, a shade easier than a majority of Smith's compositions.

Le Chant des Vagues. Morceau Caractéristique. Sydney Smith. 40

This little song, or fragment, is carried on very smoothly and flowingly through a few simple changes. It is rather easy, and is soothing and pleasant to play. A peculiarity is, that the left hand plays the melody nearly all the time, and is, most of the time, across the right. In five flats.

Masaniello. (La Muette de Portici). Fantasia. Sydney Smith. 30

More like a transcription than a fantasia. Contains the most brilliant airs of "Mas' Anello," arranged in a sparkling chain, with arpeggios and pretty modulations mingled, by way of ornament.

Chanson Russe. Op. 31. Sydney Smith. 50

A fine piece, which cannot be fully described without repeating what was said above. It is Transcription like, not difficult, and somewhat solemn, but melodious.

M' apparut l'amor. From Martha. Piano and Flute. Pratten. 35

One of the best songs in "Martha" arranged for Piano and Flute, but will do very well for Piano and Violin.

Books.

THE NEW SACRED STAR; or Union Collection of Church Music. By Leonard Marshall. $1.38 Per dozen $12.00

Mr. Marshall's sacred music is arranged with great care, and the new Star, although of course, somewhat similar to the old one, shines also with its own brilliancy; or, to drop metaphor, it contains a number of new features, and will, doubtless, be acceptable to numbers of singing schools and choirs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the convenience a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 639.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 30, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 14.

The Present State of Music.

(Continued from page 99.)

(Translated for this Journal from Marr's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

So Mozart wrought; so, with him and before and after him, the host of German, Italian, French composers; the almost contemporaneous Italians, such as Paisiello and Cimarosa; the nation-less Cherubini; the French and Belgians, with Gretry at their head; the followers of Mozart, the Páers, Winters, Righinis, Weigl, Spöhr; the latter Italians who Italianized him, with Rossini, tired of victory, (he liked to catch fishes better than to make operas) leading the van,—so far as they did not look back to the traditions of the old Italian school. A treasury of music has accumulated in these thousand works, in one more lightly and cheerfully, in another more darkly colored; here more variegated, there more monotonous and mannered; with this one more rich in melody, with that one more elaborate or more intellectual and free (herein Mozart remained in advance of all); with Beethoven, more deeply brooding in the mysteries of the tone-realm, for he occasionally loses himself in the dialogue of the orchestra climbing vine-like up into the dialogue upon the stage and threatening to overgrow it. In one German preëminently, in Dittersdorf, a tendency to drastic characterization asserts itself; only the circle of vision—the dull every-day existence of the suburban townsman in all his poverty and limitation—is too narrow and effete, and the artistic means are small.

Two appearances there were, that first lifted themselves out of this ocean of music, by whose waves so much that was charming, deeply moving, genial, was upborne awhile and then swallowed up. They seem to me significant for my purpose.

First came forward SPONTINI, with the Vestale, Cortez and Olympia. We leave it to the nice critics to weigh him in their scales and show how much he lacked of Mozart's richness, and of German depth and culture, and whatever other sins he had. One thing is decisive in his favor and satisfies us. He was a character, and had force of will; he has shown both in his operas, which, in spite of all deficiencies and aberrations, strive after genuine dramatic shaping and effect. How did he come to that,—he who in Italy had been a Rossinist before Rossini? By being in Paris, where he not only found texts of dramatic pith and favorable for scenic presentation, but also received the energetic spirit of the French nation into his fiery soul. True the people's life was dammed up by the usurpation of Napoleon, and the free play of souls was hemmed in and gagged by the imperial despotism. But this usurper was a hero, this despotism hid its baldness, as Caesar did of old, under the laurel wreaths of victory; the glitter of arms and war, the thundering gloire de la grande armée had poured out the intoxication of Roman world dominion over the people. This intoxication, this splendor of the new imperialism, gathered up and personified in the forms of the hero, of the foresworn conspiring rival, of the representative high-priesthood, of the noble lover, were the subject matter of Spontini's dramas. The thoughtful word of the free poet would have been incompatible with Napoleonic suspicion and Napoleonic self-love, and could not fellowship with the self-will of the most autocratic of all autocrats; under a Napoleon poetry, like eloquence, is dumb. Music alone could revel and intoxicate herself with innocent unconsciousness; she without danger could display herself beside her idol, still triumphant after his fall in the residences he had so recently misused. Indeed the Germans, with their quiet wont, found the noise of the Spontini trumpets and cymbals oppressive—yet it was natural and necessary to the Napoleonic. It is precisely the noise, and nothing else, which has been handed down as an heirloom, and grown year by year tenfold stronger.

The second form is CARL MARIA VON WEBER. The Körner battle songs during the war of liberation made him the minstrel of the people. But the popular life, in those years of oppression, had taken refuge from the shameful present in the "romantic" time of people's and of hero life, in the Middle Age circle of traditions. Then stepped Weber with his Freyshütz into this circle, where the German people had already been made at home by their most recent poets. His music gave popular expression to the hunter, the envious peasant, the village humor, the rural simplicity and passion for the dance, and to that "romantic" sentimental enthusiasm of the Fouqué type of maiden innocence and love; it came roaring and moaning by, in ghost-like sounds, with the Wild Hunt; it was the highest summit to which German dramatic music at that time could lift itself. Euryanthe followed. Nowhere has Weber shown himself so rich; nowhere has he or any one of his predecessors or contemporaries so genially and happily hit the local tone of time, place and situation, all the weighty dramatic moments. But that Middle Age tendency was already played out; its ghostly whisperings, its love-love (Minne), in which the deification and the degradation of Woman are so closely bound together, its whole circle of ideas and forms, are foreign to us, its "Ancient throng of Gods is long ago gone by." Weber and his poetess had not understood how to present the ever-living element of that time; Euryanthe had no triumph. Compared with the boundless success of its predecessor on the stage, it was a failure; but it is justly famous in the historical development of Art through that energetic insisting upon local truth.

Spontini's and Weber's dramatic efforts were the outbirth of an eventful period, not conceivable without that period, and no further reaching than the real scope of that. As no man can give what he has not got, so also can no time. Art is constantly and everywhere the secret confession and imperishable memorial of its time.

The same period, the soulless and empty period of the Restoration, brought the French their AUBER, who held at first to Boieldieu, then borrowed brilliancy and charm from Rossini, and afterwards, favored by the dramatic tendency of his nation and Scribe's stage tact, attained to successful scenic effect. To the knowing ones, it was farce, with the "Comedy of the fifteen years," that France then played with the Bourbons and kept on playing. The earnestness of the dramatic Muse could not suit such a time.

It has received its highest satisfaction through MEYERBEER, who, leaving the German school, at first gave in his adhesion to the Rossini direction, when this was in vogue; then made himself master of the Scribe and Auber scenic effects; and finally appropriated to himself that local coloring that was found by Weber, in short the German People's tone. All this he controls, he lavishes with a virtuosity and a refinement without equal. With wonderful acuteness he divined alike the tone of deep fermenting passion and the humorous way of those odd heroes who, in rough soldier's garb, without especial thanks or pay, and partly foreigners, victoriously fought the battles of the old Fritz against the united continent. For the fanaticism of the consecrated murderer priests of St. Bartholomew's night he finds the specific ground color with the same certainty as for the Zealotism of the Anabaptists and the antique psalmody, smelling, one might say, of the mould of past ages, of pious female pilgrims; indeed his ear has happily caught the chord of tender innocence. Perhaps he would not have needed the favor of outward circumstances, securing to him the very élite among performing artists, the most enticing outfit, the service of the serviceable press, to step triumphantly to the head of the operatic world, such as it now is and can be. Another last determining element for him fell into the scale: He was and is the man of this his time.

For, with all his marvellous peculiarities and happy faculties, he has wanted one thing: Integrity—the integrity of the artist. It consists in this: that one earnestly and truly will something outside of himself; that the creating artist will set forth his object as he sees and feels it—or rather, that he feel constrained through the power of creative love so to set it forth, and this power yields itself up without reservation, without any ulterior or side end. Only out of this love and sincerity can the true Art work spring; only so does it exercise, whatever be its subject or direction, any moral, spiritual power, and become at once a monument and armory of the progress to which Humanity is inwardly called and bidden. This integrity has Meyerbeer, fortunately for him in such an age, never practised. Never is his chief concern about his subject, never does he love and shape it for its own sake; he trusts it not, nor does he entrust himself to it in devoted fidelity; he bulwarks it with all imaginable outworks, uses it and all that it brings solely for his own profit, to—make effect. This making of effect has become a characteristic trait for the artist; no one has understood it so thoroughly or pushed the trade with such rich means; it pervades and modifies these works from their first inception to the minutest feature of their execution. What a medley mass of things has had to be dragged together in these Huguenots, in this Prophète, one thing pressing upon the heels of another on the overcrowded stage, all of which has no necessary connection with the original design or with the subject proper, is not required by the action, and does not show nor develop the characters! Whatever could be rummaged out of the whole broad field of time, out of all the old property rooms of life, that seemed to promise any effect, had to come forth: Sunrise, skating scene, shepherd's piping, little jack-o-lantern tongues of flame, dances, high mass, explosions, gipsies, processions, students, vesper bells, illumination of the Louvre, Queen on horseback,—who can enumerate in a short time all the rubbish that is brought out in four or five long hours? As for what mere music may do—in the first moment, perhaps, the most striking characteristic trait of the old downright time; in the second, noise without ground or measure; in the third, a solfeggio floating up and down on the major and minor ninth chord, the nocturnal languishing of modern sentimentality, that yearning after yearning; in the fourth, mere coloratur, or ornament; in the fifth, a sort of mésalliance between the piccolo and contrabasso: no fancy dry goods dealer displays more fashions on his broad shop counter; there is something for everybody. Pity only that one thing crowds another and stifles it, as they all do the one main thing, which is the work of Art. Distracted, wearied out, one slips off homeward from the costly bazaar.

But how capably this man has studied the age at the high school of Europe! Has then this age any force of character or impulse to action? Has it a deep, inwardly settled will? Does this "society," which pays for and controls salon and theatre, bear in its bosom any power of hate or love? Besides mere personal interests, is it conscious of a more pressing and sincere want as a distraction from the fatiguing chase of material and ambitious ends? To future historians Meyerbeer will be a characteristic feature of the present age; for "he who has satisfied his time, has lived for all time." Pity, that such splendid endowments had to be so squandered!

(To be Continued).

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Good Music.

A CONTRIBUTION TO MUSICAL AESTHETICS.

Much is said about good music, implying thereby a discrimination between music so characterized, and certain other which is not good. Now why is not all music good? And how shall we determine what is and what is not Good Music? An answer to these questions involves an appeal to the fundamental principles of musical taste; and it is the attempt of this paper to state these principles somewhat more systematically than usual.

We believe that the true problem of the musical composer is this: So to combine tones as to express certain emotions in the most impressive and beautiful manner. In his choice of means he is guided by no law save that of his own inspiration, except in so far as musical science puts its checks upon him not to use certain incongruous combinations. But a composer who writes only in constant fear of violating these laws is a composer made, not born. A composition may be in accordance with all written laws, and shaped after the most approved models, and yet be of no artistic value whatever, because it means nothing. So in language, one may talk for hours in an elegant manner and express no thoughts. But such are not Art-works.

So it appears that in judging a musical composition we appeal to two kinds of aesthetic laws, which we may term the tangible, and the intangible. Those which we have ventured to term intangible, are the artistic perceptions which we possess in such different degrees, and by which we receive the meaning of a work of art into our very souls, as it were, or by which we perceive the insignificance of trash. This faculty we might term the Musical Common Sense, because it is possessed in some degree by almost every one. This faculty, like every other of the mind, becomes more active by use. There can be no discussion about the decisions we obtain from it, further than appeal to the intuitions of large bodies of men. For the judgments of this faculty, like those of the Common Sense as applied to other kinds of thought, are intuitions. So if you tell me that after due study a certain work of art is meaningless to you, I cannot discuss the question further than to say that to me it is highly significant, and to refer you to the opinions of acknowledged judges. Sometimes great diversity of opinion prevails, even among these, and then we must each in candor hold our own opinion, waiting for more light, or for the verdict of that stern old critic, Time. And this is what is meant, no doubt, by the famous saying de gustibus non disputandum. For it is not a dispute about tastes, but about the ability to perceive a meaning where it exists to others. Concerning tastes, properly so-called, we can dispute, else there could be no laws of taste, musical or otherwise.

The aesthetic laws which we have termed tangible are those that have regard to the manner, or form, in which a musical thought can be expressed or elaborated in order to produce upon the listener the impression of beauty—or, as we say, to be in good taste. To discuss and elucidate these laws is the province of the Theory of Musical Composition, and of Musical Aesthetics, on neither of which subjects is there any elaborate treatise in English. We inquire, then, as a foundation for our reasoning: How do works of Art give us pleasure? To this, John Ruskin:

"All sources of pleasure, or any other good to be derived from works of art, may be referred to five distinct heads. I. Ideas of Power.—The perception or conception of the mental or bodily powers by which the thing has been produced. II. Ideas of Imitation.—The perception that the thing produced resembles something else. III. Ideas of Truth.—A perception of faithfulness in a statement of facts by the thing produced. IV. Ideas of Beauty.—The perception of beauty, either in the thing produced, or in what it suggests or resembles. V. Ideas of Relation.—The perceptions of intellectual relations in the thing produced, or in what it suggests or resembles."

The pleasure we derive from music is, no doubt, referable chiefly to the fourth of the sources mentioned. In some kinds of music, the Fugue, for instance, we are delighted by the contrivance and skill displayed in the intertwining of the different voices, while we at the same time receive the inner significance of the thought itself. These emotions, so far as they belong to our tangible aesthetics, are to be referred to ideas of relation. By dance music we are impressed only sensuously. We are pleased by the felicitous nicety of manner sometimes displayed therein; but this music speaks no language to the soul.

Since our chief musical pleasures arise from the beauty of compositions, as is no doubt the case, we are led to inquire: What is beauty? For an answer we accept the theory of those philosophers who hold that beauty consists of certain traits which typify the Divine attributes. These are:

Infinity, the type of the Divine Incomprehensibility. Unity, the type of the Divine Comprehensiveness. Repose, the type of the Divine Permanence. Symmetry, the type of the Divine Justice. Purity, the type of the Divine Energy, and Moderation, the type of government by law. Of unity there are four kinds: things subjected to the same influence, called subjectional unity; when things arise from one source, unity of origin; when things form links in chains, unity of sequence; and the unity of separate and distinct things into one whole, unity of membership. And this last is the highest unity of all.

The Beauty, then, of a musical composition consists only in its capacity to produce upon us the impression of Infinity, Unity, Repose, Symmetry, Purity or Moderation. Unconsciously to ourselves these impressions are made upon us; we are pleased thereby, and their exciting cause, whether picture, statue, poem, or music, we term beautiful. For the production of these impressions, Music has recourse, as it seems to us, to the following means. The impression of Infinity we derive from the breadth, significance, or, as we often say, depth of a composition. This impression, therefore, belongs partly to the intangible aesthetics. Such an impression is derived from Beethoven's well-known Sonata in C-sharp minor, the so-called "Moonlight Sonata," and from his Fifth and Ninth Symphonies. In the symphony form, too, may be most fully displayed the various kinds of Unity. In the multiplicity of instruments governed by one spirit we have subjectional unity. In the construction of various differently managed passages from one motive, as is often done with the Theme and Second Episode in the fifth rondo-form, we have unity of origin. In symmetrical modulations we have unity of sequence; and in the combination of several dissimilar compositions into one consistent whole, we have unity of membership, the culminating unity of all. The Andante, Largo, or Adagio movements usually make a marked contrast with those preceding and following. Thus we experience an impression of Repose. As, for instance, the Adagio in the Sonata Pathétique. In the due proportion existing between the various themes and episodes of a work, as well as the proper dimensions of the separate rondos of a Symphony, we have Symmetry. Impressions of Purity arise from the delicate style of the instrumentation, as in the introduction to Mendelssohn's Overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream;" or, separately from any material agency, from the ethereal character of the idea itself, as in some of Chopin's compositions. Our impressions of Moderation arise from a general obedience to the laws of that form of composition chosen as the dress of the thought, without running into extravagance on the one hand, or into a cramped and constrained style, on the other.

We conclude, then, that Good Music must have meaning, a voice for the soul; and must be expressed in such musical forms as will be in accordance with the laws of beauty.

At another time we may take a brief survey of the literature of the piano-forte, searching for examples of good music.

Aurora, Ill.

W. S. B. M.

The Famous Quire of Earndale.

(From the Cornhill Magazine).

When, fifteen years ago, I was inducted to the Rectory of Earndale, the parish church possessed a famous quire. Not that the quire of Earndale differed much from that almost obsolete type which fifteen years ago it was deemed the young churchman's duty to extirpate on first donning the white tie. It was a famous quire, which every year—once or twice in the year—strangers would come to listen to. It consisted of but five men, one of whom played a clarinet with bold, firm tone, that sustained the treble, and gave confidence to the cracked-voiced boys and rough-voiced girls who hardly stood in need of encouragement. Another played a violoncello, to which he had attached a fifth string tuned to F F, in order to add sonority to the deeper bass. A third performer played the flute, on which he executed the counter-tenor part as it was written for him in the G clef, above the treble or air. Of the remaining two men, one sang the air with the clarinet, only an octave lower, and the last sang the bass. But besides this, the violoncello player sang bass, tenor, or air, or counter-tenor in a screaming falsetto, one part or the other, as he deemed it necessary to ornament or support the service of song.

Such was the quire of Earndale; they sang pluckily, and made a cheerful, if not a melodious noise. I gave them supper once a year, but could not induce them to adopt more ecclesiastical music than glees and songs set to sacred words. Still, we were better off than the meeting, where they all sang in discordant chorus, while the parson played the big fiddle in the pulpit. Like other things in Earndale, the quire was an institution, and I did not attempt to remove it.

But after five years, clarinet left the valley, and began to feel symptoms of dissolution. Flute wouldn't play the air, it was so tame; and when remonstrated with withdrew and carried off tenor with him to the meeting. Still, we had a sturdy voice for the air, and the rural "master of song." But alas! the master, always fond of drink, became so uproarious that we were obliged to dismiss him. The crisis came when a stranger was taking duty for me. A new tune of Abel's own composing was to be sung, one full of eccentric turns and intricate distances. The choir made a start, quavered, and broke down. Abel sounded the note anew, and again they broke down; this time a pause, "Let us pray," said the officiating clerk, meekly, "Pray be blown!" shouted Abel, "Let's try again." It was Abel's last Sunday of office.

For some Sundays we tried congregational singing, our one remaining voice, with the aid of a pitch-pipe, leading the tune; but bit by bit the congregation grew tired of a duty which had always devolved upon paid officials and many a tune was sung by old Jamie and the children—he with spectacles on nose and book in hand—while the other hand, hooked in his waistcoat, beat time on his breast to the tune; save when, in some pathetic verse, it was released to cuff some youngster who gave tongue too lustily, and didn't appreciate the "temper" of the strain. Then in our perplexity we procured a small harrel-organ which had seen service in a room used for dancing on week days, and service on Sundays. It was a peculiar instrument; the first time we tried it, it went off like a musical snuff box, and played all the tunes successively, including a waltz and "Merrily danced the Quaker's wife." Earndale has not forgotten that Sunday yet. The wardens and sexton managed to carry it out (it was not large) into the churchyard, but even there it fired away tune after tune amid the snow and cold till all the machinery was unbound. Before the next Sunday we had it put in order, but it seldom went right. Sometimes the wires just elevated the keys enough to let a portion of the wind into the pipes, producing mournful whines like key-hole music; sometimes, for want of pinning the barrel, it wound from one tune into another with marvellous dexterity; sometimes the wires were bent, and discord, harsh and strong, grunted and thundered in one line, while in the next, for half a line, was a vacuum of notes of any sort. At last we understood it better, and congregational singing in some sort actually was inaugurated.

Like most old churches Earndale had suffered under the beautifying furor of the eighteenth century; whitewash, a ceiling, large square pews—one description serves for all. Far be it from our sober criticism to join in the outcry against that age; what would have remained of our old churches without such "beautification?" At all events it preserved them to us, and probably in a more seemly state than they have been since the wars of the Roses.

Earndale church had suffered in the process; rood-screen, chancel, arch, reredos, were gone; some windows were square, some circular, some Grecian, and there was an urn in each corner, and a sun-dial over the door. We began to restore; and little by little replaced arch and screen and window, chancel and oak roof; seated the nave afresh, and quarrelled over the seats, as churchmen will to eternity. We paid our bills. The church was a seemly one; and we began to think it was not quite the thing for the district chapel of Outgate to glory in a finger organ, while we ground music on a barrel.

So we formed a committee. Farmer Jolly, our churchwarden, in the chair. We ordered a new organ—a handsome instrument; "plenty of music in it," was old Jolly's instruction to the builder. The subscriptions didn't quite make up the cost, but the committees never look at that insignificant item, and we resolved to open the organ with clat, and have a collection.

A week or so before the day, a deputation of ladies of my parish called at the rectory with a mission to the rector. I am a man of simple and retired habits. I felt nervous on hearing it was a deputation of ladies, but was greatly relieved to read on the cards the names of Miss Fanny Penflower and Miss Bessy Floskin, two of the youngest young ladies in Earndale, both very musical, both pets of the rector from childhood—and knew it too. I suspected they had some deep scheme in their pretty heads, but all the same was infinitely glad that they, and not the widow, my lady Topsticks—who always talks on pathetic topics, goes to balls and can't come to church—or Miss Stiers, whose conversation is learned or religious—had been chosen to represent the ladies of Earndale. I don't think I abuse confidence if I say that all the pretty speeches they could frame and all the charming looks they could put on, were on that morning forthcoming, just to fathom the temper in which their errand would be received. They managed their mission adroitly. The ladies of Earndale, as I knew, were fond of music, and they had often heard me say that church music ought to be more cultivated than it is, and they wished very much—they were sure I should not object—to celebrate the opening of the organ with a choral service.

"Choral service!" exclaimed I, astonished, "and where is the quire to be found. You wouldn't have old Jamie and the school children attempt it?"

No; the ladies would undertake that duty, come and sit in the chancel, and sing all the responses. "And do you know, we have practiced so much, we can do it perfectly."

"But how can you manage," said I, "without male voices? Your small sweet notes will sound angelic, and all too unearthly."

"Oh, there's young Seabody, and half a dozen more, who have attended all the practices."

"I'll be bound they have. Why didn't you let me come, young ladies?"

"We wished to give you a surprise."

"And so you do," replied I.

"But really, now, if you will consent, we all wish it so; and it's only once! The Bishop can't write aggravating letters when all we want is to pass the day off creditably, and get a good subscription."

With such pure motives, urged by such lips, what could I do? Of course I yielded; and then, just as I had showed them round my garden, and gathered my most beautiful roses for them, and they were bidding me good by—"And oh, Mr. —, I had almost forgot, will you intone the service?"

"No, no; I know better than that. What voice I might have had ten years ago was exhausted in lifting up, Sunday after Sunday, the category of the people's sins."

Then would I allow the curate of the new church, who sang tenor beautifully, to take the service.

O Earndale, how cruel! Here I had asked a dignitary to preach, and had a surplice, new starched and clean, lying in my study for my part; and to be done out of it by two young ladies! and for that puppy Augustus Claighfern, in high-collared coat and cassock tie, just come from Oxford, and great at all the evening parties, and always followed Fanny Penflower! O Earndale! far better thy rector's wishes were not uttered then—not chronicled now. They were not clerical!

In the end they prevailed on me to let Augustus intone, and content myself with the lessons. There was, however, another party besides the rector to be won over, and that a party not so easily coaxed out of its whims and prejudices. At the head of it was Farmer Jolly; at the bottom of it—the soul of all the mischief it perpetrated—Miss Stiers. Rich and decided, she hated Puseyite ways, and old Jolly was persuaded we were all to become perverts to Romanism in the lump, against our will, just as the Sepoys fancied they were to be christianized surreptitiously by biting the greased cartridge. He came with reproachful civility, and lent me a folio book of Martyrs with pictures of the cruelties of the Inquisition. Mrs. Jolly gave me an account of a visit she made to hear such a choral service elsewhere, and couldn't abide it. "It had such a Popish twang in it—that way of doing the service." And the worst of it was, that I, the rector—no party to the thing, except by implication—had to soothe all the difficulties. Well, there was only one way. Lady Topsticks asked the Misses Jolly to one or two evening parties, and that quieted the Jollys; and Miss Stiers was, without much persuasion coaxed into a promise to attend a Penny Reading in the school-room in the evening of the day of our Festival, and to read herself—to a distinguished and educated audience, with all the pathos of a poetic soul—the laureate's last poem.

Then for a week, the church was thronged from morn to eve; all the ladies and young men came to decorate it. Large placards with suitable inscriptions were nailed and stuck round with flowers; the pillars wound with wreaths; the windows crowned with garlands; and primroses, cowslips, and every flower of spring, were gathered from the hedgerow, garden and greenhouse, and tastefully appropriated. The young gentlemen were very busy, and so were the young ladies. I fear their conduct was not exactly in all respects suitable to the place they worked in. But then, as Charley Seabody said: "How can you help Bonnie Bessie Floskin down the ladder, and only look good?"

At last the day was come. It was a beautiful morning. I went early in the dawn to the top of Earndale Sear, and watched the tide waves roll in under the early sunshine, flashing like the wings of a silver dove. Not a sign of rain. We were to have a fine May-day; and for a collection, let me tell you a fine day is no despicable power.

The service was at eleven, but long before eleven a large flag waving, and peals one after the other clashing out from the tower, reminded Earndale of what no one stood in danger of forgetting. As the time drew near carriage after carriage rolled up, clustered with fair faces, and dashing riders and visitors from the valley trooped in. Earndale for once was gay. There were carriages left standing without their horses on the green; there were little knots of well-dressed people wandering about; there were the orderly lines of the school children, and disorderly crowds of the truants gathering round the nut-sellers, who brought their merchandise as near the temple as they dared; there was the organ builder—a proud man—come from London on purpose to be present, and to be paid; there was the dignitary in cassock and band; and Augustus, who stepped from a drag, arrayed in dusty canonical costume, with a square cap such as Earndale never spied before, and thought it some new fashion.

My duty required me to attend these gentlemen, so we proceeded through the churchyard full of on-lookers, and through the aisles, then beginning to fill; the churchwarden and sides men, busy, and anxious, and important, at a loss what to do with cantankerous Earndalers who would occupy their own seats that day, and not make room for full-purged visitors.

In the chancel was our quire, as fair a sight as ever was seen when men-singers and women-singers served the service of song in the temple. A row of ladies sat on each side, and the young fellows in white ties behind them; all of both sexes, I observed, (what I never saw before), for once looking serious.

I had objected to their processioning to their seats: country people might have mistaken it for another ceremony in which young ladies take part at the altar. Then in the vestry I was obliged to use strong language to induce Augustus to replace in the bag—a blue one like a brief bag—a stole of white satin with crosses of gold and scarlet beautifully interwrought, and with which he was tastefully arraying his lawn-enveloped shoulders.

Eleven o'clock! clash went the bells altogether in a sudden explosion, and then were still, their several harmonic tones sobbing and dying away in dissonance. We sallied forth, and the organ discoursed triumphant music.

Augustus was nervous; he didn't keep his note, and sometimes made desperate hits at distances, and only arrived within three-quarters of a tone. Then the quire was disconnected, only the organist picked them up so deftly that most people thought it was all right. The performance on the whole was creditable only it was nothing else but a performance. Old Jolly alone made an ill-natured remark. His daughter Emily wondered how Mr. Augustus Claighfern could chant at all without his stole; "As if a tomcat couldn't purr without his tail. It was the ladies that dashed him."

After this, I thought we could have nothing but harmony in Earndale. Alas! three weeks had not passed before grim Miss Stiers (who had only the little boys and the rector for her audience) came with a long story of the wicked and profane doings of the choir. Charley Seabody had been seen by somebody who didn't attend to the service, busy with the golden gay ringlets of Fanny Peasflower (the little flirt! she knew Augustus couldn't be there on Sunday!) behind the organ curtain. Miss Stiers thought it atrocious. So did not I, but then I felt it a duty to say something, and put it to Charley whether he hadn't better sit away from the organ. "Oh, no, he was wanted to draw the stops;" and the young scamp went and told the whole parish that the rector was jealous, and stories and fables of every hue were concocted and circulated in consequence, and I had to request them both to sit with their mammas.

Then our volunteer organist began to quarrel, and some who could play wouldn't play; and others who couldn't play would play, and often-times hit the wrong keys, which cried lustily in reply, or made harmony with two fingers only, and oftentimes anything but harmony. At last, unkindest cut of all, came a letter from the Bishop. The proceedings in Earndale had for some time past occupied his attention; the flower decorations—the choral performance—the improper proceedings—and, in consequence, remarks of parishioners about the rector; and, what grieved his episcopal soul to the quick, the unauthorized practice of singing a response, which for generations Earndale had heard read. "Peccavi; peccavi," was all I could reply. "My new organ, instead of harmony, produced nothing but discord."

From that day I dare not think about music in Earndale, far less record my impressions. We have musical parties, but I shrink to the very farthest corner of the room, and dare not applaud Emily Jolly, or Fanny Peasflower, or Beatie Flo-skin, in a song, or express my abhorrence of bacchanalian glees, lest I should be saddled with personal feelings; and when on Sundays I hear the organ tapped like a pianoforte, I groan to myself and wish for "the famous quire of Earndale," with its clarinet, flute and violoncello.

The Court Opera at Munich.*

Opera, or musical drama, is, comparatively speaking, a new branch of art. If we take, in round numbers, the year 1600 as the year of its birth, not more than two centuries and a half have elapsed since its origin in Italy, from which we have to subtract fifty years for the rest of the world; for during those fifty years the novelty of the thing, the want of the necessary resources, and above all, the warlike condition of affairs monopolizing all the efforts of mankind, were obstacles to its introduction. Subsequently, moreover, till after the first half of the eighteenth century, this branch of art was an amusement in which only the more important Courts, and, at most rich towns, and these latter merely from time to time, or on especial occasions, could indulge. For a long period, Italians were the sole composers and singers of opera, and if any one wished to devote himself to it, he had to go through a course of study in Italy, and be acknowledged there before he could hope for recognition in his own country.

Apart from isolated attempts at national opera (such as the production of Daphne, words by Opitz, music by Heinrich Schütz, in 1627, at Dresden) it was in France that any permanent desire was first manifested to throw off the musical dominion of the Italians; and as early as from 1639 we find authors like Perrin, Quinault, T. Corneille, Racine, Molière, La Fontaine, Rousseau, La Grange, and La Motte, and composers like Cambert, Lully, Destouches, Campra, Rebel, Quinault, junior, Batin, Rameau, Mondouville, Rousseau, and others, busily engaged in founding a French opera, which, however, for a long period was still intended only for the entertainment of the Court. It was a considerable time before Germany and England persistently followed in the same path, and not till after the commencement of the 19th century that German opera, more particularly, in the wake of that of France, worked itself up to a state of independence, which, however, has yet to struggle with the influence of the Italians. Meanwhile, the spoken as well as the musical drama has become the common property of all civilized nations, and every little town of 10,000 souls wants its regular theatre, where it may enjoy both dramatic and operatic performances. This is not the place to discuss the advantages and disadvantages of the over-propagation of these kinds of amusements; so much, however, appears certain; the internal development of musically-dramatic art has reached a goal or turning point where we are impelled to render our present position clear by a serious retrospect of what has been effected, and of the gradual course of development. A comprehensive, general, and thorough history of opera is altogether wanting, and it will be impossible for such a history to be produced till the necessary materials, in the shape of the operatic history of each separate country, are collected. Very gratifying activity in this respect has lately been manifested in Germany. Berlin, Dresden, Hamburg, and other leading cities, have found industrious men to search through the theatrical archives, the libraries, and other sources of information of a former age, collecting, arranging, and elucidating, more or less aesthetically or historically, the results of their labors, and thus producing a picture of the course of development and of what has been done. In this way, we shall some day be enabled to obtain a survey of what has been effected by the whole of Germany; to write a comprehensive history of opera there; and, finally, by comparing such a history with those of other civilized states, to arrive at the history of opera generally.

As we have observed, we are still engaged in the preliminary labor only; whoever, therefore, successfully works at this produces something which is needed, and which is worthy of appreciation and imitation. Looking at the matter in this light, we heartily welcome the present publication by Herr Rudhart, which undertakes to describe in a connected form, for the first time, the fortunes of the opera at the Court of Munich. The first part now before us embraces the period from 1654 to 1787, and relates exclusively to the Italian operas given at the Elector's Court—the succeeding period and the history of German opera being reserved for the future portion of the work. Any one who has been engaged in similar researches will know how to appreciate properly the diligence displayed by Herr Rudhart. That gentleman has brought to light several facts hitherto unknown; corrected many errors; and, on the whole, furnished a connected narrative that enables us to form a satisfactory idea of the operatic affairs of the period. The want of previous works, and the difficulty of discovering the scattered materials, excuse, for the most part, the incompleteness of the book. We should have fancied, however, that with a fair expenditure of time, the author might have found other rich sources of information in addition to the old accounts of the Electoral Treasury and the Royal Library. Lipowsky, the author of the Bavarian Musical Lexicon, may possibly have made many incorrect or inexact assertions, but we can scarcely imagine that so many titles of operas and names of authors were pure fictions of his own. Lipowsky, without doubt, was acquainted with, and availed himself of, other sources of information than those consulted by Herr Rudhart, and the discovery of them should be an essential condition of all fresh labors in the same field. Such researches cannot, however, be made during a leave of absence of a few months only from official duties, but demand uninterrupted attention and a system of following up every trace discovered accidentally or intentionally for half a life. Herr Rudhart is modest enough to acknowledge the incompleteness of his production and to leave for more fortunate investigators the task of supplying its deficiencies. We will not, therefore, quarrel with him any longer for not allowing himself sufficient time to prosecute his own investigations farther.

The love of art entertained by the reigning house of Bavaria is exhibited in a brilliant light in the descriptions before us. The Electors bestowed great attention and expended considerable sums upon opera and music generally. Among the successors of Orlando Lasso there are celebrated Capellmeister and composers, encouraged and distinguished by liberal salaries, titles, and splendid presents. The catalogue of solo singers contains the names of many of the most famous artists of the day; we may, as examples cite those of Faustina Bordoni, Antonio Bernasconi, Luigi Marchesi; Anton Raaf, and Valentin Adamberger (Adamonte).

Musical biographers will find many interesting facts in Herr Rudhart's book, especially concerning the lives and compositions of the Capellmeister Jakob Porro, Jos. Kaspar Kerl, Ercole Bernabei, Gius. Anton Bernabei, Pietro Torri, Giovanni Porta, Andrea Bernasconi, and Paolo Grù; and as many concerning the best singers of the period. Especially valuable are the details relating to the clever composer and eminent organist, Jos. Kaspar Kerl. We will take the liberty, however, of correcting some trifling inaccuracies. Giov. Valentini, Imperial Capellmeister, did not die in 1630, but in 1656, at Vienna. Kerl, therefore, can very well have been his pupil. Neither the opera L'Oronte, by Kerl, or any opera of that name, was ever given in Vienna. It is true that L'Oronte, "dramma musicale in tre atti, poesia di B. Giacinto Andrea Gicognini, musica di Filippo Vismarri," was produced at the Imperial Court, Vienna, in 1660, but even the book is quite different from that of the Oronte, performed in 1657, at Munich, as may be seen by consulting Allacci's Drammaturgia and the libretto preserved in the Imperial Library. Kerl was greatly esteemed in Vienna as an organist, but no dramatic compositions by him were ever brought out there. Perhaps he tried to secure Valentini's place after the latter's decease. Antonio Bertali, however, was appointed Capellmeister to the Court, and the prospect of this fact may have been the reason of Kerl's leaving Vienna the same year (1656) and entering the Electoral service.

To the particulars given by Herr Rudhart concerning the celebrated Faustina Bordoni, we will simply add that she appeared at Vienna as far back as 1717. We find that she sang the comic part of Grilletta in an intermezzo (to the opera of Scasstri). Subsequently, in the years 1725 and 1726, she was regularly engaged in Vienna. Among her best parts were Semiramide, in Semiramide in Ascalone, by Ap. Zeno and Caldara; Lucinde, in Venceslao, by the same; Juno, in Giunone placata, by Jos. Fux; and Gianisbe in Spartaco, by Pasquini and Forsile.

It is not practicable for us to follow the author into every detail, supplying omissions or correcting errors. We must leave this task to his own well-proved seal and to those who are more interested in the affairs and resources of the Bavarian capital. We will only express our regret that, when he comes to speak of Mozart's two operas, La finta Giardiniera (1775), and Idomeneo (1781), Herr Rudhart is too modest, and refers his readers principally to Jahn's Mozart-Biographie, which, however, is not accessible to every one. Munich may be proud of having been the cause of these two works being written and of having been the first to have them performed.

Again expressing our sincere gratitude, and begging the author speedily to continue and complete his work, we must, at the same time, add the hope that he will procure the aid of some friend conversant with foreign languages. Frequent errors in foreign proper names, and in the titles of foreign operas, offend the reader's eye, and sometimes distort the sense.

Musical Gossip.

FOREIGN.

L'AFRICAIN.—In a letter from Paris, dated Aug. 30, we find the following, which, we suspect, expresses the truth with regard to Paris, however it may be as to the opera in question.

The Africaine has reached its fiftieth representation and there seems no abatement in the attraction. I can understand this, even when bearing in mind the different kinds of reception awarded by the Parisians to Guillaume Tell and La Juive. Love of good music and its thorough appreciation has nothing whatever to do with the success of the Africaine at the Grand Opera. Had the music been better than the Huguenots, or worse than Almanzor, or Marguerite d'Anjou, the fate of the Africaine would have been precisely the same. The French have very sensitive ears, and the melodies of Guillaume Tell must have pre-possessed them in a strong degree. Moreover, the opera was written for them, and their nationality was strongly appealed to. Besides, their great tenor, Nourrit, was powerful in his part, and made a new reputation for himself. Nevertheless, it is well-known that Rossini's magnificent work, which to hear once to most listeners is awakening a new feeling for music in the soul, had a mere succès d'estime at first, and nearly drove Rossini frantic with chagrin. Now all the praise lavished on the music of the Africaine seems to me to be paid indirectly to the man and not the work. I believe the Africaine to be utterly beyond the Parisian sensibilities, and think that, had it been given out as the composition of any other composer—excepting M. Halévy, whom the Parisians, if they dare give vent to their feelings, would proclaim the greatest of dramatic composers—it would have been received with indifference. But the musical public of Paris are deeply indebted to Meyerbeer. He made their city the stronghold of his genius, he produced all his great works there; he died there, and bequeathed his last masterpiece to their care and affection. Do they accept the legacy as a treasure? They admit as much, but I do not believe them. They are bound to praise and support the Africaine, but the music is above them, and is a little too comprehensive for their Gallic levities. The Africaine, nevertheless, even though it were deprived of Parisian prestige, would make its way with the artistic world. Not only every opera house of note in Europe is desirous to produce it, but negotiations are at this moment pending to have it brought out at the principal lyric theatres in America, North and South. The transatlantic impresario, M. Grau, has arrived in Paris expressly to engage a company to perform Meyerbeer's Africaine in New Orleans, in Chicago, and Havana. M. Maratzeck, the noted American manager, is likewise here with the intention of organizing a troupe to play the Africaine at New York and Boston. The Parisians, of course, will assert that all the excitement originated with them, and to a certain extent they will be right. I will not withhold from the devil his due, but that business of Guillaume Tell and the Juive sticks in my throat like Macbeth's "Amen."

* Geschichte der Oper am Hofe zu München, etc., von Fr. Rudhart. Erster Theil. Franz Dattner, Freising.—From the Vienna Recensionen.

ENCORE LISZT! (says the same letter writer). I read in a local journal that Monsignor Liszt's oratorio Sainte-Elisabeth was produced on the 15th of August, at Pesth, under the direction of the composer. The oratorio was received with boundless acclamations, and the friends of the abbé-pianist are ready to swear on any lawful testament, that Handel and Mendelssohn are forthwith utterly extinguished. The first part especially of the new oratorio seems to have created an immense sensation. Much stress is laid on a chorus of children and a duet for Elisabeth and the Margrave—I am writing in the dark—which roused the audience to the highest enthusiasm; the second part had not so éclatant a reception; but the Lisztians affirm that it is too sublime for ordinary comprehension. On the second day of the festival the Abbé's "Dante" Symphony was performed, with what result the journals do not state. Liszt has donned the clerical costume, perambulates the streets of Pesth as Abbé proper, much to the delectation of the little boys and the vendors of fruits.

SIGNOR GIUGLINI.—The Diritto of the 25th ult. gives the following sad account of the great tenor's state of mind:—"Poor Giuglini; the first physicians have examined him, and there remains no longer the least hope of his cure. This famous tenor, who held so long the first rank at her Majesty's Theatre, has still, indeed, a ray now and then of reason, but it is only of short duration. Three days ago two Italian gentlemen whom he had known at Milan came to see him at the house of the doctor, who had the care of him. Giuglini was sitting upon a couch, in a dressing-gown, with a portion of Faust in his hands. When they entered, the great singer rose to meet them, grasped them by the hand, and spoke for twenty minutes about London, Paris, Naples, and Milan. During the conversation he expressed himself with clearness and good sense, and nobody would have thought the unhappy man was mad. No sooner, however, did one of the Italians pronounce the words 'St. Petersburg,' than his eyes began to glitter and stare, and he said in a strange tone to his old friends, 'Will you go to the opera to-night? I will find you seats.' The Italians humored him, and said, 'Yes,' whereupon he gave them each a chair, and went out of the apartment. By-and-by he returned in the costume of Genaro, and sang in his own sweet manner the romance, 'Auch' io provai le tenere.' Then he went on all alone to give the last scene; his chest heaved, his face lit up with pleasure; his voice, plaintive with sighs, struck pity to the mind as he sang, with extraordinary tenderness, the words—

'Madre, se ognor lontano
Vissi dal materno seno,
A lui m'unica Iddio.'

After that he stood up to his full height for a moment, his arms grew rigid, and he fell flat like a man struck by lightning. The medical attendant was summoned directly, and found Giuglini in a state of the most complete prostration; nor from that time has he, as yet, recognised any one.

BASLE.—The first performance of Bach's Mattæus-Passion in Switzerland took place on the 16th June, before a very numerous assembly in the Minster here, and was extraordinarily successful. This fact is tantamount to the conversion of the great mass of the public, who have been previously unable to free themselves from the prejudice entertained against Bach's "learned style." It is true that a great step was taken, in 1861, towards this consummation, when the Vocal Union gave a performance of the Johannis-Passion. The greatest amount of praise is due to Herren Stockhausen and Schneider, who were exceedingly good. The other vocal solo-parts were entrusted to local artists.

VIENNA.—Cherubini's celebrated opera Les Deux Journées has been produced here with great success. Herr Beck distinguished himself in the principal character. Mdle. Ilma de Murska made her réentrée at the Court theatre in Mozart's Seraglio.

COLOGNE.—Herr M. Ernst has lately published a summary of what has been done at the Stadttheater, from the time he assumed the management, on the 16th September, 1863, up to the end of the last winter season, that is, the 1st May, 1865. During this period there were 352 operatic representations, at which 58 operas were performed, 7 of them being novelties here. In addition, there was one operetta played. Of these performances, 303 were given in Cologne; 39 in Bonn; and 10 in Aix-la-Chapelle. The German operas were: Fidelio, 14 times; Beethoven.—Lorelei (new), 15 times; Max Bruch.—Martha, 6 times; Stradella, 3 times; Flotow.—Der Deserteur (new), 3 times; Ferdinand Hiller.—Das Nachtlager, 8 times; Kreutzer.—Boss Nachbarin (new operetta), 5 times; Klerr.—Cesar und Zimmerman, 8 times; Undine (with new scenery), 25 times; Lortzing.—Hans Heiling, 5 times; Marschner.—Les Huguenots, 10 times; Robert le Diable, 5 times; Le Prophète, 5 times; Meyerbeer.—Don Juan, 15 times; Zauberflöte, 6 times; La Nozze di Figaro, 10 times; Belmonte und Constanza, once; W. A. Mozart.—Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, 7 times; Otto Nicolai.—Jessonda, 5 times; Spohr.—Tannhäuser, twice; Cola Rienzi (new), 3 times; Richard Wagner.—Der Freischütz, 15 times; Euryanthe, twice; Oberon (with new scenery), 23 times; C. M. von Weber.

The French and Italian operas represented were: Gustave, 3 times; La Muette de Portici, 8 times; Le Maçon, twice; Fra Diavolo, 7 times; Auber.—Norma, 3 times; 1 Puritani, once; La Sonnambula, once; Bellini.—La Dame Blanche, 8 times; Boïeldieu.—Les Deux Journées, 8 times; Cherubini.—Lalla Rookh (new) 6 times; Félicien David.—Lucia di Lammermoor, 5 times; Lucresia Borgia, 3 times; La Fille du Regiment, 3 times; Don Sebastian (new), twice; Donizetti.—Faust, 16 times; Gounod.—La Juive, 17 times; Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, 5 times; Halévy.—Zampa, once; Hérold.—Joseph en Egypte, 6 times; Méhul.—Les Dragons de Villars, twice; Lara (new), 10 times; Maillart.—Rhein-Nixen (new), twice; Orpheus in der Unterwelt, 10 times; Offenbach.—Il Barbiere, 6 times; Guillaume Tell, 9 times; Otello, 3 times; Rossini; Il Trovatore, 17 times; Rigoletto, 6 times; Verdi.

LONDON. After midsummer, and after the musical season proper, follows the Mel(l)on season,—about the only fruit of much importance yielded by this corner of the musical field in the months of August and September. The Times man, bound to be on hand in season and out of season, reports as follows:

Mr. Alfred Mellon is keeping up the good custom, instituted by the late M. Jullien, of devoting occasional evenings to the works of the great masters. Not long since the whole first part of the concert was absorbed by Mendelssohn, from whose compositions were selected the descriptive overture, Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt, suggested by one of Goethe's poems; the first pianoforte concerto, the "Munich Concerto" as Mendelssohn himself used to call it, played with wonderful vigor by little Fräulein Marie Krebs, the "Lady of the Curtseys;" the romance called "The first Violet," sung by Mdle. Liebhardt; and the overture and incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream—as rich a programme as could have possibly been made out. Later, Mr. Mellon gave what he called a "Gounod night." On this occasion the first part was exclusively taken up by music chosen from the works of the admired composer of Faust. Though by no means a Mendelssohn, M. Gounod has quite sufficient variety to sustain the interest of an entire section of a concert programme; and this was shown in the result. The selection from Gounod comprised the overture to La Médecin malgré lui; the Paganini March from La Reine de Saba; the "Meditation" on J. S. Bach's first Prelude—Second Symphony (in E flat)—an early work. On Thursday night it was the turn of Beethoven, whose name exercised the accustomed spell, and, as usual, attracted a vast multitude of amateurs. The programme contained only one piece with which Mr. Mellon's supporters were unlikely to be more or less familiar. This was the overture to King Stephen, which on account of its light, sparkling, and agreeable character, would, if often heard, be tolerably sure of becoming popular. It was played not merely with vigor, but with a nice attention to detail that showed how thoroughly Mr. Mellon must have made himself master of the score. The concert began with the Pastoral Symphony, "repeats" excepted, given without curtailment and finely given from end to end. The concerto was the fifth and last of the pianoforte series—the one in E flat, which, among compositions of its class, stands alone and unapproachable. No symphony excels in grandeur and variety this truly marvellous inspiration. Mdle. Marie Krebs played the pianoforte part with extraordinary spirit, point, and intelligence, combined with an execution no less brilliant than accurate. At the conclusion she was overwhelmed with applause, and afterwards unanimously called back to the orchestra. There was only one vocal piece—the plaintive air of Marcellina, from Fidelio, sung with genuine and unaffected expression by Mdle. Liebhardt, who in almost every style of music seems to be more or less at home.

For Monday evening Mr. Mellon announces a "Selection" from Meyerbeer's last grand opera, the Africaine, arranged by himself.

The first part of Thursday's programme was devoted to works by Haydn and Weber. Perhaps no other two masters that could be named have so little in common; but as both were men of original genius, the combination seemed all the more attractive. The first piece was the symphony containing the characteristic andante known as the "Clock Movement," on account of a rhythmic peculiarity in the accompaniment recalling the measured beat of a pendulum. The last was the fiery and impetuous overture to Euryanthe. With Mdle. Marie Krebs at hand, the brilliant Concertstück in F was, as a matter of course, expected, in a selection from Weber's music. And most brilliantly it was played, from first to last, by the gifted and indefatigable little pianist, who took the first and last "allegros" at bravura speed, and whose spirit and energy never for one instant flagged.

None were surprised, though all were gratified, at hearing some of Haydn's delightful canzonets, in a selection from Haydn's works. Madame Krebs Michalesi chose two of the most beautiful of these gems of expressive melody—"She never told her love," and the "Mermaid." She sang them both remarkably well, her correct pronunciation of the English language being as worthy notice as her unaffected style. Madame Krebs was supported at the pianoforte by her clever daughter, who had to transpose the somewhat florid accompaniment of the "Mermaid." An air from one of Weber's operas was equally a sine qua non; and the one selected by Mdle. Liebhardt—the last of Annchen's two songs in Der Freischütz—was exactly the sort of thing to please the audience. Rarely has Mdle. Liebhardt sung with more spirit and vivacity. She gave quite a dramatic reading of the air, and fairly enchanted her hearers. Called back unanimously, she had no option but to repeat the quick movement. Altogether, the Haydn-Weber selection was a musical treat of the highest order.

The Orchestra has been waging war against the "Monster Concert" system, singling out for especial reprobation Mr. Howard Glover, composer of English operas and songs, and musical critic of the Morning Post, his articles in which have been distinguished for learning, fine discrimination, and earnest pleading for high art. But he was tempted to follow in the wake of Jullien, Benedict, and others, and perform the monstrous while he preached the legitimate. The storm raised about it succeeded in ousting him from the critical chair. But it is now stated that he has been recalled on condition that he will be a good boy in future, give no more monster concerts, and not write songs for singers—a queer branch of trade among the musical profession in London, innocent and proper as the thing would seem to be.

The Orchestra says "The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung has just found out that we have had a Handel Festival in England!" We wonder how long it will take the London Orchestra to find out that we have had a whole week's Festival of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Boston, on a scale at least comparable to that of Birmingham! It is careful never to find out such things about "the Yankees"; but it makes a show (now and then) of keeping its readers informed of musical doings in America, and is very careful always to select only the most trivial things and ignore all that is of any artistic importance in our musical record. It will tell of our Ethiopian Minstrelsy and say nothing of our Oratorios and Symphonies. Suppose that we should limit our summary of English musical intelligence to the "Music Hall," and be mum about the Philharmonics, Charles Halle, Covent Garden Opera, &c.!

DOMESTIC.

WORCESTER, MASS. We copy the following from the Spy of the 21st, partly as an item of local news, but more for its wholesome sentiment:

MUSIC, FLORID AND OTHERWISE.—ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.—Emerson, after beholding Mrs. Fanny Kemble Butler, exclaimed—"What quantity!" He might exclaim again at the dresses and adornments of our women, at our exaggeration in everything, in art, in literature, in sentiment, and almost in philanthropy. Even music is disesteemed unless noisy and florid to the extremity of human possibility. An orchestra without abundance of brass is tame now-a-days. Organs must be built of proportions sufficiently huge to fill nearly beyond endurance enormous public halls, which are themselves monstrous exaggerations. The pitch of music has been constantly going up to furnish the occasion and the necessity for that sort of shouting and bellowing which passes for vocalization. In fact one may go the rounds of the concert halls and the academies (!) of music without hearing much that deserves to be called singing, and what little there is not only fails to elicit applause but is esteemed insipid and tiresome. Neither in song nor in symphony is the music allowed to speak for itself, to display its own inherent strength or weakness. Intensity of sound, volume of noise make feebleness of meaning pass for more than its value.

When Rossini, the great Italian master, began to compose for the stage, he found the performers addicted to the habit of embellishing the music with superfluous ornaments, wherein they were able to make a display of their own special gifts, necessarily, for the most part, sacrificing the author to their own glory. A just taste prompted him to undertake the reform of this abuse. He accordingly wrote such embellishments as were fit and proper, and strictly forbade any other. Decidedly, vocal music reached its culmination in this man. No author before or since has written so well in general for the voice. His would-be imitators, like all imitators, have gone beyond the model, and so nourished the very vice which he did so much to eradicate. Since he has left the field of dramatic composition, there has grown up a false and meretricious style, which excites only disgust in minds possessed of a pure taste. The opera has become an affair of diamonds, white kids, and extravagance in dress generally, as well as of powerful lungs and exaggerated sentiment. Still there are a few who have not bowed the knee to this modern Baal, and that portion of them who reside in Worcester and vicinity are, as we are happy to learn, to be gratified with hearing one of the most interesting of the works of this extraordinary genius, to be performed by the Hamilton Club of this city, on Friday evening of next week. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" is the feast to which the public are invited.

Crowded out—all the rest.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 30, 1865.

Music in Boston.

ORGAN CONCERTS. Throughout the summer, and still continued every Wednesday and Saturday noon and every Sunday evening, the performances on the Great Organ at the Music Hall have furnished thus far about the only public music of much account as music,—that is to say, as Art. The organ front has recently been cleaned, so that all shines again, enhancing the attraction as an object of sight. The attendance, for such quiet and frequent occasions, has been larger than in past seasons, and indeed seems steadily increasing at a moderate rate. The veteran concert-goer is more and more struck by two things: first, the very silent, respectful and intently engaged aspect of the audience; all seem to look and listen with profound interest, and indeed with wonder; for, in the second place, you are struck also by the absence of familiar faces: these are audiences of strangers, summer visitors who seek out the "lions" of the "hub;" a totally new set of faces every time. We ought to know the musical faces of our city pretty well by this time; yet it is literally a fact that in twenty odd visits to the Music Hall, with the exception of a few listening organists, directors, &c., our eyes have scarcely once lit upon a person whom we knew even by sight. It seems to show that the attraction of the Organ contradicts the law of gravitation, at all events is not inversely as the squares of the distances. But it is also clear that whoever is drawn into its sphere enjoys being there and turns his back on it reluctantly; these pilgrimages are in almost every instance (with just exceptions enough to prove the rule) acknowledged satisfactory and rewarding. The greater is the wonder, therefore, that our own people, those who live under the very shadow of this grand temple of exhaustless harmonies, should appear so indifferent to the rare privilege of having "in their midst" one of the greatest, possibly the most perfect, organ in the world, with constant opportunities of hearing plenty both of the real and great organ music (Bach, &c.) and of the lighter and more fantastical sort. But Boston people are like most others, with their multifarious occupations, careless of opportunities which are thoroughly secured and anchored within reach, and which seemingly have lost their novelty. Seemingly only; for in truth the only intrinsic real novelty is that which lies latent in a great thing and requires time and perpetual revisiting to bring it out and realize it. There is more novelty for us in Bach, or Shakespeare, if we will only seek for it, than in the whole music and poetry of to-day and yesterday, and very likely of to-morrow. Genius is always new, always has a new side or phase for us; whereas mere novelty-seeking talent only succeeds in producing fashions, momentary shows, passing effects, and never any thing new, because never any thing lasting. He lives the newest, freest, richest life from day to day, he enjoys the most of novelty, who does not run away from the familiar and the old merely because it has stood within reach (outwardly) for some time already. He has seen it, listened to it, but has he even begun to know it? In fact all that he knows of it is the outward announcement of it, and what he is running after is not new things, but only new announcements. Most of the pleasure-seeking, in music as in all things, is only a perpetual reading of new advertisements, seldom a taking of the thing home to one's own heart and soul.

Now these Organ Concerts are very quiet occasions; to our own citizens there is of course no bustle and excitement about them, no fashionable crowd, no rare display. He that goes to them often, goes as quietly as he would walk into his own garden, or sit at his own window letting his soul fill with the sunset. He sits as if alone, or in sympathetic quiet with a few, and is soothed, is filled, is roused and lifted up by sweet or glorious music. He has left the crowd, the bustle and the glitter of the world and quietly slipped into a temple where, by the ministration of tones, he may enter into communion with what is holiest, purest, sweetest, freest, most eternal in his own soul. The great utterances of Bach, the tender breathings of the soul of Mendelssohn, even many of the sweet and strangely varied combinations of the lighter modern organ music, offer him this opportunity; and be the composer who he may, from Bach to Gounod or Batiste, there is no organ in the world better suited to do justice to his thought. Our organists, too, young and earnest, constantly improving, are well up to the level of their task both in the "classical" and in the "light." Be it understood, however, that we do not cease to quarrel with the policy which assigns a larger, or even an equal share to the "light." Real organ music, such as Bach wrote greater and more inexhaustible than all writers since, is the kind which most satisfies and edifies in the long run. The organists of late have commonly given him a respectful place in their programmes; some have devoted their attention largely to him. But it is still not a very creditable comment on the administration of the Organ, that such an organist, such a devout disciple and interpreter of Bach as Mr. PAINE, and so musician-like and clever withal in his own productions, should have been called upon to play just once during the entire summer, while all the others play continually. The only motive can be that he will not compromise the dignity of the instrument and of the artist in the matter of his programmes; and that, we say, is not a creditable motive. We shall be too happy to learn that we are mistaken in this imputation. Mr. Paine has played once, Sept. 2nd. The audience seemed about as large and as attentive as any, although his own peculiar audience (many of the most earnest music-lovers of Boston and Cambridge, who make it a point to go when he plays) were not visible, that class being particularly fond of mountains and seashore at this season. He played first the noble Fantasia in G by Bach, which Mr. Lang first introduced at these concerts, and to which one can never weary of listening, it is so full and deep in the principal Grave movement, and so exquisitely led in and led out by the airy arpeggio passage at the beginning and end. Then two of the Choral Variations (or Vorspiele): "Nun kommt der Heiden Heiland" and "Freuet euch, ihr Christen alle!", which are among the most poetic and full of deep, tender piety of all the forms in which Bach loved to write. Then a Sonata by Ritter,—not the one with variations on the Dutch national hymn, but a new one and a far nobler one in E minor (op. 19), one of the best additions to the repertoire of late. Then followed a Pastorale from Spohr's Historical Symphony; some extremely interesting selections from a MS. Mass of Mr. Paine's (contralto solo and chorus, Qui tollis, with orchest. oblig., and choral fugue: In gloria Dei Patris, Amen!) Finally an improvisation, in which a dignified theme was really treated, the thing developing into the unity of a composition worth preserving. In all this Mr. P. displayed the noblest powers of the full organ in a masterly manner, while there was no lack of tasteful and expressive alternation upon softer stops.

We could not keep the run of all the concerts, and can only make a few more notes, limiting ourselves to the present month. Mr. LANG has given us on various occasions, of Bach: that same Fantasia in G, a Concerto in G (three comparatively small movements), and the lovely Pastoral in F; of Mendelssohn: that third Sonata (in A), which he has made so peculiarly his own, transcriptions of March in Athalia, of Nocturne in Midsummer Night's Dream music, and overture to the same; of Beethoven, the Quartet in Fidelio; of Weber, Oberon overture; of Meyerbeer, the Dinorah overture, which lends itself well to his very felicitous tact in fanciful and delicate combinations and contrasts of stops; he makes really quite a poetic and romantic little dream of it. All these things he has played repeatedly before, but he always offers some new shade of refinement in the treatment, more especially the coloring. His one new thing, and about his most remarkable effort in the way of transcription, has been his arrangement of themes from Tannhäuser.

Mrs. FRODOCK has played Bach's great Pascaglia (we take for granted it was the great one in C minor), Prelude in E flat, and one or two Fugues; Mendelssohn's Sonata, No. 6, and Prelude and Fugue in C minor: an Andante and Jesu bone Pastor by Mozart; some selections from Haydn's Symphonies and "Creation;" a Handel chorus or two; Variations by Rink, Pastorale from "Tell," &c. This lady is more and more recognized as one of the sterling organists, and certainly she is most enterprising and in earnest. Boston must keep her.

Mr. WHITING has played a wide variety. Among other things (we have not all the programmes at hand), the glorious Bach Toccata in F; one of Schumann's Fugues on "B.A.C.H.;" Paine's Star-spangled Banner Variations, (handsome on Mr. W.'s part); selections from Beethoven (Eymont overture, Symphony and Sonata movements); a Pastoral, and Variations on the English national air "America;" selections from Meyerbeer, Rossini (Cujus animam), Donizetti, Wely, &c. His playing is much admired.

Mr. WILLCOX has played once this month, and never were we more impressed by the graceful facility with which he commands the stops and changes of the instrument. Very effective and artistic in their way were his renderings of a Gloria by Hummel, a brilliant Offertoire by Batiata, larger in its conception than most of those things, and the sparkling little Zanetta overture, which, though child's play for the organ, is very pretty child's play; also his improvisation on the 8th Gregorian Tone.—Mr. HENRY CARTER, also, has played once.

SACRED THEATRE CONCERTS (left-handed and otherwise). There were queer doings at the Boston Theatre last Sunday evening, in the shape of a so-called "Sacred Concert," designed, it appears, not only to "inaugurate" the musical season, but also to fix the permanent headquarters of Boston music at the afore-said temple of Tragedy, Comedy and Sensation Spectacle, and compell it to take its key-note and character from the tone of that institution. That is to say, Mr. Jarrett, the enterprising and popular manager, has got an uncommonly good theatrical orchestra this season, larger and more select than is usual in theatres, with a smart conductor for the light, brilliant style of mere amusement music in Mr. KOPF, who plays pi-colo solos in his conductor's chair to the immense delight of the multitude; an orchestra, equipped with an excellent bassoon, which Boston has strangely lacked, and excellent instruments altogether; the pure and brilliant sonority of the band, and smart, clear execution, is rather remarkable. Certainly a very creditable piece of liberal theatre management. But now, to utilize this orchestral material to the utmost, besides furnishing a nice little light concert as it were every night between the acts of the drama, what does our manager do? Why he conceives the idea of "inaugurating" an indefinite if not interminable series of Sunday Evening Concerts in his theatre, with Herr Koppitz and his orchestra enlarged to fifty (including "the best talent of Boston and New York"), with Mr. JAMES M. WEHLI, the wonderfully brilliant presti-digitateur of the piano, for central attraction, and a number of singers: Miss ANNA GRANGER, soprano, Mr. D. B. WYLLIE, a smooth voiced tenor, attached to the theatre, and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, the basso. All this, we presume, was carried out to the letter of the announcement. It was called a Sacred concert to conciliate the law; but how far it was sacred in intention, or even elevated in an intellectual and artistic sense may be judged from the programme, which we presume also was carried out to the letter.

The opening overture was that to Wallace's Lurline, or Loreley—neither subject nor composer interesting to a very serious mood of mind. Then came a couple of vocal solos belonging to the smaller order of religious compositions, just sacred enough for an excuse; viz. a Tantum Ergo by Mercadante and an Ave Maria by Gounod, with such accompaniment as to make it evident that Gounod's melody put upon Bach's little harpsicord Prelude is what was meant. Then appeared Mr. Wehli and played his pretty "Trembling Leaves" (all of a sacred tremor, we suppose) and his sacred "Bacchanale"—sacred of course, to Bacchus, also to the Money gods. Part II began with a "jubilee overture" by Flotow, who wrote Martha; we cannot say it was not profoundly religious, as we were not there to hear. Then a vocal trio from Haydn's "Creation," which was well enough, if only well enough sung, as we presume it was. The services were continued with a piece of left-handed worship, Mr. Wehli solemnly officiating with that wonderful left hand of his, which is always trying to beat both hands, and doing it, to the delight and admiration of all the "European and American Press," as duly set forth in glowing paragraph upon the concert bills, in his celebrated Lucia Fantasia. After the vast congregation had had a little time to recover from the great strain and excitement of this strange spiritual exercise, probably "without its equal" in a Methodist revival meeting, a Saltre Regina, composed by one Lechner, was blown on three trumpets, orchestra accompanying. Then came the Benediction, or perhaps Accipitation, after the following formula: "Tender and true, Adieu!" being a song composed by Alfred H. Pense. And finally the congregation were "played out," in torchlight procession, by the orchestra to the tune of Meyerbeer's Fuckeltanz. Such, it seems, was the very interesting service which it was our misfortune and that of many of our neighbors, last Sunday evening to lose. Now a few comments, by way of "improvement."

1. We have no objection to Sacred Concerts in any true sense of the word. We have no objection to Concerts—any kind of Concerts which we would not equally object to at all times—on Sunday evenings. But we do object to calling a concert sacred, when it has nothing sacred in it, and is chiefly made up of the lightest sort of ad captandum musical pastime. Such misnomers are demoralizing; to some extent all religious profession is so, or is in danger of becoming so. The most sacred experiences are those which we do not parade nor profess. But now, in sober earnest, properly considered, all really noble, deep, inspired, great music is sacred; that is, it harmonizes with the deepest, finest chords, the most spiritual experiences, the most divine aspirations of our nature; it speaks to the ideal and unselfish part of us; it emancipates the soul from the slavery of worldly cares, protects it from frivolous distractions, supplying real nutriment instead, lifts us nearer God and gives us a realizing sense of the soul's high, immortal destiny. Surely this cannot be said of all music; least of all, of the music which is merely made to display execution, to astonish by technical brilliancy, dealing in tricks of effect and not in meanings of Art. It can be said of the Symphonies of Beethoven, the great works of Bach and Handel and all the masters down.

Nobody's religious feeling can the hearing of such music possibly disturb or postpone, unless the composition is spoiled by some vanity in the rendering. On the contrary, such music is in complete and strengthening accord with all that the religious nature craves and strives for. Therefore we really know of no better way in which a Sunday evening could be spent, than in listening to good music in this sense. But we would not have it called "Sacred," because that at once taints it with a sanctimonious or a false profession. The term sacred in music has its technical and accepted sense; let it be kept to that; it means music written and intended for the church, or for some religious service or occasion. To the more trivial kind of music we have no objection at any time, when it does not take the place of anything better, provided that it does not abridge the opportunities of higher music, and provided that we are not obliged to hear it unless we happen to be in the mood for it. We think Mr. Jarrett and all concerned would do a far better thing to take hold and agitate the repeal of the foolish restrictive Sunday law, than to give so-called "sacred" concerts. Let us be free to hear the Symphonies on Sunday or whenever we please, and without nicknaming them "sacred." The motive of these Theatre concerts certainly is not Religion; neither is it Art; it is simply money; and in this sense they are sacred concerts according to the old saying "Auri sacra fames."

2. In the interest of Music as a high Art, of classical, good music in Boston, we looked upon the announcement of this theatre invasion of the domain of music not without alarm; an alarm which has been confirmed by what report, privately circulated, says of the intention and spirit of the manager. How will it affect the chances of good classical concerts, "Philharmonic," Symphony concerts in Boston this winter? And that is asking how will it affect the growth of a higher musical taste? Were Boston as well stocked with musicians as London, it would not matter. But an orchestra is indispensable to a grand concert. Nearly all our musicians drudge in theatres five nights, and lately six nights, in the week. Sunday alone is left for concerts; if the Theatre monopolizes that too, and for music only up to its own standard, are not Beethoven and his admirers nicely left out in the cold? We hear it hinted, nay asserted, that the Manager openly avows his intention to control and monopolize the concert business of Boston this winter; that the musicians, the fiddlers, the oboes, the long desiderated bassoon, are to move only at his beck and bidding; that he cannot spare them to help out anybody else's concerts, however classical and unworldly in their aim; that the so-called "popular" music is to have full swing henceforth and all else must quit the field.

We hope these rumors are exaggerations. But, in any case, it is hard to see, how all the musicians can be preoccupied for light mere fashionable music seven nights in the week and leave any chance for what the real music-lovers want. Any attempt, however, at such dictation and unamiable exclusiveness, once understood, would be sure to unite all reasonable parties against a manager, and so the evil would soon cure itself.

We have no personal feeling whatever in the matter, and have only bronched these fears on the principle of forewarned is fore-armed.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 25.—The musical season has been fairly inaugurated, at least so far as the concert hall goes, by the first performances of the new troupe of artists, Madame PAREPA, and Messrs. DANNREUTHER and ROSK, engaged by M. Bateman for a three months' tour in this country. Madame Parepa, the prima donna of the company, is a Scotch lady, of English and Wallachian parentage (the latter fact having given a very fair thread to sensation biographers, whereby to hang a tale of her Greek extraction), who enjoys a most honorable position among the resident London sopranis. The lady's voice is a true soprano, of excellent quality throughout its extent, of great power and sufficient flexibility. Her style of singing is characterized by healthy vigor, possessing much physical verve (as distinguished from impassioned warmth), but never degenerating into extremes. Her tone is full, open, and well sustained, her scale passages clear, and her shake steady and distinct. Her musical education has evidently been more eclectic than that of the majority of our concert singers, for she does not confine herself to the Italian repertoire alone, having given arias from Oberon, Freyschütz, Judas Maccabæus, &c. But the lady's choice in the matter of ballads is not of the best, especially as regards the compositions of Mr. Ganz, however desirable these latter may be as to the display of Madame Parepa's fine shake. But they are musical platitudes. Mme. Parepa's manner and appearance are such as to secure her the popular appreciation.

M. DANNREUTHER, the pianist, also hails, at least lately, from London, where he has established himself as an admired concert player at musical entertainments of the highest stamp, and as a successful professor in Belgravia, despite his twenty years, for a young professor finds popularity difficult of attainment in an old country. Edward Dannreuther, although an Alsatian by birth, is legally a United States citizen, having come to America in early boyhood. He is an admirable pianist, and an intelligent, true musician; he does not make use of the piano-forte merely in order to display his remarkable technical ability, nor does he coquet with the instrument, like so many others; but he uses it as a means of performing the works of our great masters, with reverence and earnestness. His manner is modest and free from affectation, his conception of the works he performs is correct, and his technical means are so perfect as to render each performance a complete æsthetical picture, even in the smallest details. Bach, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, etc., are awakened to ideal life under his fingers; and if we sometimes desire a little more physical force and passion, the finer characteristics of these masters lose nothing at his hands. His rendering of Chopin's compositions is especially deserving of admiration; Edward Dannreuther possesses exactly the poetic feeling, the gentle and tender expression, absolutely needed in an exponent of this exceptional composer. The young artist's phrasing is very careful and intelligent, his touch clear and distinct, his scales, passages, and trills finished, even in the faintest piano. The Steinway Grand used by Herr Dannreuther at these concerts is one of the finest Pianos we have ever heard from this celebrated manufactory.

The violinist and youthful concert-meister from Hamburg, CARL ROSÉ, is an equally interesting and remarkable artist. His tone is clear, pure, noble; he masters all the technical difficulties of his instrument with ease, and unaffectedly. His bowing is elegant and admirable, as we might expect from a distinguished pupil of Ferdinand David, and an artist who has modelled his style upon that of Joachim. We have heard him play the violin Sonatas, and the great Chaconne of Bach, as well as compositions of Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, and were delighted with his rendering of them. It is to be regretted that the general public is not warm in the reception of such lofty creations, and that the young artist is forced by circumstances to make a partial choice of effect pieces, unartistic in their tendency, and opposed to his own sympathies.

LANCELOT.

HARTFORD, CONN. A correspondent writes us:

"The Beethoven Society, on Monday, commenced in earnest their regular rehearsals after their summer recess. This Society has been in existence nearly seven years, and has from its commencement been under the direction of JAMES G. BARNETT, a thorough English musician. During this time they have studied works of the highest character. On the list we find, of Mendelssohn's writings: 'Elijah,' 'Hymn of Praise,' Lauda Zion, 'Hear my Prayer,' 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (music), and selections from 'St. Paul,' 'Athalie,' and many of his lighter compositions; Handel's 'Messiah,' 'Acis and Galatea,' and portions of 'Samson' and other oratorios; Haydn's 'Creation,' 'Last Seven Words on the Cross,' 'The Seasons'; Loewe's 'Seven Sleepers'; Rossini's Stabat Mater, and selections of the most pleasing portions of his many operas; Weber's Oberon. Van Bree's 'Saint Cecilia'; Romberg's 'Transient and Eternal,' and 'Harmony of the Spheres'; J. G. Barnett's 'Life of the Blessed,' and many other first-class compositions.

The energy displayed by the officers of the Society in its management, and the great amount of vocal talent to be found among its members, has enabled them to perform many of the above works in a very intelligent and superior manner; and they have manifested in their different performances a desire to do justice to the conceptions of the great and inspired thoughts of the immortal composers. They have been very materially aided by first-class instrumental talent engaged at great expense from Boston and New York, including the Mendelssohn Quintet Club and Germania Society; and also have they been aided in their successful performances of the 'Elijah,' 'Messiah' and 'Creation' by Dr. Guilmette, whose splendid voice and intelligent conception of whatever he has to sing place him very high in all that relates to classical vocal music. The officers of the Society have been re-elected: Charles Canfield, as President; W. H. Hill, Secretary; J. G. Barnett, Conductor; and W. J. Babcock, Organist. The Society have now on their list upwards of two hundred names. They commenced the season with the rehearsal of Costa's Oratorio of 'Eli,' placed within their reach by the enterprising house of Oliver Ditson & Co. They intend bringing out this work in all its magnificent proportions without delay. They have also several other interesting works on their list for the ensuing fall and winter."

ROCHESTER, SEPT. 19. Not being in town at the time of Mr. MORGAN's two concerts in July, I can chronicle his success only upon hearsay. Pecuniarily, it was better than the average of the concerts of the tour, judging from the notices of the press elsewhere. Artistically, it must have surpassed all of them, since he had, (as I think) the best instrument he met with on the route, that presided over by Mr. Penfield, in the Central Presbyterian Church, the officers of which society are justly entitled to thanks for their liberality and public spirit. Mr. Penfield will give us occasional organ treats during the autumn. We hope also to hear something from the touch of your Mrs. FRODOCK.

Mr. HENRI APPY gave a Concert last evening in Washington Hall, assisted by Miss Clara Strauss, vocalist, Mr. Carlo Morra, pianist, and Mr. Bauer, accompanist. Mr. Appy's violin performances were, of course, the gems of the evening. He gave the Concerto in A of De Beriot; Bravoura Variations on airs in Massaniello, by Hauman; Norma Variations, and "The Dream," both by himself; the latter sans accompaniment, and with the G string tuned a minor-third below. His playing was marked by all his usual breadth and completeness of style. He was recalled each time, but responded only after the "Dream," when he gave a balladistic air with some very rich double stopping. When will the American public be educated up to the point of expecting and demanding of such artists as Mr. A., something from the classics of the art!

Mr. MORRA is a late arrival and proposes to make Rochester his home. His selections for the evening were gotten up sufficiently after the Thalberg-Gottschalk style to "take" the young ladies, and he no doubt will soon find plenty of pupils. Miss STRAUSS is not a great artist, but was well received, the accompanist performing his part judiciously.

I should say by the way, that a certain lady not a hundred miles from Syracuse has recently, with the ecclesiastical sanctions in such cases made and provided, been made 'Appy, entitling our violinist to transfer the initial of his pre-nomen to his ad-nomen, he being essentially and matrimonially now a h-appy man.

T. B. A.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.
Enticement. (Lockung.) F. Dessauer. 30

A favorite German song, with English and German words. Dreamy and soothing, the "Enticement" merely being, to stroll out in the moonlight, and to fall into a reverie by the side of a cool, murmuring brook.

Where shall the Beautiful rest? Duet.

J. O. Starkweather. 30

A reprint of a piece, known to those who have sung it, as one of the most beautiful of duets. For two voices of about equal compass, as they cross occasionally.

Soft and Low. From the "Mock Doctor," by Gounod. 35

One of the favorite songs in Gounod's comic opera, which, in England is having good success. The music is "soft and low, as when light rills flow," and is quite taking.

Leggero Invisible. (O light invisible.) Ardito. 40

A charming, light, airy Italian air, with a kind of intangible beauty, like the sentiment of the poem. One of the most effective kind of songs for a sweet, flexible soprano or tenor voice. Has Italian and English words.

Early love. Ballad. F. Musgrave. 30

A pretty song about "Mother," and, which is a recommendation, bringing in "Father" too. Sung in the famous drama of "Milk White," at the Boston Museum, by Miss Annie Clark.

The "Telligent Contraband. C. Pattengill. 30

A comic song, which has been successful in Ethiopian concerts in Boston.

The Beaming Stars. (Die Sterne schau'n in stiller Nacht.) F. Mendelssohn. 35

A "blond maiden" sitting by the bedside of her sick mother, requests the stars to exert their quieting influence, and soothe the invalid to slumber; who reply, that a guardian angel has already descended, and the sufferer's eyes are closing. The music, of course, is good and appropriate.

Instrumental.

Nocturne. In C minor. Op. 48. No. 1.

F. Chopin.

A composition which will be melancholy, or deep and mysterious, or somewhat lulling, according as one happens to feel while playing it. Difficult, of course, and requires careful study.

Pratten's recreations. Flute and Piano.

Santa Maria. "Dinorah," by Meyerbeer. 30

The Power of Love. "Satanella," by Balfe. 30

Two very pretty melodies for the Flute, (or Violin,) and Piano. Not difficult, and the Piano accompaniment quite tasteful.

Tandem Galop. J. P. Clarke. 30

Perfectly easy, and quite musical. Has a line or two of singing in the "Trio."

Welcome to Spring. (Frühling's Eingang.) For six hands. Th. Oesten. 75

Six hand pieces are excellent practice, and, with a good arrangement, like the present one, make powerful and excellent music. Easy, and a good exhibition piece.

A waltz song. For small hands. T. Oesten. 30

This is No. 1 of three pieces, called Kinderrindchen or Children's songs, and is a very neat waltz, so arranged as to fit very easily to the motions of the finger, and there are no chords too "stretchy" for a child's hand.

Books.

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE CABINET ORGAN. 50

An excellent method is here furnished for that popular instrument. The elements and exercises are found in a simple form, and are followed by a number of simple and pleasing airs and songs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 640.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 14, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 15.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Violin and Violoncello.

BY MISS E. A. STARR.

O tender Viols, that with more than touch
Of mortal pathos haunt my memory still,
It is no trick of art or cunning skill
That starts my tears and moves my heart to such A plaintive sweetness; as if life so much
Of joy had known the brimming cup must spill,
And thus send heavenward, in a shinin' rill,
The joys too sacred for this world to clutch.
No wonder that those pious artists old
In angel hands my favorite viols place;
The calm cheek touching, with a blissful grace,
The instrument, whose harmonies unfold
A love no mortal lip has ever told—
The Seraph's spark, which fires our human race.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Ad Ultimum.

Yes, I can wait—although about my heart
The serpent-coils grow closer every hour,
And keen despair, relentless in its power,
Drive through my spirit like a fiery dart.
I will endure, though nerve and sinew start;
I will arise, although the darkness lower
Across my pathway, and my soul shall tower
To reach thy face, though life and death bear part
To bind me down. And there shall come a day,
My soul's requital, when, though fierce the fray,
I shall have struggled up, through toil and wrong,
To stand before you, patient, steadfast, strong,
And in your calm eye-depths to read my fate,
Eternal joy!—Beloved, I can wait.

A. A. C.

The Present State of Music.

(Continued from page 106.)

(Translated for this Journal from Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

Such is the Opera of the Present. It is peculiar to the time, and a necessity thereof. It fills every stage; consumes the marrow of all theatres; compels them all to the most unlimited outlay, and in order to hold up under it appeals to popular appetite as well as to princely subvention; goads and teases the contractors into every means of attraction and excitement; digs up things buried in oblivion; sets its Flotows to work garnishing Suabian love-songs with mouldy Fioravanti finery boiled over; pours an endless whirl and confusion into the ears, and jumbles together all times and nations and kinds, the shallowest with the deepest, truth and falsehood, poetic invention and vulgar commonplace. It is hard, if not impossible, for the composer, if he bear something nobler in his mind, to evade the claims to which the opera public has become accustomed. Powerful orchestral means, massive choruses, extravagance of diction, pompous outfit, a morbid craving for outward novelty: these, as matters stand, have become the conditions of success; and success is, on the stage more than anywhere, the condition of effective labor; non-success, whether deserved or not, is easily decisive of the question of life or death.

It is easily conceivable, therefore, that musicians were found ready for a direction which seemed to promise a more chaste expenditure of their art. It was in Berlin that the restoration of Greek tragedies was first tried with the support of music; Antigone was the first attempt, and Mendelssohn the composer. It is equally well known that this work won great respect in and out of Germany, nay that it was many times greeted with admiration as a step towards a higher future. If our music would ever admit of being wedded to the antique Tragedy at all, it could not, essentially, have been better done than it was by Mendelssohn; the repose and reserve of the Sophoclean poetry, as contrasted with the stormier passion and more heavy and decided tread of the drama of Aeschylus, must have suited his temperament peculiarly. For the proper might and lofty grandeur of the Drama was not given to himself; indeed it was quite contradictory to his finely reserved, more sympathetic than originally creative nature. This is proved by the dramatic tasks to which he set himself: the Loreley, which he wrote with Geibel; the Tempest, which he once wanted to write with Immermann; the Midsummer Night's Dream and the Marriage of Camacho.

But, apart from every personality, the restoration of the Greek Tragedy, especially the Antigone—hailed with whatever professional glee by the philologists, and however admired by "cultivated society"—so eager, in its blanc state, for something new and classical, something suited as it were to its nobility of birth and intellect—was an undertaking foreign to the present time and life. We can (and who would willingly forego the pleasure?) read the ancients for ourselves, and our imagination can dream itself, more or less lively, into their existence and its leading thoughts and principles; where this fails, we have knowledge and understanding to skip what is strange and foreign to our mode of being, and secure the enjoyment of what is accessible. Thus over the silent book of the poet we are delighted with the charming sports of the elves that "creep into acorn cups and hide them there;" the dreamy fancy "swifter than the moon's sphere" is drawn into their dances, although for us (Germans) they have not even the reality of a live popular legend. But it is another thing when the stage undertakes to bring back this long drained life in palpable downright actuality. No longer then does imagination, like a kindly mediator, convince us; the corporeal eye sees what is corporeal, and the understanding peremptorily demands and sees reality wherever it is present bodily, and allows of sympathy only so far as we recognize in that reality our own, the contents of our own life. Here already we are unable to follow the old poet. The power of morality and law stands eternal, but the forms thereof in Antigone are foreign to our life. That the burial of a legitimate king's son should be forbidden on penalty of death and this be recognized as law; that at the same time burial should be regarded as essential to the final welfare of the soul of the slain, and that the sister should be driven by the ties of blood and custom to violation of the law and to her own death: all this is so strange to us, that we can only sympathize with the understanding, not with the incredulous feeling. How can music be awakened there, true music of the whole soul stirred to its inmost depths? And how shall it take root and blossom in the diction of the Greek, which is almost entirely given up to outward intuition and reflection? It would have to deny the fullness of its own meaning, the power and nature of its own being as it has for centuries unfolded itself for and out of our being; it would have to give itself up to declamation, have to become strictly and purely recitative (as the Greek music was essentially), and thereby would become intolerable to us.

Mendelssohn with a fine feeling avoided this wrong way, as well as the other, which consisted in lavishing upon the task the full powers of our music, and would have utterly torn to pieces and drowned the poet out of sight. Here he was prudent and circumspect enough to make Gluck's style his model; this may with reason be asserted, if we will consider how widely the Antigone departs from his way of writing elsewhere and how near it stands to Gluck. That the depth and truthfulness of Gluck could not be reached, lay by no means merely in the smaller endowment of his follower in regard to the original type, but above all in the problem in hand. Gluck chose poems which stand almost entirely upon musical ground and are suitable, nay favorable for musical treatment even to the smallest details; the very opposite must be said of the ancient tragedy. Even the connection of the words; that first law for declamation, had occasionally to be sacrificed, since the inevitable rhythm of the Greek by no means everywhere observes the endings of the verbal sense; but the music had to accommodate itself and round itself off to the rhythmical endings. What was attainable under such circumstances: Declamation and, still more, scansion, developed as far as possible into melody corresponding with the mood of the scene and, if possible, also the striking expression of the moment—that Mendelssohn has reached with insight, tact and great talent. But to the ancient poet he has been able to do no more justice than lay within the power of our music altogether; and this our Art he has degraded, inasmuch as he has used it for exploits in which it had not only to limit its nature but to involve itself in untruthfulness. What right have we Germans to reproach a luxurious Rossini, or any other light-blooded singer, with untruth and infidelity towards the poet (as we have always been ready enough to do), if we practice or permit the same against a Sophocles, just because we take a fancy to draw him into our un-Grecian Cymmerian darkness, to fill up our vacant hours and hearts upon our worn out stage? How much manlier and more honest was that first attempt, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, to revive the ancient Tragedy in imitations! The plan could not be realized; but it grew out of the artistic necessities of that time and a fresh love for the antique, naive and innocent, without touching the unapproachable. If just that goal could not be reached, still the attempt led to the creation of the Opera, to Gluck's high-souled images; it became the foundation for whatever true and vital production is possible in this domain. . . .

III. INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

The third broad field is that of pure instrumental music. We need only allude to what we possess of works by Bach and men of his time, and from Haydn to Beethoven, for orchestra and solo, organ and piano. . . . In the greatest form, the Symphony, what our more recent masters have created has found recognition everywhere. In Schumann, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Gade, and many older and younger writers, the Symphony has had a most refreshing after-growth. The same is the well-known fact with regard to Quartet and Piano music; for the latter the names of Chopin and Liszt are the most noteworthy.

Among the Symphonists since Beethoven, must be named first of all HECTOR BERLIOZ. What first attracts our attention here (postponing for the present any appreciation of the spiritual direction of his symphonic works), is the formation of his Orchestra. One must read in his "Cours d'Instrumentation," a work distinguished for its complete technical insight and its poetic knowledge in many particulars, and in his other writings, how he thinks to build up his orchestra. This host of instruments, these choirs of great and little flutes and wind instruments of all kinds, these variously subdivided stringed instruments, these harps and pianos, these masses of brass and drums and cymbals: all this affords the broadest, fullest sonority, whole series of new mixtures of sound, new tone-colors, unheard of effects—and in fact Berlioz has invented such in the richest abundance and employed them often and most thoughtfully in his compositions; but the spiritual life of the orchestra, that poetry and dramatic quality which rests upon the individualizing of the parts (voices), upon clear discrimination of characters and the carrying of those characters through with certainty, must be narrowed and crowded, nay stifled in such masses.

This point is of more consequence for the music of the present than the creations of the genial Frenchman themselves, however high we may set their worth. For the new expansion of the orchestra has intruded everywhere, especially into the Opera, and has everywhere manifested its influence, an influence of the most questionable sort. It has formed itself gradually and with no preconceived plan; Berlioz is not the founder, but rather the finisher, the intelligence of this movement, to which the most important and—if you once admit the principle—the most intellectual accessions have been MEYERBEER and WAGNER.

The first thing to be remarked in the new orchestration is the great increase of the kinds of instruments, particularly the wind band, involving a corresponding increase of numbers in the string department. Hence in Opera and Cantata we have a mass of sonority opposed to the singing voices, now driving them up into their highest tones with an exaggerated accentuation, now overpowering and stifling the voices and even urging the chorus to violent outbursts, while it moves the composer to an unfavorable choice of instruments if a solo is to make its way through. Thus Meyerbeer, in a funeral or a love song in G minor (I think in Robert le Diable) has used the trumpet for pathetic Cantilena; similar things could be pointed out in Auber and others.

The second point is the emasculation of the trumpet and the French-horn (and they have even taken hold of the trombone) by the introduction of valves. The moment you cease to regard truth, that moment the characteristic becomes unrecognizable or unendurable; for character is the completeness of a nature in itself and in its truth to itself; it can work and avail through nothing else but just what it is itself. Now characters of the most fixed stamp in the ranks of tone-personifications are the heroic trumpet, the dreamy horn in its native state. Even the imperfection and limitation of its scale of tones is peculiar to its nature and character; Achilles with the cunning and eloquence of Ulysses were no more Achilles; the trusty mountaineer cannot have the many-sidedness of the polished, narrow-breasted man of the city; just as little can the trumpet use the clarinet's multitude of tones, or the horn the serviceable pliancy of the bassoon. The character of these instruments, the very limitation of their number of tones, has always challenged the appreciative composer to invent characteristic passages, and often has rewarded his fidelity with most felicitous and genial turns. By the mere fact of drawing these native characters out of their proper sphere of tones, of trying to transform their naive individuality into a cosmopolitan universality, composers have ensnared themselves in miserable halfness and falseness. The use of valves has to be sure enlarged the domain of tone; but the new tones are in part impure, the characteristic purity of tone-color is utterly dimmed and tarnished, the power of sound entirely broken.

The third point is the introduction of the so-called soft brass instruments—the cornets, sax-horns, tubas, and what not—into the orchestra.

By no means would we here declare war against newly invented instruments, or ancient instruments restored; that would ill become me, who have found one of them at least (the chromatic tenor horn, in my "Moses") indispensable. Because our masters, Beethoven included, have done great things without them, it does not follow that we should despise means which they could not employ, because they did not know them,—just as little as they clung to the yet more limited means of Bach and Handel. Some of the new instruments have already found truly artistic use (for instance, the bass clarinet in Wagner's Lohengrin, which could hardly be replaced by any other means); others may yet acquire, who knows how soon or where, an equal significance; even the use of them by whole choirs together may somewhere become necessary. Every means may possibly be fit and indispensable for some artistic moment,—and then it is the right means. Nevertheless the use of this new band of brass, as now in vogue, must appear questionable, nay generally pernicious. For, taken together with the addition of valves to horns and trumpets, it extinguishes the characteristic features of the orchestral form until we cease to know them. And that weighs more in the scale, than the favoring of single moments.

The stringed quartet and the wind band (the latter divided into the brass: horns, trumpets, trombones and cymbals, and the reed band, or instruments of wood): these in the old orchestra formed decided contrasts. Splendor, power, martial summons, high solemnity lay in the trumpets and trombones; every group and every instrument had its well distinguished character. Did you wish the contrast softened, done away: the French-horns of themselves came in between the stern brass band and the reeds; the sharp insight of the composer found in the covering of harsh voices by milder ones, in veiling them by accessory ones, in a hundred turns, always new and even genial means, which stimulated his own mind and that of the hearer more than any mere material addition can.

And now came in the choir of cornets and tubas. They speak to the eye already by their very shape. Their conically expanded speaking-trumpet-like bodies, intestinally twined, interrupted and checked in their vibration by the weight of cast metal valves, indicate a sound now hemmed in and now breaking right out, a dull and yet a violent sound, just as the form of trumpets, trombones and horns indicates their sonorous character. This choir, above all, by its ambiguous, hermaphroditic quality of tone, weakens the contrast between brass and reeds. The cornets, which are not horns and not clarinets and yet resemble both (as if the painter would bring together in forced union blue, green and yellow), the larger tubas, half trombone and half horn in their nature, but neither one entirely,—add to which the choking and dulling of the horns and trumpets: all this veils and smothers the sharp outline of characters, causes the significant differences of the orchestra to run together into one common characterless mass (sometimes reminding one of Goethe's "Getretner Quark wird breit nicht stark") and enhances merely the fullness, not the strength of sound. The drawn sword is mighty; in the sheath it is thicker and heavier, but has lost its victorious edge.

(To be Continued).

The Abbe Liszt in Hungary.

(From the London Musical World.)

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Pesth-Ofen Conservatory, at which the Abbé Liszt produced his last work, has created quite a sensation among musicians and musical amateurs in Germany, and the papers, both musical and political, devote a considerable space to the description and discussion of it. We extract the following from the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung:

"The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Conservatory, which commenced on the 15th August, has found a most lively response not only in the more restricted circles of professional men, but thanks to the system of political reciprocity now obtaining, in the widest general ones. In addition to this, we have probably for the very first time the fact of a musical festival got up on the grandest scale having a specifically Hungarian character. With the exception of Mendelssohn's "Festgesang an die Künstler" in the vocal, and some unimportant pieces in the instrumental part, the works performed are by composers who are all native Hungarians; all the compositions treat of national subjects; and all the performers, with the sole exception, perhaps, of Herr von Bülow, are, likewise, natives of Hungary. The central point of the Festival was, as we have already announced, the production of the oratorio St. Elizabeth, words by Otto Roquette and music by the Abbé Liszt. A most culpable act of neglect, as regards both the Festival and the composer, was committed by the musical managers, in as much as they did not begin studying the work earlier with the musicians engaged in it. This, however, was not deemed necessary; nay, still worse, no precautions had been taken to see that the orchestral parts tallied properly with the score, and thus a large portion of the wearisome rehearsals had to be devoted to correcting the separate parts; this, of course, acted prejudicially on the real object for which the rehearsals were held. The result was that the general rehearsal lasted from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., and we owe completely to Liszt's energy and indefatigable zeal that the performance did not turn out an utter failure for among the performers, comprising about five hundred local instrumentalists and singers, the majority were amateurs."

Speaking of the performance of the oratorio, the Wiener Abendpost says:

"With regard to the execution, it was far from perfect; the orchestra especially was so inhuman as to leave us completely in the dark as to some, perhaps, of the finest passages; the whole arrangement, too, particularly the position of the orchestra, was a mistake; directly the chorus began, nothing was heard of the violins, indeed the latter were, generally speaking, far too feebly represented in comparison with the double-basses and wind-instruments; how many wrong notes, and how much playing out of tune we heard we will not stop to specify. The chorists had studied their parts well, and even Liszt is said to have expressed his satisfaction at the fact."

The concert commenced with a hymn from Dozza Gyorgy, the last opera from the pen of Franz Erkel, the Nestor of Hungarian composers. Then, after a prologue written for the occasion by Gabriel Matray had been spoken, Liszt appeared, in his abbé's dress, upon the platform. Hereupon there arose from the crowd of auditors, from the whole trumpeting, fiddling, and singing mass, a tumultuous welcome that reminded one of the roaring of the angry sea. The pale-faced man, with the sharply marked features and the hair streaked with silver, bowed and bowed, evidently moved by the friendly cheering, which seemed as though it would never end; on the contrary, it broke out with greater intensity when Liszt took up the conducting-stick, destined to inspire the expectant masses with life. It was presented to him by Herr Matray, the director of the Conservatory, as a modest gift from the thankful institution; it will not be very imposing by its outward ornamentation and splendor in the midst of the large collection which Liszt possesses of similar objects, but it will not be without value in his eyes; it is made of Hungarian rose-wood, in memory of the Rose of Hungary, whom he has celebrated. We may mention that the Landgravine Elizabeth, "St. Elizabeth," of Thuringia, was the daughter of Andreas II., King of Hungary.

Alluding to the character of the music generally, the Pesther Lloyd expresses itself thus:

In this work, Liszt has entered upon a decidedly new path. He has here set limits for himself, and employed four distinct melodies which are introduced and carried out in the most remarkable manner; in acting thus he has abandoned the Wagnerian system of what is called endless melody, and the structure of his periods has been rendered more intelligible, without the slightest detriment to their originality. The hearer finds the necessary resting places; he is furnished with passages he can remember, and the composer is understood even by the less advanced ear. In addition to this, there is a richness of instrumental coloring spread over the whole, which prevents the attention from being wearied a single instant. This last production of Liszt's will be more popular than any other of his musical efforts, and, because melodiously more comprehensible, will render his harmonic peculiarities more pleasing. The composer himself will be convinced that as a certain metre is necessary for the poet, definite form of melody is required by the musician to impart the necessary distinctness and clearness to his inspirations. Liszt has proved that he can be new even in simple forms of melody; in proof of this, we need mention only the Chorus of Children (No. 1) and the Crusaders' Chorus (No. 3); both are instantaneously intelligible and leave behind them a well-defined impression, because they are distinctly constructed, while, at the same time, both surprise us by a strange coloring and a still stranger succession of harmonic passages. Of the richness of coloring within the means of the artist in the matter of instrumentation, we will say nothing, but we will not conceal our pleasant surprise that, on the whole, Liszt has displayed greater moderation in the scoring than even in the Graner Messe. In his management of the vocal parts he has everywhere restrained himself within the limits of what is possible, and even in some passages of what is easy; it is only in a few solo passages that we meet with certain of the old well-known Lisztian intonations. But the otherwise all-victorious composer has not avoided every danger. While revelling enthusiastically in certain situations, he has lost a proper appreciation of the due limits to be observed; he has not been able to tear himself away from a subject once taken up. Thus we should wish to see the Miracle-Scene somewhat curtailed; we would sacrifice a third of the Crusaders, and even omit the repetition of the words: "O Herr, lass Deinen Segen thauen" in the prayer of Elizabeth herself, because, in all three instances, the previous magnificent climax is weakened by the pieces being too much spun out, which is a great pity. Furthermore, it strikes us that the repetition of the harmonic movement with the point d'orgue for the tenor (before the chorus of the Poor, and the introduction of the Angels' voices) takes up time unnecessarily, and is, therefore, superfluous; after the highly characteristic passages for flute, representing Elizabeth's last sigh, the effect would be increased were the Angels' voices allowed to be heard at once."

The rehearsal of the second day's concert was not brought to a close till eight p.m., on the 16th, and the performance itself began at ten a.m., on the 17th. It was ushered in by a "Festival Overture," contributed by Robert Volkmann. "As a rule," observes a writer in the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung, "a peculiarly unlucky star presides at the birth of compositions written for a particular occasion." This is true. The public expect something out of the common, while it is but very seldom that the composer can work himself up to the requisite degree of inspiration. Fancy will not be commanded, nor always obey the summons when invoked. Even Meyerbeer's weakest compositions were those he wrote for special occasions. In proof of this, we need merely mention his "Schiller-Marsch," his overture to Struensee, and his "Fackel" marches for the nuptials of various grand personages. Herr Volkmann, it appears, was unable to escape the almost general law. As a matter of course, his work gave evidence of emanating from a skilful and experienced pen, but it is far from exhibiting the talent that marks his other compositions. The same composer's Sappho, a scena for soprano, followed, and was exceedingly well sung by Mdle. Carina. Herr Reményi, also, had written a pièce de circonstance, which he called a "Hungarian Concerto for the Violin." This came next, but was not very successful, being more a rhapsody with a pleasing cadenza at the end than a concerto, Hungarian or otherwise. The first part of the concert concluded with Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus."

In the second part, Liszt treated the assembled multitude to his Dante Symphony. A writer in a German contemporary, in speaking of it, remarks:

"Whoever has felt what fearful mysteries Dante has unfolded in his Divina Commedia; whoever knows with what demoniacal fanaticism Liszt above all other men would unresistingly give himself up to them; and whoever has experienced how horrible is the power of the world of tones when completely freed from every trammel, must have awaited this Dante Symphony with a certain degree of apprehension. Such at least was the case with ourselves. We have composers who have endeavored to portray a hell; who have depicted pain, yearning, and hope in the most glowing colors; we can render by sound revenge, ambition, and rage that overwhelms all before it; but to fright our souls by making music convey the idea of despair, that passion which annihilates everything else, that was something on which no one had ventured. 'Lasciate ogni speranza voi ch' entrate!' such is the theme Liszt has chosen for the first part of his Symphony, and, Heaven knows! he works it out in the most fearful fashion. There is no resting place, no break; nothing but everlasting rhythms and chords, surging up one above the other! What avails it that, in the Andante amoroso, just for the moment, we catch a glimpse of a beautiful youthful picture reminding us of the magic to which we once gave ourselves up with such ecstasy? 'Lasciate ogni speranza!' we are again driven forth into the hideous night. Whether a composer should be pardoned for selecting such a programme for the guidance of his imagination—that is a point on which we will not give an opinion. The party who are called by their opponents 'Musicians of the Future' insist upon definite programme for every musical composition. They require expression carried to the highest pitch; they have broken with universal human sentiments to devote themselves to special and extraordinary phases of the soul. How far they have succeeded, history must teach. Liszt and Wagner have, perhaps, not reflected that their system can be carried only up to a certain limit, unless they would be overwhelmed by chaos, where hope indeed cannot exist. Liszt is, however, original, and we accept the eccentricities of originality with the same interest as we accept what agrees with our own way of thinking. But many, who call themselves his party, are no longer original; they are a faint and bad impression, which really cannot interest us."

The concert wound up with the "Rákóczy March" orchestrally illustrated by Liszt.—On the 19th, there was a grand dinner given to Liszt in the shooting gallery. It was attended by three hundred persons.—About six thousand persons were present at the grand Vocal Festival, on the 20th August, in the "Stadtwaldchen." When Liszt made his appearance he was greeted with tumultuous cheering. Unfortunately the mode in which the singers were stationed was very unsatisfactory, the consequence being that a great deal of what they sang was inaudible to the public. In the evening, there was a grand ball in the shooting gallery.

Liszt, it is said, will return direct to Rome, where the appointment of Capellmeister at St. Peter's awaits him. He is still the same he was twenty years ago. The abbé's dress is merely a novelty in costume, in which he creates as great a furor as he formerly created in a Hungarian dolman, or a French tail-coat.

OTTO BEARD.

P. S.—Since the above was written, we have had a second performance of the oratorio St. Elizabeth, the audience being quite as numerous, and the applause as deafening, as at the first. Still competent judges shake their heads and decline prognosticating the same success for the work in other cities which it has achieved in Pesth. However, their opinion has not much weight with the masses. Liszt is the lion of the hour, and all he says and does, writes or composes, is indiscriminately praised. Even the ladies declare he never looked so well as in his ecclesiastical garb, and it certainly would not be astonishing if a number of sucking pianists, led away by his example, were also to receive the tonsure, or, in other words, get their heads shaved. There are many quite mad enough to justify the process.

The 29th August was a grand day for Liszt:

"Cressa ne careat pulchra dies nota!"

so I will endeavor to give the readers of the Musical World some idea of what took place on the occasion. Firstly there was a concert given by the Abbé, in the Grand Redoutensaal, for charitable purposes. The programme was made up exclusively of works by the concert-giver. Here is a list of them: "Ave Maria," and "Cantique d'Amour" for Pianoforte; Fantaisie for Violin on Lenau's poem: "Die drei Zigeuner" (played by Herr Reményi); two Legends: "Die Vogelpredigt des heiligen Franciscus von Assisi," and "Der heilige Franciscus von Paolo auf den Wellen" (Poems for the Piano); Hungarian Rhapsody for Violin and Pianoforte (Violin: Herr Reményi); Hungarian Rhapsody for two Pianos (second piano: Herr Hans von Bülow), and the Rákóczy March played by Liszt himself. The room was positively crammed to suffocation, places of all kinds fetching fancy prices. The proceeds of the concert amounted to 5,080 florins, which Liszt divided as follows: towards building the Leopoldstadt Church, 2,000 florins; to the Association for Assisting Authors, 500 florins; to the Association for Assisting Musicians, 500 florins; to the Infant School, 200 florins; to the Josephinum, 800 florins; to the Sisters of Charity, 800 florins; to the Institution for the Blind, 200 florins; to the "Gesellenverein," 200 florins; to the Protestant Orphan Asylum, 300 florins; to the Israelitish Infirmary, 200 florins; to the Franciscan Order, 200 florins; and in alms to various poor persons, 80 florins! Bravo, Franz Liszt! A noble act of charity, enhanced by the liberal spirit manifested in the distribution of the money without distinction of creed, among Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Jews. You may have assumed the Abbé's soutane, but you have preserved a heart free from narrow-minded bigotry beneath it.

In the evening, a select party was invited to meet Liszt at the "Stadtpfarrei," or residence of the priest attached to the principal parish-church in the town. There was an interesting concert, in which Herren Liszt, Reményi, Hans von Bülow and Madlle. Dumcsa took part. After the concert, Herr Ludwig Meszlenyi, Secretary to the Prince Primate, presented in the name of that dignitary, a handsome pyramid in silver filigree work to Liszt, and a rich bouquet-holder, adorned with gems, also from the Prince Primate, to Madame von Bülow, Liszt's daughter. On one side of the pyramid there is an enamel portrait of St. Francesco di Assisi, and, in front, the inscription: "Francesco Liszt."

At the opening of the German Theatre, on the 1st inst., under the direction of the new manager, Herr d'Arronge, the orchestra performed the overture to König Stephan, composed by Beethoven in 1812, for the opening of the theatre which was afterwards destroyed by fire.

Liszt's Oratorio.

The following is a short synopsis of Liszt's oratorio St. Elizabeth, which the N. Y. Weekly Review translates from the Dresdener Journal. In the first part the arrival of Elizabeth from Hungary is described. She as well as her intended husband, Landgraf Ludwig, are in the beginning of their youth. The little bride is greeted by the chorus, and embraced by the father of Ludwig, Landgraf Hermann, and is delivered to him by a Hungarian magnate. Ludwig shows her the country, which will belong to her, and both associate with a party of children, who welcome them with a merry song. In the next scene both are grown up and married. Ludwig is the regent of the country; he comes home from hunting, and sings a merry hunting song. At this moment he sees a person going down the path from the castle through the green bushes. He recognizes Elizabeth, who is frightened when he calls her. "Why are you frightened and embarrassed?" he asks. She does not want to answer, since she knows that the Landgraf has forbidden her to do what she is just doing, to wit, to carry food to the poor. He wants to see what she carries under her cloak, and opens the cloak, when the food has been changed by a miracle into roses. At the same time a halo of glory surrounds the head of Elizabeth, and the angels sing a chorus of jubilation: "The Lord has done a miracle!" The next scene is laid several years later. The Landgraf takes leave of his wife, because he has to go to the holy land on a crusade. The expressions of sorrow on the part of Elizabeth are drowned in the warlike songs of the warriors and knights. Then follows a scene, in which the mother of the Landgraf, a hard-hearted woman, informs his vassals that her son had fallen in the crusade, and that she is the lawful heir to the crown. She orders the "seneschal" to drive Elizabeth and her children from the country, when in the same moment these enter crying and sobbing. She had come to find consolation, but she is ordered to leave forthwith. She prays in vain to be allowed to stay a little longer, since a thunderstorm is threatening; she is expelled. But now comes the punishment. The thunderstorm commences and rages, the castle is struck by lightning and burnt down. In the last part Elizabeth is at the end of her days. Although her children have been stolen from her, she praises God for his mercy, and lives in pious exercises in a hut. The poor come to her and pray to her as a saint. She offers them her cloak and her last piece of bread. Soon she is freed from earthly sorrows. Death approaches her, while the angels greet the ascension of her soul to heaven. The last part consists of the funeral of the saint.

The Art of Ballad-Writing.

[SECOND PAPER.]

In No. 57 of this Journal,* we took the liberty with the age's Balladism of dividing it into certain schools or genres, and attempted to give our readers an in-* London Orchestra. We copied the First Paper nearly a year ago.

sight into the art and fashion of manufacturing a Ballad of the first or Wardour-street school. It is an interesting study, as interesting as chemical analysis, and occasionally productive of as curious results. As new stars arise from nebulae previously undiscov-ered, so a new school of the Balladeers may any day spring into existence and add to the collection. A successful song composed on an unused subject immediately creates a new school, violently anxious to perpetuate the success of its founder. Miss Eliza Cook's mother's "Old Arm Chair" started into existence the miscellaneous articles of furniture which compose the creed of Wardour-street, and we may see how a poetical perception of the flight of time—of the beauties of seed-time and harvest, of the tender gloaming, the rounded moon, "the twilight melting into morn," has produced the morbidly analytical writers who form the Second or

HOROLOGICAL SCHOOL.

The subjective impulse which makes poets take different periods of the day and year, and give forth their thoughts on spring and winter, on morning and evening, and paint the beauties of either, was natural and true. The sensations aroused by the seasons are among the most vivid of our nature, and are those which most powerfully influence poetic minds. In course of time it was also natural that these subjects should be exhausted and should be repeated over and over again. When Moore wrote his "Watchman," and divided the night into periods flying fleet over the heads of parting lovers, it was a beautiful and poetic idea, as well as a step beyond generalization.

"Past one o'clock—nay! wrap this cloak about thee:" our readers will remember the song and its exquisite beauty. Then Dibden, in his own vigorous style, imagined a sailor's logbook, in which the different watches bring their different action; and the idea, though less tender than Moore's, was manly and good in its way. But in these latter times lo! a school, which divides and subdivides the clock, and so squeezes time that all the poetry is driven out of it, and the remaining idea is as commonplace as the quarters on the face of an old Dutch timepiece.

To cite two examples will serve to illustrate the Horological School: there is a song, called, "Five o'clock in the morning," by Claribel; and there is another, "Eight o'clock," by Macfarren. Of the dissection of the twenty-four hours for pianoforte purposes by Mr. Brinley Richards we do not speak; firstly because we are writing on ballads, and secondly because Mr. Brinley Richards is content to Warble at Morn or Eve or Noon generally, and does not time his Warblings by his watch; and this does not overstep poetry. Nor do we speak of the charming effusion sung by Mr. Randall, entitled, "Two in the morning," for to battle war with music halls being rather paltry warfare, we prefer leaving that to the Archbishop of York at any odd time. We deal only with ballad-writers properly so called, and their modus operandi.

Now the Horological School have usually one plot, which they share with each other on Apostolic principles. It is usually an arch plot—desperately arch. It has a village stile in it and a village maiden who is loitering by the stile; the maiden is arch, and it's five o'clock in the morning. And a young gentleman, who has got up that day (very arch) out of bed, takes a stroll at five o'clock in the morning. And he meets the young maiden (in a spasmodically arch manner), and he asks her—yon know what—at five o'clock in the morning. And she says—of course she says Yes: they always do—at five o'clock in the morning. Then they are married at the same uncomfortable hour—hand down their name, die, get buried, at 5 A.M.; to which period all events through life are referable.

Let us add to the collection of the Horological School by our own mite. We shall call it—say "Three Thirty-seven A. M.," and will endeavor to keep it innocent-arch and cunning-simple. And here it is:—

I.

One morn as the dew lay in pearls
Young Robin he strolled on the lea;
And Katie was shaking her curls
At the very same moment, you see.
The pathway was not very wide,
But what did that matter to them?
He gazed; she blushed softly; they sighed;
It was Three Thirty-Seven A.M.

II.

Now Robin had always averred
"In love with sweet Katie I am."
And Katie had even preferred
Her Robin to gooseberry jam.
So when he tried one soft caress,
While dewdrops encircled each stem,

The maiden's voice whispered but yes—
At Three Thirty-Seven A. M.

Usually a balladeer is satisfied with conceiving two verses, after which the mind naturally becomes exhausted; but as comic drawing-room songs usually add to the attribute of boring you by their silliness that of boring you by their length, we can suppose another verse, which, still regarding happiness from a horological point of view, proceeds thus:—

III.

They now share the nestest of cots
With a dresser, a coalbox, a fire;
There are Robins and Kates in lots
Who play round the boots of their sire.
Their bliss has no earthly alloy,
And who shall their wisdom condemn,
If the whole house sing psalms of joy
At Three Thirty-Seven A. M.!

Music Abroad.

England.

GLoucester Festival.—The Triennial Festival of the three Choirs (of Gloucester, Worcester and Hereford) began in Gloucester Cathedral on Tuesday morning, Sept. 5. The principal singers were Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Louisa Pyne, Mme. Ruderodoff, Miss Wilkinson, Miss Julia Elton, Dr. Gunz (tenor), Mr. Cummings, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Santley (baritone). Mme. Arabella Goddard, as solo pianiste, took part in the concerts. The orchestra numbered about 70 instruments—26 violins, 8 tenors, 8 cellos, 7 double basses, &c., and the whole number of performers was about 300. Complaint is made that the Bishop turned a cold shoulder on the Festival, locked up his palace and went off, although he appeared in the list of honorary vice-presidents.

First Day. Service, with sermon, until one o'clock. Then Oratorios:—St. Paul (Part I), and Spohr's "Last Judgment." Some of the musical papers complain bitterly about the curtailment of St. Paul; others ridicule them, and about this they quarrel, and about the merits of Spohr. Tietjens, they say, brought tears into the eyes by her singing of the air "Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" and Santley sang magnificently. Cummings, the tenor, hardly comforted the English audience for the absence of their idol, Reeves. The choruses are highly praised. The Musical World says: "The whole performance of Spohr's work afforded unqualified satisfaction." But the Orchestra says:

It was, we think, with appropriate taste that the "Last Judgment" was placed after the "Saint Paul," both for numerical and musical reasons. The contrast was great, and produced a proportionate effect for both. The solo singers were Misses Louisa Pyne and Julia Elton, Dr. Gunz, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Of these it is sufficient to point out Miss Pyne as admirable throughout, Miss Elton as shortcoming in oratorio, and the German Doctor as Germanic, doctorial, gattural, and indistinct. Mr. Thomas put some energy into "Thus saith the Lord" and was rewarded by success. In the conducting of this work Dr. Wesley would have achieved some extraordinary effects if the band and chorus had minded him much. Even as it was, he contrived to throw them out here and there and to retard the time throughout.

Of the evening concert, with its long miscellaneous programme, the same journal says:

There are few attenders of the commonest matinees who have not heard most of the above ad nauseam: the overture to "William Tell" and the "Bacio" we leave to the boarding-schools, and "The Harp that once" is at the present time whistled by every London gamin as a component of that immortal negro air "The Pull-back." That which pleased greatly was Mme. Goddard's solo in the accompanied Choral Fantasia, and that narrowly missed a chance of being spoiled (malgré the wonderful execution of the pianist) by the preponderance of the chorus over the band and the inefficiency of the conductor. We sympathize with Mme. Goddard and congratulate her on emerging so brilliantly from difficulties so great. The encores in the concert were confined to the second part; The "Bacio," the "Tara Harp," and Figaro's song were bisés. Mme. Rudersdorff acquitted herself well in Abt's "Ever thine," in which we preferred her to her aria "Par-to," in Mozart's "Tito."

Second Day. We copy the Orchestra again, for brevity.

A very long morning of Music—from half-past eleven to four—was that of Wednesday. The weather again was lovely, a beautiful morning succeeding a cloudless moonlight night. Before eleven o'clock the Cathedral was well filled. The performance was a Mischmasch—Mendelssohn, Spohr, Handel, Rossini, Haydn, Gounod and Wesley. It opened with the orchestral movements in the "Lobgesang," excellently performed, and followed by the chorus: "All men, all things" (magnificent in a cathedral), and the solo sustained by Mme. Rudersdorff with semi-chorus, "Praise thou the Lord." Next came what has been ignorantly called an air from Handel's "Redemption." Handel never wrote a "Redemption;" "He layeth the beams" is an old secular air of his to which sacred words have been put, and it is a bitter satire on those analytical critics who are forever grubbing into a composer's dead mind to find what was in it when he wrote this or that, that these exquisitely sacred melodies should often have been first put to words of entirely different character. Spohr's "Crucifixion," furnished a trio for Miss Pyne, Miss E. Wilkinson, and Miss Julia Elton; in the Cygnus Animam came guttural Dr. Gunz, fighting hard and more successfully this time; next Mme. Rudersdorff finely in the "Inflammatus," with chorus; then Mlle. Tietjens magnificently singing "With verdure clad;" and Mr. Santley, as every one may imagine Santley, singing Gounod's air "Nazareth," led to an abominably executed motet of the late Samuel Wesley for double chorus, "In exitu Israel." Another air from Miss Pyne, "Holy, Holy" and the programme finished with an anthem by Dr. Wesley, "Ascribe unto the Lord," which went well, and displayed the clever composing talent of Dr. Wesley. It is written in G major, opening with a chorus, succeeded by a quartet for four female voices, a descriptive chorus and a chorus finale; and the singing of Meodames Tietjens, Pyne, Elton, and Wilkinson produced an excellent effect. In the second part Dr. Wesley (after luncheon) came forward in an instrumental capacity and played with masterly execution, a solo on Mr. Willis's organ, Bach's pedal fugue in E flat, No. 9, otherwise "St. Anné." The effect was imposing. If Dr. Wesley could manage festivals as well as he plays the organ much acrimony might be spared him. To that succeeded the following programme, and the performance lasted till four o'clock, by which time even the greatest fanatici had had enough. Chorus, "Requiem æternam;" Solo, Mlle. Tietjens, "Te decet hymnus;" Chorus, "Exaudi orationem meam," "Kyrie Eleison," "Dies iræ;" Quartet, Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Julia Elton, Herr Gunz, and Mr. Santley, "Tuba mirum spargens sonum;" Chorus, "Rex tremendus majestatis!" Quartet, Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Julia Elton, Herr Gunz, and Mr. Santley, "Recordare Jesu pie;" Chorus with Soli, "Confutatis maledictus;" Chorus, "Lacrymosa dies illa;" Quartet, Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Julia Elton, Herr Gunz, and Mr. Santley, "Benedictus;" Chorus, "Agnus Dei;" Solo, Mlle. Tietjens, "Lux æterna;" Chorus, "Cum Sanctu." Then, to take off, we presume, the effect of the "Requiem;" Song ("Samson"), "Let the bright Seraphim" (Trumpet, Mr. T. Harper), Mlle. Tietjens, Handel; Chorus, "Let their Celestial Concerts," Handel; Duet, "Children, pray, this love to cherish," Miss Eleonora Wilkinson and Mr. W. H. Cummings, Spohr; Selection from the "Mount of Olives;" Trio, "The hour of vengeance," Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, Beethoven; Chorus and Solos, "Haste, arise," Beethoven; Chorus, "Hallelujah," Beethoven.

Notwithstanding the protracted performance of the Morning in the Cathedral, the nobility and gentry of the county flowed into the Shire Hall for the entertainment of the evening, and were supported by an unusually large attendance of the professional and trade life in the old city. The habitués of the London Philharmonic and other Concerts looked with dismay on the programme. The experienced virtuosi were pitiously tender towards the hard worked conductor whose duty it was to wade through huge slices from Haydn's "Seasons," and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," besides selections from Verdi, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Gounod, Felicien David, and other prominent music makers of our day and generation.

The feature of the evening was Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto played by the Goddard-Davison. It was well done on all sides. Blagrove conducted.

Third and Fourth Days. A feeling of satisfaction pervaded the audience at the third morning's performance, for the "selection" days were over, and Mendelssohn's Elijah was given, exactly as the composer wrote it. The part of the Prophet was sung throughout by Mr. Santley; but the usual division, in defiance of Mendelssohn's intention, took place with the other characters. Madame Rudersdorff and Mlle. Tietjens divided the principal soprano music, Mr. Cummings and Dr. Gunz the tenor, and Miss E. Wilkinson and Julia Elton the contralto. We have seldom heard Madame Rudersdorff to greater advantage than in the music of the widow. The recitative, air and duet, commencing "What have I to do with thee," was given with an intensity of feeling better than all the exaggeration of voice and style which she mistook for power on the preceding day; and the burst of gratitude, "The Lord hath heard thy prayer," spoke deeply to the heart of all her hearers. Miss Eleonora Wilkinson had a thankless task in singing the air "Woe unto them," (the contralto and tenor controversy still ranking in the minds of the audience), but she gave the beautiful strain with genuine feeling, and produced a marked effect upon her listeners. Mr. Cummings sang with his usual earnestness, but of course suffered from the same cause, creating an amount of nervousness which he in vain attempted to conceal. The noble choruses of the first part went extremely well; but the wonderful effect of the concluding choral thanksgiving, "Thanks be to God"—one of the greatest climaxes in the whole range of sacred music—was sadly marred by the usual struggle of the impatient audience to leave the Cathedral, the example, we regret to say, being set by those highest in authority. If this great culminating point of the work were disregarded on its own account, surely the grand chorus, "Thanks be to God," might have been looked upon as a choral "grace before meat," and treated accordingly with no more than the usual amount of gentle impatience. In the second part, Mlle. Tietjens gave the air, "Hear ye, Israel," with the utmost delicacy and purity of expression, and in the concerted music gave life to every phrase. The trio, "Lift thine eyes," which was entrusted to Mlle. Tietjens, Mrs. J. K. Pyne and Miss Julia Elton, afforded proof to all who doubt that to make a trio go well it is necessary to have three competent singers. Anything so unutterably bad as the execution of this beautiful terzetto we have rarely heard in public. To say nothing of the second voice being scarcely audible in the harmony, the important syncopated part which occurs as a solo on the words, "Thy help cometh," if given at all, was so feebly sung that the others could scarcely support their parts, and the result was dire confusion. After this failure we were pleased to find Miss Elton sing "O rest in the Lord" so well as to prove to the audience that the fault did not rest with her. It is almost unnecessary to say that Mr. Santley sang most admirably throughout the Oratorio; and so thoroughly did he win the good opinion of the audience, that we have little doubt that a future Gloucester Festival will scarcely be considered complete without him. The choruses in the second part, although occasionally betraying the want of due rehearsal, were generally well given; and on the whole, Mendelssohn's great work, in spite of the drawbacks which we have freely mentioned, was exceedingly well rendered.

The fourth and last morning's performance of the Festival was devoted to the Messiah, and every available seat in the Cathedral was occupied at an early hour. Indeed a number of chairs, for which ladies had zealously battled on the previous days, and which were specially reserved for Stewards, who never came, were on this occasion sold to satisfy the excessive demand. We can have little to say on a work every note of which is familiar to all lovers of sacred music; and even, we may add, to many who, knowing little of other Oratorios, consider a periodical hearing of Handel's sublime composition as a sacred duty. Mlle. Tietjens gave the air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and "How beautiful are the feet," in her very best style; Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Julia Elton, and Mr. Cummings acquitted themselves in all their solos extremely well; and Madame Rudersdorff would have sung the air, "But thou didst not leave," in a manner to satisfy the most exacting Handel lover, had it not been for an unfortunate shake at the conclusion, which, even if well executed, would have been utterly out of place. Dr. Gunz, as might be expected, did not please his audience in the opening recitative and air, "Comfort ye," and "Every valley; and indeed it appeared that Handel's music suited him less than any which had fallen to his share during the Festival. Mr. Lewis Thomas again was extremely effective in his solos, especially in the energetic air, "Why do the nations," which is admirably suited to his voice and style. The choruses were firmly and correctly given throughout; "For unto us a child is born," and the "Hallelujah," producing even more than their usual effect upon the audience.

We have said nothing of the orchestra during these performances, for in truth the perfect manner in which the whole of the instrumental portions of the works were performed, left us nothing to comment upon. The band, indeed, comprising the oldest and most accomplished artists in the metropolis, proved the very best friends of the conductor, a fact which he tacitly admitted by occasionally laying down his bâton, and becoming an attentive and admiring auditor. We may also here say that Mr. Townshend Smith, organist of Hereford Cathedral, presided at Mr. Willis's new organ during the Festival, with his usual well-known ability.

The last concert on Thursday evening, although, as usual, too long, was remarkable, if only for the artistic performance of Mr. Blagrove in Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for the Violin, and Mlle. Tietjens' splendid singing in the finale to Mendelssohn's unfinished opera of Lorely, which, had she been better supported by the chorus, would have been the great feature of the evening. Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8) would have been well performed by the orchestra had not Dr. Wesley pertinaciously insisted upon dragging all the tempi, so that the composer's intention was utterly destroyed. It would have been better had he resigned his post to Mr. Blagrove, as he did during Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto on the preceding evening, when all the movements were taken at the proper pace, the last especially being dashed off at a speed which would have driven the Conductor wild. We must not omit to mention Miss Louisa Pyne's very fine interpretation of the scena from Wallace's Lurline, in which occurs the well-known "Sweet spirit, hear my prayer," nor Mr. Santley's singing of the couplets, "Se l'arless son Regine," from Miralla, both of which were received with the utmost applause, the first gaining a well-merited encore. Madame Rudersdorff's version of "Robert toi que j'aime" was so exaggerated as to create wonder that she could so successfully restrain her natural tendency in Elijah and the Messiah; and the Adelaide of Dr. Gunz, tamely accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Done, failed to arouse the audience to anything like enthusiasm. With the National Anthem, the solos of which were taken by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Santley, and Madame Rudersdorff, the Gloucester Meeting of 1865 came to a conclusion; the artists as they left the room, soon to be dispersed in opposite directions, seemed to linger as if to bid farewell to the many friends who had accompanied and encouraged them through their arduous duties; and in a short time utter darkness reigned in the building which for three nights had been the centre of attraction, even to those who were not fortunate enough to gain admittance.—Novello's Mus. Times.

PARIS. How the season has opened may appear from a few scraps from foreign musical journals.

The Théâtre-Lyrique has re-opened with the Flûte Enchantée, the cast precisely as before. Were I writing for a Parisian paper it would be nothing short of high treason in me to utter a syllable in dispraise of that vocal marvel of the French capital, Madame Miolan Carvalho! I admire the name vastly—Miolan Carvalho!—You can fancy a French breeze blowing softly over an Italian lake! Unfortunately, however, names do not make singers, and the admirable sopra of the director of the Théâtre-Lyrique is, in my humble opinion, one of the most overrated songstresses in Europe, and these are plentiful nowadays. Mlle. Nilsson has natural qualities far above Madame Carvalho, but she wants much teaching and does not seem to me to improve. She sings the two airs of the Queen of Night in some respects even more brilliantly and perfectly than Murka, but Murka's power, Murka's passion and Murka's intensity are nowhere to be found in the Swedish Astrafantante. Mlle. Nilsson, I hear, is undergoing instructions from Madame Carvalho. I cannot congratulate the young lady. Rigoletto followed Mozart's opera, Mlle. de Maeson, MM. Monjasse and Ismael sustaining the principal characters.

At the Opera the "Africaine" still holds its place on the bills, and still draws good houses; the average receipts for the first fifty nights being 12,000f. (£480). I hear of three new engagements: Mlle. Block (contralto) and Mauduit (forte chanteuse), and M. Ponsard (basse noble). The new comers are laureats of this year's Concours. "La Muette" is announced for this evening.

The managers of the Opera Comique have also made several new engagements; the names of Mlle. Roze, Gontié, Cadet, Seveste, and M. Leroy, being added to the list of the troupe. A capital baritone from Lyons, M. Melchissédec, made a very good début in "Le Toraador." "Marie" (lately noticed in these columns), was the piece chosen for the first appearance of Mlle. Roze and Gontié and M.

Leroy. Of the three new comers Mlle. Rose is said to be the most promising. Grisar's best opera, "Les Porcherons," has been revived with much success. It deserves a special letter, and I will give you an account of it in my next. I forget whether I mentioned the death of Gourdin, the basso-cantante. He was very intelligent, and "created" some good parts, among others, that of Lambro, in "Lara," and Paroles, in "Le Saphir." The rehearsals of M. Victor Massé's "Fior d'Aliza" are progressing, and I hear of a new opera by M. Bazin.

The Theatre Italien is announced to open on the first or third of October. Mmes. Patti, Vitali, Lagrange, Penco, Galetti, Vestri, MM. Fraschini, Brignoli, Nicolini, Delle Sedie, Graziani, Scalese, Zucchini, Santley?, Selva and Agnési are said to be engaged. M. Lablache quits the stage management. M. * * * (no one can either write or pronounce his name) will be the conductor vice Arditi. I strongly recommend this gentleman to follow the example of a former chef at the opera, whose name was Scheitzenhöfer, and had it printed on his cards with the words "prononcez Bertrand" underneath. I hear there were some difficulties with the old members of the orchestra, but they were settled "à l'amiable," and everything will, I trust, go on smoothly. The repertoire contains forty-four works, and ballet will again be tried.

I made an attempt the other evening to sit out the Dame Blanche—one of the operas of my predilection—at the Opéra-Comique, where it has been reprised for M. Achard and Mlle. Cico, and, though I was unable to remain to the end, contrived to stay and hear the finale to the second act, a piece of music in my opinion worthy of Mozart. The opera, as far as I heard, was well done, though I have heard singers and band do better. I made another raid at the Opéra soon after, and heard the second act of Masaniello—more properly La Muette de Portici—but was not greatly impressed by M. Villaret's fisherman, or by M. Cazaux's Pietro. I was sorry I could not attend the Théâtre-Lyrique on the night of the reproduction of La Reine Topuze, not because I care greatly for the music, or for Madame Carvalho's acting or singing, but because so many of the Parisian journals have turned such lively summersaults in praise of composer and artist that it is certain I lost a sensation one way or the other. Of course the second night of a reprise is out of the question.

M. Victor Massé's new opera, Fior d'Aliza is in rehearsal at the Opéra-Comique. The difficulty which has hitherto prevented all idea of its production has been settled. An interpreter for the heroine—a part of the last importance, requiring grand singing, grand acting, grand appearance, grand everything—has been most fortunately discovered in little Madame Vandenheuvel-Duprez, who, we must suppose, by some extraordinary bequest or supernal endowment, has suddenly become possessed of the requisite qualities.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 14, 1865.

Concerts.—Mlle. Parepa.

Through the arrival of Mr. Bateman, with his admirable group of concert artists, our musical season has opened with artistic interest and dignity, at the same time gratifying the larger public, creating a "sensation," and crowding the great Music Hall night after night—six times already in the past two weeks. They have seemed like European concerts; a certain air of fine artistic arrangement and completeness has pervaded them; really good music, in a great variety of schools, has with comparatively few exceptions been the rule in the making up of programmes; always at least enough of the classical and genial to ensure a pleasant evening to the most cultivated listener, while the perfection of execution in nearly every particular made all pass off agreeably. We commonly see with dread, or with indifference, announcements of prima donnas or virtuosos going about to give miscellaneous concerts, small parties where the whole interest lies in one central figure, and all the rest is cheaply, slightly put together just to show off the star. But these have been real concerts. The prima donna does not appear bereft of musical atmosphere and background; there is an orchestra. The attendant minor stars, the young violinist and pianist, are also artists in the true sense of the word, classical artists, and before an artistic audience, out of the general crowd, would shine with no secondary lustre. They play from the best classics of their instruments, also with orchestral accompaniment. And then the orchestra each evening has given us two good overtures. That makes a concert—all being so well planned and, as we shall see, so admirably done.

The combination of artists is rare: a richly endowed, consummate singer, fairly ranking among the great ones, if not thus far so renowned, for great she is in a remarkable variety of styles; a pianist, who is a true artist; a young violinist, also a true artist, and possibly a genius—both excellent specimens of the best Leipsic culture; and later, as if this were not enough, a great curiosity in the shape of a cornet-player; this last for popularity, in which respect, at least while the novelty lasts, it may be expected to beat all.

As for Mlle. PAREPA, her only danger in coming here would seem to have lain in the extravagant laudations of the New York press and in "stunning" announcements. For we were called upon to prepare to hear not only a great, but the greatest singer of the present day, the greatest ever heard in this country,—with only the possible exception of the Lind. The wonder is that the lady charmed from the first moment and continues to charm in spite of all this. Greatest or not, here is a live artistic fact which can bear to be over-praised and not lose its interest. We think the substantial truth is said about her, temperately, with discriminating insight, by our New York correspondent in the last number. She is a most accomplished, noble singer, equal in voice and art to every service whether of concert, oratorio, and even opera, although the dramatic element can hardly be her forte. The most serviceable of singers for all important work in the concert season of a musical metropolis. And this is the position which she held in London, when we heard her there in the summer and fall of 1861; always singing, now at a Philharmonic concert, now at Alfred Mellon's concerts, now in Oratorio, and again in English opera; always applauded, always praised, but at that time not the theme of excitement, not the musical topic, as compared with Tietjens, Patti, or Sims Reeves, the tenor, or Santley, the new baritone, or Mme. Goldschmidt, of course, who just at that time stepped out of her retirement and sang all the soprano music of Elijah with all her electric power of soul and genius. It must be that Mlle. Parepa has gained greatly both in voice and art since then; for she by no means made so great an impression on us as she does now. We can remember to have thought her a fine singer, but no after-vibration of it remained in our mind. She has been singing all the time since in England, always with praise, but still we do not find the musical journals making her the topic, or indulging in that chronic enthusiasm about her, which they discourse month after month, and year after year, by columns, about Grisi, Tietjens, Patti, and so many reigning favorites; nor, though she is one of the ablest of oratorio singers, do we hear of her at the Birmingham Festival, for the last six years at least. We seriously suspect that she has not been appreciated at her full worth in England; it was perhaps necessary to come abroad to get full recognition: let us try to give it intelligently and heartily, but let us not be in haste to overdo, ruining the force of all our praise by the readiness with which we forget what art, what genius in song has visited our shores and thrilled our hearts before. Have we not had Lind, and Sontag, and Lagrange, and Bosio, and Alboni, and do we remember anything of their expression, of the flavor of their voices, of the heart and soul experience they gave us? One would think that it was nought, had all vanished utterly, to read the papers now. The evil of this overpraise is, that it disturbs the relation between the sincere appreciative hearer and the artist; it makes it awkward to express the real homage which one does feel; there is an organized army as it were standing over you putting to your lips the oath of loyalty in such superlative terms that you tremble for the modesty of your own soul if you take it. Now we do not profess to have arrived at a final judgment about the Parepa as compared with other great singers, nor do we think there is any need to be in haste about that. We are content to enjoy and admire; and as for the quality of the enjoyment, the extent and limits of the admiration, and the grounds thereof, we perhaps can best show it in a series of passing notes upon the concerts.

But first let us say, that we regard the excellence of the concerts as concerts as a musical fact of paramount importance to the singer or any individual artist engaged therein; and this excellence in the case of these Bateman concerts (in the main) it is a great pleasure to us to be able to admit at the outset.

I. Wednesday Evening, Oct. 4. The Music Hall was filled with a most eager audience, including most of the intelligent music lovers. Intrinsically the programme was inferior to any which have followed. Parepa's selections were not of high artistic character, but rather sensational, show pieces. The purpose plainly was to introduce to a new public the remarkable qualities of her vocal instrument and the rare skill with which she could use it, her sound honest school of singing, and her capital outfit, physical and mental, for all the simple and the trying tasks of song. In this sense the hacknied Ernani, involami—an effect piece, to be sure, but one of the felicities of Verdi—was a good thing to begin with. Musical feeling apart, it was like a prelude on an instrument, trying its whole compass and exhibiting its means of musical expression. It revealed a voice of rare power and volume, most evenly developed throughout an uncommon range, equally firm, sonorous and musical in the contralto region and in the tones in alt, up to E flat, suggesting tone in reserve above that, say enough for Mozart's Queen of Night. The reach and volume of the voice was great, filling the great hall with utmost ease, no straining ever perceptible. The tones are all round, clear and sweet, without being particularly sympathetic; they please, rather than touch the heart; the quality is not searching in a fine spiritual sense, not the quality that haunts the soul long afterwards and seems to play a providential part in its own destiny. The style was faultless, admirable, noble; the school, the best. It was large, generous, copious, splendid singing; it sustains itself marvellously, whether on a single tone, swelling, diminishing, modulating, shading, brightening with consummate art, or through the symmetric flight of a whole long trying piece, or through an indefinite length and variety of work. The execution, whether cantabile, declamatory or florid was all faultless, too, unless we take exception to a somewhat coarse and throaty kind of trill, making the plentiful use of that figure rather a blemish than a beauty on so fair a whole. Impossible to deny, too, a clear and sure intelligence pervading all her song, and a good-natured, frank and hearty quality which the eye catches at the same time in her good pleasant English face. Whether the intelligence have any touch of poetic imaginative or of genius in it, whether the hearty expression betray finer depths of spirituality (qualities which, be it remembered, we were all too happy to ascribe to the Linds and Bosios and Sontags), probably came up with most people only as an after-question, the day after the concert, if it came at all, and is not a question which we need be deciding yet. Certainly we never have heard the Ernani piece so well sung.

The second piece, "Nightingale's Trill," by one Ganz, is a mere show-piece, a trifle except as a task of technical execution; plainly done to order to offset the Lind echoes. Said echoes were beautifully made, in tones perhaps as clear and silvery as Lind's, and all the runs and flourishes were liquid, bright and bird-like, delighting the audience. Of the trills we have anticipated what we might here say. The Serenade by Gounod, a Barcarole in rhythm, a charming tender melody, charmingly put together with violin and piano parts, so as to make a graceful trio, exhibited to fine advantage what we think the greatest beauty of her singing, her sotto voce. This was indeed lovely, and came nearer to the heart than anything that she has sung. The everlasting Il Bacio, a vulgar dish for an artistic feast, of course "drew the house down," given with such fluent ease, abandon and sensuous tone beauty.

So far so good—one only longed for better music; but that was in a measure furnished by the other artists. Mr. DANNREUTHER (formerly of Cincinnati, a distinguished pupil at the Leipzig Conservatoire—we well remember meeting him, and Rosa too, at the house of Moscheles four years ago, and the interest which the old professor took in him—for a year past taking a high stand in the concert life of London) is a classical pianist, who unites good school, rare technical ability, taste, refinement and intelligence, in an artist-like pursuit of an ideal worthy of an artist. He compares well with the best pianists we have had in this country; a little cold perhaps, lacking the fine imaginative charm of Dresel, and the dash (which is no matter) of the Satters, Gottschalks, Wehlis, et id genus omne. We can agree with "Lancelot" that he has a particularly good touch and conception for Chopin; his rendering of the well known Andante and Finale of the E-minor Concerto was highly satisfactory and won the respect of the right kind of listeners. That Rigoletto Fantasia (though it has for subject about the piece of writing that we know of Verdi's, the quartet), struck us as one of Liszt's weaker efforts in that kind. In the Gounod Serenade he showed fine instinct as an accompanist; there was as much expression in those chords, almost, as in the singer's part. An unaffected, quiet, gentlemanly manner, albeit a little stiff, and a look of mind and culture, bespoke favor at the outset.

The young violinist, CARL ROSE, had not the opportunity to show himself in the music which he most loves (Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c.). He began with the well-known Polonaise by Vieuxtemps, excellent in its way; he began too, as he has gone on through several concerts, sick and weak from want of food and sleep; yet he at once showed a finer musical feeling than any of the party, with a touch of something very near to genius, if not that. We could at once credit the report that Joachim, of whom he alone has ever yet reminded us, had predicted a fine future for him. He has the qualities which, when matured and more amply seconded by manly physical growth, make the great violinist. His tone is most beautiful; refined, pure, soul-like. His style and execution, learned under the Leipzig David, and further inspired by intercourse with Joachim, are thoroughly artistic, free from nonsense and exaggeration; there is no liptrap about it; it is all music, that goes to the heart and wakes the imagination. The only want, that in which we miss Joachim, is robust strength, the broad, large tone and the imperial accent, which can assert its presence even in our great Music Hall, and bring even Bach's music home to such a multitude. Not that his tone is weak or thin, not that he lacks energetic vital accent and power of sustained delivery; only the refinement, the delicacy, the purity are the prominent qualities, so far as these can be prominent. Yet how surely and quietly he won his way to all hearts! (He seems to have been overlooked in New York—Dannreuther too—as if such artists were mere foils to a singer!).

Feeling—this is the main characteristic of his playing; and it was in such refreshing contrast to most of the solo violin playing we have been accustomed to, which, when it lays itself out on feeling, makes you squirm at the sentimental overdoing of the thing. In Rosa it is its real feeling, unspoiled, fresh, ingenuous, as his own nature which you read in his youthful and ingenuous face, his self-forgetting, awkward, honest bearing, absorbed wholly in his art, or rather in the ideal which he would express by it. We regard it as the most interesting arrival on our concert stage for many years. He was enthusiastically recalled; and afterwards in De Beriot's Fantasia de Ballet, and the graceful intertwining of his violin passages with the voice in the Serenade, he won still deeper hold upon his public. The weakest point of the concert is the orchestra, for want of numbers, owing to the unfortunate pre-occupation of our musicians in the theatres. Still a goodly number of our best artists, including the Quintette Club, the Sucks, and a good bassoon and oboe from New York, manage to accompany the vocal pieces and concerts very passably under the excellent lead of THEODORE THOMAS of New York, as well as to play a very good choice of overtures. The first of these was new to us, and interesting as being of a good solid musician-like old school, which was as good as new to our public; it was by the old Schneider, who wrote the oratorios, and although a little respectably tedious in some of its repetition and development, had some nice points, especially a pleasing second subject. The second overture was Flotow's Stradella.

II. Thursday, 5th. It was already established that we were to hear better singing than has been heard in Boston for a good many years. This time a somewhat better style of music was given. After Rossini's bright and ever fresh La Gazza Ladra overture, and the Vieuxtemps Polonaise again had been played, Mlle. PAREPA sang Handel's "From mighty Kings," with preceding recitative, from Judas Maccabæus. This was just the music for her; for that lofty vein of Handel, which has in it more of his strength and triumph, more of the heroic, than of the spiritual or tender, we know no more effective singer. It was all large, dignified and telling, and made us long for such a singer in our oratorios; it was eloquent music, far-reaching over the crowd, every word and syllable carrying its just, full force. The "Shadow Song" from Dinorah was in wide contrast, but she gave all the airy grace and sentiment and echo of the romantic melody as we have by no means heard it done before; and before hearing you would almost as soon think of her undertaking the shadow dance. The Gounod Serenade again, with the same charm. Another of the Ganz productions, "Sing, birdie, sing," proved very popular, and indeed her voice and manner are very taking in English ballads, flat as many of these ballads are, particularly one (sung as an encore), which comes under the Orchestra's category of the "Horological School," called "Five o'clock in the Morning" (see article on a preceding page).

Herr Rosa (so spelt phonetically; he is not Italian, but German, and his name is properly Rose, two syllables), played for a second piece the Elegie by Ernst; a beautiful, sustained, chaste rendering, full of feeling; we have heard it given with more force and breadth, but never more artistically; it was listened to with breathless interest. Mr. DANNREUTHER played the first movement of Beethoven's C-minor Concerto, which it is a privilege to hear at any time; pity we could not have the whole. He played it finely, making admirable effect in the long and well-contrived Cadenza; we could only wish that for once he might play it on a Chickering piano, which to our ear responds more musically than the Steinway in strong passages. He did not seem to us to have caught the spirit and accent of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," though the fingers ran so fleetly through it.—Nicolai's "Merry Wives" overture opened the second part, and all the concerts have closed with a March.

III. Saturday.—The overtures were Auber's for the Crystal Palace, new and interesting, and Martha. Dannreuther and Rosa played a charming Adagio and Rondo Zingaresse from Haydn's Sonata Duo in G, originally a Trio, which Mme. Schumann and Joachim are so fond of playing; it was an artistic gem in the rendering. Rosa played nothing new, except a little encore piece in the altissimo octave; but the pianist confirmed his good classical impression in the B-minor Capriccio of Mendelssohn. Mme. PAREPA sang the great Freyshutz Scena finely, especially the brilliant close; but the Prayer has often touched our feelings more; we had rather hear sympathetic little Frederici sing that. On the other hand, another night, she gave the other great Weber Scena: "Ocean," from Oberon, magnificently. The other pieces were Il Bacio again, and ballads.

IV. Sunday Evening. This was the great concert of the six, if only for Rosa's playing of the Bach Chaconne—without accompaniment, as we have heard Joachim play it; the greatest of all violin solos, full of beauty and of meaning, and the best of all Rosa's performances so far. It was too good for the multitude and yet made great impression and was heartily and long applauded. The Adagio and Finale from the Kreutzer Sonata was a great success on both parts. Thoroughly, artistic sparkling little gems were the Harpsichord Lesson by Scarlatti and the Bach Fugue in D (from Well-temp. Clav.) in which Dannreuther was very happy. The Adagio Religioso by Bott, which Rosa played with Organ accompaniment, we found rather tame. Mlle. PAREPA was truly the great Oratorio singer in three of the noblest pieces: "With Verdure Clad," delightfully even, pure and graceful; "If guiltless blood," from Handel's Susannah, first time in this country, which we think on the whole her greatest piece; we knew not which most to admire, the splendid declamation and Handelian fire of the first part, or the large, rich, sustained cantabile of the more deep and quiet second part, on the theme "Thy will be done." It was noble Handelian interpretation. "I know that my Redeemer" was also very admirable, and had one fine moment that was like inspiration; but more than one singer has touched the heart more in that holy song. Gounod's Ave Maria, a melody put upon Bach's first little Prelude, which was played by Dannreuther, Mr. WILCOX filling in a most effective background from the Organ, might be called a perfect rendering.

—Unwillingly we must stop here, having no room for the good things of succeeding concerts, not even for the famous cornet-player, Mr. LEVY, who of course created a furor, of that kind which is no good condition for a fine-strung classical violinist to follow in the wake of. More hereafter. Meanwhile read what Marx says of Cornets and the modern soft brass instruments near the close of the translation in an earlier part of the paper.

The last PAREPA Concert, for the present, is tonight. To-morrow evening the great singer lends her aid to the Handel and Haydn Society in a single Oratorio performance: "The Creation."

The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY commences their grand series with Judas Maccabæus on Nov. 16, to be followed some time later by the Messiah, St. Paul, &c.

The Sunday Evening Concerts at the Boston Theatre have wisely dropped the term "Sacred," while the last programme was made less trivially secular by the introduction of parts of Beethoven's 5th and 8th Symphonies, and a Mozart Concerto by Mr. Wehlis, although the "left hand" played "Sweet Home" by request.

MILWAUKEE, OCT. 7.—The 149th concert by our Musical Society opened the "Season" here last evening, and was listened to by a good house, thanks to the fine weather, and Prof. Abel's efforts. The programme was an excellent one, embracing several novelties in the shape of Flotow's "Jubel" overture, a male chorus, "Scotland's Tears," and Mendelssohn's "Capriccio" in B minor, for piano, with orchestra accompaniment. The latter piece was well received by the audience, and the young pianist is evidently becoming a favorite here. The orchestra gave evidence of careful training, in the performance of the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and will now compare favorably with any in the West, in point of numbers as well as efficiency. The Society are now rehearsing an act or two from "Faust," which will probably be presented at their next public performance, the 150th concert. Owing to the active interest now taken by the public in the affairs of this institution, and the personal efforts of its managers, it is, financially speaking, in a flourishing condition, and will soon, I hope, give us something in the way of public performances worthy of its former reputation. T. N. R.

PORTLAND, ME. An Organ and Vocal Concert was given on the 19th ult. at the Universalist Church in Congress Square. The occasion was the opening of a fine new organ, of 54 stops and 3,000 pipes, built by Hall and Lebaugh. The organists were Mr. John K. Paine (himself a native of Portland,) Mr. Newton Fitz, and Mr. M. C. Milliken. Mrs. Newton Fitz, late of Mobile, was the vocalist. The concert began with an Ode: "Praise him with the Organ," sung to the tune of "Nuremberg," the audience joining in the chorus. Mr. Paine played Bach's Toccata in F, Ritter's E-minor Sonata, Kulak's Pastorale, his own "Religious Offering" (which certainly is more religious than most of the French Offertoires), closing the concert with an improvisation and variations on the "Star-spangled Banner." Mr. Milliken's contribution was a Postludium by Rink. Mr. Fitz's part is not named in the programme; we presume he accompanied Mrs. Fitz, who sang a Recitative and Air: "Beneath the ramparts," by Concone, "With verdure clad," and Rossini's Inflammatus. The Quartet also from the same Stabat Mater was sung.

WORCESTER, MASS. We take the following from the Palladium:

CONCERT. The performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater, by the Hamilton Club, on the 29th inst., was an occasion of much interest to the seven or eight hundred people who seem to represent the really musical portion of our community. A larger audience might have been expected, but the performers abated not a jot of interest in their work on that account, but did their best for the most part, entering into the performance with commendable zeal. Some of the choruses were exceedingly well sung, while in others there was a little hesitation and timidity, as in the chorus supporting Mr. Wilder's bass solo. The quartets were well given, and the solos were, on the whole, well sustained, with the exception of that want of artistic expression which is rarely found among amateurs. The duet, "Quia est homo," was smoothly sung; and in "Fac ut portem," Miss McFarland, a very promising soprano, received an enthusiastic encore. The "Inflammatus," finely sung by Mrs. Allen and the Club, was also encored. Mr. Allen's organ accompaniments were in excellent taste, rich and varied, and at times almost orchestral in effect. Mrs. Hammond was reliable and efficient as usual at the piano, and under Mr. Hamilton's conductorship, this first performance of Stabat Mater met with warm favor from an audience unusually appreciative.

The first part of the programme was filled by miscellaneous selections, opening with Handel's "Overture to Samson," to which Mr. Allen's playing lent the finest effect. In this performance, and in that of Battista's "Offertoire in D,"—"St. Cecilia," it was gratifying to notice how, in less than a twelve-month, the Organ has found a player with touch so firm and true, with so large knowledge of its resources. His playing recalled some of the very best that we have had upon the instrument. Between these organ performances, Miss Childs and Mr. Richards sang "O sponse mi," with excellent success. There was not only good execution, but something of that magnetic power which every singer should exert upon his audience. Among the best performances of the evening was Mrs. Doane's singing of Cherubini's Ave Maria. We have rarely heard it sung so well; with such feeling, such comprehension of its spirit.

Two years ago the Club performed Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

Worcester, for an inland town, is rich in musical societies, and it is to their credit that they devote themselves to such good music, as appears by the following in the Daily Spy:

The Mozart Society have selected for practice the coming season, "Mendelssohn's great work 'Elijah.'" Washburn Hall has been secured for rehearsals, which occur on Monday evening of each week, commencing Monday, October 2d. Rumor has it that Mr. Edward Hamilton is to return to his old position as conductor, and Mr. B. D. Allen to that of accompanist to the society; this proving true, we predict a very successful season.

The Beethoven Society are, we understand, to take up Mendelssohn's famous oratorio of "St. Paul." A difference of opinion exists among musicians with regard to the comparative merits of these two oratorios, some preferring "Elijah," others "St. Paul," none disputing, however, the great beauty, sublimity and grandeur of each.

Sons of Temperance Hall has been engaged by the Beethoven Society, for rehearsals, which, commencing on Wednesday evening, October 5th, continue on successive Mondays during the season. With Mr. Sumner as conductor, Master G. Willie Sumner as accompanist, and an effective orchestra, the society cannot fail of having a pleasant and profitable term.

OPERA IN BUFFALO.—Max Strakosch announces that he will be in Buffalo, October 16th, and will give four representations of Italian Opera at St. James Hall. The company comprises Mmes. Ghioni and Strakosch; Mlle. Canissa, Signors Maccacferri and Tamaro, tenors; Mancusi, baritone; Susini, basso; with a complete chorus and orchestra. Max Strakosch is the Impresario. Signor Rosa is the conductor and Herr Zitterbart the leader. One dollar is to be the admission fee. After leaving here they go to Toronto, C. W., Milwaukee, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Columbus, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Memphis, and New Orleans.

None of this company rank as first-class artists, but an enjoyable season may be expected. They will probably give Trovatore and perhaps Ernani.—Comm. Adv.

HARTFORD, CONN. The Choral Union will give Beethoven's Mass in C, with orchestra, during the winter. The Beethoven Society will give "Eli."

Mr. W. EUGENE THAYER, who has so distinguished himself among the organists, has sailed for Europe. His plan is to pass the winter in Berlin, and then fill out the remainder of a year in making the acquaintance of the principal organs and organists of Europe.

Mme. Van Zandt, of New York, who sang so charmingly at our Handel and Haydn Festival, has gone to Italy and France to complete her studies and her preparation for the opera.

We are happy to refer to ALBERT M. WHITNEY's advertisement, who, having been a successful teacher for fifteen years, has lately returned from his studies in Europe, and offers himself to teach the pianoforte and Harmony.

Mr. J. K. PAINE's Mass, composed for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, is to be published in New York.

Mme. GAZZANIGA, of whom our opera-goers have pleasant memories, particularly in the rôle of Sappho, is engaged by Grau for his operatic tour in the Western cities, where she is to take the principal lady's part in L' Africaine.

"MUSICAL POPULARITY" is the fitting title of the following article in the Transcript, summing up the services of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club:

Very few of our readers, even those the most musical, form an idea of the activity and enterprise displayed by the above-named highly popular Club in the number of engagements performed by them in a single season. On looking over a statement furnished us by the secretary, we are truly surprised to learn that during the past season, from October, 1864, to October, 1865, the Club have travelled over ten thousand miles, and yet they have been out of New England but once, and then as far as Albany only. They have performed in two hundred and three concerts, and fulfilled other engagements. Of that large number of concerts, but four were given by the Club in Boston. It is evident, therefore, that they have been doing on a large scale the work of musical missionaries; enlightening our country brethren in the knowledge of music as an art.

Concerts of course form the majority of the engagements, yet their services are constantly in demand for other purposes such as playing before Lyceums, Parlor Concerts, Levees, College exercises and the like. Musical Conventions enter very largely into their work. Indeed, wherever music of an elevating character is required, there they may be found, either as a club alone or forming the nucleus of larger organizations. In this manner have they labored for seventeen years. We may safely surmise that the benefit done our musical communities by their efforts is almost incalculable.

If we add to their more public employments, as given above, the amount of time spent in their individual capacities as teachers, and also the many hours necessarily given to rehearsals and private studies, we may conclude that there are few busier citizens to be found in any community than the highly prized artists of the Quintette Club. Boston or any other city may well be proud of them. Indeed, a season passed by without their choice concerts, would now, to a very large number, be felt as a public loss. However, as we do not apprehend being called on to record such a fact, we will close by expressing the hope for a continuance of the popularity which the Club has earned, not less by their merit as true artists than by their conduct as gentlemen.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Sing, Birdie, sing. W. Ganz. 50

One of Mlle Parepa's effective songs. It at first seems nothing but a simple ballad, but the ingenious changes introduced in the bird's song, give it a higher character. While any one can sing it, one should copy Parepa closely to give it full effect.

As the moon's pale-face. (Wie des Mondes abbild.) Song. R. Franz. 30

O wert thou in the cauld blast. (O, stöh ich auf der Haide.) Song. R. Franz. 35

We have here two of Franz's exquisite pieces, the first a gem, with its own crisp beauty, and the second a new melodic rendering of Burns' words, which have been already gracefully set to music by Mendelssohn. Which of the two has done the best, it would be difficult to decide. But it is safe to say that they are both excellent, each in a different way.

Hear my prayer. Quartet. L. H. Southard. 30

Quartet choirs will do well to appropriate these compositions as they appear. They bear promise of great merit.

First Sorrow. (Erster Verlust). Song.

Mendelssohn. 30

O, tell me my heart. (O sage mein Herz.)

Mendelssohn. 40

O, who can guess my emotions? (Es weiss und räth es doch keiner.) Mendelssohn. 40

The enjoyment in playing and hearing these songs does not spring so much from a fine melody, as from the masterly workmanship displayed in the harmonious progression of melody and accompaniment, both together building up a rich structure of music. One would hardly sing such songs to an audience "that knew not Mendelssohn." But, played at home, one becomes more and more attached to them.

The Mountain Boy. Song. S. O. Spencer. 30

A resonant song, full of the clang and echo of mountain bugles.

Instrumental.

Les Sylphes des Bois. Caprice Feerique. (The Wood Nymphs.) J. Ascher. 1.00

An elaborate piece, difficult, but not extremely so, which would be appropriate for a concert or exhibition.

Harum scarum polka. J. P. Clarke. 30

Rattling "harum scarum," and brilliant.

Amorine. Bluetto a la Mazourka. Oesten. 40

Of medium difficulty, and in Oesten's graceful style.

Tyrollese melody. (Kinderständchen.) Oesten. 30

Gondolier's song, " " " 30

These pretty little pieces, with the other one of the set, mentioned in the last number, (Waltz song,) are especially commended to teachers. They are adapted to small hands, and contain no difficult runs, extensions, or springs. Yet Oesten has made them decidedly good pieces, not only for little players, but for more advanced pupils.

The Two Fairies. Transcription. C. Everest. 30

A good piece for learners, neatly arranged.

Florence Polka. W. J. Lemon. 35

Belvidere Schottische. " 30

L'Etoile de la Mer. (Star of the Sea.) Waltz.

W. J. Lemon. 35

Three well constructed dances of about equal merit. They are easy, and sufficiently brilliant.

That Waltz. Lesta Vee. 40

By this singular title, which certainly is not like any other, is known a waltz of very convenient length, and quite lively and graceful.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 641.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 28, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 16.

[The following spirited and off-hand translation of Mr. Longfellow's poem in the October Atlantic has been contributed by one of our most promising Western poets, and we print it with great pleasure.—Carroll's Literary Register.]

Christmas.

SENT TO MR. AGASSIZ WITH A BASKET OF WINE,
ON CHRISTMAS EVE, 1864.

I.

When the Christmas stars on high
Palpitated in the sky,
Six good fellows, full of wine,
Sang out gaily in the rimo,
"Bons amis,
Let us go see Agassiz!"

II.

These far-famed Pilgrims came,
Cunning chaps, across the main,
Gave themselves a pious air,
All six boasting that they were
"Bons amis
Of John Rudolph Agassiz!"

III.

One pale fellow, a joker he,
Sans reproach, sans modesty,
In his native Burgund tongue
Sputtered, as he hiccuped on,
"Bons amis,
I've danced i' the house of Agassiz!"

IV.

Verzenay the Champagner,
Frenchman, nary New York,
But of the suburbs of Avize,
Often hummed such words as these:
"Bons amis,
I've sung i' the house of Agassiz!"

V.

By his side, there stalked an old
Hidalgo, so quiet, cold;
In the days of Charlemagne
Was his sire Grandeo of Spain:
"Bons amis,
I've dined i' the house of Agassiz!"

VI.

A Bordelais came on behind,
Gascon he, or else I'm blind,
Steeped in luscious Poesie,
Laughed and sang out full of glee,
"Bons amis,
I've supped i' the house of Agassiz!"

VII.

With this youth from Gascon-land,
Arm-in-arm, and hand-in-hand,
Lofty-browed, and dull of hue,
Sire Sauterne came onward too,—
"Bons amis,
I've slept i' the house of Agassiz!"

VIII.

Last of all, there came a man,—
He, a poor Carthusian,
Spake he up, in tone robust,
"Benedictions on the Just!
Bons amis,
Bless good Father Agassiz!"

IX.

Three by three, arrived at last,
Up the steps they stumbled fast,
Click and clack! O, what patrol
Suffers such a din to roll,
"Bons amis,
Fore the door of Agassiz!"

X.

"Open, do, my worthy blade,
Open quick, be not afraid:
Open, open, all of us,
Men of consequence, we trust,
Bons amis
Of the house of Agassiz!"

XI.

Hist, you blockheads! shut up now!
Your gurglings make too big a row;
Spare, O spare Philosophy
Such outrageous Poetry!
Bons amis,
And respect my Agassiz!

A Glance at Musical Life in Leipsic.

(From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.)

For more than half a century, Leipsic has enjoyed the noble reputation of being a true nursery of art, and, in the opinion of foreigners, the inhabitants of the city on the banks of the Pleisse pass for being serious worshippers of the Muses. Several circumstances have contributed to this, but those circumstances are not what they were. With regard to the theatre, it was formerly individuals like Neuber, afterwards Koch, and, more than aught else, the management of Herr von Küstner, that raised it in the estimation of strangers, for they not only produced sterling pieces, but were always striving to secure the services of the best and most eminent artists. Many an actor, afterwards enjoying a high reputation, commenced his artistic career at that period in Leipsic. The same held good of opera, though the latter, during many years, appeared to be somewhat kept in the background. The most important influence towards elevating opera at Leipsic, in the last century, was that exerted by Herr Koch, the manager already mentioned, and Herr Johann Adam Hiller, "Cantor," and Musical Director at the celebrated Thomasschule, who himself composed many things, though, it is true, in the style of the period, for the stage, one of them being Die Jagd.

The centre of gravity of all Leipsic musical life lay, however, in the concerts, both instrumental and vocal, the most important being the Gewandhaus Concerts, which, under the direction of men like Hiller, Schicht, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Gade, Rietz, and now Reinecke, soon boasted of a high reputation and have preserved it down to our own time. With regard to the importance of these concerts, they seem more and more to have entered on a state of repose, after having attained their present height, so that, unless energetic measures are adopted, there is reason to fear a retrograde movement. However great the services rendered by Hiller and Schicht, the first founders of this institution, in properly consecrating a new temple of art, it is under Mendelssohn that we must look for the palmy days of the Gewandhaus Concerts; after him we perceive a period of transition either to some future and more elevated flight, or—which strikes us as more likely—to deterioration and decay. At a later period, the "Euterpe," backed up by extraordinary patronage, entered the lists as a rival to the Gewandhaus Concerts. But even this institution appears to have attained its highest point under the Musical Directors Herren von Bronsart and A. Blassmann, for it could not, last season, maintain the good impression it had produced upon us. We cannot, however, in any way impute this circumstance to the actual Musical Director, Herr von Bernuth, because, for a long series of years, he has proved himself, generally, a thoroughly good and experienced conductor, as well as a sterling and highly accomplished artist. It appears that the circumstance should rather be ascribed to the board of management, for, from what we have been able to learn, its members have sometimes differed very much in their views on art, so that a split might easily have been the result.

Exclusive of the institutions above named, the other principal ones distinguished for the energy and zeal exhibited by their directors are Riedel's Verein and the Singacademie. As regards the excellence of the performances, and the good taste displayed in the constitution of the programmes, in which every school and every tendency is represented, we feel inclined, in the present state of musical matters at Leipsic, to allot the first place to Riedel's Verein, and this the more because, by the creation of the boys' chorus, Herr Riedel is working for the musical future of the town. Unfortunately, however, Riedel's Verein is far from enjoying the appreciation it deserves, if we compare it to many other Vereins or Associations, for the mere fact of its numbering hundreds of members (active and non-active) is not a mark of appreciation such as is often displayed towards others whose performances are far inferior, or even trivial.

The Singacademie appears less frequently before the forum of public opinion, though, when it does so, under Herr von Bernuth's direction, we are always pleased with its performances. Such institutions merit general and public commendation, and these they meet with, though unfortunately to a very small extent, for, as a matter of course, they despise even the most distant attempt at puffery.

The Dilettante Orchestral Union had, some years ago, made great progress, under Herr von Bernuth's direction, but at present we have not such frequent opportunities of attending its public performances as we once had.

Under the direction of Herr Härtel; the mixed choral union "Ossian," was unable to rise above mediocrity, but, according to report, under its new director, Dr. Hopff, it has made a stride in advance. We cannot, however, state this as a fact, because we have not had an opportunity of attending any of its recent performances.

With regard now to Male Choral Singing, it meets with warm sympathy in Leipsic, but does not find proportionately fertile soil, or corresponding care and cultivation. There exist in Leipsic and the neighboring rural parishes a large number of Vocal Associations for Male Voices, most of which are again comprised in the "Zöllnerbund," or Zöllner-Federation, so called from the composer of that name. We think we ought to speak somewhat in detail concerning this, because, as far as we know, its merits have never been generally discussed in any musical class paper, but only in local journals and the "Sängerhallen," which are all partiality. Local journals, and the vocal periodicals, written with scarcely the slightest musical knowledge, treat such matters in a puffing style, without any object but a local one, and art is completely neglected.

The Zöllnerbund forms the central point for all matters relating to male choral singing in, and for a long way round, Leipsic. It has not merely, in virtue of its admirable organization, and its grand proportions, regularly to watch over the Vereins here, but, with few exceptions, gives the tone to, and is accepted as a model by them. To all appearance, its internal management is entrusted to excellent hands, for as yet the public have not heard of any misunderstanding. The musical director, also, Dr. Hermann Langer, is well-known as a first-rate musician. The honorary president of the whole "Bund" or Federation is at present Dr. Roderich Benedix.

Seeing that the Zöllnerbund stands so well with the general public, and has such well tried resources at its disposal, we have certainly reason for surprise at its hanging back somewhat with its performances. With the numbers it comprises, it might be one of the first bodies in all Germany for male choral singing, for it possesses the requisite materials. But why is it not so? To answer this question is, perhaps, no easy task, because, in all probability, many local reasons have something to do with the matter. We cannot believe there is a want of energy on the part of the committee, for we have ourselves repeatedly heard the members requested to be more zealous in attending for practice. The cause appears to be in something very different, and in order to get at this we go somewhat far back.

For many years, Leipzig has enjoyed the honor of being the central point for grand national festivals. Thus we had the grand German "Turnfest" (Gymnastic Festival); the inspiring Th. Körner Anniversary; the jubilee of the Leipzig Völkerschlacht; the fifteenth general meeting of German Schoolmasters; the sixth meeting of the German Fire-Brigades, and so on, in which the Zöllnerbund readily took an active part. On all these occasions, it either welcomed with song those engaged in the proceedings, or itself gave concerts in honor of the particular event, concerts distinguished for their excellence, and for the proportionately hearty applause bestowed upon them. But there was one thing that struck people: the continuous sameness of the programmes.

As a rule, the same old things were reproduced which had been heard over and over again. There is such one-sidedness visible, too, in the choice of the songs and of the composers as to merit public censure. Our male choral literature has recently been enriched with so many fresh productions, that we feel astonished that so important an association could possibly take no notice of the important works among them. Most of the programmes contain no names beyond those of Carl Zöllner, Mendelssohn, Marschner, C. M. v. Weber, Dürren, Adam Silcher, Abt, Jul. Otto, and Pierson, those of Mendelssohn and Carl Zöllner being met with most frequently; on the other hand, we entirely miss the names of Franz Schubert, Spohr, Friedrich Schneider, Robert Schumann, Julius Rietz and many more. To continue moving upon such very limited ground is not at all calculated either to advance the prosperity of the Federation (Bund) or the cause of art. The result is indifference and absence of interest on the part of the members, and a want of sympathy on the part of artists and art-critics.

Zealous singers begin to grow weary when the old songs are continually repeated; every one who is director of a Verein knows the truth of this, and is aware how often he is fearfully bothered to produce new works. This ought not to be a very difficult thing for the Zöllner-Federation, for, as we have been informed, there are some very able men among the directors of the branch Vereins, and their advice must at times be worth something. The heaviest charge against the Zöllner-Federation is that of permitting the Vereins to choose amateurs for conductors, a fact calculated to make people believe that the object in view is not really artistic excellence but simply the pecuniary advantage of the Federation itself, which advantage can certainly be commanded only by the adhesion of large masses. That such a pecuniary consideration plays a prominent part in the arrangements was lately proved by the Zöllner-Federation in a most striking fashion, and it ought to be subjected to very severe criticism. But critics take very little interest in the Zöllner-Federation, and the circumstances mentioned are the causes of this. It does not say much for a musical society, especially for so large a one, to be ignored by critics, especially when cases frequently occur of more attention being bestowed on much smaller societies in very little towns.

Such is a tolerably correct epitome of the general state of musical matters in Leipzig (this is not the place to speak of the Conservatory). The reader will easily perceive from it that there is still much to be desired, as far as musical art is concerned, in the town on the banks of the Pleisse, and that of other cities such as Vienna, Berlin, Dresden, Weimar, Löwenberg, and Sonderhausen, some stand higher than, and some on a level with it, in the matter of art, but:

"Man kann am alten Ruhme lange sehen."

CARL OTTO.

Musical Institutes in Italy.

The following report of the Royal Musical Institute in Florence is interesting, as affording an insight into the working of such establishments abroad:

"The foundation of the Royal Musical Institute of Florence is recent. It was set on foot March 15th, 1860, and at the beginning of the year 1862 it was opened for public instruction. The Royal Institute is an establishment for public and gratuitous instruction in music. There are schools both for the rudiments of music and for musical reading, for solfeggio, for solo and part-singing, for keyed, stringed, and wind instruments; lastly, there are schools for thorough bass, for counterpoint, and for composition, and a school of aesthetics and musical history. Students of both sexes have thus an opportunity of obtaining in this Institute a complete musical education in every branch of the art; besides which, for the more advanced pupils, there are added periodical exercises in orchestral music, both instrumental and vocal.

The pupils do not reside in the Institution, but live in their own houses, and come to the Institution only to receive instruction in the different schools, and to take part in the musical classes. The admission of pupils, and their removal from one class to another, depends on examination; and previous to the grant of the diplomas, the pupils who have finished their course are subjected to a strict examination.

The Institute is under the direction and government of a president, assisted by three professors, who form what is called a Council of Management. The Institute possesses a musical library, composed of selected music and books relating to musical literature. The Academy is composed of resident, corresponding, and honorary members. The Examiners are chosen from the resident members of the Academy, as are also the three members of the council of management; these latter are elected triennially. The number of pupils is not limited, being in practice regulated by the applications for admission, the result of the examinations, and the means available for imparting instruction. According to average experience, the number may be calculated at 220 pupils, two-thirds females and one-third males.

The Institute has no endowment or property of its own, nor does it receive any payment from the pupils. It is maintained by a grant from the State. The expenditure amounts annually to 40,694.70 lire, of which 13,672.50 lire go to pay the management, exclusive of the president and director, whose office is gratuitous, and the remaining 27,022.20 lire are for the instruction. The grant for apparatus is regulated by what is required; the average has been 14,300 lire. In this is not reckoned the rent of the place where the Institute is held, this being State property.

The following are the rules of the Royal Musical Institute at Florence:—

The Institute is established to teach, singly and collectively, all the pupils of the Institute. It is intended that it should be opened periodically to all musical composers: that it should maintain a library of music for the use of the public, especially artists; that it should grant rewards to deserving artists; that the best works of modern ancient masters should be performed there; that it should comprise a section for administration and direction; also one for instruction; and a musical academy.

At the head of the Institution is a president, a secretary, and a committee formed from the academy. There are sub-officers and others appointed by the president, and under the orders of the secretary, for the service of the Institute. The musical academy is composed of resident and non-resident academicians, as well as a class of honorary academicians. The Institution is in all respects a government one. It provides the musical service of the State on all public occasions, sacred and secular.

The president has power over all the departments of his Institution. His office is permanent, but unpaid. The secretary is responsible, under the president, for the financial administration. He receives the reports of the general conduct of the schools, and sees that the librarian and musical secretary perform their duties. The council is composed of three resident academicians, appointed by the Minister of Public Instruction from amongst those who are not instructors in the academy. Their power is only corporate; they are elected triennially. There are also three supplementary councillors, in case of illness. The council is the judge in all examinations for admissions, &c. They receive an annual stipend.

The schools or classes are apportioned as follows:—

1. History of music and aesthetics as applied to music; this class has a master with the title of professor.
2. Harmony, counterpoint, and composition; a master with an assistant.
3. Accompaniment from a figured bass and from score; a master.
4. Singing, vocalization, theatrical instruction, elocution, and deportment; a master and assistants when necessary.
5. Elementary instruction, reading music and solfeggio; the pupils are instructed from the first principles to the practice of solfeggio; a master and assistants.
6. Organ, to enable the pupils to accompany the singing from notes; a master.
7. Pianoforte, for professional pianists; a master.
8. Secondary pianoforte, to enable singers to accompany themselves.
9. Violin and viola.
10. Violoncello.
11. Double bass; in this class the scholars are taught from the groundwork of their respective instruments up to the perfect execution for an orchestra or quartet.
12. For wind instruments.
13. For ditto of brass. In these two classes the pupils are taught from the rudiments up to perfect orchestral execution.

A choral school is attached to the Institute, where the people can be instructed in choral singing. It does not form an integral part of the institution, nor is it a necessary step to the other schools. The instruction is gratuitous in this as in the other schools.

The masters and sub-masters are all appointed by Government, on the recommendation of the president. The masters are responsible for the good regulation of the classes to which they are attached, the arrangements of which have been settled by them with the president. The masters and sub-masters must assist at the examination of their pupils. The sub-masters and the assistants are chosen by the president from amongst the better pupils; their post is gratuitous, but if they have held it for a year, they are usually paid something.

The conditions on which the pupils are admitted are—Morality, good health, and natural aptitude. The age varies according to the nature of the instruction sought, but is never under nine years. Full knowledge of reading and writing, and the elements of arithmetic are necessary. Special conditions for admission to each school are laid down in general rules. The pupils are admitted provisionally, and if they pass the examination are drifted into the Institute. Fitness to pass from one class to another, or from one school to a superior one, is determined by the examination called "passaggio." After two failures a pupil is dismissed from the Academy. To have the right to call themselves pupils of the Institute, it is necessary, at the completion of the studies, for the pupils to go through a final examination for a license; if this is well passed they are declared "Accredited Pupils of the Institute," and obtain their diploma. This gives them a preference, ceteris paribus, over others in competition for any public employment. The pupils must behave with respect both to their colleagues and their masters, to whom they must pay implicit obedience, and conform to all the rules of the establishment. Flagrant and repeated faults amongst the pupils are punished by expulsion on the sentence of the president.

During the scholastic year such of the pupils as are considered competent practice concerted music. This practice is independent of the usual classes, and is as follows:—For bowed instruments and for quartet practice, under the direction of the violin master; for wind instruments, and for the execution of good harmony, under the alternate supervision of the masters of these schools; for the school of singing in concert with or without full orchestral accompaniment. Public concerts by the pupils are given at stated periods, and at the end of the academical year.

Supplementing the information supplied by the President of the Florentine Royal Musical Institute to the Musical Education Committee, come accounts of the Royal Conservatoire of Music in Milan, and the Royal Neapolitan College of Music—which accounts have been published by the Society of Arts.

The Vice-President of the former establishment writes as follows:—

"In answer to your letter I send you the following notices, which I hope will be a complete reply to the dispatch of the Minister, dated 16th of February, 1865. The Royal Conservatoire gives a complete musical education. The musical instruction is directed by 29 professors and by about 30 teachers, selected from amongst the best pupils of both sexes. For the literary branch there are seven professors. There are two other professors, one of deportment, pantomime, and ballet, the other for drill. There are, besides, a librarian and a copyist, a tunist of the piano, a cashier and accountant, two inspectors, a secretary, seven inspectors for the pupils, four servants, a carpenter and decorator, a messenger, two porters. These persons (except the teachers of both sexes, who receive no payment for their services) cost the Government yearly 78,600 lire.

"The Conservatoire instructs annually about 240 pupils of both sexes. Each year the Conservatoire turns out from 12 to 15 finished pupils of both sexes. To the pupils of both sexes who distinguished themselves the most at the yearly examinations is granted from year to year a monthly pension, arising from an endowment of 12,720 lire. For all other requirements of the establishment the State assigns 19,868.90 lire annually. The fee which the pupils pay in each year is about 4,000 lire."

To this letter is added a copy of the rules of the Conservatoire, from which a more detailed account may be obtained, and to which is added statistics for the year 1862.

The Royal Neapolitan College of Music is composed of 100 pupils, boarders at free cost (besides those who pay), and of the gratuitous day school with 120 scholars. In the holidays of the free boarders the free day pupils have the right to compete at the examinations with those who pay, and the director of music and four professors of composition and part-singing, and four other examiners chosen by the governor of the college, together with the said directors, are the judges. The 100 pupils are divided into fifteen different classes, according to the following proportion:—

Class.	Pupils.
1. Composition, counterpoint, part-singing, and pianoforte...	16
2. Singing.....	12
3. Violin.....	18
4. Viola.....	6
5. Flute.....	4
6. Fife.....	1
7. Hautbois.....	4
8. Clarinet.....	4
9. Fagotto.....	4
10. Horn.....	6
11. Trumpet.....	4
12. Trombone and ophicleide.....	4
13. English cornet.....	1
14. Violoncello.....	8
15. Double-bass.....	8

Two pupils, one from the violin class and one from the double-bass class, are instructed in the harp. The pupils who pay have their choice of the classes, but not without considering in some degree the wants of the college.

The director of music has the superintendence of all that relates to the Art, and the musical instruction of the 100 free pupils and the instruction of those who pay is intrusted to 20 professors, divided into the following classes:—Two masters of counterpoint and composition, two masters of part-singing, two masters of singing, two masters of the pianoforte, two masters of the violin, two masters of the violoncello, one master of the double-bass, one master of the harp, one master of the clarinet, one master of the flute, one master of the oboe and English horn, one master of the horn, one master of the trumpet, trombone, and ophicleide.

Chamber practice is superintended by two other professors of music. The literary teaching of the pupils is entrusted to seven professors: one of ethics and logic; another of Italian literature and elocution; another of the French language; another of the Latin language, mythology, and universal history; another of the Italian language, geography, and history of their own country; another the elements of the Italian language; and, the seventh, writing and arithmetic. Each year there are public trials to show the progress made by the pupils in their respective classes in composition, as well as in instrumental and vocal music; and also representations annually in the theatre of the Dramatic College, as examples for the School of Elocution; and in Passion week, in the Church of St. Peter, a Miserere, the celebrated "Miserere" is sung by the resident as well as by the day pupils.

The musical lessons are given in three days of each week; on two other days there are vocal and instrumental concerts for the exercise of the pupils and the study of classical music in the library of the college. The musical instruction of the day pupils is entrusted to a fixed number of the resident pupils, with the title and rank of masters of the day school, and they are selected from the best scholars among the resident pupils. Those masters give lessons three times a week; and at other times in the week the day scholars receive lessons from six professors of music with the title of inspectors. These are divided into one for singing, another for finger instruments, another for wind instruments, another for the violoncello and double bass, another for the violin, and the sixth for the conducting of concerts.

The revenue of the College is derived from two sources, one fixed and the other variable. The first consists of an annual payment from the State of 125,197 lire, of which 46,455.55 lire are paid directly from the Treasury to the masters and to others employed by the College; 55,000 lire paid in compensation for the rents of the College taken by the State; and a supplemental grant of 23,741.64 lire. The variable revenue consists of about 58,448.08 lire arising from the rents of the College, given by private persons for the foundation of four musical scholarships, abolished at different times, and since amalgamated into the present College, the rents varying according to the letting of the town and country properties.

The terms of paying pupils are—monthly 38.25 lire, and they find their own board, bed, and washing. The annual expenditure includes the maintenance of the boarders (who all receive from the College board, clothing, washing, instruments, music, medicine, &c.); the day schools, the management, masters, teachers, servants, and repairs, &c.

The supreme government and administration of the College, in every branch, is confided to three governors, nominated by Royal decree, who give their services without any emolument whatever.

The Gloucester Festival.

(From the "Saturday Review.")

Many years since, a Dean made himself notorious by stopping the musical festival at York. Offering some objections to the programme—which he wished to have entirely under his own control—he closed the doors of his cathedral in the face of a profane mob of singers and players, and thus virtually abolished an institution which had promised to become both permanent and useful. At the meetings of the Choirs of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, things are differently managed. About seventy years ago, the least tolerant section of the clerical party was strong enough to do away with the festival at Hereford; but as, at the same time, the claims of the widows and orphans could not be overlooked, it was resolved to meet them by private subscription. The result, however, showed that oratorios were greater attractions than sermons; or, at any rate, that a sermon followed by Handel's Messiah was infinitely more fruitful than a sermon without the Messiah to back it up. So, from that time onward, the Choirs were allowed to assemble every year, at one of the three cities, and celebrate their festival in the cathedral church. A more graceful and harmless way of turning the pleasure derivable from the manifestations of a beautiful art into a channel for the supply of an admirable charity could scarcely be imagined; and to the credit of those in authority it should be added that, with rare exceptions, the successive Bishops and Deans of the three dioceses have not only refrained from opposing the performances of sacred music in their cathedrals, but, by their personal countenance and princely hospitality, have materially assisted the cause.

In the dioceses of Worcester, Gloucester and Hereford there are nearly 150 livings with an income of £100, and out of this pittance, it is clear, the holders can do no more than furnish themselves with the bare necessities of existence. That they should be able to put by anything for the future wants of those who may survive them will hardly be expected. If then, as appears evident, the diocesan clerical institutions, deprived of the aid of the music-meetings, would depend for revenue exclusively upon the clergy and their belongings, the widows and orphans of the most hard-worked and ill-paid laborers in Christ's vineyard must be in a sad plight. Of recent years the festivals have been the means of enriching this particular charity with an average yearly contribution of at least £1,000, which has enabled the diocesan institutions to give to each widow on the fund an annual stipend of £20, and to each orphan of £15. Now, there are still many candidates whose claims it is desirable to recognize; but to abolish the festivals would be to make any further extension of the benefits of the charity impossible. Moreover, it is on all sides admitted that the average annual £1,000 of which we have spoken could never be obtained through private subscription alone. The money comes to a very large extent from the noblemen and gentlemen possessing property in the three counties; and we most frequently read of a great step on behalf of a charitable object being preceded by a dinner, so it seems that the noblemen and gentlemen of the three counties require the charitable instincts within them to be moved to action by the stimulating effects of a banquet of good music. The conduct of the festival lies entirely with them. They alone are responsible for loss; and if by chance there is a surplus, it invariably goes to the charity. Not a penny that finds its way into the plates is appropriated by them in case of a deficit, however large. So that we are really unable to perceive what the question of economy, urged in some quarters, has to do with the matter. Whatever the stewards may be out of pocket, is exclusively their own affair. Grant the festival, and from £1,000 to £1,200 or £1,300 is added to the fund; forbid the festival, and the fund remains in statu quo ante. Besides, the county families like to meet periodically on common ground, with a common object in view. The music-meetings, from a very small beginning, in 1723—thirty-six years before Handel died—have grown into important institutions; and they form just such occasions as bring such people naturally and agreeably together. The aristocratic and wealthy inhabitants of the counties are proud of them. London, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and other great towns, send special reporters to record their proceedings; and the festivals are talked about from one end of the kingdom to the other. This flatters the county vanity in a very innocent way, and a great good is effected without an atom of prejudice to any one. It has been proposed to dispense with the collections at the doors of the cathedrals after the morning performances, and to make up for the loss by increasing the charges of admission. But, odious as the system of plate-begging may appear to some, we do not think the proposed alternative a good one. It would be merely robbing Peter to pay Paul.

The festival just held at Gloucester—the 142nd meeting of the Three Choirs—appears to have been one of the most successful on record. And yet things looked ominous at the outset. A new Bishop had arisen who knew not oratorios, and a new Dean who did not like them. It was current that these dignitaries had expressed their intention of absenting themselves during the week, and it was believed that Dean Law had granted the use of the cathedral under protest. Our zealous contemporary, the Record, with whom this Low-Church Dean is in especial favor, and who considers the festivals as a desecration of the house of God, gloats over the fact that, after "politely informing the stewards," "in terms as cold as he could freeze," that the cathedral "on this occasion would not be withheld," the Dean "positively refused to deliver the sermon for the charity—mindless of the precedent set by those rigidly evangelical fathers in God, the Bishops Ryder and Baring, who had consented to preach on similar occasions. Not less exultant was the Record in stating another fact—that "the good Dean" had followed the Bishop in his flight from Gloucester, and that, in consequence, both the episcopal throne and the decanal stall would be vacant "at a gathering in which it is too obvious that the honor of God is not the first object, and that the world has the mastery." Common sense might ask why, if this was really the feeling of the Dean—and if he further considered the festival a "daring profanity," relying "for its attraction as much on the ball-room as on the house of God, and desecrating the most solemn words of inspiration for the entertainment of a pleasure-seeking crowd"—he granted the use of the Cathedral at any time or under any circumstances. But as the ball was not, any more than the evening concerts, held in the church, the sophistication is as plain as it is impertinent. Nevertheless, matters looked singularly unpromising. High-Church as represented by the Bishop, and Low-Church by the Dean, were both of a mind. Bishop Ellicott had selected festival week to cross "from Lanterbrannen over the Tachingel glacier to Knadersteg"—a feat which he appears to have accomplished with admirable success; Dean Law had gone no one knew where, and two of the Canons had followed the example of their superior. Gloucester was downhearted, but gradually waxed wroth. The local papers contained fulminating "leaders," in which the ecclesiastics were treated with but slight respect; while the Record came in for a goodly and by no means unmerited share of obloquy. The only point they would condescend to discuss—and indeed the only point worth discussion—was whether the performance of sacred music in cathedrals was a desecration of those sacred edifices, an employment of them, so to say, in usum lilitiae. This our contemporaries indignantly denied, strengthening their argument with the words of a canon of the Church, known and respected for his devotion to the interests of the festivals:—"No pulpit eloquence ever moved the hearts of the multitude like the music of the Messiah; no picture of the immortality of the soul from preacher's lips has caused the tears of thousands to start like the singing of the lovely air, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'"

But these drawbacks were not all that made anticipation gloomy. Since the last meeting of the Choirs, at Hereford, (1864), Mr. Amott, organist of Hereford Cathedral and for many years conductor of the Festival, had died. His successor was Dr. Samuel Sebastian Wesley from Winchester—a famous musician, it is true, but remarkable, if report was to be relied on, no less for eccentricity than for talent. The arrangements of Dr. Wesley, for the musical part of the Festival were criticized in anything but favorable terms. That he had made one or two very serious blunders could hardly be denied. His greatest mistake was in dispensing with the services of a tenor incomparably the greatest singer in oratorio we possess, and with those of a contralto who, long as she has been before the public, is still confessedly unequalled in her line. The tenor was Mr. Sims Reeves, the contralto Madame Sainton Dolby. In place of the first, Dr. Wesley had engaged Dr. Gunz, from Her Majesty's Theatre—an artist untried in oratorio and unacquainted with the English language; in place of the last, he had secured two young ladies of whom nobody knew anything. Then Dr. Wesley entertained peculiar notions of conducting—traditions of a certain festival at Hereford, which he had directed thirty years ago, while organist of Hereford Cathedral. True, he could scarcely prove a worse conductor than his immediate predecessor, Mr. Amott, the least competent of the three local organists who have so long presided respectively over the meetings of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester; but from a recluse since thirty years, who now came forward with an inexperienced baton, at the caprice of an obstinate will, nothing very good was to be expected. Thus, in the belief of many, the Gloucester Festival of 1865 was not only to be the last, but, in an artistic sense, the least satisfactory ever given. But l'homme propose et Dieu dispose; the actual results showed the reverse of what had been anticipated. As the festival gradually advanced the cronkers were gradually silenced; and the upshot was that the 142nd meeting of the Choirs—if, judged from a musically critical point of view, not one of the most unexceptionally creditable on record—turned out at any rate better than had been expected, while in a commercial sense it was wonderfully prosperous.

As matters mended, a more cheerful and indeed a more charitable view began to be taken of everything and everybody. Bishop Ellicott's London labors, as one of the Lords Spiritual, had been severe, and he needed repose and change of scene; so he left Gloucester and "did" the glacier. Moreover, the Bishop had never declined to preach the Charity Sermon, but had merely requested that he might not be asked to preach it. As for Dean Law, not only had he granted the use of his Cathedral (the Record and the "freeze" were no longer hinted at), but placed his deanery in charge of Lord Ellenborough, who was spending 150*l.* a day in dispensing hospitality. To conclude, the Dean had never harbored a thought of withholding the Cathedral, or he would have considered it his duty to apprise the organist and conductor, Dr. Wesley, of his intention—inasmuch as the abolition of the music meetings would so considerably diminish that gentleman's professional emolument as to make him chary of abandoning his old post at Winchester, for another not otherwise much more honorable or much more profitable, at Gloucester. The Dean of Chichester, who preached at the Cathedral on the Sunday after the festival, did not, of course, enter into explanations such as these; but he is reported to have uttered something from the pulpit about "anonymous assassins" (or words to that effect), which in the minds of many of his hearers set things all to rights. It little matters, however, what influence may have caused the change of tone in certain quarters. The Dean of Chichester, if he really made use of such an expression, could not have meant that the Record allowed "anonymous assassins" to make unscrupulous use of its columns; and so the observation may be accepted as against those journals which, taking the Record as authority, wrote accordingly. Enough that the festival has proved a great success, and that at present there is no idea of it being the last.

Crispino e la Comare.

In the correspondence of the London Orchestra we find the following account of the first production in Paris of the comic opera which Maretzek has imported for the delectation of the New York opera-goers.

PARIS, APRIL 11, 1865.

"Crispino e la Comare," opera buffa in three acts, libretto by Piave, and music by the brothers Luigi and Frederico Ricci, was produced at the Theatre Italien last week, and met with great success. For some time past the repertoire of this theatre has been confined to horrible subjects; and though a good murderous piece every now and then is agreeable, and affords healthy excitement, still an indigestion of crime ought to be avoided. To tell the truth, I'm sick of the "Troubadour;" I've no sympathy for Azuena, that villainous old Bohemian, who appears to consider that it's her mission to "devil" children like kidneys. I don't like consumptive libretti, and think an unfortunate girl dying on the stage from what the registrar-general calls "disease of the respiratory organs," the reverse of cheerful. Ernani inspires me with contempt; and as for Don Silva (who appears, from his own account, to have been suffering from the effects of a peculiar disease, known to Italian librettists as "hell in the breast," l'inferno nel petto), had he insulted me by offering me a "cup of cold poison," I think I should have forgotten my dignity as a grand d'Espagne, and done battle with him like a costermonger. Add to the operas already mentioned, those of "Lucrezia Borgia," "Rigoletto," and "La Duchessa di San Giuliano," and you will, I think, admit that my remarks are just; and that the idea at one time entertained of establishing the new "Morgue," underneath the Salle Ventadour, was not so idiotic as some people pretend. The scene of M. Piave's opera is laid in Venice. Crispino is a poor cobbler in a bad way, and has no fortune but his debts. His wife, Annetta, does his best to aid him, and sells "a hundred songs for a penny," in the streets of "Venezia la bella." Their efforts to arrive at that difficult result known as making both ends meet, are useless; and Crispino in despair determines to commit suicide. He is about to throw himself into a well, when a lady rises from it and stops him. This lady (La Comare) is not, as you would perhaps imagine, Truth, who is said to have taken up her residence at the bottom of the well, and to find the prospect cheerful. We knew that at once from her costume, which was grey and ample, while the above-mentioned person's is like Cramer & Co.—Limited. Who she really is will be known to those whose perseverance and long suffering will permit them to read my letter to the end. La Comare, who seems to be a very good sort of fellow, gives Crispino a purse of gold, and offers to set him up in business as a doctor. Crispino hesitates at first; but his new acquaintance tells him that all he has to do in treating his patients, is to look about him, and if he sees her near them, they will die; but if she does not appear they are sure to recover, and he may order what remedy he pleases. He then accepts, and La Comare, fearless of damp, returns to her most unpleasant abode.

In Act II. we find our friend in the exercise of his profession. An unfortunate mason has rolled from a house-top, and, being condemned by the faculty, is brought to Crispino to see if there is any chance of life left. After assuring himself that his Commère is absent, he undertakes the cure, and effects it by means of a bottle of Bordeaux which he drinks himself. Astonishment of the crowd who cry "Un miracle!" Crispino's reputation is made; patients arrive from every part, and he becomes rich. "Set a beggar on horseback," and we know where he'll ride to. Crispino forgets his old friends; and when his wife invites a few of them to a quiet carpet-dance he turns them out of the house, and gives his better-half a gentle hint, in which a chair takes a prominent part, that she had better not "do that again." Annetta seeks refuge in her room; her husband follows her to continue his chastisement, but is stopped on the threshold by La Comare, who expostulates with him, and is received in a very cold-shoulder sort of way. In order to bring him to his senses she takes him on a short trip to the infernal regions, and the two disappear. On arriving at their journey's end, La Comare shows him a number of crystal vases in which are burning lights more or less brilliant. "Each of these represents a human life. This one which burns so clearly, is Annetta's. That beside it, nearly extinguished, is yours." "Can't you take a little oil out of my wife's lamp and put it into mine?" asks Crispino, who, as you will justly observe, is generous. His mysterious companion upbraids him, and on his asking who she is, answers "Io son la Morte!" at the same time showing him her ghastly face. Crispino falls at her feet and implores pardon. In a sort of vision he sees himself stretched on his bed with his family around him assisting at his dying moments; but he begs so hard for half an hour's grace to bid adieu to his wife and children, and makes so many promises of amendment, that his terrible companion relents, and a quick change of scene shows him in his own house asleep on a chair, and laboring from the effects of a night mare. Annetta sings the inevitable rondo finale, and the curtain falls.

The brothers Ricci, who composed the music of this opera en collaboration (it was first performed at Naples in 1836), though not much known on this side of the Alps, have written, separately or in partnership, some very charming works. Luigi, the elder, who died some five years ago in a maison de Santé at Prague, was the composer of "Un Aventurero di Scaramuccia" and "Chiara di Rosenberg," both of which were very successful, and certain numbers are, I think, known in England. His brother, Frederico, is the author of "La Prigione d'Edinbourg," and "Corrado d'Altamura." He is still alive, and was for some time director of the Conservatoire at St. Petersburg. Nothing can be more agreeable and charming than the manner in which the two artists have treated the subject of "Crispino." It is the most genial opera buffa we have heard for a long time, and deserves a place very near the "Barbiera." The music of the fantastic scenes, particularly of that which passes in the infernal regions, is written with wonderful tact. I tremble when I think of the consequences that might have ensued, had the work been given to a disciple of the school, a partisan of "la musique réaliste." From the beginning to the end of the opera there was such entrain, so many charming motifs, such brilliancy and good writing in the orchestral accompaniment, such a feeling of gaiety about the whole affair that, all being over, the only word I can find to express the general feeling is, that we went away "happy." The most remarkable numbers are, an air for soprano in the first act, admirably sung by Mlle. Vitali; a duet for Crispino and his wife; another soprano air and sextor in act II.; a "chanson de la crêpe;" and a capital quarrelling trio in act III., which last is worth the "Pappatacci," and that's no slight praise.

The cast was excellent, and included Mesdames Vitali (Annetta), Vestri (La Comare), M.M. Zucchini (Crispino), Brignoli (Il Contino), Agnesi (Fabrizio), and Mercuriali (Il Dottore Mirobolante). The whole weight of the piece fell on M. Zucchini, who got through his task admirably. His scene with La Comare in the third act was one of the most remarkable pieces of acting we have witnessed for a long time. His repentance was played in such a manner that one hardly knew whether to feel sorry or laugh. He is an Italian edition of Robson, and if one of your operatic companies should mount the work this year, I have no doubt that he will be as successful before an English audience as he was here on Tuesday. M. Mercuriali played the Dottore Mirobolante very well indeed, and was deservedly encored for the way in which he sang his phrase of the quarrelling trio mentioned above. M. Agnesi had but little to do, but did that little well. M. Brignoli, being either out of voice, or out of temper, on account of the little importance of the part of the Contino, was nearly as blue as the "Saphir."

Rossini.

(From the Onida Circular.)

Rossini is the prince of melodists. He seldom awes us with his majesty, or melts our hearts with his pathos; but he bewitches and captivates us by his lavish vitality and exuberance of spirits. His melodies seem so spontaneous and effortless that they impress the listener rather as a production of nature than of art. They are like the caroling of birds on a spring morning, perfectly joyous, happy and unconstrained, and full of a careless ease and abandon which is as fascinating as it is unapproachable.

If Rossini has a fault, it is, that he is too uniformly gay. It is his nature, and we will not complain of it, nor indeed have we any disposition to do so; yet we cannot always laugh, and there are seasons when our appetites crave a more substantial aliment. Rossini's music impresses us as the outpouring of a nature that has never known a sigh or a tear: he is a delightful associate in our sunny moods, but at other times we turn from him and seek the companionship of those who have loved and labored and sorrowed, and whose rhythm is more in unison with the soberer pulsations of the great human heart.

Rossini may be considered the founder of the Italian school of music. Although he has very little of the sentimentality which now prevails, the somewhat florid and sensuous character of his music was developed by his imitators and successors into that combination of ornament with affectation of feeling, which is so prominent in some of the later Italian composers. Rossini broke at a bound through the formality and stiffness of the old schools, and evolved a new and free style of music, which speedily won the admiration of all Europe. Even his enemies could not withhold their applause from the daring genius who was not afraid to cast aside conventional trammels, and give unrestrained utterance to nature.

Many of the operas of Rossini are as popular now as ever, and seem destined to hold their place on the stage for at least another generation. Of these, the principal are Tancredi, L'Italiana in Algeri, the Barber of Seville, Otello, Cenerentola, Il Turco in Italia, La Gazza Ladra, La Donna del Lago, and William Tell. The latter of these is the most elevated and serious of any, and abounds in superb melody and masterly instrumentation. The Barber of Seville is probably the best comic opera in existence, not excepting the Nozze di Figaro of Mozart, and is a favorite wherever operatic music is cultivated.

The overtures to Rossini's operas are master-pieces in their way, and are much esteemed by orchestral conductors, and others, for concert music, on account of their fire and vivacity. The best of these are the overtures to Tancredi, the Barber of Seville, Il Turco in Italia, Gazza Ladra, and William Tell.

Rossini is less successful in his more serious music. His quasi opera, Mosé in Egitto, or Moses in Egypt, although full of beautiful melody, can hardly be considered a sufficiently elevated treatment of a scriptural subject. The same may be said of his Stabat Mater—an ecclesiastical subject, which is treated in a somewhat operatic manner; but in spite of these incongruities the music is always pleasing, and if we can but ignore or forget the libretto, our enjoyment will be unalloyed. Even his serious music is far from being wholly inappropriate. The Cujus Animam, from his Stabat Mater, is a fine specimen of elevated and stately melody, and would hardly be out of place [?] in an oratorio of Handel.

Rossini has given us but little of such music, however, and we may consider it as exceptional with him, rather than normal. His chosen mood is, as we have said, gay and lightsome, and sobriety seems to oppress and chill him.

Rossini is yet living in Paris, at the age of seventy-three. He has composed little music during the past thirty years, refusing the most tempting offers from an unwillingness to endanger his reputation by the possible production of inferior works. He is said to be, what we should infer from the character of his music, "a genial, well-preserved old gentleman, full of anecdotes and reminiscences of musical history in Europe during the past half-century." It is said, in illustration of his wonderful facility of melodic composition, that, on the eve of the production of his opera of Tancredi, the prima donna refused to sing one of the leading solos, declaring that it was too difficult. As time was precious, Rossini immediately set to work, and in ten minutes produced the beautiful aria, "Di tanti palpiti," which will endure as long as music lasts.

The function of Rossini in music is like that of Hood or Lamb in letters—to please, rather than to elevate or instruct. That in this he is eminently successful, no one will deny. The abundance and richness of his melodies render him easily appreciable by ordinary culture, while his inimitable sprightliness and grace commend alike to the virtuoso and the amateur. He is no Handel, and yet he will outlast [?] Handel, for he is more nearly within the range of common sympathy. He wins us away from care and pain, the wear and tear of every-day life, and bids us enjoy ourselves and be merry. He changes many a sigh into a smile, and dispels many a tear-drop which would gather in our eyes. He is the apostle of the gospel of beatitude—always clear, fresh, and happy, never mournful, never repining, but unceasingly tempting men to look from cloud to sunshine, and from night to day.

Music Abroad.

Meagre and dry indeed are the last month's reports of musical doings in Europe.

LONDON. Alfred Mellon's concerts closed with the month of September. To show what a rich variety of classical music is given in these popular "Promenade Concerts" at Covent Garden Theatre (and with a great orchestra of some 80 of the best musicians of London), we cite a few more paragraphs from the Times.

Since we last spoke of these thriving entertainments there have been, to employ the conventional phraseology, an "Italian Night" and a "Mozart Night." The Italian programme was full of good things. It began with the overture to Noirmahal, a work produced during Spontini's reign as conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin, and which grew out of a ballet on the same subject, entitled Lallah Rookh. This overture, lengthy, melodious, and gorgeously instrumented, is clearly an imitation of Rossini's more spontaneous and symmetrically wrought-out orchestral prelude to Semiramide. In effective contrast with this was the overture to Cherubini's Anacréon—Anacréon, ou l'Amour Fugitif, the twenty-fourth dramatic work of the magnificent Florentine composer, produced at the Théâtre Feydeau in 1803, not long after the more celebrated Deux Journées, and six years after Medée. The overture to Anacréon, one of the most original and brilliant pieces of its kind, is, thanks to the Philharmonic Society, who gave it at their very first concert, in 1813, at the Argyll Rooms, and with whom it has always remained a stockpiece, tolerably familiar to London amateurs of classical music. The splendid Guillaume Tell of Rossini completed a triad of overtures as unlike to each other as could be imagined, and therefore the better fitted to be placed in one and the same programme. Perhaps it would have been wiser to put the Guillaume Tell—as the most showy—last, instead of second; but, as all three were admirably played, the order of succession was of comparatively small significance. In addition to the overtures, there was the vigorous and characteristic March of Israelites, from Mr. Costa's oratorio, Eli, given with extraordinary spirit, and loudly encored.

Ernst's extremely difficult and highly-interesting fantasia on the March and "Willow-song" in Rossini's Otello was played with surprising mechanical dexterity, united to genuine artistic feeling, by the gifted young violinist, Mr. Carrodus, who was unanimously called back at the end of his performance; the famous duet for basses, from Bellini's I Puritani, "Suoni la tromba," was performed on the ophicleide and euphonium, with singularly good effect, by those excellent professors, Messrs. Hughes and Phases—a horn obligato part, for C. Harper, who has known few rivals on that instrument, materially enriching the effect; and Ricci's barcarole, "Sulla poppa del mio brik," was sung by Signor Ferranti.

There still remains, however, to notice one of the salient features of the "Italian Night"—we mean the re-appearance of Mlle. Carlotta Patti, so great a favorite last season, and who bids fair to become even a greater favorite now. The reception awarded to Mlle. Carlotta Patti was most enthusiastic, and the air selected for her, "O luce di quest' anima," from Donizetti's Linda di Chamouni, was sung twice, in obedience to the emphatically expressed desire of the audience. This clever lady's vocalization exhibits all those inviting characteristics, all those original embellishments and tours de force, that have hitherto made it so acceptable. In the second part Mlle. Patti introduced a waltz by Franz Abt called "Il Sogno," with which her hearers were so greatly pleased that they again summoned her back to the orchestra, when she further charmed their ears with the quaintest conceivable delivery of our popular old ballad "Comin' through the rye."

"The Mozart Night" was equally satisfactory. The G minor symphony—which in impassioned earnestness and continuously flowing melody has never been surpassed, rarely approached; the seldom heard overture to La Clemenza di Tito—the last piece of the kind, excepting the incomparable Die Zauberflöte, that Mozart gave to the world; the genial and dashing pianoforte sonata in D (No. 7), exceedingly well played by Mlle. Marie Krebs; and the adagio from the concerto for clarinet, recently introduced by Dr. Wyldé at the New Philharmonic Concerts—again intrusted to Mr. Lazarus, whose tone, phrasing, and execution were alike perfect, composed the instrumental part of the selection. Signor Ferranti sang "Non più andrai," and Mlle. Carlotta Patti the two grand airs of Astrafiamante, Queen of Night—the last of which she was uproariously called upon to repeat. The same compliment was paid her in the miscellaneous part of the concert, when she joined Signor Ferranti in a duet from Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore. On both occasions—the "Italian Night" and the "Mozart Night"—the house was literally crammed from roof to base. So much the better for genuine art.

The concert on Saturday was made more than usually attractive by the first appearance of the eminent violinist, Herr Wieniawski, whose truly wonderful execution of his own fantasia, entitled Airs Russes—in which all the difficulties of modern fiddle "virtuosity" are unsparingly heaped together—completely electrified the audience. M. Wieniawski, who never played with greater fire and animation, was rapturously received and encored amid a storm of applause.

On Monday we had a curious programme—made up of Schumann, Wagner, Meyerbeer, and Spohr (Mr. Mellon must be a bit of a wag); and on Thursday a second "Mendelssohn Night." Good.

Sept. 16.—Signor Bottesini made his first appearance on Wednesday evening, supplying the place left vacant by M. Wieniawski, whose engagement terminated on Tuesday. The celebrated contra-basso played as marvellously as ever and created an immense sensation in two pieces of his own composition, "Adelaida," accompanied on the pianoforte by Mlle. Krebs, and fantasia on La Sonnambula. Mlle. Carlotta Patti remains the vocalist par excellence, and Mlle. Krebs is undisturbed at the piano. Mr. George Perren has been singing throughout the week. On Thursday a second "Beethoven Night" was given, and a "night" devoted to Louis Spohr is announced for Monday, when the "Power of Sound" Symphony will be performed. Next Thursday a "Mozart and Mendelssohn" concert.

The Royal English Opera was to open on the 22nd inst. with Meyerbeer's L'Africaine.—The Abbé Liszt, it is said, will visit London in May next, for the purpose of conducting his Mass composed expressly for the opening of the New Church of the Carmelites at Kensington.—An Autumn Festival of the Metropolitan Schools was held at the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin. There were 5,000 singing children, and an audience of 18,000. The first half of the programme was sacred, the second secular. A writer says:

Particularly noteworthy as an example of smooth steady singing (although not coming in for so large a share of applause as many other pieces) was the execution of the chorale from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, "Hark, arise, a voice is calling." The enumeration of the choruses redemanded will best show what found most favor in the eyes, or rather the ears of the audience—"Hosanna," "Home, sweet home," "At the night raven's dismal voice," "The Men of Harlech." The vocal performances were relieved by the boys of the Duke of York's School, whose playing would do credit to many a regimental band of far higher pretensions. The magnificent weather, the lovely aspect of the Palace, the freshness of the children's voices, and the slight of their genuine appreciation of their visit to the Crystal Palace, rendered this day a remarkably enjoyable one to all around.

HANNOVER.—The king George V., says one of our German exchanges, has lately composed an Italian Opera, "The Hermit of the Peloponnesus," which is in preparation for performance. To this end he has engaged an Italian troupe at a cost of 20,000 thalers. King George, born in 1819, is not only a composer, but an intelligent writer upon music, and above all a zealous protector of Art. His love for music appeared at a very early age, and he began to take lessons on the piano in his seventh year; from 1829 to 1833 Dulcken in London was the prince's teacher; from 1835 to 1837 he studied composition under Greulich and Kütken in Berlin. Returning to Hannover he at first occupied himself with the piano; afterwards with composing songs. A little book, "Reflections upon Music," gives proof of his manifold scientific and æsthetic studies.

Joachim and his wife, having returned from their successful season in France and England, will continue to make their home in Hannover until the Spring, when they will leave the residence forever. One of the journals says, the good bourgeois of this small capital are somewhat surprised that Italian music should be thus suddenly distinguished in a place hitherto considered the home par excellence of German music, which was rather ostentatiously patronized, and adds:

His Majesty the King will then, perhaps, discover how foolish he was to part with an artist like Joachim, whose presence was the sole fact which caused the greater portion of non-Germanic Europe to recollect there was such a town as Hannover in existence.

Of Joachim's successor we read: "Jean Bott, hitherto in Meiningen, has been appointed Court-Kapellmeister and Chamber-virtuoso to the King of Hannover, and has already betaken himself to the residence. The salary is the highest paid to any Kapellmeister in Germany, namely, 2,000 thalers the first year, and 3,000 afterwards. As violinist, Joachim has a greater fame than Bott; but the latter is known among artists as an unsurpassable Spohr-player; yet he plays not only Spohr, but the whole classical and modern violin literature—Paganini not excepted."

WIESBADEN.—Theodore Eisfeldt, the esteemed conductor for many years of the New York Philharmonic Concerts, has been appointed Kapellmeister to the Duke of Nassau and has entered on his duties. He will there find our old Boston Conductor, Henri Schmidt, for a townsman.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 28, 1865.

Concerts.

MADAME PAREPA.

The interesting concerts, for which Boston is indebted to Mr. Bateman and the artists brought by him from London, closed almost immediately after our last issue; yet we were only able to chronicle the first period of them, so to speak, to wit the ante-cornet period. Mr. LEVY was the great card whoso the shrewd manager had been holding in reserve. The first four concerts, which we in some sort described, were made up of artistic materials: a very admirable singer (though not one of great inspirations, or one whose song goes so to the heart as that of many less accomplished), a violinist who makes the impression of genius and is perhaps the most interesting artistic character that has come among us for some years; a pianist, of thorough classical culture and rare intelligence, as well as skill, for his age; and an orchestra:—these made up together a concert which a cultivated taste could enjoy, the selections being in the main good, though mingled with some clap-trap. There was at least a pleasant artistic unity in these elements. But now comes in a new element, something purely ad captandum, a perfect patent reaper of applause, therefore grateful to the managerial heart, which has its own standard by which to rate the value of an artistic effort, namely by counting and measuring the plaudits; that being the best art which can set the most hands in motion with most vehemence and pertinacity; hence "Il Baccio" is better than the greatest aria of Mozart; the little encore piece for the violin which peeps all the time in altissimo, (and which the young rogues who play it distinguish, among themselves, by the title of "Chicken up a tree!"), better than Bach's Chaconne or Beethoven's Concerto; and an extraordinary solo on a cornet, better than Symphony or Sonata even by the Shakespeare of music, whose misfortune it may have been to have flourished in the days of straight-out, honest trumpets, and before this double-tongued valved imitator had opened a more glorious field for genius. The purpose of the introduction of the Cornet into these concerts was not to add to their artistic completeness, but, at the risk of seriously disturbing that, to increase their attraction for that larger public who are more delighted with a strange feat than with real beauty and expression.

Great was the fame of Mr. J. Levy, of Covent Garden orchestra, "the greatest cornet-au-piston player in the world," and great the crowd at the fifth concert. Tuesday evening, Oct. 10, when he first gave a public sample of his quality in the Music Hall (some favored ones had already gone crazy with delight after a private hearing). He came, he blew, he conquered. Such Jericho blasts, alternated with such tender, melancholy cantabile: such ringing trumpet tones, suddenly subduing themselves to caper through the mazes of a waltz, and thrid a labyrinth of florid variations, as if it were a flute or fiddle; such trills, floriture, double-tonguings accurate as clock work, echoes, and grotesque Carnival of Venice imitations, such mingling of technical virtuosity and sentimentality,—what novelty-loving crowd could resist it? Those who were not edified, could be amused at the drollery of the phenomenon. We could readily believe it the greatest cornet playing in the world (if that were any comfort for such interruption of a concert). Certainly the performance was wonderful; the execution as nearly perfect as we can conceive of; the variety of effects produced surpassing all that we ever could expect, or desire, from such an instrument. The certainty and graceful facility with which all was done gave that pleasure which we always have in the artificial part of art, while we think it only fair to reserve the term Art for things of higher meaning, for something more like poetry. Is there not a broad distinction, one of kind rather than degree, between the utmost perfection of any gymnastic or technical feats and the mind's creations in the sphere of poetry and what we call the Fine Arts, including music? But the mass of a promiscuous audience at any time are carried away by a rare display of technical skill, especially where an inferior instrument is made to seem to do the work more native and congenial to better instruments, as brass the work of reeds or strings. So when the less musical part of the crowd (the part who make most noise when they are pleased) heard the cornet singing the "Exile's Lament" with all the sentimental tone and agonizing stress of an Italian tenor nursed in the school of Verdi, it thought there never was an instrument so touching and so searching in its tone, or artist so inspired with feeling; and when it came to the "Whirlwind Polka," of course there was a whirlwind of excitement and applause; and again, when the hacknied barlequin of the "Carnival," turned up in a new form, "in armor of complete brass," yet lithe as ever, some of the original fresh charm returned. Besides, there was so much good-natured life and jollity about the little man, he so seemed to blow his whole soul into his cornet, and to be so happily at home in whirlwinds of applause, that one could think of him as Beranger's petit homme gris changed into the little man of brass.

Now all this is very well in its place, and when one goes to get this sort of thing it is well to "get the best," get Levy if you can. (The New York critics, we see, give the preference in tone and phrasing to their own Schreiber, while owning Levy to be matchless in bravura). But is this sort of virtuosity in place in such society as Chopin's Larghetto and Impromptu and Mendelssohn's B-minor Capriccio (capitally played by DANNEBERGER), Spohr's "Concerto Dramatique," commonly called Scena cantante (next to the Chaconne the best of CARL ROSA's refined, imaginative renderings), and the great Oberon scena: "Ocean, thou mighty monster," (to which we have before alluded as one of Mme. PAREPA's grandest efforts)? With the rest of the programme (quite enough, one would think, of sugar-plums interspersed among the courses of an artistic feast to please the children), Il Bacio, &c., it was in place; but the rattling of sugar-plums was harmless in comparison to such a "whirlwind." Let us stop a moment here, just by way of parenthesis, to admire the exquisite grace and fluency with which Mme. Parepa sang, in French, the charming florid air: "Du village voisin" from Auber's Le Serment; and this concludes all that we need say about the concert as such.—To return to the wonderful cornet:

Objection first: It was out of place; it is not and cannot be a classical instrument. It does not appeal to the same kind of taste, to the same mood of mind, as that in which we listen to good music. It disturbs and breaks up the sphere, the sympathetic quiet atmosphere in which pure musical enjoyment is possible. In plain words, in the street dialect, which is its own, it raises "too much of a row." It delights crowd and manager (who always sit outside of music), but it scatters the music; the electro-nervous conditions are changed, and Beethoven and Mendelssohn can no longer telegraph themselves through such a medium. When the "house is brought down" in that way, we are all jostled out of our musical seats and senses. And when the fine-strung violinist, as we hinted before, comes on, sensitive and nervous already perhaps with illness, and now, doubly nervous amid all this riot and unmusical excitement, awkwardly feeling himself out of place with his fine things, how can he do justice either to himself or (what he cares more about, as he is an artist) to Mendelssohn?

The tone and feeling of the place has been changed to that of the circus, and what now have Bach and Beethoven to do here? No wonder the manager is willing, in grateful exchange for the cornet, to send his classical pianist back to London. The brass virtuosity raises too much of a "whirlwind," for the fine flowers of Art to live in; the cornet comes in as a disturbing element in what was a nice little artistic unity in variety.

Objection second: We do not like the instrument (out of the streets). It is a sophisticated instrument; in putting on all these airs, in learning to do like flutes and violins and singers, it has lost its native honest, hearty and decided character; it has no character, and is all imitation, a plausible creature of the world. Its basis is the old-fashioned trumpet, with its ringing martial tone and crackle, its limited scale and limited uses, within which it was altogether characteristic, and most valuable to an orchestra; its tone-color very positive. Now, with its scale completed by the use of valves, and its tone smoothed and softened to an unpleasant singing quality, and in the hands of variation-playing virtuosos become an imitator of the finer solo instruments, it beats all smod-dom and shoddy-dom by the manner in which it dresses itself out and the ease with which it apes the airs of good society. We hear its quality of tone admired in sentimental strains. But to our ear, however smooth and soft, however swelled with thrilling stress and diminished to a murmur, it is still a mongrel, artificial, vulgar tone; in abjuring the trumpet, its nobler birth-right, it seems always trying to refine upon the fish-horn. We know not how to describe the impression which its singing tone makes on us; but if such a thing were possible as a modern Verdi tenor quality of voice carried up into the soprano register, we can imagine a similar result; a strange, ambiguous, hermaphroditic sort of tone, very sentimental, never sympathetic; nor on the other hand manly, because just that quality it has been schooling itself to put away. Then again it betrays itself into queer retributions; the "old Adam" will come back, most unexpectedly and malapropos sometimes; for instance, in the gracing of these sentimental arias with little ornaments and floriture, just there, where all should be fine and delicate, the old original crackle, coarse and loud, breaks out with most bizarre effect; the tendrils are thicker than the main stock of the vine.

It is less offensive when it comes to mere bravura; runs, variations, trills, staccato, double-tonguing, and all that, it does curiously and accurately enough in the hands of such a player, if it were only better worth the doing, and not just as good or better upon easier instruments. Mere virtuosity is not Art, though Art has use for much of it. Therefore we have spoken of Mr. Levy as a great curiosity, rather than as a great artist. We suppose a man may be an artist and play the cornet; but we do not believe a man who is an artist in his soul (for that means poet, mind) can find all his aspirations satisfied in such an instrument; he may devote his life to it, what he wins from it will be virtuosity, not Art.

We pass now to the remaining concerts.—In the sixth, the orchestra played the overtures to Freyshütz and La Gazza Ladra. Mme. Parepa sang Casta Diva in a sustained, finished, noble style, not taking the heart captive; the Gounod Serenade again, in place of Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim" (parts mislaid), the Dinorah Shadow Song, and, if we recollect right, a charming little German Lied (in German), Mr. Dannreuther played the first movement of Beethoven's C-minor Concerto again, a "Gondoliera" by Liszt and Valse in C-sharp minor by Chopin, all masterly renderings. Mr. Rosa played the Adagio and Rondo of the Mendelssohn Concerto; fine and pure, but feebler in tone than usual, with less breadth and elan, for where were he and Mendelssohn amid the furor following "Alexis" on the Cornet! What has an artist to do with a furor? That's the manager's affair. Does the slave own her own beauty? Rosa also played Ernst's Elegie. Alexis also blew the "Whirlwind."

On Saturday a Matinée, without Parepa, but Alexis made amends for all; certainly the children, older ones too, were very much delighted, and he looked very happy to delight them. Dannreuther and Rosa played some nice selections, (Chopin, Mendelssohn Songs without Words, Vientemps Fantasia, &c.), and the old Church air of Stradella, together, with effective organ part by Mr. WILCOX.

Saturday Evening, Oct. 14. The last of these pleasant concerts, more crowded than ever, and everything applauded. Mme. Parepa sang "Hear ye Israel!" a noble selection, and in the noblest style that we remember to have heard it, with the exception of the Lind and Tietjens; it lacked their inspiration, their soul-penetrating quality, but it was large in voice and manner, and very admirable singing. Her Ah non credes, and Ah non giunge illustrated still further her varied wealth as an interpreter of so many great and graceful kinds of song, and was indeed one of her best performances. She flung a parting kiss (Il Bacio) to her admirers, but was called out to repeat it at "Five o'clock in the morning," and so ended the first series of a remarkable concert singer's triumphs at the "hub." Rosa played a brilliant Scherzo Capriccioso by his Leipzig master, David, in his best style. He also told us French musical critics say) the touching old ballad of "Auld Robin Gray" upon the strings, with such pure, sweet, simple pathos as no mere virtuoso can command, and closed with that peeping little Caprice Fantastique which he has made so popular. Health and success everywhere to the gifted and sincere young artist! The same to his friend Dannreuther, who this time played Weber's "Invitation" better than before, and who throughout has made the impression of one remarkably intelligent, earnest and accomplished in his art. We wish we had the influence of these two young men added to the right side here in Boston; but the pianist has chosen London, whither he is on his way back, and the violinist is to be Kapellmeister in his native Hamburg. When the Bateman troupe revisit us may we not hear him lead a Quartet?

Mr. Levy seemed to us particularly happy in the choice of "Una voce poco fa" for a vocal cornet solo; we hardly think Rossini would have quarrelled with him, but would have been pleased to recognize his own, one of his arch, bright, wilful children, even in that dress. Of course there had to be a Carnival and a Whirlwind for this prophet to depart in as he came. The overtures were two of the most genial light ones; Auber's "Bronze Horse" and Nicolai's "Merry Wives," and this we mention more for the sake of a last grateful allusion to Mr. THEODORE THOMAS, the quiet and efficient conductor.

ORATORIO. "THE CREATION." The Handel & Haydn Society of course could not let the presence of such a singer as PAREPA pass without seeking to avail themselves of her great aid in one of those oratorios which they stand always ready to bring out. The "Creation," hacknied as it is, was on the whole well chosen. Perhaps no other could employ this great singer's powers to better advantage, or suggest so little thought of qualities wherein she is not greatest. On no occasion have we heard her with so much pleasure throughout. The music, cheerful, wholesome, natural and graceful, never deep in feeling, seemed just to suit her voice and nature. The melody was all fresh, clear, telling, elegant in her sustained artistic rendering; in the trios and the high obbligato passage work cresting the top waves of some of the choruses, the voice revelled in sunshine. "On mighty pens" was only second to Jenny Lind, whose fervor it lacked, nor can we yet accept that trill. "With verdure clad" might be sung more tenderly, but it is not often better sung.

Even the Adam and Eve business, which always bored us, was made healthy and alive for once through this lady's singing. Indeed she infused life into the whole Oratorio. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, who took the bass parts at short notice, mastered the task remarkably well and sung like an artist as he is, his voice answering better than we could expect even in those deepest tones. Mr. HAZLEWOOD's tenor was rather dry at times, but he made his mark in the air "In native worth" and achieved all creditably. The choruses went with spirit generally, if not found just then in their best state of drill. The organ gave support with tact and understanding under Mr. LANG's hands, and Mr. ZERRAHN did contrive to muster a more than passable orchestra in spite of the "fifty musicians" at the Boston Theatre. It was pleasant to see Rosa and Thomas working in the ranks with the first violins; it is artist-like to love to help out the whole.

Miss ALICE DUTTON's "maiden concert" (Piano-forte Soirée) occurred at Chickering's rooms last Saturday evening. This young girl of thirteen, who came from the West two years ago with a musical talent that had been growing up wild, with no sure direction, and who has since been studying with Mr. Lang, and eagerly listening to the best music, is now really an accomplished pianist, in technical facility quite remarkable. The best of it is, that she has taken good counsel and seems to feel the force of it: she makes virtuosity secondary and is chiefly devoted to the study of good music. She aims to be a classical artist, as her programme showed.

The performance showed the earnest aim to be rewarded. The Beethoven C-minor Trio, in spite of a little lack of self-possession in the opening, went brilliantly and smoothly through, and it is no slight task; accent and expression were generally good, though if she have a fault often noticeable, it is a habit of pounding too heavily where accent should be marked;—but this may have been owing in some degree to the over-anxiety of such a debut. The last two movements were very nicely played. The Bach fugue C-sharp ran away with her a little in tempo, but it was clear and fluent to a degree that some older concert-players might envy; so too the agitated B-minor Lied of Mendelssohn. The Schumann and Chopin pieces showed that she had listened well, and nearly caught the sense and feeling, when she has heard them played by masters. The "Auf Flügeln" transcription did not seem to us felicitous as a composition; it was excellent taste in the young lady to answer the recall with the little first Prelude of Bach (senza Gounod), which was about her nicest piece of playing; it had all that quiet, which she must study to attain in more trying and exciting pieces before her art will be perfect. Into all the depth and subtle shades of feeling of the "Moonlight Sonata" we could not expect her to enter fully, nor to breast the mighty sea of passion in the last movement like a strong swimmer Beethoven; but she certainly brought out a great deal of its beauty, and it is a thing to play better and better as one gets experience.

Messrs. SCHULTZE and FRIKS gave good aid in the Trio, and Mr. LANG turned over the leaves with anxious and we dare say proud interest in his pupil. The audience was not so large as we could have wished; but it contained some of the most musical persons, and the impression made on critical artists, as well as on friends and willing public, was highly favorable to the young player. Her appearance is interesting and she cannot fail to have valuable sympathy so long as she perseveres in so good a path.

ROCHESTER, OCT. 16.—In the afternoon and evening of the 5th inst., we were favored with two public performances upon the organ in the Central church, by Mrs. FROHOCK, she being in town on a brief social visit. The programme on both occasions was made up from the selections heretofore named by you as having been played by her upon the Music Hall Organ, including the Toccata in F, and the great G-minor fugue of Bach, Sonatas Nos. 1 and 4 of Mendelssohn, and the Hallelujah chorus. The lesser pieces comprised a beautiful Adagio for the Organ by Merkel, also transcriptions from Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. She played Mr. Paine's "Star Spangled Banner" in the afternoon programme: in the evening it was called for again. The finale was especially admired. You said it was "handsome" for an organist to play the productions of his contemporaries. Is it not as handsome in Mr. Paine to allow his unpublished works to be played by others?

The following from the Evening Express, though not quite up to the enthusiasm of some privately expressed individual opinions, is a fair illustration of the impression generally made by her performance.

Mrs. FROHOCK.—There was a good attendance at the organ concert last evening. Mrs. Frohock's playing fully justifying the commendations which the press in Chicago, New York and Boston have given her. We had a right to expect from a lady a delicacy of touch and fine expression, (though from one so young, not such a conception of the great masters as Mrs. Frohock evinces). Yet here was not only delicacy and expression, but the most vigorous execution, when required, both upon the manuals and pedals. The ease and rapidity of the latter was truly wonderful.

On Wednesday evening she entertained a few friends with some Piano-forte performances of selections from Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Chopin, at the Tracy Female Institute, where she was once a pupil.

If Boston is yet in its musical baby-hood, as intimated in your organ article of the 30th ult., and has to be fed with milk (and water?) not being able to bear Mr. Paine's strong meat, what is to be expected of the "world and the rest of mankind" beyond the circumference of the "hub?"

On Friday and Saturday nights last we had Ernani and Faust by the Ghioni and Susini troupe, with which Max Strakosch is supplying the rural operatic wants. The patronage on both nights must have been remunerative. Meagre as an itinerant representation must necessarily be, the audience were evidently well satisfied with the first night's performance, and no doubt would have been equally so with the other, but for Susini's cold, which obliged the manager to substitute another d—l after the performance commenced, one who neither knew the part nor the art (diabolique), for he sang partly in Italian and partly in German, and that in the same scene. As for the [black] art, he exercised so little of it, they did not deem him worthy of any other than a "reconstruction" fate at the end, and so he got off free.

Unlike some, Max strives to do all he promises, albeit an orchestra can hardly be said to be "complete" without an oboe and bassoon. T. E. A.

Two PAREPA concerts were given in the New York Academy of Music last week, each entertainment supplemented by a few choice dishes of Maretzek Opera—as if enough were not as good as a feast. Mme. Parepa had such a cold that she could not appear at all on the second night, and Miss Kellogg obligingly volunteered at the last moment to take her place. Rosa and Dannreuther played, and of course "my cornet" blew the house down. The witty Saturday Press (welcome revival!) has the following version of "Bateman's last speech in French (when the great songstress was ill)—Mlle. Parepa ne parait pas."

An exchange which professes to know says that Mlle. Parepa receives from Mr. Bateman a salary of five hundred dollars a week, and all expenses, including the use of a carriage and one or two servants. Her mother travels with her.

Parepa has started on her Western concert tour. Chicago, Louisville, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, &c., is the order of the route. Levy, the cornet player, "my cornet," is likely to be Mr. Bateman's trump card out there in the musical wilderness. We must commiserate the Kreislerian Leiden of the young artist of the violin who has to play against that cornet! Dannreuther, the pianist, knows the West too well, and knows the cornet, and making discretion the better part of valor, has already sailed for Europe to resume his excellent position as an artist in London. It is said that Parepa will sing again in Boston in December, and in the "Messiah" at Christmas. Meanwhile, however, her card stands in the London musical journals announcing that she will return to London in December.

The London Orchestra of October 7 has the following:—"We understand that the frequent rumors with regard to Miss Bateman's marriage are so far true that she has become the wife of an American gentleman—a pianist."

GERMAN OPERA, &c. The New York Weekly Review says:

The movements of Mr. Grover are shrouded in mystery. We know that he has engaged Mr. and Mrs. Himmer, who were not duly appreciated by the public of Hanover, where they intended to sing, and Messrs. Habelmann, Madame Johansson, Madame Holland, and Mr. Herrmanns. Mr. Grover will have to import a new conductor, Mr. Anschütz having been engaged for six months by Mr. Bateman, and Mr. Thomas, the only available and good conductor of operas, not engaged yet, declining to travel. It is to be regretted that no arrangements could be made with the brothers Formes—Theodore, William, and Carl, who would have been immensely useful and valuable to the German opera. Difficulties between Mr. Carl Formes and some singers of Mr. Grover's troupe, which are only too fresh in everybody's memory, prevent the possibility of an engagement of Messrs. Formes; but we do not give up all hope yet of hearing them in opera during this winter. As the matter now stands, the three gentlemen before mentioned will give a couple of concerts in Irving Hall, the first to take place on Monday, October 30th. There cannot be the slightest doubt about the artistic and pecuniary success of a concert tour of Messrs. Formes, if the affair is well managed. It is also contemplated to import a new troupe of German singers next year, but the question is whether a sufficient number of theatres in the different cities will be disposable.

Mr. Grau is daily expected in this city with an army of singers, and will begin operations as soon as possible. Mr. Grau's troupe consists of the following artists: Prime donne: Mmes. Gazzaniga, Noël Guidi, Leonilda Boschetti, Murio Celli. Contralti: Mmes. Cash-Pollini, and Olga Olgini. Primi tenori: Messrs. Musiani, Anastasi, Lotti, and Tamaro. Bassi: Messrs. Bernardo Pollini and Ladislao Miller. Maestro concertante: Giuseppe Sarti.

—Mr. George F. Root, the popular composer, appears to have followed A. Ward's advice, to "let the old man have a chance." His latest published ballad is entitled "Sing me to Sleep, Father."—Daily Adv.

—The Chronique Musicale of Paris has discovered a coincidence between the cholera and the production of a new opera by Meyerbeer. In 1832 the epidemic followed the first performance of "Robert," in 1849 it came with the "Prophète," and in 1854 with "l'Etoile du Nord." And now in 1865 we have "l'Africaine," and the cholera is on its way.

—A German paper in New York says: Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN, the famous pianist, after entertaining repeated invitations to visit this country on a concert tour, in company with the violinist Joachim, has finally declined, not wishing to be separated from her six children.

—CAMILLE Urso, the admired lady violinist, was recently reported in London, and has gone to Germany, intending to study some time with Viennese masters in Frankfort and then make the tour of Europe.

The organist at the Church of the Advent in this city, Mr. HENRY CARTER, furnishes us with the following description of the large organ lately removed from Williams Hall to that church. It was built by Messrs. W. B. D. Simmons & Co., and was always considered one of the best of their many excellent works:

- |                           |                               |
|---------------------------|-------------------------------|
| 1. GREAT ORGAN.           | 4. PEDAL ORGAN.               |
| 1 Double open Diapason.   | CCC to F                      |
| 2 First open "            | 1 Double open Diapason        |
| 3 Second open "           | 2 Double Dulciana.            |
| 4 Clarabella.             | 3 Ophicleide 16 ft.           |
| 5 Stop Diapason Treble.   | 4 Harmonica.                  |
| 6 " " Bass.               |                               |
| 7 Principal.              | Couplers.                     |
| 8 Twelfth.                |                               |
| 9 Fifteenth.              | 1 Great and Swell.            |
| 10 Ses-quialtra, 3 ranks. | 2 Choir and Swell.            |
| 11 Cornet, 3 "            | 3 Great and Swell Super 8 va. |
| 12 Mixture, 3 "           | 4 Pedals and Great.           |
| 13 Trumpet Treble.        | 5 Pedals and Choir.           |
| 14 Trumpet Bass.          | 6 Pedals Super 8va.           |
| 15 Clarion.               |                               |
| 2. SWELL ORGAN.           | 3. CHOIR ORGAN.               |
| 1 Bourdon Treble.         | 1 Open Diapason.              |
| 2 Doub. Stop D. Bass.     | 2 Stop Diap. Treble.          |
| 3 Open Diapason.          | 3 " " Bass.                   |
| 4 Stop Diapason.          | 4 Dulciana.                   |
| 5 Dulciana.               | 5 Principal.                  |
| 6 Principal.              | 6 Twelfth.                    |
| 7 Flute.                  | 7 Fifteenth.                  |
| 8 Fifteenth.              | 8 Flute.                      |
| 9 Cornet 2 ranks.         | 9 Cremona:                    |
| 10 Trumpet.               | 10 Fagotto.                   |
| 11 Clarionet.             |                               |
| 12 Hautbois.              |                               |
| 13 Double Trumpet.        |                               |
| 14 Tremolo.               |                               |
- Making, together with Pedal Check and Bellows Signal, 51 draw stops.
Design of the case, Mr. Estv.
Diapering of pipes, Mr. T. D. Morris.

The Canadians must be a great musical people and blessed with angel visits from greater artists than we outside barbarians ever heard of. Witness the following leader in a Kingston paper; the Italics are ours:

JEHIN PRUME'S CONCERT.

To paint the lily, to gild refined gold, are works of supererogation. To laud Mr. Jehin Prume's Violin playing is about as futile. He is the sweetest Violinist that ever lived—his execution is most wonderful, while his taste and exquisite musical conceptions equal his mastery of the difficult instrument. On Tuesday night he again delighted a good and fashionable audience in the City Hall. His playing on this occasion was remarkable for every thing that constitutes a great musician, and the large and attentive audience fully understood him and applauded vociferously every endeavor he made to please them. Where all was good it is hard to discriminate, and individual taste alone induces us to say that "L'Eligie" at the commencement of the second part was the gem of the evening, it was so grandly, so delightfully, so charmingly played. There was no trick about it, but it was simply great beyond imagination. Mr. Jehin Prume was recalled several times; once he played a pretty melody con sordini, and once he gave some variations almost as wonderful as those of the far-famed Carnival of Venice. This is probably the last visit this celebrated Artist will make to Kingston for many years to come. He soon goes to New York and Boston; thence home to Europe, where a long career of glory is before him. He is quite a young man, and the most of his musical fame is yet to come.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Sad is my heart with care. (Wie mir's in Herzon schwer.) Song. Op. 52. F. Gumbert. 40
Quite disconsolate in sentiment, but with a rich and well woven harmony and melody.
O thank me not. (Widmung). Op. 14. R. Franz. 30

A pretty conceit of Wolfgang Müller, who declines the thanks of his fair lady for the dedication of a poem to her, on the ground that he had read the verses plainly in the sweet light of her eyes, are committing them to paper, so that the words were truly her own property. Music nicely adapted to the ideas of the text.

- O, think not woman's heart is bought. Ballad. J. Whitaker. 30
One of Madlle. Parepa's taking songs. It is simple and easy, and yet susceptible of great expression.
Move my arm chair, dearest Mother, or, Move me in the sunshine, Mother. For Guitar. F. Wilmarth. 30

- This really touching song has become sufficiently popular to justify its arrangement for guitar. Has a good chorus.
Strike for Freedom, Ireland. National song of the Fenians. Dennis O'Neil. 30
A very spirited affair, which will, doubtless, be popular among the members of the great organization.

Instrumental.

- Bid me discourse. Transcribed from Sir. H. Bishop, by B. Richards. 70
In the ordinary style of Richard's Transcriptions, and among the easier ones.
Water Fall Schottische. F. H. Pease. 30
Quite original, and brilliant.
Fantasie in Mirella. Op. 149. E. Kettner. 75
Includes the favorite melodies of the opera, skillfully put together. These melodies are not so well known among us as they probably will be after public representation of the work, but are very pretty and taking.
L' Africaine Quadrille. Strauss. 40
A selection of prominent melodies, which answer very well to be worked up into dances, as the instrumental part of L' Africaine has a somewhat blarney character.

- Nocturne. (Op. 48, No. 2.) F sharp minor. Chopin. 60
Of sad, and in places extremely "minor" character, as if in part composed during illness; but of great power, nevertheless.
Köhler's studies for skilful execution. Book 1. Op. 35. $2.00
Köhler's reputation is already established as a most skilful provider of materials for musical students' practice. These studies are carefully arranged, and will be very useful to advanced players.

Books.

- THE UNITED STATES COLLECTION OF CHURCH MUSIC. By A. N. Johnson. $1.38
Per dozen, 12.00
This fine book contains nearly 400 pages, and includes a most excellent and simple course for singing schools, with very taking exercises and songs for practice. There are about 300 Psalm Tunes, about 40 anthems, a dozen tunes and hymns for funerals, and about 50 secular pieces for singing schools.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 642.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 11, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 17.

A Farewell to Agassiz.

BY O. W. HOLMES.

How the mountains talked together,
Looking down upon the weather,
When they heard our friend had planned his Little trip among the Andes!
How they'll bare their snowy scalps
To the climber of the Alps,
When the cry goes through their passes,
"Here comes the great Agassiz!"
"Yes, I'm tall," says Chimborazo,
"But I wait for him to say so—
That's the only thing that lacks—he Must see me, Cotopaxi!"
"Ay! ay!" the fire-peak thunders,
"And he must view my wonders!
I'm but a lonely crater,
Till I have him for spectator!"
The mountain hearts are yearning,
The lava-torches burning,
The rivers bend to meet him,
The forests bow to greet him,
It thrills the spinal column
Of fossil fishes solemn,
And glaciers crawl the faster
To the feet of their old master!

Heaven keep him well and hearty,
Both him and all his party!
From the sun that broils and smites,
From the centipede that bites,
From the hail-storm and the thunder,
From the vampire and the condor,
From the gust upon the river,
From the sudden earthquake shiver,
From the trip of mule or donkey,
From the midnight howling monkey,
From the stroke of knife or dagger,
From the puma and the jaguar,
From the horrid boa-constrictor
That has scared us in the pictur',
From the Indians of the Pampas,
Who would dine upon their grampas,
From every beast and vermin
That to think of sets us squirming,
From every snake that tries on
The traveller his p'ison,
From every pest of Natur',
Likewise the alligator,
And from two things left behind him,
(Be sure they'll try to find him)—
The tax-bill and assessor,—
Heaven keep the great Professor!

May he find, with his apostles,
That the land is full of fossils,
That the waters swarm with fishes
Shaped according to his wishes,
That every pool is fertile
In fancy kinds of turtle,
New birds around him singing,
New insects, never stinging,
With a million novel data
About the articulates,
And facts that strip off all husks
From the history of mollusks.

And when, with loud Te Deum,
He returns to his Museum,
May he find the monstrous reptile

That so long the land has kept ill
By Grant and Sherman throttled,
And by Father Abraham bottled,
(All specked and streaked and mottled
With the scars of murderous battles,
Where he clashed the iron rattles
That gods and men he shook at),
For all the world to look at!

God bless the great Professor!
And Madam too, God bless her!
Bless him and all his band,
On the sea and on the land,
As they sail, ride, walk and stand—
Bless them head and heart and hand,
Till their glorious raid is o'er,
And they touch our ransomed shore!
Then the welcome of a nation,
With its shout of exultation,
Shall awake the dumb creation,
And the shapes of buried sons
Join the living creatures' p'ans,
While the mighty megalosaurus
Leads the paleozoic chorus,—
God bless the great Professor,
And the land his proud possessor,—
Bless them now and evermore!

—Atlantic Monthly.

The Present State of Music.

(Continued from page 114.)

(Translated for this Journal from Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

III. INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC (CONCLUDED).

The moment we increase the mass (of instruments in an orchestra or band), it changes all proportions. We artists "are dependent on the instruments that we have made." Once bring in voices and they are eager to take part. No sooner have they announced themselves aloud, than their sonorous weight hangs upon every step; the masses with their crescendo and diminuendo (from a few instruments to more and more, to all, and vice versa) become broader; the finer carrying out of the versatile dialogue between the instruments is pushed into the background; the spiritual gives place to the material; the orchestra gives up its thoroughly soul-like dramatic character, that most precious heirloom of Haydn and Beethoven, merely that it may resound like a many-voiced, mighty, sublime lyre* (or organ, if that sounds better). Even the choice of principal voices must look out to govern itself by the noisier, although often ill-assorted instruments, or fall in amid those grotesque Meyerbeer-ian alternations of one or two solo instruments (piccolo flute and contrabasso, even!) with the most wide-mouthed massive tutti. Hand in hand with this goes the banishment of significant instruments. Thus the characteristic Basset-horn has been crowded out by the more poor and shallow Alto-Clarinet; so too, the not powerfully sonorous, but often deeply significant Contra-fagotto has been obliged to give way to the bull-voiced Bass Tuba.

* The word Lyre (lyre, hurdy-gurdy, &c.), in German is commonly coupled with Orgel—Lyre-Orgel, or street-organ.—Ta.

If you would note these consequences of the new composition of the orchestra in a simpler body, consider the organization of our military music, so far as it is now known in the Prussian, Austrian and Russian armies. Of the superior skill of our military musicians, and their directors, compared with former times, there is here no question.

In an artistic point of view, what can and must be required of military music generally? In the first place (it seems to me), a martial spirit, and then a characteristic expression for the branch of service to which each music corps belongs. Now, to fulfil this last requirement out of the means of the old orchestra, we should have: for mailed troops of heavy cavalry, trumpets (high and low), trombones and kettle-drums; for light cavalry, trumpets (mostly high, the low only as bass); for the Jäger corps (chasseurs), horns (perhaps also those primitive signal horns of the forest, which howled so wildly at the French in 1813; perhaps, too, the small, more trumpet-like horns of the French and Belgian voltigeurs); for the many-sided, wide-stretching infantry, besides drums, the full Janissary music, with the jubilant clarinets at the head, also supported and more highly colored by the brass. The cavalry music would be far simpler, nay poor in its range of tones: but its peculiarity would be those natural tones and natural harmonies, in which, after the example of all natural singers and all masters, the simple, freshly natural, down-right, heroic feeling ever finds its truest utterance. But this very poverty of tones would drive the composer to a strong, decided rhythm, to the most peculiar expression of will and courage, of stormy onset and of firm resistance, so far as he had a spirit in him capable of being roused.

I return from the half foreign field. Let any one, who takes an interest in it, inquire for himself, how much of these requirements is fulfilled or given up, since the troop of valve instruments has placed itself at the head of all kinds of arms, and the mailed brass choir has been softened down for every opera aria and all the chromatic sobbing and sighing of sweet sentimentality. A long peace rusts the brightest sword; the valves, brutal and tame, are the right voice for our (German) warfare.

IV. MUSIC AMONG THE PEOPLE.

And now let us turn from the salient points of the creative Art of Music and its knowledge to its working out here in actual life. For surely we comprehend Art very one-sidedly, if we observe it merely in artists and their works, if we do not follow it into the life of collective humanity (or of one's nation at least), of which life it is only a part. Art is not the property of the artist, but of humanity; the artist belongs to it more nearly, but all men have part in it, and it in them.

Now all that has been created and imitated by old and new, pours itself like a stream of a hundred sources and a hundred arms into the life of the people. Besides the musical Festivals and the Sing-academies, there are set to receive its waters, and to pass them round, all sorts of smaller singing clubs for practice and for entertainment (in Berlin the practice of singing is even ordained in the house of correction for juvenile offenders from 18 to 22 years old); especially those countless Männerchors and male quartets, so frequently destructive to our tenor voices. To these voluntary unions are to be added the singing classes in all the schools, the University Institutes, the hired church choirs and theatre choruses. After the performances in the halls of Art, crowd garden concerts, bands, besides individual music-makers who mix up symphonies, overtures, dances, marches, arrangements from operas (no matter whether intelligible and effective without words and song or not) in a motley variety, and, to idealize the hodge-podge as it were, crown it, under all sorts of "stunning" titles, with those Quodlibets (potpourris), in which rags and patches of four or eight bars out of a hundred pieces of music are botched together in a bewildering medley; the more inconsistent and contradictory the ingredients, the more welcome.

Add to this the house music. One may scarcely ask now-a-days: Who is musical? but: Who is not? In the so-called higher or more cultivated circles, music has long passed for an indispensable part of culture; every family demands it, if possible for all its members, without particular regard to love or talent; in many families indeed, at least for the young women, the whole freer culture, the whole social entertainment limits itself to music, by the side of which one or two modern languages and a modicum of painfully narrow and prudish reading, at the most, finds place. The good people take for granted, that "Robert! Robert!" and the other splendors of the lyric stage are less dangerous to morality and decency than Goethe and Byron, to whom they prefer Halm der Wildnis and Geibel. What is thus begun in the circles of well-to-do "society," is emulated, by force of example, of ignorance, of false ambition, by the multitude. Even in the sphere of petty trade and handicraft, time is stolen and wrested from the hard necessity of toil, and money from small earnings, to purchase at least for the daughters a piano, notes, music-teacher, above all in the hope of thereby counting among "cultivated people." What is practised and learned everywhere pours itself out to overflowing over the domestic circle, tries to make itself available in company, in the semi-publicity of the singing societies, and finds its nourishment (like the orchids, which have their roots in the air) at all the concerts and operas, without which now the smallest maiden thinks she cannot breathe, nor any household stand. It is running in a circle without beginning or end: they learn music because music is everywhere made, and they make music everywhere because they have learned it everywhere—and often that is the whole amount of it.

(To be Continued).

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Good Music.

II.

In a former paper, containing an inquiry as to the points of excellence for which we should look in good music this general result was reached: that good music, must be significant and correctly expressed. More recently, however, a translation of Henri Heine's Thoughts about Music and Musicians has come to our notice, and therein we find the same idea more happily and clearly expressed. Thus: "Music can work upon us only in three ways: through tones upon the ear, through expression upon the feelings, through form or musical structure (as also through the treatment of the principal themes, in instrumental music) upon the intellect. If a musical composition answer all these ends it is perfect; it will and must please all, the laity as well as the profession." And again, "Music is heart-painting: its task is to attune the mind, to arouse the feelings of the heart, to express the play of sensibility. If the composer succeed in attuning the mind and awakening the feelings at will, or if he give that in his compositions which will do this, his work is true. The true artist, moreover, strives to give his composition a graceful, attractive form. If he succeeds in this, his work is also beautiful." "A masterpiece of Art, therefore, is both true and beautiful."

A composition may be both true and beautiful as far as it goes; but it may contain only a small truth. And a composition must be regarded as great according to the amount of truth and beauty it embodies, so far as consistent with unity. Or, perhaps better, we may regard compositions as great in proportion as their excellencies are received by the nobler faculties of the mind. For example, we take two songs, The "Adelaide" by Beethoven, and "Rosalie, the Prairie flower," by Mr. Geo. F. Root. Both have been sung by hundreds of thousands of people. The former is regarded as a great song. The latter is not. But why? The latter must possess some excellence, or it would not have been singled out from the obscurity of its contemporaries for such remarkable favor. Examining it we find that the melody has a vivacious, cheerful character, and there is not in the words any sentiment which is beyond the understanding of the mass of the people. It is both true and beautiful as far as it goes. It is a good song, for the purpose its author had in view when he composed it: viz., to lend another pleasure to people of little musical or artistic sensibility, but of pure heart. The melody does not appeal to the great toe, but to true artistic perceptions; yet its spirit is so very evident that it requires little study to be understood or performed. But the words of the Adelaide are those of a finely wrought poetic nature, and as such are quite out of the range of common people. Its musical execution is so elaborate that only artists of considerable ability are able to perform it justly, and it must be heard many times before it will be fully appreciated. It is truly beautiful, but is not a people's song.

So it appears that there is music which is not great, but which is true to all the moods of the souls of a great many people. Such music is not to be despised. But the discussion of the immense mass of this would take too much time, and in this paper we confine ourselves to the best.

By the common consent of musical connoisseurs, certain masters are considered to have surpassed all others in writing piano-forte music. These writers are Beethoven, Bach, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Chopin. The general tone of criticism, based on the intuitions of many independent critics of different lands, coincides in recognizing the following as the more striking characteristics of the works of these authors.

The piano-forte works of Mendelssohn are generally among his lighter tasks, and yet his "Songs without Words" are too highly esteemed by musical amateurs generally to allow us to pass them over in silence. They contain delicate thoughts oftentimes, expressed with poetical felicity. There is a time in the life of almost every musician when these works are esteemed as among the best and most significant. Our own impression, however, is that they have not that innate weight of meaning or truth to the emotional nature of the soul, that would entitle them to take rank among the greatest works for the piano-forte.

In the works of Chopin, it is believed, there may be found much true beauty of thought. Often his ideas are couched in rustic (?) dress, but they are the fancies of true poetry nevertheless. They do not seem to impress us like the thoughts of Beethoven, but we love them for their beauty. In short, Chopin is rather the Tennyson than the Shakespeare of music.

It is thought that the works of Beethoven are the most profound, the most significant that have yet been written for this instrument. At the same time they express a greater variety of emotions than is to be found in the works of any other author. Hardly a chord of the soul but is awakened by the touch of this Master Hand. Beethoven is the musical Shakespeare.

The piano forte works of Bach consist mainly of his often-heard-of "Well-tempered Clavier." These works are in the fugue form, but in spite of all the restraints incident to this form of composition, they display as much well-marked individuality among themselves as is elsewhere to be found. Their wealth of melody and harmony is absolutely something wonderful! They are ever fresh, ever pleasing to those who have the true soul for music. It is greatly to be regretted that so few of our players are able to play music written in this polyphonic form.

We find, therefore, that the works of Beethoven are universally considered to be the most weighty as it regards meaning, and the most faithful to the varied moods of the artistic soul. Next come the works of Schumann. Now it is observable that these two writers have shown the most complete mastery of the Sonata form of any(?) who have made it the dress of thought, while for Beethoven it seems to have wonderful charms, being employed by him almost to the exclusion of any other form of composition.

And why should this be, except for the reason that this form, uniting—as it alone does—different complete compositions into one consistent whole, affords the opportunity for the simultaneous exemplification of the greatest number of the traits of true beauty in mere form and treatment, together with the most faithful and manifold shades of thought. Of instrumental forms, here alone may be exemplified in one composition all of the various kinds of unity, as has heretofore been shown.

Each of these Sonatas stands complete; a tone-picture painted by a master. How individual are they! As we call over the list each rises before us like a distinct personality. Take the first three, the Op. 2, when, as critics tell us, Beethoven had hardly attained to his own peculiar style of composition. Yet how clearly defined is the character of each of these three works! The little sonata in F minor, with its beautiful Adagio, so limpid, so full of song! The sonata in A with its significant Largo! The sonata in C, with the Mozart-like themes of the first part, the playful Scherzo, such as Beethoven alone could write, and the fiery Finale with its beautiful second episode in F, so masterly treated! Ah, this must indeed have been a new revelation to the music-lovers of those days! In these thirty-three sonata alone there is a library of music. Whether grave or gay, sad or joyful, the soul of æsthetic perceptions may here find food. Such music may become old, but it is never old-fashioned.

To conclude. If our appeal to the musical common sense has been correctly answered, and if our inquiry into the æsthetics of musical form, so far as it regards the piano, has reached the truth, it follows that a correct taste in this department of musical literature must be founded on the study of the best examples of the Sonata, that is, of Beethoven's Sonatas. In these we have legitimate art-creations exemplified by means of the piano-forte. So, too, in the works of Schumann, Mendelssohn and Chopin, but in less degree. These works are truly classic. And when to them we add the study of grand old Sebastian Bach's "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues," we have a solid substratum for a correct taste in piano forte music.

NOTE. It will be observed that we have omitted to mention a large number of really excellent composers for the piano. Among these are Hummel, Von Weber, etc. But it must be admitted that a knowledge of the better works of the composers whom we have mentioned, should precede that of these inferior, yet excellent, writers.

Aurora, III.

W. S. B. M.

William Vincent Wallace.

The journals have for a long time spoken of the lingering illness of this widely known and popular musician. His sufferings were closed on the 12th of October at the Chateau de Bagen, Haut Garonne, in France. In England he seems to be deeply mourned, personally as a man, while his genius and musicianship are very naturally over-rated in the obituaries which have come to our notice. That he was a talented and accomplished musician, a very facile and in a superficial sense clever composer, there can be no doubt; but to rank him among the great composers, as these English admirers do, to say of him all that could be said of a Mozart or a Beethoven, is simply extravagant. This qualification will of course be made in reading the otherwise interesting account of his adventures and labors, by an enthusiastic friend, Mr. Wellington Guernsey, which we find in the London Musical World. We are obliged to abridge it somewhat.

William Vincent Wallace was born (in 1814) in Ireland, in the city of Waterford. His father, Mr. William Wallace, was band master of the 29th regiment of the line, and was a most excellent and practical musician, playing nearly every instrument in the band, besides stringed instruments, and the pianoforte. The young Wallace displayed a wonderful aptitude to excel his father in all these accomplishments, and was highly encouraged and patronized by the Colonel of the 29th, the late Sir John Buchan, who ever remained a steadfast friend to Wallace in his early career. At the age of fifteen he could handle, with considerable mastery, nearly every instrument in an orchestra, and could play with extraordinary excellence the pianoforte, the violin, the clarinet, and the guitar. Nor was this a display of mere mechanical facility; his great store of mechanical power was practically applied, for he had written numerous compositions, fantasias, marches, &c., &c., for his father's and other military bands, before the period at which we have commenced his history. At this period, when only fifteen, though a young leader, yet an old musician, he was appointed organist of Charles Cathedral, where he only remained a short period, when he returned to Dublin, where his position as leader at the theatre and concerts brought him in contact with all the musical celebrities of that day, and where his musical purposes were much strengthened by the kind encouragement and judicious commendations of Ferdinand Ries, Paganini, and others.

For three years he occupied a high musical position in Dublin, and had the honor of directing the first performance of Beethoven's Mount of Olives in Ireland. At the age of eighteen his strength seemed to sink under the pressure of his many studies and pressing engagements. He made up his mind to emigrate to New South Wales. For a long period after his arrival in that country, he literally plunged into the bush. But for one characteristic circumstance the world might never have known Wallace as a composer; but as a sheep farmer tending the herds of wealth they produce, or, perhaps, as a digger of gold at Bathurst.

During one of his brief visits to Sydney, from the banks of the Darling where he resided, he was invited by some friends to attend a musical party. He went, little dreaming how that evening was to influence his destiny forever, and to add another name to the bright list of musical celebrities. When he entered the room he saw four gentlemen seated round a table working away, with greater will than power, at a quartet by Haydn. All the music slumbering at his heart seemed to spring at once into vivid life, and he became possessed with the great musical desire. Much to the gratification of the party, he played the first violin to the next quartet, and so they played on till morning. The fame of his performance spread through Sydney like wildfire, and reaching the ears of his countryman the Governor, Sir John Burke of Limerick, he persuaded Wallace to give a concert, to which he consented. His success was great, and Sir John, as a mark of his delight, sent him two hundred sheep, which was in that country and at that time a princely gift.

After giving several concerts, in conjunction with his sister, a vocalist, Madame Bouchelle, and conducting several musical performances, a restless desire to travel seized upon him, and to use an Irish phrase, he became "a roving blade," and wandered, he and his fiddle, into "strange countries." He visited Launceston in Van Dieman's Land, gave several concerts, then went to the Bay of Islands in New Zealand, then a very primitive demi-civilized settlement, where he met with many hair-breadth escapes amongst the natives, which we have not space to enumerate. He went on a whaling voyage in a vessel called "The Good Intent," with a crew of half natives, who turned on the European portion at night, murdering all but three, Wallace being one of the number saved. He was landed at the South Island, and again saved from death by the chief's daughter, after it being arranged he was to be dispatched. From New Zealand he journeyed to the East Indies. With that unconscientiousness, or recklessness of danger which was his characteristic in those days, he penetrated far into the interior, visiting the Court of Oude, everywhere delighting by his performances. The late queen behaved most munificently to him, granting him presents of great value in the shape of rupees and diamond rings, and—in those countries he encountered incidents of travel from which nothing but a remarkable coolness and presence of mind could have delivered him. After seeing all he deemed worthy, pig sticking and tiger hunting included, in Nepal and on the borders of Cashmere, he reached Calcutta, and after half-a-day's thought sailed for Valparaiso in South America. From thence he went to the city of Santiago, where, with the writer of this notice, he crossed the majestic cordilleras of the Andes to Buenos Ayres, on horseback and mule, where their stay on account of the blockade was but brief. They returned in company to Santiago, where he gave several concerts, performing solos on the violin and an old harpsichord that came from Spain in the year 1793. His last concert at Santiago produced him the sum of 3000 dollars paid at the doors in all sorts of specie, and amongst other coin given, the writer recollects two gauchos, not having any specie, giving two game cocks for admission, which they prized highly, so great was the enthusiasm to hear the great musician.

He was assisted by Senora Paquita Robles, a native vocalist, and a young Scotchman who sang Scotch melodies to the delight of the Chilians. He here displayed a remarkable evidence of his enthusiasm for art. He had given a pledge to play at a concert on a certain day in Valparaiso, for the benefit of a charity, but some circumstances drove the promise from his memory. Being reminded by his friend, the writer of this, of the fact when it was apparently impossible for him to reach Valparaiso in time, Wallace resolved to ride on horseback the whole distance, one hundred and twenty-five miles, to keep faith; and he performed this equestrian feat, with change of horses, in less than eleven hours, and was in time for the concert. From Chili he went to Peru, and gave a concert at Lima, which produced the large sum of 5000 dollars. He again crossed the Andes, via Rosario, to Buenos Ayres, and visited Havana, Vera Cruz, Tampico, and the city of Mexico. His success in these cities was very great, and there can be but little doubt that he realized a vast sum of money, more especially in Mexico, where he composed his Grand Mass (which we hope to see published one or these days) for an anniversary fete. It was performed at the Cathedral with immense success several times, and for it he was munificently rewarded by the government. He went next to New Orleans, where his triumph was more gratifying than any he had yet achieved, for it was wrung from a highly critical and most exacting audience. So great was the enthusiasm excited at the St. Charles Theatre by the performance of his solo (one of his own compositions) on the violin, that the musicians in the orchestra forgot to play, and laid down their instruments to join in the tumult of applause. From New Orleans he journeyed through the Southern States, and his concerts were, literally, a succession of triumphs.

We remember as well as though it were yesterday, in the year 1844, and it is now nearly twenty-one years ago, being one of a party invited to Col. James L. Hewitt's rooms, over William Hall and Sons' music store, in New York, to meet Wallace, who had just come from the South. He was then a slim, gentlemanly-looking man, carefully and elegantly dressed. There was high intelligence in his face, but it seemed to lack fire; there was languor in his air, which made us think that the luxurious indolence of the South had become as it were a part of his nature. He seemed dreaming, and the wild romance of his life, which spread abroad, linked half a dozen heart-rending love tales with the name of our melancholy musician. He played the piano—his famous Cracoviense was the first piece—and it was generally acknowledged that he was the greatest pianist that had then visited America. But when he took his violin in hand and exhibited such extraordinary mastery over the instrument and such impassioned sentiment, we were one and all carried away with mingled feelings of astonishment and delight. His success in the United States, which followed this well-remembered evening, is familiar to all, and we need not reiterate it. He was looked upon by all as a gifted, wonderful, and eccentric genius, and as a musician of high attainments. His compositions for the instruments which he played were acknowledged as full of originality and power, but no one, we are sure, ever dreamed that William Vincent Wallace would in a few years take his stand amongst the greatest mental musicians of his age (!); that he would quench the inspiration of the great executant and stand forth as a creator of enduring (!) works; that he would rise from the chrysalis of a player to the full-grown stature of a musician—a creator—a composer! But Wallace had dreamed his dream, and came to London full of high aspirations, and prepared to work in that great mill where there were many workers, and some of whom had won the world's good favor. It was a bold push for fortune, for though his name was well-known, there were many who had the start of him by many years, and there was no place for him. He had to make a place for himself; and so he went to work. As a pianist he took a good position at once; but there were many good pianists—some of them the rage—and pianoforte compositions were a drug in the market. We have often heard Wallace tell how, on his first arrival in London, he left some of his compositions with a celebrated publisher in London, and how, on his second visit, they were politely handed back to him. How he on his return home, somewhat discomfited but with an inward consciousness of future greatness, marked on the margin of said pieces,—"refused by —, on such a date," and how, after the triumphant success of Maritana, the said publisher came to his lodgings and paid him twenty guineas for one of the very pieces he had formerly refused even as a gift; and now they had a hearty laugh at the turn of fortune's wheel.

Of Wallace's ability on his arrival in London from New York in 1845, no one entertained a doubt, but few had sounded the depth of his capacity. He determined to write an opera, and that ready writer, Fitzball, adapted the libretto of Don Cesar de Bazan as an opera, in something less than no time. The late Frederick Beale heard that Wallace was writing an opera and visited him just as he had completed the first act. Mr. Beale was himself a good musician and an excellent judge, saw at once that it had sterling merit, made a most liberal arrangement on the spot, and walked off with the score of the first act under his arm. Maritana was produced, and met with a success altogether unprecedented, and far, very far, beyond the most sanguine hopes of the composer. It ran close on one hundred nights, and was acknowledged as one of the most successful and meritorious first operas ever produced. His second opera, produced in the season of 1847, Matilda of Hungary, though wedded to a libretto of Bunn's sufficiently heavy and stupid and disgusting to damn the fine music, met with distinguished success and favor, and called forth admiring comments from the best musical writers in England. From the first to the second opera, there was a wonderful mental stride; all evidence of the novice in writing had vanished, and the master had appeared in every movement. * * *

The undoubted success of Wallace's operas in England attracted the attention of the continental musical world, and he received an invitation from Vienna to superintend the production of Maritana. Wallace longed to be heard in Germany, and he started with his scores, and arrived in Vienna. Maritana was most carefully rehearsed and admirably performed, and was received with more public enthusiasm in Vienna than it even met with in London. It was played night after night for many months, and ran through all the German opera houses like an epidemic. . . .

Wallace studied most assiduously while in Germany, and wrote the greater part of his opera of "Lurline," which, after an interval of 14 years, was produced under the Pyne and Harrison management in 1860. Its brilliant success must still be fresh in the memory of all our musical readers. He also at this period nearly completed his fourth opera, The Maid of Zurich, which never appeared, and he sketched out two Italian operas, part of the score of which we heard at Wiesbaden; they were named Gulnare and Ogla—we presume they are in existence amongst his posthumous works. When Wallace left Germany, after a brief visit to London, he went to Paris, where he revelled in the fellowship of the most brilliant musical minds in the world. The great ambition of an operatic composer's life was in a fair way of being realized—he was commissioned to write an opera for the Grand Opera, of Paris, a point of the highest ambition with all (?) composers, and one the most difficult for a foreigner to attain. Now came one of the great misfortunes of his life. Elated with the bright prospect before him, he sought out George, and from him procured a libretto for his opera. Full of the subject, he began his work, but before he had finished the first number, that calamity, which of all calamities he feared the most, overtook him, and he became nearly blind. The first oculist in France attended him assiduously; week succeeded week until they grew into months, and still he remained in total darkness. The anxiety, the torture of mind which he endured during this trying period may be better imagined than described. At length a change for the better was apparent, and a long sea voyage was ordered him as the only means of permanent relief. So once again he became a wanderer, and in 1849 he arrived in Rio Janeiro. He remained in South America some eight months, and gave several concerts. He played frequently before the Court, and received from the hands of the Emperor a superb diamond ring. Leaving Rio, he visited New Orleans, where, together with Mr. Strakosch, he gave several concerts with wonderful success. From New Orleans Wallace worked his way to New York, through the West, narrowly escaping death by the explosion of the steamer "St. Louis," on the river Mississippi, arriving in New York in the summer of 1850. He immediately registered his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and prepared himself to work upon new operas in hand. He now also entered into a speculation connected with pianoforte making, which ended for all parties most disastrously; he also joined a tobacco manufactory which ended in a similar manner. In 1852 he gave a series of concerts in New York, performing for the last time in America at his sister's (Madame Bouchelle) concert, when he performed on the pianoforte his Cracovienne, his Polka Bravura, and a solo of his own composition, on the violin. He also concluded an engagement with the music-publishing house of Hall and Son, awarding to them the sole right of publishing his works in America. Some of his most popular songs and pieces were written previous to this in America, and published there, for which he received no remuneration whatever, besides the loss of their becoming non-copyright in England. He shortly after returned to London, where he composed many works, amongst others a cantata written by Mr. Joseph Edward Carpenter, which has not been performed. He was also under engagements to a publishing-house to complete an opera written by that gentleman, entitled The King's Page, which he sketched out; and also a series of songs which he finished, by Carpenter, Chailis, etc., and are published by Duff and Hodgson. In the spring of 1861, the Amber Witch was composed—the most elaborate of all his works, but which, from the nature and formation of the libretto, failed to become popular, though containing many morceaux worthy of any composer. Wallace spent more time over this opera in scoring and composing it than any of his lyrical works. For months and months, night and day, he worked at it, and we have no hesitation in stating, that it laid the foundation of the cruel disease which carried him off. Late in the following year, Love's Triumph appeared, and on the 12th October, 1863, the Desert Flower was produced, the last of his acted lyrical works. * * * He retired to Brance nearly twelve months back, where he died on Thursday, the 12th inst. at the Chateau de Bagen Haute Garonne, in the Pyrenees. The immediate cause of his death is stated to have been "congestion of the lungs."

The Conservatoire in Paris.

In the Journal of the Society of Arts the following memoranda are published relative to the Conservatoire Impérial de Musique et de Déclamation, Paris, and explanatory of the system on which that institution is worked.

The chief officials are:—Director, M. Auber, Member of the Institute of France; Secretary, M. Alfred de Beauchêne; Librarian, M. Hector Berlioz, Member of the Institute; Administrator, M. Lossabathie; Director of School, M. Duvernoy. In the list of professors are—M. O. Carafa, Member of Institute; M. A. Thomas, ditto; M. Reber, ditto; M. Clapiason, ditto; M. Benoist, M. Henri Hers, M. Sax, M. A. Elwart, M. F. Bazin, M. Réval, M. Bataille, M. Giuliani, M. Masset, M. Fontana, M. Tariot, M. Duvernoy, M. Batiata, M. Padeloup, M. Levasseur, M. Morin, M. Mocker, M. Samson, M. Beauvallet, M. Regnier, Mlle. Augustine Brohan, M. Georges Mathias, M. Prunier, M. Alard, M. Massard, M. Franchomme, M. Labro, M. Dorus, M. Cokken, M. Gallay, M. Meifred, and M. Arban.

The number of pupils is on the average 600, and there is no charge whatever for the general instruction of the Conservatoire in any of its classes. All are out-of-door pupils, with the exception of twelve young men in the vocal school, who are lodged, clothed (in uniform), and supported within the establishment. There is a box at each of the operas reserved for these young men. There were formerly as many female pupils lodged in the Conservatoire, but this was found so troublesome that pensions have been substituted in the place of residence. By way of compensation, a certain number of female pupils receive a pension of 800 francs a year for two years. All the in-door pupils and pensionnaires are bound to appear, if required, at one or the other of the operas or theatres receiving a subvention from the Government; and no pupil in the schools is permitted to appear in public without the special authority of the direction.

Each applicant for admission must apply personally, and produce certificates of birth and vaccination, must be French, and not less than nine nor more than twenty-two years of age. The applicants are examined by a professor, and if, according to his judgment, they are sufficiently advanced to complete their education in two years, or exhibit peculiar aptitude, they are admitted provisionally, and are again examined at the general meetings for that purpose, which occur in May and December. There is also an extra examination for the admission to the singing class in March. No set form of application. Foreigners may be admitted by authorisation of the Minister of State.

There are five provincial schools—at Lille, Toulouse, Marseilles, Metz, and Nantes, which have the title of succursales of the Conservatoire, the last having been thus nominated in 1846. Some years since pupils were examined in these schools and sent up to the Paris Conservatoire, but this has been discontinued for some time, and candidates from the provinces have now to present themselves personally to the directors of the Conservatoire for admission. For all purposes connected with the pupils these local schools seem now completely dis severed from the Conservatoire—why, does not appear. That of Toulouse, however, exerts a very powerful influence, and supplies a large proportion of successful pupils. Not only is there no preliminary examination in the provinces, but there is no recommendation of pupils by any of the authorities or musical professors in the provinces.

The education is divided into the following eight sections:—1. Sol-fa, scales, and oral harmony. 2. Singing. 3. Lyrical declamation. 4. Piano and harp. 5. Stringed instruments. 6. Wind instruments. 7. Thorough bass, organ, and composition. 8. Dramatic declamation. There are also courses of popular singing for adults, superior to those in the common schools. There is a fine library of music, and of works relating to music and the drama, and this is open not only to the pupils but also the public. There is a good collection of musical instruments attached to the Conservatoire, to which the public is admitted on certain days of the week. The Conservatoire is a very large establishment, and includes a complete theatre, a smaller theatre or concert-room, and innumerable class rooms of all sizes, besides the library, offices, and apartments for the in-door pupils. The annual competitions now take place in July, instead of August. They commenced this year (1865) on the 10th and ended on the 29th of the month, occupying twelve days in all. With the exception of the classes for the organ, harmony and accompaniment, fugue, thorough bass, scales and sol-fa, the competitions are conducted in public. They take place in the theatre of the Conservatoire, erected in 1806, and in which are given the famous concerts of the society formed within the Conservatoire, but not being officially a portion of it. This theatre holds more than 900 persons, but in a most inconvenient manner, but the excellence of the building for sound has hitherto set aside all idea of its reconstruction. It is arranged like an ordinary theatre, with three principal tiers of boxes, a balcony in front of the lower tier, baignoires around the pit, a gallery divided into boxes and stalls, a pit and pit stalls. The pit holds 150 persons, and there are 180 stalls. The form of the building is oblong, with circular ends, the stage and orchestra occupying more than half the whole area. The wall at the back of the stage is not in fact semi-circular but ten-sided. In the centre of the principal tier of boxes is the loge d'honneur, which is the Imperial box for the concerts of the society, and for which the Emperor makes a donation of two thousand francs a year, and behind this is a good-sized antechamber.

During the competitions this box with the antechamber are devoted to the jury, who, after listening to the performances of the pupils in one section or class, retire and decide on the awards before another class commences; each pupil to whom any award is made is then called forward, and the decision of the jury announced to him. If the award has been unanimous, that fact is announced also. The prizemen in the instrumental classes, with the exception of the great instruments, receive an instrument as their prize; others receive books of music, and the pupils of the elementary classes medals. Each successful pupil receives a written diploma in addition.

The jury generally consists of nine members, chosen according to the nature of the competition of the day—whether vocal, instrumental, or dramatic—from a body of thirty. There are, however, five members who are present on almost all occasions, viz.:—M. Auber, Director; M. E. Monnais, Imperial Commissioner for the Lyric Theatres; M. Kastner, Member of the Institute, composer; M. J. Cohen, composer; and General Mellinet, an eminent amateur and composer. In addition to these gentlemen the following acted as members of the jury during the competition just concluded:—M. Cabanis, Chef de Bureau of the Minister of Fine Arts (official); M. De Leuven, Director of the Opera Comique; M. Perrin, Director of the Grand Opera; and M. Hainl, Conductor of the Grand Opera (ex officio members). MM. Ambrose Thomas (member of the Institute), F. Bazin, Benoist, Duvernoy, E. Jonas, Clapiason (member of the Institute), Prunier, V. Masset, Padeloup, Elwart, and Cokken, Professors in the Conservatoire. MM. Wackerlin, composer; Rinaud de Vilbac, composer and pianist; Ravina, pianist; Wieniawski, pianist; Cuvillon, violinist; Léon Réquier member of the Institute, Professor in the College of France; Colin, harpist; and Cremieux, composer.

As already stated, all the competitions are open to the public, with the exception of those amongst the pupils of the elementary classes; but in the case of opera, comic opera, and still more of tragedy and comedy, the demand for places is so great that the theatre is not half large enough to hold those who apply for seats and obtain them, as far as they go, by favor of the director. In the case of the vocal and instrumental competitions, the theatre is not half filled, and the military music attracts only the friends of the pupils themselves.

The competition of 1865 included the following prizes awarded:—

Singing (male classes)—20 competitors and 11 awards, viz.: 1 first and 3 second prizes; "accessits," or honorable mentions, 3 first, 2 second, and 2 third; (female classes)—30 competitors and 17 awards, viz.: 4 first and 3 second prizes; and 2 first accessits, 3 second, and 3 third.

Pieces:—air, 2d act, "La Dame Blanche," air, 4th act, "Lucie;" air "La Juive Moïse;" rondo, "Cenerentola;" air, "Macbeth;" air, "Troviata;" air, "Norma;" air (Joseph), "Vaniceunt Pharaon;"

air (Mousquetaires), "Bocage épais;" air, "Fille du Régiment;" and air, "Pré aux Clercs."

Violin—Piece selected, 8th Concerto of Rode, 23 competitors, male and female. Prizes, 3 first (1 female) and 1 second; 1 first, 1 second, and 1 third accessit.

Violoncello—8th Concerto de Romberg; 1 first prize, 2 second prize, and 1 accessit.

Opera Comique—This is the most popular portion of the competition, and also that in which the pupils are generally strongest. It was especially so this year. There were 22 competitors, male and female, and 17 awards, viz.: male pupils, 1 first, 2 second prizes, 2 first, 3 second accessits; female pupils, 3 first prizes, 2 second prizes, and 2 first and 2 second accessits.

Acts and scenes, performed as well as sung, in stage costume:—Scene from "Le Tableau Parant;" fragment of 1st act of "La Fiancée;" scene from "Les Dragons de Villars;" fragment from "Les Dragons de Villars;" finale of "Noces de Jeannette;" scene from "Noces de Jeannette;" scene, 3d act, "Mousquetaires;" finale, 1st act, "Galathée;" operetta, "Le Chalet;" operetta, "Le Maître de Chapelle;" scene, "Barbier;" scene, 1st act, "Songe d'un Nuit d'Été;" and scene "Toréador."

Piano—11 male and 35 female competitors. (This class is generally pronounced to have been weak.) Male pupils, 1 first, 2 second prizes; 3 first, 1 second, 2 third accessits. Female pupils, 3 first, 3 second prizes; 3 first, 2 second, 4 third accessits. Piece played by male pupils, "Concert Stück" (Weber); piece played by female pupils, "Concerto in B minor" (Hummel).

Harp—4 competitors. 1 first accessit only awarded.

Opera—18 competitors; awards, male pupils, 1 first prize (divided between 2 pupils), 2 second prizes; 3 first, 2 second accessits; female pupils, 1 first prize (divided between 2 pupils), 1 second prize, 1 first, 1 second accessit. Acts and scenes given.—Last scene "Romeo et Juliette;" scene, "Robert le Diable."

Wind instruments—Flute, 1 first, 1 second prize; 2 first, 1 second, 1 third accessit. Horn, 1 second prize; 1 first accessit. Clarinet, 1 first, 2 second prizes; 1 first, 1 second accessit. Bassoon, 1 first, 1 second prize. Hautbois, 1 first, 2 second prizes; 2 first, 2 second, 1 third accessit. Saxophone, 1 first prize, 1 first prize divided in 2, 1 second prize, 1 second prize divided in 2; 3 first, 3 second, 3 third accessits. Saxhorn, 2 first, 2 second prizes; 3 first accessits. Trumpet, 2 second prizes; 2 first, 1 second, 1 third accessit. Trombone, with slides, 1 first prize. Trombone à piston, 1 first prize; 1 first accessit. Cornet à piston, 2 first, 3 second prizes; 1 first accessit. The instrumental classes bear a high reputation.

The total of the above awards is:—36 1st prizes; 38 2nd prizes; 7 3rd prizes; and 81 accessits; in addition to the medals given to the pupils in Sol-fa, 56 in number.

Two of the prize holders were immediately engaged by the director of the opera, and are announced to appear in "Marie."

A competition took place a short time since between the schools (communal) of the left bank of the City of Paris, in Harmony, Reading at Sight, Sol-fa, and Dictation. The Jury included—M. Victor Foucher, President of the Imperial Commission for Singing; M. Ambrose Thomas, General Mellinet, Edouard Rodrigues, Bazin, and others. There were distributed to certain schools—For adults, 2 first prizes and 2 second prizes. For boys, 3 first prizes and 1 second prize (divided). For girls, 1 first prize and 1 second prize.

The competition amongst the pupils of the School for Religious Music took place on the 28th of July, under the presidency of M. Victor Hamille, Director of the Administration des Cultes, and M. Lefèvre Niedermeyer, the Director of the school. The following is the list of awards:—Musical composition, counterpoint and fugue, harmony, organ (two divisions), plain chant, piano (two divisions)—2 prizes in each, first and second class; sol-fa—1 prize.

Opera East and West.

I. ITALIAN OPERA IN NEW YORK.

From week to week we have awaited a summary of the operatic as well as other musical doings in New York from our excellent correspondent; but in his unaccountable silence we must glean from the newspapers such mere statistical record as we can.

MAX MARZETZK, having slain the Herald dragon, opened with his new company at the Academy of Music on the 25th Sept. "Elegance and fashion,"

"best of New York society," plenty of applause, enthusiasm, white kids, universal satisfaction, and all that, of course. Miss Kellogg won fresh laurels in her pet part of Margaret, while the new tenor, Irfre, as Faust, showed at least "some fine and telling tones" and got a fair share of favor. Antonucci, as Mephistopheles, is praised as a decided acquisition, and it is enough to say that Bellini was the Valentine, as of old. Mme. Ficker, Miss Stockton, and the veteran Müller were praised, too, in the little parts of Siebel, Martha and Wagner. Next came Il Poltuto with the old cast: Zucchi, Massimiliani, &c. Marzetz conducted these first two nights.

Then came Petrella's Ione, in which Signora Bosio made her debut, the Weekly Review recognizing in her "a young and fair lady, possessing a fine mezzo-soprano, which has not yet yielded all its beauty and resources." Nervousness, &c. Adelaide Phillips was the Nidia; Mazzoleni, Antonucci and Bellini in the male parts.—Ernani introduced a new baritone, Signor Marra, whom the Tribune praises without stint, the Review languidly. Irfre, Antonucci and Mme. Carozza-Zucchi filled the other parts to general satisfaction apparently, Carl Bergmann conducting.—Once in the Verdi vein, it seemed hard to get out; Un Ballo in Maschera was the next piece, with Mazzoleni and Bellini both indisposed, Mme. Zucchi "doing justice to her part," Bosio—as the page, and Mlle. Gebele ("too much of a novice") as Ulrica. And then the gypsy-burning hacknied horror, which won't stay buried, Il Trovatore, with Mazzoleni, Bellini, Zucchi, and a debutante as Azucena, Mlle. B. di Rossi.

Bellini's I Puritani must have been a relief. Miss Kellogg is said to have been in superb voice and to have surpassed herself in the fine florid melody. Irfre, too, made a hit, and Antonucci and Bellini seem to have been up to the mark.—Ernani again, and then Martha with Kellogg and Phillips, both Americans, which must have been quite charming, Irfre and Antonucci supplying the other side of the quartet, then Ione again, filled out the week, ending Oct. 14.

Verdi led off the next week, with Traviata (Zucchi, Mazzoleni, Bellini).—Lucrezia Borgia and Lucia came in for the next turns, each with a Parepa concert tacked on at one end. Mlle. Ortolani, the Lucia, is said to have much improved.—Norma, with Zucchi and Bosio, closed another week.—Thus far all the pieces have been hacknied ones, including a large proportion of the poorest kind of stuff which happens to be fashionable:—Iones, Traviatas, Poltutos, &c.

Monday, Oct. 23, brought with it the first novelty, the comic opera, of which we copied a description in our last, "Crispino e la Comare" (The Cobbler and Fairy), by the brothers Ricci. We copy what the Albion says of it:

The music is the most charming of its kind, that can be heard or conceived. It is not perhaps so brilliant and rapid as much of the comic writing of Rossini, but is equally melodious, and in style somewhat larger. There are frequent traces that the Brothers Ricci were familiar, not only with this master, but even more intimately so with Donizetti. There are two or three numbers in "Crispino," which might be transferred bodily to "L'Elisir d'Amore." It must not, however, be supposed that the work is marred by plagiarism. In this style of writing, imitation of preceding models is inevitable, and there is no more in "Crispino" than in any of its predecessors. The rest is fresh and exquisite, displaying an easy invention, an abundant flow of melody, a good and humorous arrangement of the characters (as in the trio between the two Doctors and the Cobbler) and a thoroughly clear and intelligent use of the orchestra. The spirit of the work is unflagging. Indeed had the last act been put on the stage in anything like a decent way, it would have excited merriment even from the Sphinx.

We have rarely heard a first performance that was so completely successful, in a musical point of view. Miss Kellogg is the heroine, not the Fairy—who, to speak the truth, is rather a forbidding person dressed in sombre raiment. She, Miss Kellogg, is Crispino's wife—a ballad-monger, with what may be termed a decided turn for flirtation. The music of the role is of course brilliant. Miss Kellogg's rendering of it was simply perfect. Her acting did not impress us so favorably—although it was lively and good. The lady is sometimes a little too easy and unrestrained, and it appeared to us to be the case on this occasion. Nothing is so unacceptable on the stage as nonchalance. In the august presence of the public, the greatest genius may well tremble and feel abashed.

Signor Rovere, an admirable comic actor, made his re-appearance as the hero. The part could not have been entrusted to more competent hands. Signor Bellini, in a small part, was equally good. It was a small part too, that was entrusted to Signor Irfre, who did not in any way increase its proportions. Signor Marra, on the other hand, felt confident that he was doing a great deal for the Brothers Ricci—who, we have no doubt, groaned uneasily at his attentions. We are always gratified when Marra sings. It seems as if he might be so mountainous, when really he is so mousey. With a little study, there is reason to believe that he will speedily become the worst singer in New York.

The choruses and orchestra were alike good, and reflected much credit on the careful conducting of Signor Torriani. The piece is excessively enjoyable, and they who miss it are musical suicides.

Il Crispino was given three times that week. Last week, among other revivals, Robert le Diable was given. Rigoletto, Fra Diavolo, Don Giovanni, Don Sebastian, Saffo, and (novelty number two) L'Africaine, are among the things following or to follow.

II. ITALIAN OPERA IN THE WEST.

1. The "STRAKOSCH TROUPE" (Ghioni, Susini, &c.) were in Detroit last month, we read of them this month in Cleveland, & in Pittsburg. It is curious to see how the newspapers out there describe the hacknied Trovatores, &c., as the latest nine days' wonders in those parts; and to note what kind of efforts on the part of artists are "rewarding" (alas! not there alone!) Thus a Detroit critic, speaking of the redoubtable Maccaferri, says:

Some of his vocal triumphs were remarkable in the extreme. In the grand finale of the third act, he created a great sensation by singing the highest chest tone ever reached by any tenor—an achievement in which the celebrated Tamberlik alone can equal him. This feat was rewarded by tremendous applause.

Think, too, of little Canissa (of the late German Opera) taking the part of Margaret in Faust ("heartily applauded and sung sweetly")! And of Mme. Patti-Strakosch ("making the most of her chances" in "the minor part" of Siebel! With Tamaro, too, as Faust, and Susini as Mephisto, it must have been a rare rendering of Gounod's opera! Of course it was all "first-class"; everything is first-class, where musical agents and newspapers come into fortunate conjunction, and they always do somehow, they seem to be made for each other. The critic aforesaid concludes thus:

It is the first time that the test has been fairly applied, as to whether our city would sustain a genuine Italian opera, with all its numerous items of expense. The answer has been satisfactory in all respects, and we trust that the visits of first-class opera troupes will be less of a rarity hereafter in our city.

And now for a specimen of the newspaper opera talk in Cleveland. (By the way, these people do well to double the S in the word impresario, for is it not the chief function of such an adventure to impress the press itself into his service, and thereby to impress the crowd?)

On Friday evening the indefatigable Impresario and popular Manager will have the honor of presenting a second and last time the Ghioni and Susini Opera Company to the citizens of Cleveland. As their route and time is fully marked out, they will only be enabled to give two operatic performances, and one Grand Sacred Concert on their way to Pittsburg. Now if our musical friends wish to hear and see Opera as it is given in the principal cities of Europe and the New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn Academies of Music, they should avail themselves of the last opportunity, and attend each evening, as such a chance is not likely to be presented again. Max has spared no expense in the formation of this troupe, selecting the best and most talented that were to be found in the Empire City and Europe. The Opera to be performed on Friday is Ernani, in which Madame Angiolina Ghioni, the great dramatic prima donna, will essay the leading rôle. This lady, will no doubt create the same furor in Cleveland that she has in all the cities where she has personified the principal character of the plot. The incidents of the Opera are founded on the popular work of Victor Hugo's, the scene being laid in the Mountains of Arragon, the time the early part of the Sixteenth Century. Signor Maccheroni, as Ernani, is considered by critics as intimitable, while Susini, as the Duke, and Mancusi, the Emperor, need only be mentioned.

On Saturday Flotow's delightful and exquisitely comic Opera, Murtha, will be given, introducing Mlle. Pauline Canessa, the charming vocalist, who has a fresh voice, full of sweetness and sympathy. Madame Patti Strakoski, the favorite contralto, will sustain the difficult rôle of "Nancy," and we have full confidence that both these ladies will acquit themselves to the entire satisfaction of the Cleveland public.

2. MANAGER GRAU'S newly imported troupe, passing over the Eastern cities, made directly for the West, and probably commenced their season this week in Chicago. The "Impressario of the West" has promulgated his purposes and his resources through the New York Tribune:

The main design of the Impressario of the West is to establish regular opera seasons in Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis and Louisville, the entire musical term embracing a period of eight months. Hitherto there has been some difficulty in procuring suitable lyric temples in these, but Chicago now has an elegant one, and the leading capitalists in the other cities are devising plans to establish Academies of Music on a grand scale.

What has been done, however, will be realized by a survey of the engagements made in Europe and elsewhere. In the first place, to prevent having any further trouble on account of unjust and unexpected demands through combinations, a chorus of twenty-eight males and females was engaged in Turin. They were selected with great care, both for their musical and vocal ability, and also for their experience and their personal appearance. These, with the orchestra, comprising thirty-six efficient musicians, under the musical dictatorship of Signor Nuna, will make the accessories in every opera abundantly effective.

The most important engagements made, however, are those of the principal artists, of whom we have a correct description derived from an intelligent Paris correspondent. There are to be four prime donne. The first of these is Madame Gazzaniga, well known here as a dramatic, lyric artiste of great power, and who, before our late war, set the musical connoisseurs of Philadelphia nearly crazy with enthusiasm. She will have Saffo, by Pacini, revived for her, and will also be the heroine in L'Africaine. Her engagement is for a limited period, and she will only appear in the rôles in which she has been most distinguished.

Signora Noel Guidi is the next in importance as a dramatic artiste. She has been regarded recently as the ascending musical star in Italy, and has there acquired a fine reputation not only for her remarkable ability as an actress, but for combining with her histrionic powers the riches of a fresh, melodious voice, cultivated to produce the very best impressions upon musical ears. She has had much experience for so young a vocalist, and her repertoire is extensive. She is chiefly known in Italy, where she is a great favorite, but has appeared very successfully in Russia.

The prima donna next in importance is Signorina Buschetti. Although eminent in many rôles, she is particularly distinguished for her remarkably beautiful and effective personation of Margherita, in Gounod's Faust. She was the original of this heroine at La Scala, Milan, and at Naples, Genoa, Trieste and Rome, her success in the part having caused the managers in all the great cities of Italy to seek her services. She has been styled the Empress of the Margheritas, because her beautiful face and manners realize the ideal of Goethe's lovely creation. She has a fine voice, under excellent cultivation, and has been particularly engaged for the opera of Faust, and to appear as the Page in Un Balla in Maschera, in which she is very charming.

The other prima donna is Signora Moreo Cielli, recently from Mexico, where she has been very successful, alike with the Imperial Court and the people. Her voice is a light soprano of high range.

There are two contraltos. The first of these is Signora Casti Polini Rosa, who has what may be deemed a phenomenal voice, in consequence of its range and depth. She reminds the Europeans of Pasta and Brambilla, and is particularly brilliant in Rossini's music. The other contralto is remarkable for her great personal beauty, but is sure, also, to excite great interest by her other qualities. She has a fine voice, and is a very effective actress. The opinion is entertained by those who have seen and heard her that she will become one of the greatest favorites ever known in the annals of Opera in this country.

The tenors are three in number. Signor Musini, the first of these, visited this country and Havana in 1861, and was a valuable member of the Cortesi Company. He is a tenore di forza, and it is said that he has ripened into one of the most efficient tenors in Europe. He is the rival of Tambrlik, in one respect, at least. He can take the Do di petto and hold it firmly. He is also a very acceptable actor. Another tenor is Signor Anastasi. He is only 26 years of age, possesses a fine personal appearance, is graceful and easy in his manners, and acts with enthusiasm and spirit. He has been very successful in Milan, where the critics are not apt to show young artists too much favor. His repertoire is extensive, and he has particularly distinguished himself in I Puritani, La Sonnambula, Faust and Il Barbiere di Siviglia. Signor Lotti, well known in our principal cities as an agreeable tenor, has also been engaged.

The baritones of the company are Signor Brandini and Signor Fellini. Both of them, it is represented, have fine, fresh voices, and are very good actors.

The basses are Signor Milleri and Signor Pollini, together with a basso buffo, Signor Sarti.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 11, 1865.

Concerts.

AUGUST KREISSMANN and HUGO LEONHARD. The first soirée of these true and highly appreciated artists, at Chickering's rooms, last Saturday evening, was very delightful to the few whom the rain-flood allowed to be present. Their concerts in past years have always been among the pleasantest and purest musical occasions; their names being good guaranty that whatever is to be played or sung shall be classical and fine and often rare in quality. Last year they gave no concerts, so that the announcement now of a new series (of five on successive Saturdays) was hailed with double interest. And a perusal of the first programme piqued still more the curiosity to hear. There were about half a hall full present—not half as many as desired to go—but the little audience was of the best kind, such as could feel at once the beauty of such music as the following:

- 1 Sonata, op. 7..... Beethoven.
Allegro molto—Largo—Allegro—Rondo.
- 2 Songs..... Schubert.
a. Der Neugierige. b. Ungeduld.
- 3 a. Gavotte from "Suite Anglaise"..... Bach.
b. Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2..... Chopin.
- 4 Songs..... Schumann.
a. Waldesgespräch, op. 39, No. 3.
b. Mondnacht, op. 39, No. 4.
c. Frühlingsnacht, op. 39, No. 12.
- 5 a. Scherzo, op. 20..... Chopin.
b. Song by Rob. Franz, transcribed..... Liszt.
- 6 Songs..... Rob. Franz.
a. Auf dem Meer, op. 33, No. 1.
b. Lieben ist da, op. 33, No. 2.
c. Rastlose Liebe, op. 33, No. 3.
- 7 Trio, Piano, Violin and Cello, op. 68..... Schumann.
Allegro con fuoco—Scherzo—Andante—Finale.

The early Beethoven Sonata in E flat,—one which we do not remember to have heard in a concert room before, but which is very familiar in private—was interpreted genially, in the true spirit, and with fine vital touch and accent by Mr. Leonhard. It may have been the accident of place, that to our ears the fortissimo chords after those soft staccato phrases sounded almost too heavy; but with that only slight exception the rendering of the whole first movement was an almost ideal reflection of our feeling of it; all the rest seemed to speak as it were without mechanism. So too the Largo, broad, rich, deep, well marked by the composer "con gran espressione." The Minuet and Trio,—or what answers therefor, the playful Allegro and the mysterious Minor which for a few wonderful moments intercepts its sunshine,—and the Finale, that most gracefully wrought Rondo, with its exquisite returns into itself, and the stormy episode in the middle, were played with all the nicety and discriminating force that one could wish. The poetic life and unity of the whole long work was perfectly preserved, so that expectation never flagged and the remembrance was as of a real hour with Beethoven.

The little Gavotte of Bach charmed by its naïveté and brightness, the simplicity which is the height of art. The Chopin Nocturne was the natural after-mood of tenderness. The Scherzo was of another temper and more formidable—the earliest of the four strong flights of fancy and of passion which Chopin calls by that name, it has been the least heard in the concert room, and is certainly a piece to task the player's executive faculty as severely as anything in the modern piano repertoire. It is an exciting, a magnificent work, and the interpreter was fully master of it.

The Schumann Trio was new to us, and we should like to hear it again. The Allegro quite carries one away with its fuoco; it is rich and strong. In the Andante there seems something very morbid; the Finale begins well, but as if the movement went on after its own violence was exhausted. The Scherzo, on the other hand is healthy and felicitous, a gem in its way. The Trio lost nothing in the rendering, M. Leonhard being ably seconded in the violin and cello parts by the brothers HENRY and AUGUST SICK, who have been studying with excellent result in Germany.

Mr. KREISSMANN's selection of songs was choice as choice could be, each more charming than the last. Schubert's "Der Neugierige" (the Curious One) was the least striking, though beautiful, somewhat Mozartish in its style. The well known "Ungeduld" (Impatience) was sung with life and feeling. The three Schumann songs are of the finest that we know by him: first, the mysterious "whisper of the woods," then, exquisitely as the reality, the "Moonlight Night," and perhaps still more lovely, the "Night of Spring." We have never heard Mr. Kreissmann put more soul and feeling into his voice, or modulate it more delicately to the sentiment of what he sang, although when he began his tones seemed to come out with a little difficulty, which he overcame as he warmed to the music. Robert Franz last, because the best! The three pieces were well contrasted. "On the Sea" suggests its own character. "Liebet den da!" (in which the lover calls to the little flowers in the garden to look round and see what he has seen: "Darling is here, is here!" and they, sharing his joy, set the air ringing with their musical shout: "She is here!") is a most charming little conceit, and was rendered to the life. (This little song has just been published by Ditson with English words). "Rastlose Liebe" (Restless Love) is Goethe's little poem wonderfully set to music, with a most happily found accompaniment, which as in all the songs, Mr. Leonhard played in perfect understanding with the singer.

We have not said much of all these interesting compositions; nor is it necessary, for fortunately the programme will be repeated this evening for the sake of many persons whom the rain deprived of the pleasure before.

THE BROTHERS FORMES. The well-known basso CARL, with his brothers THEODORE, for some years leading tenor robusto, or "heroic tenor," at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and WILHELM, baritone, from the Opera at Hamburg, announced two concerts at the Music Hall for last Monday and Wednesday evenings. The first came off according to card before a moderately large and cordially disposed audience. There was a small orchestra, the "Germania," under a newly imported conductor, Herr BUECHEL, who seemed accustomed to command and did duty well also as accompanist at the piano-forte. They played Spontini's overture to Fernando Cortez, which we were sorry to lose, as Spontini is not too well known here; also a noisy, trashy sailor overture by Flotow, "Die Matrosen," in which the piccolo played boatswain's whistle; and a Turnier March, from an opera, "Agnes," by Krebe, for a wind-up. The programme contained points of interest of a kind too seldom met with in our concerts: the great trio of the patriots in "William Tell," for instance,—about the grandest thing, that and the whole scene in which it stands, which any Italian opera writer has produced. Something from Weber's Euryanthe, too; and above all, a goodly share of Mozart, of whose unrivalled song our concert singers for some time past have been strangely shy—not a note of him in all the Parepa concerts—not a note in the whole week's Handel and Haydn Festival!

Carl Formes is a hearty Mozart-ian; he sings the Leporello music, and the Figaro music, and the Sarastro music sehr appetitisch, with an unction, and the time has been when we have admired him greatly in all this. This time he gave us Non più andrai, with much of the old life and gusto,—but, it pains us not to like Carl Formes' singing as we once could. We have very pleasant associations with his name and with the picturesque sight of him. He always seemed to us to have a streak of genius in him; a rare intelligence he certainly has; and his dramatic impersonations were so characteristic, so artistically complete and telling! Then too a great voice, which is a great voice still, but alas! not a true one; he sang more than ever out of tune that night, and, on a mere concert stage, nothing covers that defect. We had hoped much from the report that his voice had become quite itself again during long rest and treatment in Chicago. Its strength and freshness did seem recovered, but certainty of pitch and power of sustaining itself were wanting. This made the "Tell" trio a piece of discord, much as there was to praise in the rendering. So too, Schubert's "Wanderer," which also had the fault of being much exaggerated in expression.

Herr THEODORE FORMES, some dozen years younger than Carl, without the lion build, mild in aspect, sang about as we remember him in Berlin (in such rôles as Raoul, Lohengrin, in Dorn's Niebelungen, as well as more classical things):—that is to say, with rather too much forcing of tones naturally rich and strong, and containing in the rough ore abundant musical material; for the rest, with intelligence and effect. Some of his passages were sweet, and not a few were rich; but generally, it is in strong, declamatory "heroic" strains that he rings out most at home. We were thankful for so interesting a piece as the aria from Euryanthe. Of the two little German songs, the "Sentinel" (Die Schildwache) by Esser, suited him best, and was given in a very genial spirit. In the "Tell" trio his high tones rang out well in the climaxes.

WILHELM FORMES, still younger, more resembling the dark lion brother, has, like Theodore, a modest, quiet, gentlemanly manner. His baritone is rich and round and full of marrow, and he sings, not with great energy, but simply, with true expression, giving real pleasure, especially in the soliloquy of the Count from Mozart's Figaro, which with its delicious orchestration it was a treat for once to hear. He also sang with Carl the duet from Nicolai's "Merry Wives" between "Master Brook" and Falstaff, and "The Sailor's Salute" by Fuchs.

The second concert did not come off; excuse: illness of Theodore Formes.

THE CHICKERING PIANO-FORTES.—In spite of the terrible competition among the piano makers, and the bewildering clamor which they all make in the newspapers, our old Boston house of Chickering & Sons appear to hold their own, still more than keeping pace with all improvements, and still as ever at the head. We copy the following item of intelligence with emphatic Amen to its heading:—

A DESERVED SUCCESS.—The last State Fair of the Northwest has just closed, and with it a great triumph for Chickering & Sons' new unrivalled piano-fortes, which have taken the first premiums over all competitors.

Michigan State Fair, at Adrian, Mich.

First Premium for Grand Pianos.
" " Upright Pianos.
" " Square Pianos.

Iowa State Fair.
First Premium for Semi-Grand Pianos.
" " Square Pianos.

Wisconsin State Fair.
First Premium for Grand Pianos.
" " Upright Pianos.

Indiana State Fair.
First Premium for Grand Pianos.
" " Semi-Grand Pianos.
" " Upright Piano.

Making a total of ten first premiums awarded in different States within the short space of two weeks. Every piano exhibited received the first medal, against the strong competition of pianos entered by at least twenty other makers. The Messrs. Chickering have now been awarded fifty-one gold and silver medals, in every case the first premium, for the best pianos.

There has just been a Mechanics' Fair here in Boston, at which the instruments of all our Boston manufacturers were submitted to the most impartial test that could be devised; with what result will be seen by the following manly communication which appeared in the Transcript on Wednesday, from which it would seem that there were some queer doings in the publication of awards. Was the result of the impartial trial too startling for some of the judges to abide by? We trust we shall soon have the report of the Committee in full; meanwhile hear its Chairman:

PIANO-FORTE MEDALS. To the Editor of the Transcript: The President of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association says, in substance, that he believed he was correctly reporting the award of the Committee on Musical Instruments, in the list of gold medals, as given to the press by him. What he thinks is of very little consequence to the public; that is a matter which concerns the Association over which he presides; if the members think his course honorable, it is sufficient. But there is an aspect of the case with which the public have something to do. The recent exhibition of the Association has drawn together so many thousands of people, has presented so varied and so complete an epitome of the ingenuity, skill and taste of this great manufacturing district, that the judgments of the experts selected to make awards in the various departments are naturally awaited with an eager interest. Gentlemen who are hereafter invited to act as judges will be glad to know whether they are to sit in impartial judgment and to render verdicts, (vera dicta), or whether they are expected merely to register the pre-determined awards of partisan managers. The public, who have heretofore looked upon a medal as an honor worthy to be contended for, will be glad to know whether it is bestowed for real preeminence, or whether it is wrongfully given on account of the favoritism which business connections and social and political influences engender; and therefore, Mr. Editor, I venture to make public a few facts respecting the recent Committee on Musical Instruments and its doings; regretting very much that the action of the President has made this step necessary.

The Committee consisted originally of eight persons; but after the first meeting two new members appeared, one of whom came as a substitute for a gentleman who had resigned, although the substitute had himself previously declined to serve;—the ninth member never having been appointed at any regular meeting of the Board, as I have been informed. Subsequent events showed plainly enough why this gentleman was added to a committee of already even more than the ordinary number.

The examination of the piano fortes was made in a darkened room, the makers' names being pasted over, and the instruments shuffled about without any known order as to position in the hall. The square pianos were first tried, faithfully and patiently. When the choice at last lay between three instruments, there were two or three votes out of the nine for one which we afterwards learned was made by Hallet, Davis & Co. The choice then lay between the two others, one of which received five votes; but both of these we afterwards found were from the manufactory of Chickering & Sons. For myself and the majority of the Committee I can say that we had no knowledge of the origin of the instruments we were deciding upon, and Brown, Jones or Robinson would have had a cheerful vote if he had deserved it. Whether the two gentlemen referred to were equally in the dark, I have some doubt. To be minutely correct, I should state that at the very last, when the light was a trifle stronger, we all recognized a square piano by its black-walnut case as being from the Chickering's—but not until its merits had been fully admitted.

We next tried the semi-grand. It was the work of a moment, for there was not the least hesitation in giving the unanimous preference for an instrument which subsequently proved to be a Chickering's piano. Nor were we much longer in arriving at a similar conclusion as to the full-grands: most of the time was spent in determining to which of two instruments (both by Chickering & Sons) the first prize should be given. No one voice was raised for the competing instruments. As to the direction of the awards, we were thus far harmonious; and, at the meeting which followed (the supplementary member not being present), the awards were voted, viz: to Chickering & Sons, a gold medal for the best grand and semi-grand, a silver medal for their upright pianos. To Hallet, Davis & Co., a silver medal for their grand piano, and a second-prize silver medal for their square. To Mason & Hamlin a gold medal, &c., &c.

The committee had doubts, from the beginning, whether the instructions under which they acted allowed them to award a gold medal for any pianoforte; but it was thought that precedents enough existed for such a vote. At a subsequent meeting these doubts were somewhat adroitly revived by one of the supplementary members; the action of the committee was reconsidered and silver medals were substituted for the gold medals. And upon the paltry pretext that the semi-grand of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., was entered by them as a "Parlor Grand," an independent award of a silver medal was conceded to them,—although at the original trial the instrument had not a single vote. It was remarkable how much new light had dawned upon hitherto darkened minds. Not the least injurious effect of this vote was to deprive Messrs. Geo. M. Guild & Co. of the silver medal which had been previously awarded for a parlor grand,—really the only one in the exhibition.

At this meeting the report was substantially completed, and the document was sent the next morning to the room of the Executive Committee to receive signatures. But there being some confusion as to certain brass instruments, and some errors and omissions as to others, it was sent for and considered again. I had declined to sign the report, for the reason that it was apparent that a portion of the committee, not being able to give any first prize to Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., were determined that the honors to others should be as insignificant as possible. I signed a strong protest instead, and in this was joined by two others. As the matter stood there would have been no agreement; for two members would not sign either the report or the protest. It is to be regretted now that any compromise was made. But compromise we did, appending to our report a recommendation to the Executive Committee to give gold medals in place of the silver ones, one "to Hallet, Davis & Co., for the marked improvement in all the piano-fortes exhibited by them." The dissenting members were appeased. They had wrung an award to which other piano-forte makers were quite as much entitled.

Not one of the Committee would have had the hardihood to propose "a gold medal to Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., for a very superior Grand Piano Forte,"—which Mr. Bailey (I give the prefix which in his card he forgot) says he believes our Committee awarded. It was quite enough for us to sign what we did. The only possible cover for the conduct of the President is to be found in the sentence which I will presently quote. Remember, Mr. Editor, we were recommending the substitution of medals, and could not multiply them; and as it seemed to be inevitable in order to come to an agreement that Hallet, Davis & Co. must have a gold medal, and as we could give it for no one instrument—we agreed to give it for the reason above italicized, and (to save bullion in these days of paper money) added,— "this last," namely, Hallet, Davis & Co.'s gold medal, "to take the place of the silver medal awarded for their Grand Piano-Fortes."

The Executive Committee have an undoubted right to award such medals as they please; and if they had taken the responsibility and avowed it, there would have been no occasion for any public controversy,—only it might be difficult under such management at future competitions to procure judges.

Now, Mr. Editor, did Mr. Bailey believe he made a correct abstract of our awards? Can he be justified except by a disreputable quibble? If he really thought so why did he not print the report which he has had since the middle of October and for which many people have been waiting? Was he not persuaded to wait, that the garbled and falsified abstract might first obtain a currency, which it would soon be difficult to correct?

But, sir, he has been now fully informed of what the Committee intended. He was informed before printing by some of his colleagues in the government; but, in spite of all, he has persisted, as I am told, in ordering the false inscription for the gold medal in question, and perhaps for scores of duplicate diplomas to blazon the wrong. I cannot mince epithets in view of this conduct.

I respectfully ask, Mr. Editor, what is the real value of a medal thus obtained?

For the correctness of this statement I appeal to my colleagues. Hoping to trouble neither you nor the public farther in regard to this controversy, I am,

Yours truly, F. H. UNDERWOOD.

(Late) Chairman, &c., &c.

We, as members of the Committee on Musical Instruments, cordially indorse the statements of Mr. Underwood.

CARL ZERRAHN,
CHAS. J. CAPEN,
H. WARE.

PARIS. At the Grand Opera L'Africaine still reigns, alternating with Tell, Masaniello, &c. Duprez's new opera, "Jeanne D'Arc," was brought to performance after many delays, but, owing to the indisposition of the heroine, broke down in the middle, and the critics abstain from judgment on the music. A leaf from the Orchestra's correspondence, Oct. 9, shows the complexion of opera life in Paris:

At the Italiens we have had "Crispino" and "Don Zephira" during the week. We are to have "Lucrezia," for the rentrée of M<sup>me</sup>. Penco and M. Fraschini, and the débuts of M<sup>lle</sup>. Grossi and M. Selva. Among the novelties in preparation are Mercadante's "Leonora;" "Don Pucéfalo," by Cagnoni; "Simon Boccanegra," by Verdi; and perhaps (mais est-il possible?) "La Forza del Destino." At the Opera Comique "Marie," "Häydeé," and now and then "La Dame Blanche," are the current pieces, and call for no special mention. The rehearsals of "Fior d'Aliza" are progressing; the cast includes the names of M<sup>mes</sup>. Vandenhuevel-Duprez, Galli-Marie, Révilly, and M<sup>me</sup>. Achard, Crosti, Potel, &c. A new basso, Falchieri, has been engaged. The Théâtre Lyrique gives nothing new at present. M. Bosquin, a novice from the Conservatoire, has appeared, sans débuts, in a small part in the "Flûte Enchantée," which is as successful as ever. A new theatre, to be called the "Théâtre des Fantaisies Parisiennes," is in course of erection on the Boulevard des Italiens, on the site of the ancient "Concerts des Beaux Arts." M. Martinet is the speculator. M. Choudens, the apostle of Gounod, to whom we owe in a great measure the world-wide popularity of "Faust" and the now evident success of "La Reine de Saba," has taken M. Choronvri's "Roi des Mines" under his protection, and the work will not only be edited but resumed at the Lyrique in a few days. This enterprising publisher has also in hand a Mass, or as the composer entitles it, a "Petit Oratorio," by M. Gounod, which is said to contain some of the writer's best inspirations. I had almost forgotten the Opera. "L'Africaine" still draws money, and the deadly emanations of the upas-tree are said to have something to do with the approach of the cholera. "La Muette" was given the night before last with Villaret as Masaniello and M<sup>lle</sup>. Eugénie Fiocre as Fenella. The public, "penetrated" by the talent of these two artists, applauded them "with phrensy."

—ADELINA PATTI has been giving concerts at Amsterdam, in company with Leopold de Meyer. Bottesini and M<sup>lle</sup>. Castellani, as violinist.

—M. PASDELOUP, the founder of the Popular Classical Concerts in Paris, announces that he has discovered sixteen scores of the first symphonies of Haydn, not one of which was known in France. He reserves the first taste for his concert.—The said Concerts Populaires opened on Sunday, October 22, at the Cirque Napoleon, as heretofore. Programme: Overture to Oberon; Symphony No. 4 (first time), Haydn; Canzonetta from a quartet by Mendelssohn, by all the strings of the orchestra; 7th Symphony by Beethoven.

—LEIPZIG. The Gerwandhaus Concerts, (new series of twenty), commenced on the 5th October, Reinecke conducting, every thing unchanged, the same perfection, same classical style of programme, and the same close little hall. At the first concert were performed: Beethoven's great Overture, opera 124; air from Elijah, sung by M<sup>me</sup>. Alexandra Kotschetoff, of St. Petersburg; Violin Concerto, composed and admirably played by Ferd. David; air from Glinka's Russian opera, Ruslan und Ludmilla; Schubert's C-major Symphony.

—MR. ULLMANN still finds the "sensation" business as profitable in Europe as he did in America. He has engaged his traveling concert troupe for the winter, with Carlotta Patti as the chief attraction, and announces the order of his triumphal entrées: Berlin, Munich, Cologne, St. Petersburg, &c., some 40 or 50 cities. Here is a list of his troupe (according to the Gazette Musicale): Singers: Carlotta Patti and Dr. Gunz; déclamatrice: M<sup>me</sup>. Niemann; pianists: Messrs. Brassin, Epstein, (of Vienna), Jaell, Dreyschock, and Kontski; violinists: Auer, David, Lauterbach, and Vieuxtemps; violin- cellists: Piatti and Swert; contrabassist: M. Simon; horn: Richard Léwy (of Vienna); accompanist: M. E. J. Franck.

LONDON. The Royal English Opera season opened at Covent Garden, Oct. 21, with L'Africaine, the English translation by Mr. Charles Kenney. Selika, Miss Louisa Pyne; Inez, M<sup>me</sup>. Sherrington; Nelusko, Mr. Lawrence; Vasco, Mr. Charles Adams. Gounod's "Mock Doctor" was to follow.

On the same day, Handel's Acis and Galatea was performed at the Crystal Palace concert.

—HECTOR BERLIOZ has completed his Autobiography, which is said to be already printed, 100 copies only, for friends; but he will not have it published until after his death: It forms a large octavo of some 500 pages.

—FAUST, the violinist, perhaps the greatest since Paganini and before Joachim, and perhaps well named between those two opposites as uniting both the virtuoso and the classical tendency, died on the 8th of October at Nice, whither he had gone for his health. He was born at Brunn, in Moravia, in 1814; had his first musical education in the conservatory of Vienna, when Mayseder and Paganini befriended him, and afterwards studied in Paris, where he gave chamber concerts which won him fame. He is popularly known by such pieces as his "Elegie," "Carnival of Venice," &c.; but he has written quartets and has figured much in London as a leader in quartet-playing.

—MELODY DEFUNCT.—It is the custom in Germany for beggars to take their seats at the corners, playing on instruments, sometimes solo, and sometimes in parties of two and more, and soliciting charity. Dreyschock relates the following incident respecting one of these: "My attention was attracted one day by a man who was playing on his violin a simple accompaniment, without any melody whatever. I stopped and listened; tum, tum; tum, tum, went the beggar, through one piece, and then, after a short interval, commenced the same thing in another key, and at the conclusion of this, again in still another. 'Stop! my friend,' said I, 'and tell me why it is that you do not play some air instead of this mere accompaniment?' 'Alas! good sir,' was the reply, 'there were two of us, and my companion played the melody and I accompanied him. He, poor man, died last week, and as I don't know the melodies, I am obliged to play as I do.'

The musical copyrights of the London firm of Addison & Lucas were recently sold at auction. The Athenæum says:

"The 'statistics' of the sale are full of curious matter for thought, not without encouragement for those who steadily fix their eyes on the fact that what is good must, will, and does, ultimately assert itself as valuable, even though, for a while, it be vexatiously shoved aside and shouldered by trash. Thus, while we find two ballads by Linley, of no earthly value, selling for the sums of £221 and £94 respectively, we perceive, also, with great satisfaction, that six songs by Dr. Bennett went at the raised figure of £324. Again, Mr. Hatton's four-part songs brought £446. Then, what revelation is thrown on the successes of English operas, successively blazoned by our contemporaries, by such facts and figures as the following! Mr. Balfe's entire opera, "Blanche de Nevers" (full of ballads), was knocked down for £65, his "Puritan's Daughter" for £150, his "Armorer of Nantes" for £124. Compare sums like these (recollecting that many an opera has "brought itself home" on a single song) with those given for the copyrights of two oratorios—works which inevitably can only be performed at rare intervals. Mr. Costa's "Eli" produced £412; his "Naaman," £567."

GUSTAVE SATTER has received in Germany the cognomen of "the great puffer." It is reported that he has resumed in Germany his old practice of writing criticisms about himself, which proved that nobody knew or recognised Mr. Satter's eminent genius so much as he himself did. This very Satter has written an opera, "Olanthe," for which he has also written the libretto, as his talented colleague, Richard Wagner did before him. Zellner's musical journal says about the libretto: "If the music is equal to this libretto, then we believe that Goethe's words, 'a political song, a disgusting song,' have never been better illustrated." It is well known that Satter, when in America, had an engraving of the then most famous pianists made at his own expense, which represented himself sitting between Liszt and Thalberg in that "hemicycle." It was then feared that he would die of modesty.—Orchestra.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Spring's come. (Er ist's.) Op. 27, No. 2.

R. Franz. 30

Perfectly sweet. The only unsatisfying thing about such songs, is their brevity; but in this small compass, Franz compresses as much music as, flowing from the brains of some composers, would cover many pages. The verses, by Edward Mörike, constitute a joyous outcry at the coming of spring.

On me turn thy sparkling lustre. (Weil auf mir.)

R. Franz. 30

"The dark eye," is the subject of this airy musical fancy. The ideas are elegantly expressed, both in the music and the original words, to which is added a careful translation.

Arise, O Lord. Bass Song. "Naaman." 40

A very melodious air, in which Elisha prays for miraculous help for the poor widow, whose sons the hard creditors are about to sell into bondage. This new oratorio by Costa (which is a very fine one) might with propriety be named "Elisha," instead of "Naaman." The latter name is assumed, probably, to avoid too great similarity to "Elijah."

Bury me at sunset. Song. F. Wilder. 30

A pretty ballad, subject, the death of a soldier.

Weave garlands for the brave. Song. D. Godfrey. 40

Another patriotic song, to the favorite melody of the "Guard's Waltz."

Aged and Grey. Song. L. B. Starkweather. 30

Of in dreams I see my mother. " " 30

Two excellent songs, showing the composer's well known taste and care in their preparation.

Instrumental.

Re-union March. (Verbrüderung's March.)

J. Strauss. 30

A brilliant affair, which, although a German production, will do excellently well to play in honor of the re-uniting of the fragments of "These United States."

Star Spangled Banner. Varied for Organ.

J. K. Paine. 1.00

A fine piece of the "sensation" order, which has frequently been played here and in New York.

Il Penseroso Waltz. Mrs. E. W. Brown. 30

A very graceful and musical composition, which will not disappoint you, if you play it.

Warrior's Victory. (Kriegers' March.) Strauss. 30

Very brilliant and powerful, with the steel-y ring to it, common to Strauss' strongest compositions.

Maiden's Blush. G. and Concert Waltz.

Seven Octaves. 60

Although a "concert waltz," not very difficult, and is a good piece for exhibitions.

Bell March. Mr. F. Follansbee. 30

A simple affair, but pretty, and good for those beginners, for whom teachers find it so difficult to select appropriate music.

Books.

JUDAS MACCABEUS. An Oratorio by Handel.

Paper, $1.75

Cloth, 2.50

This grand work, which is to be brought out, the present month, by the Handel and Haydn Society, is commended to musical societies for their winter's practice. Strong, bold, and manly, and suited to the times, it is just the work to use. The choruses are published in a separate book, for societies who do not need the whole, but it is much better to have the complete oratorio, if you can.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 643.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 25, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 18.

The Present State of Music.

(Continued from page 120.)

(Translated for this Journal from Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

In fact, after all, it would be well to attempt at least an estimate of the economical results of our Art, to find out what it costs in time and money, and what it gives in return. One must reckon up the lessons now required, every week two or three for from four to six years for each learner in each particular branch; also the time spent in practice—from two to four hours daily; the time devoted to encouraging the pupil to culture, compensation, entertainment, to concerts, operas, musical parties: one must observe how these hours of lessons and practice crowd themselves in between the indispensable school and working hours, how this pressing of one thing upon the heels of another allows no leisure for any inward, true conception of Art itself, not to speak of the harmonious development of the whole man. The money reckoning every one may make for himself. I need only call attention to one fact, that no teacher is so dearly paid as the music teacher, no instruction is so costly as musical instruction.

This again has had for an immediate consequence, that musical instruction, like every other lucrative trade, has drawn a host of practitioners, eagerly engaged in winning and in sending out new troops of amateurs. He who has no other calling and source of income for his son, he who knows not how to compass a dowry or a marriage for his daughters, and who thinks them "too good" to work with their hands, has them educated for music teachers. But where there is no pure, disinterested love for Art, where not the calling for Art and the teacher's office, but only the need of money and the desire of gain have given the impulse, there, in the best case, only an external assiduity and conscientiousness, not in regard to the thing itself, but to the assumed duty, can prevail; there there is practicing and learning with most restless effort, but abstractly and mechanically; there teaching goes on early and late, with further practice, till the nerves are blunted or unstrung, on what the humor and the fashion of the day brings forth. Art becomes mechanical—no fault of the victim, but the consequence of false position—and it passes mechanically into the people. Thus is formed the peculiar class of "connoisseurs" or of so-called "musicians" par excellence, and of the music-mad "amateurs," who run from one concert to another, assist if possible at two or three reunions, devour two or three symphonies, three or six quartets, two overtures to a Fidelio or an Iphigenia at once, and hear everything one after another or all in a heap—and naturally enough carry away from this hurried and confused meal nothing but the vague remarks: It "went quite well;" this one sang or played so, the other so; this composition is "very fine," or "did not speak to me," is beautifully worked—classical, grotesque, original, tasteful, or contains "reminiscences,"—and whatever else such fertile judgment may let drop. The nobler nature of Art shows itself in this, that it slips away from impure hands and shrinks from any unclean or alien motives. The work of the laborer, the business of the merchant aims at gain and is not tainted nor demoralized thereby, although for even that there is no success in the higher sense without a genuine love of the work itself. The artist too must live by his labor, that is right and lawful. But gain, for him, must be something secondary and incidental, the accident of his life's task, not its starting-point and motive, else he is no artist, else whatever of artistic power he has in him escapes from him, else all his making and his working can be only a dead and not a life-kindling thing. And even to the receiver Art denies herself, if he be not drawn to her by a presentiment of her vital force, by a live, earnest longing to be filled by her with a new and higher spirit; if he is only tempted that way by fashion, only by imagining that it belongs to culture, only by the desire of amusement. To him she remains a fashionable toy, a sounding tedious pastime.

So we are forced to recognize, that the present time exhibits an unparalleled diffusion of music, that our life is all immersed in this play of the waves of tone, all submerged and deafened by this most importunate because the loudest of all arts, which drives the neighbors to distraction, commands silence in the midst of entertainment, and brings society to a stillstand, begs of us and grinds to us in the streets, storms us in the garden, if possible, with alternate rival troops of a double orchestra, and by over-weight and over-speed lames and weakens its own effects.

If finally you wish to know what is the principal gist and substance of this deluge of music, ask the music publishers and their catalogues what music is most purchased; compare the mass of Solfeggios and the years of cultivation of the voice with the fruits: a few "sanglottante" opera pieces accidentally brought into fashion by some prima donna, bunglingly enough imitated from the copy, and some songs of that cheap meadow growth, pleasant and characterless as blades of grass, welcome at their first appearance as the first crocuses in Spring, and as soon forgotten;—compare too the "exercises in velocity," which consume the years of these myriads of piano dilettanti and virtuosi and aspirants after virtuosity, with the sum of real works of Art which come only to the scholar's acquaintance, not to speak of artistic understanding and interpretation;—inquire how many, besides the few who reach a fair result of all their efforts and their sacrifices, after long years of assiduous learning presently desist forever from all active part in Art, or at least from all attempt to progress beyond the standpoint of the last lesson. Either—you will readily admit—some richer and higher result must be won through such far prospective exercises, or the burden and time-consumption of the preparatory exercises must be lessened and be brought into some proportion with the small result, if the occupation of oneself with music is to be anything else than a wanton waste of time, money and nervous energy, if it is to be a blessing to the human race.

(Conclusion next time.)

Beethoven's Letters.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Dr. Ludwig Nohl, Professor of History and Aesthetics, at the University of Munich, has collected and published a volume of Beethoven's Letters. Side by side with much that is beautiful and elevating we find in this volume a perfect anthology of misères from the life of a great man, and we should end by laying down the book with a sentiment of moral seediness, if, while we were perusing it, the immortal Symphonies, Sonatas, and Quartets of the Master did not continually keep running in our head. The disagreeable things a man may suffer as a German, a composer, a German composer; as a deaf, sick bachelor, as a teacher, as a lover, nay, more, as a man of business, crop up, here and there, in these letters, and crop up, too, into our very eyes, so that the latter become wet with tears. But we must reflect that Fate is justified when it charges as dearly as possible for such genius as that which fell to the lot of Beethoven. The highest price is always a mere trifle.

The Editor has divided the Letters into three sections, the first of which (1783 to 1815) "Lebens Freud und Leid," and the last (1823 to 1827) "Lebens Mühe und Ende" (the titles savour rather of those given to a series of songs) include between them the second (1815 to 1823), which bears the title "Lebens Aufgaben." Why the middle section should be thus called is not very plain; perhaps it is because Beethoven's guardianship over his nephew agrees with the year 1815. It cannot, however, be denied that among the "Lebens Aufgaben" (Tasks of Life) in Beethoven's case, was certainly the task of writing the C minor Symphony and Fidelio. But no matter! we can only feel thankful to Herr Nohl for his industry as a collector, though the most important pieces in his collection have long been familiar to us.

It is not difficult to give a short summary of the contents of the Letters. A very small number indeed consist of letters of a mere friendly nature—but there is a love-letter among them. The others are nearly all on business: letters to the various publishers of his works; letters and documents relating to the guardianship and education of his young nephew; furthermore others of the same kind concerning the income settled on him by certain princely personages; and, finally, shorter letters and notes treating of every possible subject—of the production of Fidelio and of his squabbles with his domestics, of dedications and medical men, of change of residence and concerts, and—alas!—very frequently of money, money! A special place must be assigned to the will, which has been so often printed. The original, in possession of the celebrated Ernst, and written at Heiligenstadt in 1802, is a sorrowful lament, in which the Master gives utterance to the most moving grief for the loss of his hearing. There is nothing that ever flowed in words from Beethoven's pen which can equal the interest this Elegy never fails to inspire, however often it is read.

The book opens with the dedication to the Elector, Maximilian Frederick of Cologne; it is printed before the first Pianoforte Sonata "verfertigt" ("made") by Beethoven in his twelfth year. The editor remarks somewhat naively: "it could scarcely have been drawn up by the boy himself, but has notwithstanding been included in the work as forming a cheerful contrast to his own subsequent mode of expressing himself towards persons of rank." It is certain that never in his life was Beethoven capable of writing such correct German as in this dedication, and still less could he have ever thought of such old-fashioned bombastic stuff. With regard, however, to "his mode of expressing himself towards persons of rank," his letter to the King of Prussia (381 of the collection) referring to the dedication of the Ninth Symphony, is merely couched in that altered tone naturally required by the lapse of half-a-century. His letters also to Count Hatzfeldt, to Prince Lichnowsky, to the Countess Kinsky, and, moreover, his recently published letters to the Arch-Duke Rudolph, prove that Beethoven could behave to the great ones of this earth just as other mortals do, who want something from them, or owe them something. That he was as little able to restrain his violent temper in his intercourse with princes as in his dealings with domestics is quite another thing.

The letters to his youthful friends, male and female, Wegeler and von Breuning (already made known to us by Wegeler) are far from numerous—but they produce a pleasing impression when they first appear in the year 1798 and finally a few weeks previous to the master's death in 1827. As Beethoven himself confessed, he must have committed many a wrong against these two friends of his, but the deep and cordial attachment he preserves for them, despite everything, after all their separations both mental and actual, touches us the more, because we fancy we can perceive in it the love, which was never extinguished, for his Rhenish home, and his grateful reminiscences of the first years of his youth. Beethoven's relations with Ries and the letters addressed to the latter are, likewise, already known. People have sometimes felt inclined to blame Ries for the rather unfriendly tone that now and then peeps forth in his Mittheilungen. But it must be confessed, that, if Beethoven assisted Ries at the outset in Vienna, and granted him the distinction of calling himself his pupil, Ries, up to the very last, displayed the most self-sacrificing alacrity in doing whatever lay in his power to serve his master. From the very first letter, in which Ries is ordered to correct parts (1801), up to the last which is given, of the year 1823, the pupil is always employed on the master's business, procuring commissions for work, obtaining payment, as well as undertaking performances with restless obligingness and assiduity. For this, a few friendly observations concerning his compositions are now and then graciously vouchsafed him, but the Master never gets as far as to dedicate, as he frequently hinted that he would, a work to Ries's wife. It is quite right, but still a fact to which we must direct particular attention, that Beethoven required a very great deal from his friends—there appears to be a certain heroic and also domineering egotism in the disposition of great, and also, sometimes, of little, geniuses.

There is, moreover, a series of notes to a first-rate dilettante, Zmeskall von Domanowecz, running through the whole time of Beethoven's stay in Vienna. The good man has to do all sorts of things, and is always humorously treated. The humor in the Master's letters, and in some musical jokes of his, affords, however, no idea of that which gushes forth in his compositions. They are exceedingly cheap specimens of wit, which may have been pleasant enough at the moment they were thought of and uttered, but which are ill-calculated to bear immortality. It is for this very reason, probably, that they are the more characteristic.

This is, perhaps, the place to mention the numerous notes addressed to Schindler. It is true that Schindler was, ex professo, "l'ami de Beethoven," but, in reality, nothing more than a factotum graciously patronized by the latter. The most varied commissions of every kind are condescendingly entrusted to him, while now and then he is read a lesson to the tune of: "Where is your judgment? Where it always is," etc.

That Beethoven in the course of years exhibit a kind of thankful partiality towards this indefatigable man, though he sometimes speaks in Heaven knows what terms of him, is a fact which we will as little deny as that the immortal "ami" enjoyed the privilege of gaining a deep insight into Beethoven's material circumstances and condition. Did he do any more? In a letter to the Rev. Herr Amenda, whom Beethoven appears really to have loved, we read the following words, which, though it is true they are not applied to Schindler, are highly characteristic: "I look upon him and — as mere instruments, on which, when it pleases me, I play; I value them according to what they do for me." This is, at least, very frank.

From friendship to love is but one step—les extrêmes se touchent. The letter written on two successive days to the Countess Giulietta Guicciardi is here given, we are informed by the Editor, "with diplomatic exactness"—with extreme exactness let us hope. It concludes with the words: "Ever thine, ever mine, ever each others," * as a postscript, and contains the everlasting "joy Heaven-loud, but sorrowful as death" of all lovers, though, it is true, not couched in German that Goethe would have written. A year after all these "evers," the said Countess Guicciardi was the wife of Count Gallenberg. Beethoven dedicated to her the celebrated C sharp minor Sonata—"quasi fantasia."

"God, how I love you" are the words, also, at the conclusion of the last of the three letters communicated by Bettina herself, to whom they were addressed. Their genuineness has been greatly doubted—Herr Nohl is of opinion that, after the publication of Beethoven's other letters, such doubts are no longer possible. I confess, with all humility, that their linguistic form is a complete riddle for me. His short intercourse with Bettina must have exerted an extraordinary effect upon Beethoven, as far as language was concerned, and that effect must have been at work while he was writing to her, but for those few moments only. As regards the contents, that is often queer enough. "Your approbation is dearer to me than aught else on earth," says Beethoven to Bettina. Further on we read: "when two such persons as I and Goethe come together." It might at least be: Goethe and I! The oft-cited story, however, to the effect that Beethoven, as he was taking a walk with Goethe in Töplitz, frayed himself a passage, "with his arms folded and his hat upon his head, through the thickest throng of the Imperial family" and, "to his great amusement, sees Goethe, with his hat off, standing and bowing deeply on one side"—this rhodomontade, I say, has enjoyed too much honor, when people wanted to regard it as a proof Beethoven's republican feeling and Goethe's servile nature,† for, at the same moment, Beethoven boasts that: "Duke Rudolph took his hat off to me, the Emperor bowed first—these high personages know me:" a fact to which he evidently, therefore, attaches no small value. Can we now believe it true that he afterwards: "rapped Goethe (the great Goethe, his Excellency Herr von Goethe, Minister of State, and then sixty-two) over the knuckles, and reproached him with his sins, especially those against Bettina?" Perhaps we can, worse luck. But what do we not pardon in a Beethoven—and a Bettina?

(To be Continued.)

* "etwig was" (sic), in the original.

† On it being subsequently proved in court that, despite the Von in his name, Beethoven did not belong to a noble family, he said: "The burgher should be separated from the higher man, and I have fallen beneath him."

Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst.

(From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.)

Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst, "the pale faced" violinist, one of the most brilliant virtuoses of the most brilliant concert-epoch, died at Nice, on the 8th of October. He was born in the year 1814, and at an early age exhibited extraordinary talent. His father took him to Böhm, the then very celebrated professor of the Conservatory, Vienna. Böhm, an amiable man, full of enthusiasm for his art, soon perceived how great a future was in store for the boy, and acknowledged that, though the latter might learn music from him, he was already nearly his equal in practical skill. Ernst made a professional tour, and ended by settling in Paris, where he remained some years. He then commenced, without fixing his quarters anywhere, his travels, which were terminated only by his continually increasing attacks of illness. His most brilliant period began in 1840. Beriot was then in Vienna, achieving a tremendous success with his endless "airs variés," and his "tremolo" on the theme from Beethoven (out of the Kreutzer Sonata), when Ernst appeared, played the "Otello Fantasia," the "Elegie," and the "Carnaval de Venise," and with these compositions excited among the Viennese a degree of enthusiasm that spread far beyond the limits of the monarchy. His journey resembled a series of triumphs, bringing in pecuniary profit as well as fame. Ernst, who possessed a thoroughly good heart, did not save, and, on one occasion, sacrificed a very large sum to preserve from ruin a person nearly connected with him. When he was near forty, a diminution in his power and likewise in his success became apparent. The "Carnaval de Venise" which he still played, had lost a great deal of its attraction, and, in addition to this, Ernst's execution became more and more uncertain, his tone more and more effeminate; seldom did the old fire, the pristine energy, burst forth, though, when it did, he was incomparable—a spring of deep, fervid feeling gushed forth with his tones, and profound was the emotion of those who listened to them. When past forty, he married Mlle. Siona Levy, a French, and not, as most of the papers have announced, an English lady. Young and talented, Madame Ernst still entertained the idea of devoting herself to the stage; at least as late as 1853, she gave a dramatic performance at Braden, reciting several scenes and poems à la Rachel. Ernst, who kept growing worse (he was then suffering from gout, which eventually turned to paralysis of the spinal marrow), was a great deal in London, where he played frequently in quartets as no one had played before him; but he, also, paid visits to the other towns of England, and was always well received. At length his remaining strength failed, his violin was dumb—and this severed the nerve of his life, for, had his pecuniary circumstances been better, he would inevitably have perished of grief; Death released him.

Ernst was a truly inspired artist, a man of kindly disposition, rather passive than energetic, more subject to an impression than able to rule it, but full of good nature, and a stranger to intrigue and envy. Few men understood as he did how to repair a wrong committed. If he had hurt anyone's amour propre, he seized every opportunity of proving how much he himself suffered. A younger generation is now growing up, for whom Ernst's personal character is a thing of the Past, a generation that finds satisfaction only in publicity and in great celebrity. Could one of the younger men belonging to it have seen Ernst in his good days, he might have learned that there is in the disposition of a man a something for the absence of which nothing can compensate, a something which still supports the true artist long after the sayings and doings of the world have ceased to exist for him.

(From the Athenæum.)

The long agony—for to such did the last years of Herr Ernst's life amount—is at last over. His career of suffering closed at Nice on the 8th of this month. This is one of the cases in which departure can only be welcomed as relief. His long-protracted bodily pain had been long known to be past the power of medicine to alleviate; and it is to be feared that the princely munificence with which the artist dispersed the gains made by him during his career of public exhibition, left him to face sickness in its most depressing form, under narrow circumstances. It may be added, however, that the active kindness of those to whom his admirable qualities had endeared him failed him not to the last.

A more amiable man never breathed than Ernst; nor one of a better heart, a finer intelligence, and a more generous and unenvying nature. A certain languor of temperament, approaching to indolence, and of late years aggravated by illness, prevented him from doing full justice to his powers, either as a creative musician or a member of society; but his friends will recollect him not merely by his nobility of nature, incapable of intrigue, jealousy and suspicion, but also by his quick and delicate sense of humor. As an artist he cannot be overrated among the violinists.

At the moment of writing we are without any biographical data to tell us under whom Ernst, born in 1814, at Brunn, in Moravia, acquired his mastery over his instrument,—a mastery, however, accompanied by a singular drawback, which was probably organic,—not a defect arising from incomplete study. During his entire career, Ernst was always more or less liable to play out of tune; in this resembling the greatest singer of modern times, Pasta, who could not, even by her indefatigable industry and indomitable will, control her tendency to imperfect intonation. In his best days, Ernst's tone was rich and grandiose, with a touch in it of that vibratory Italian quality, characterizing Paganini and the players of the Southern school, as distinguished from the more solid—perhaps less expressive—countrymen and followers of Spohr. If we mistake not (but the facts fall back upon, we repeat, are singularly meagre), Ernst made himself a hearing, even in the teeth of the frenetic success which attended Paganini: and this, in some degree, by meeting the wonderful Genoese virtuoso on his own ground. Less perfect in his polish, less unimpeachable in the diamond lustre and clearness of his tone, than De Beriot, Ernst had as much elegance as that exquisite violinist, with greater depth of feeling. Less audaciously inventive and extravagant than Paganini, he was sounder in taste, and, in his music, with no lack of fantasy, more scientific in construction. He wrote for his instrument too sparingly, owing to the placid carelessness of his nature, of which mention has been made, but the great concert pieces will stand. The allegro of his unfinished Concerto in F sharp minor, of an almost insurmountable technical difficulty, is based on those clear, impassioned and noble phrases, and conducted with a thorough science which ensure its permanence in the repertory of violinists of the very highest class. Probably there is no movement of its length which has lasted so long, and, had so deservedly wide a currency as his Elegie. Of Ernst's stringed Quartets, and his grand violin studies, we were speaking only the other day.

The secret, however of Ernst's success, whether as a composer or a virtuoso, lay in his expressive power and accent. There has been nothing to exceed these as exhibited by him in his best days. The passion was carried to the utmost point, but "never torn to tatters,"—the freest use of tempo rubato permitted, but always within the limits of the most just regulation. This is an excellence granted to few, measured abandonment (if such a term may be employed) being one of the rarest graces in Art. Those who have exhibited it in perfection could almost be counted off on the ten fingers. Ernst possessed it in the highest degree. We recall certain of his cadenzas (one especially, to Meyerbeer's graceful, varied air in E major), certain readings (as those of Beethoven's Second Razumouffsky Quartet, and of the Cavatina in his posthumous Quartet in B major; of Mendelssohn's Quartet in E minor, and the adagio of his posthumous Quintet), which "stand out," after their kind, as distinct and superior as anything to be cited in our not too long list of first-class musical treasures. There is none of the exaggeration which the death of a great man is too apt to awake in the above praise. As an example of certain of the very highest qualities which can be combined in a musical poet and interpreter, Ernst must always be rated, if not the first, among the first.

Report of the Musical Committee

At the Tenth Exhibition of the Mass. Charitable Mechanic Association.

The Committee on Piano-fortes and other Musical Instruments would respectfully report that the following articles have been examined by them, viz.:

- 1154. Violin, guitar, and banjo, I. H. Arey, Boston, N. H.
- 1265. One piano, Hazelton Bros., Boston.
- 1311. Organ Pipes, Samuel Pierre, Reading.
- 1371. One violin, John White, Boston.
- 1378. Piano-forte action, C. C. Ryder, Boston.
- 1382. Carved piano-forte, Paul, Humphrey & Co., Boston.
- 1461. Four violins, Daniel Dunbar, Boston.
- 1535. Cabinet-organs, Mason & Hamlin, Boston.
- 1540. Twelve pianos, Chickering & Sons, Boston.
- 1547. Three pianos, Geo. M. Guild & Co., Boston.
- 1563. Two piano-fortes, Parkinson & Sons.
- 1573. Nine piano-fortes, Hallett, Davis & Co., Boston.
- 1590. Two piano-fortes, G. A. Miller & Co., Boston.
- 1604. Piano-fortes, McPhail & Co., Boston.
- 1614. Pedal-piano, J. W. Brackett, Boston.
- 1661. Piano-forte, Wm. B. Bradbury, New York.
- 1675. Pianino, J. W. Brackett, Boston.
- 51. Two prs. Cymbals, Carl Lehnert, Boston.
- 51. One B-flat and one E-flat Cornet, B. F. Richardson, Boston.
- 66. Musical Instruments, E. G. Wright & Co., Boston.
- 288. Case musical instruments, Henry Lehnert, Boston.

Your Committee feel deeply sensible of the delicate nature of the duty they have undertaken to perform. If it were the ordinary case of the inspection of ingenious mechanism or rare workmanship, it would be comparatively easy to decide upon competing claims; but the construction of musical instruments requires not only mechanical skill, but knowledge of acoustics, appreciation of musical quality of tone, and the adaptation of all the parts to the production of artistic effects.

Without disparaging any purely mechanical labor, or setting up any undue claims for this branch of art, your committee think it would be difficult to name any department of industry for which is requisite so much pains in selection of material, such experience and judgment in construction, such delicate perception of musical tone, in fine such thorough union of mechanical skill and æsthetic taste as is employed in the manufacture of musical instruments.

Your committee are satisfied that there has been in no branch of mechanical industry a more steady and rapid progress. The power and scope of the piano-forte, its resonance, the ease and rapidity of its action, and delicacy of touch, have constantly improved, until it may safely be assumed that the most indifferent maker surpasses in many respects the efforts of the most celebrated names of a quarter of a century ago. One change in the scale of those of recent date, however, is, in one respect, of questionable benefit. We refer to the mode of adjusting the strings at different angles of tension, popularly known as the "over-strung" scales. Increased power is undoubtedly gained in this way, but at the cost of all evenness of tone; in passing from one group of strings to the next, the points of intersection are readily detected by the most ordinary ear, and the transition is as unpleasant as the breaks between the registers of an uncultivated voice.

Your committee, being fully aware that it has been common among interested people to depreciate the value of honorary awards by alleging that they are obtained by favoritism, or that committees commence their examinations under the influence of invincible prejudice, determined to anticipate such criticism by giving an unquestionable guaranty of fairness. Before making any examination of the competing piano-fortes, they requested the management to cover the names on the front, to arrange the instruments without method, and to leave only a dim light in the exhibition room. This order was strictly carried out, and your committee made their examination in a darkened room without the possibility of knowing the makers of the instruments they were deciding upon. Whatever may be the worth of the judgment which they now give to the management, it is certain that it was made without any prompting of interest, prejudice or bias.

The committee recommend the following awards: To Messrs. Chickering & Sons for the best Grand Piano-forte, the first Silver Medal. To the same for a fine Semi-Grand, a Silver Medal.

To Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., for a very superior Grand Piano-forte, the second Silver Medal. To the same for a fine Small Grand a Silver Medal.

To Messrs. Chickering & Sons for their upright Piano-fortes, a Silver Medal.

To the same for the best Square Piano-forte, the first Silver Medal.

To Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., for a very excellent Square Piano-forte, the second Silver Medal.

To Messrs. George M. Guild & Co., for a Square Piano, a Bronze Medal.

To Messrs. A. M. McPhail & Co., for a Square Piano-forte, a Bronze Medal.

To G. A. Miller & Co., for a Square Piano-forte, a Bronze Medal.

To J. W. Brackett, for his Pedal Piano-forte for Organ practice, a Diploma.

To Hazelton Brothers, for Square Piano, a Diploma.

To Paul, Humphrey & Co., for Square Piano, a Diploma.

To Parkinson & Sons, for Square Piano, a Diploma.

To W. B. Bradbury, for Square Piano, a Diploma.

To the United Piano-forte Makers, for Square Piano, a Diploma.

The instruments made by Messrs. Chickering and Sons your committee consider as being very remarkable for their excellence, even when compared with the exhibitions of former years.

Their Grand Piano-fortes are eminently satisfactory, so perfect indeed that it may be difficult for a long time to make any decided improvement either in evenness of scale, brilliancy, fullness and fluency of tone, elasticity of touch, ease and promptness of action, or in the special singing quality which so many modern compositions require.

Your committee especially designate No. 28065 as having, in their judgment, the sweetest tone, and as being the most desirable instrument for the drawing room; they also mention No. 28050 as a Piano-forte of extraordinary power, with a richness and pungency of tone and decision of action that would be very effective in the concert room.

The upright Piano-fortes of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, when the inherent difficulties of construction are considered, are even more praiseworthy. The improvement in these instruments is marked. The "jangle" as well as the metallic jar, which haunted them of old, has disappeared, and they "damp" almost as promptly as their great rivals. In quality of tone they are delightful, and they will undoubtedly come more into favor, especially with those who have not room for the larger instruments. The one especially commended by the Committee is No. 28321.

Two Square Piano-fortes of Messrs. Chickering & Sons at first about equally divided the judgment of your Committee, viz: Nos. 28293 and 28340. The preference was finally given to the first named for superior richness of tone, while the latter was allowed to be more fluent and more brilliant.

The Grand Piano-fortes of Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., have many very admirable features; they have a great body of tone and are especially commended for their fine touch and their beautiful singing quality.

The Square Piano of the same makers, No. 12790, was very much admired. It has great fullness, depth and mellowness of tone, and in certain grave styles of music would probably be unexcelled by any similar instrument on exhibition.

In the department of reed instruments there was but one entry—the Cabinet Organs of Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, and the Committee, in consideration of the valuable improvements known as the "Automatic Swell" and the "Combination Register," as well as of the excellence of tone and beautiful workmanship displayed in these instruments, recommend the award of a silver medal.

The Committee further recommend an award — To Messrs. E. G. Wright & Co., for a full set of Brass Instruments of superior tone and workmanship, the first silver medal.

To Henry Lehnert for smaller Brass Instruments, and for improved Alto Horn, the second silver medal.

To Carl Lehnert, for fine toned Cymbals, a diploma.

To B. F. Richardson, for Silver Cornet, a bronze medal.

To Samuel Pierce, for beautifully made Organ Pipes, a bronze medal.

To John White, for a Violin, a diploma.

To Messrs. E. G. Wright & Co., for newly invented Book-Rack, a diploma.

To Edward L. Balch, for specimens of Musical Typography, a diploma.

The Committee would remark that most of the violins were so completely out of order that they could form no judgment concerning them.

F. H. UNDERWOOD,	E. L. HOLBROOK,
CHAS. J. CAPEN,	GEO. W. HARRIS,
STEPHEN R. CLAPP,	WM. H. GOODWIN,
GEO. J. WEBB,	CARL ZERRAHN,
H. WARE,

The Committee after having made the foregoing award guided by a construction of the rules which in the opinion of many of their number allowed no proper recognition of the merits of the instruments, and no adequate award for improvements, desire to express to the Government of the Association their opinion that the highest honor is much more appropriate for such a magnificent Grand Piano-forte as has been named for the first prize. They venture to suggest that at future exhibitions the rules may be modified so as to allow greater freedom to Committees on Musical Instruments; and that the results of so many years of experience, the products of so much skill and taste, be not put on the same plane with purely mechanical works such as every household contains. And as the principles of justice as to awards are of no day or time, they respectfully urge that the Executive Committee will consider the matter at the present Exhibition, and they would request the Government to grant a Gold Medal for the best Grand Piano-forte to Messrs. Chickering & Sons, instead of the first Silver Medal awarded:—a Gold Medal to Messrs. Mason & Hamlin for their Cabinet Organs, in place of the Silver Medal;—and a Gold Medal to Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., for the marked improvement in all the Piano-fortes exhibited by them,—this last to take the place of the Silver Medal awarded for their Grand Piano-fortes.

F. H. UNDERWOOD,	WM. H. GOODWIN,
CHAS. J. CAPEN,	GEO. J. WEBB,
H. WARE,	STEPHEN R. CLAPP,
GEO. W. HARRIS,	CARL ZERRAHN,
E. L. HOLBROOK,

Musical Correspondence.

AMONG THE ALPS.—RECOLLECTIONS OF MUSIC IN DRESDEN.

MONTREUX, LAKE OF GENEVA, OCT. 1865.—Sadly pressed for time before leaving Dresden, as well as during the constant travel and moving about which has been my pleasant lot for the last month or six weeks, I should have found it next to impossible to fulfil my duties as correspondent, had I even had material for writing. But while revelling in Nature's choicest beauties, the lovely Swiss lakes, the glories of the Bernese Oberland, Chamouny, with its stupendous surroundings, ending off with this calm, peaceful East shore of beautiful Lake Lemman, it has not been my good fortune to hear a note of music worth recording. One exception, indeed, was made, by a little incident which was refreshing enough to me, though hardly of general interest, except to show what we may hear in Europe quite unexpectedly. You may judge how delightful it was, after a ten or twelve hours pedestrian excursion from Interlaken, to sit quietly in the parlor of the hotel at evening, listening to the very superior rendering, by an amateur young lady from Vienna, of compositions by Schumann, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and last but not least, of a Sonata (I forget which, but a difficult one) and the 32 Variations of Beethoven, and all without notes! To my infinite regret, unavoidable circumstances prevented my hearing the Freiburg organ, of which I had hoped to give you a glowing account. It was a great disappointment, but I trust the time may yet come when I can make up for my loss.

Meanwhile, not to leave you too long without some intelligence, I cannot do better than tell you something about the state of music in Dresden, as I intended to do before I left that place, and as far as I can judge of it from my own experience. The opera is, on the whole, very good, though some of the principalsingers are not as young as they might be. The veteran among them is TICHATSCHKE, who, though between 50 and 60 years old, has still a wonderful voice. In his prime the latter was considered one of the most beautiful tenors in the world, and I well remember the deep impression it made upon even my childish mind, when I first heard him, years ago. He has used his voice well, and now, though of course it has lost much of its sweetness and freshness, it is still very powerful, true, clear and flexible. He still fills the hero parts, and is able to sing any role he ever sang. His acting, which was always stiff and awkward, has not improved, and the want of grace and ease, which youthful freshness and manly vigor could make one overlook, becomes too conspicuous in a man of his age. Far better preserved is MITTERWURZER, who is, indeed, considerably younger. His voice is truly superb; so powerful, so rich and expressive! His acting, too, is faultless, so that it is a real delight to hear and see him. He throws himself thoroughly into every part he acts, and, although of too stout and massive a frame for beauty, he looks his parts as well as he acts them. Since the sad loss of SCHNORR VON CARLSFELD, whom, to my great regret, I never heard, and who was as true an artist and as great a singer as Mitterwurzer, no other tenor had been appointed in his place, and various individuals were starting on trial. I have not heard whether the matter has since been decided. Of the other male singers no one deserves particular mention.

The prima donnas are Mme. BURDE-NEY and Mme. JANNER-KRALL. The former is also verging on the superannuated, but her voice is still very beautiful, and her singing and acting extremely fine. Her exterior, however, which can never be other than unprepossessing, is rendered so very much so by advancing years, that in some roles, where she represents lovely young girls, the effect is truly ridiculous. Just the opposite is Mad. Janner-Krall, a most charming little creature, full of youthful freshness, archness, and sparkling naïveté. Her stock of roles is, of course, entirely different from that of Mad. Burde-Ney; she sings chiefly the lighter parts, although she occasionally undertakes more serious ones, and with much success. Her voice is an exquisite, clear, rich, high soprano, very flexible, and thoroughly at her command. A third singer, said to be of merit in bravura parts, is Fräulein HÄRNISCH, whom, however, I never happened to hear.

The choruses are excellent, and the orchestra under the direction of KREBS and RIETZ, is, as any musical person knows, justly celebrated for its superiority. I was much disappointed that no concert was given by this royal orchestra while I remained in Dresden, but it was not the season for any of their regular concerts, and there was probably no occasion for an extra one. I heard, however, the Tannhäuser Overture from them as I have never heard it before. The repertoire of the opera is very varied, and there are about three representations a week, alternating with those of the drama. During the two months I spent in Dresden, the repertoire comprised the following operas: Tannhäuser, Huguenots, Don Juan, Fidelio, Gounod's Faust, Dinorah, Robert le Diable, "Daughter of the Regiment," Lucia, Trovanore, Sonnambula, Spontini's Fernando Cortez, Marschner's "Templar and Jewess," etc. I was much interested in hearing the two last mentioned, as both were new to me, and I had never heard anything by Spontini, and only an overture or two by Marschner. Both were very effective, and were put upon the stage brilliantly. Tichatschek as Cortez, Janner-Krall as Amazili, the Mexican maiden, and Mitterwurzer as the Mexican chief, Telasco, were all excellent. The music is gorgeous; no other word so well expresses its quality. Marx, in his Musical Recollections, denotes a couple of very interesting chapters to Spontini. Among other anecdotes he tells one of Zelter, who, after hearing one of Spontini's operas, spoke of the tattoo as "gentle music." Marx adds: "Poor unfortunate; he had not heard any of Meyerbeer's music!" and we might add Wagner's! I had always heard of Spontini's music as exceedingly noisy, but, probably because I was familiar with Meyerbeer and Wagner, it did not strike me particularly so, and I was far more impressed by its richness of coloring, and its fulness of instrumentation. It is certainly original too, as well as vigorous, and totally different in character from all the modern Italian music. But on the other hand it is not so full of flowing melodies as the latter, and would not perhaps be as pleasing to ears that are tickled by them. Still I should consider it quite a safe experiment for a manager to bring out Cortez in America; I am sure it would prove quite as attractive if not more so, than many operas which are produced there.

The same might be said of Marschner's Templar and Jewess, which I found exceedingly attractive and full of fine effects. As the title indicates, the plot is taken from "Ivanhoe," quite well worked up, and cannot fail to interest every one to whom that pearl of romances is dear and familiar, and to whom it is not? Tichatschek, to be sure, was a sadly unpoetic representative of the "Desdichado," an incongruity to which even his fine voice could hardly reconcile one. This too, is the case with Burde-Ney, whose faded exterior cruelly marred all the romantic ideas one had ever formed of the beautiful Rebecca; but if these characters rather put illusion to sleep, it was awakened again by Mitterwurzer, who looked and acted the proud and passionate Brian de Bois Guilbert to perfection. I have never seen a finer representation of any character, and if I add to this his excellent rendering of the really fine music, you can imagine that I enjoy a rare artistic treat. The opera is full of fine melodies, the choruses and other concerted pieces are splendidly worked up, and the music of the whole abounds in freshness and vigor, and is by no means devoid of originality. The mise-en-scène, too, can be made very effective; the scene of the ordeal, for instance, with all the templars assembled, in the uniform of their order, etc., is very picturesque, as are, indeed, all the requisite costumes. Though the romantic element preponderates, the comic is not forgotten, and Friar Tuck and Wamba have their place in the array of familiar characters which appear, while the Black Knight and Locksley are by no means forgotten.

As I mentioned above, the season at which we were in Dresden was unfavorable for hearing superior concert music, though there was not a day in the week when one could not attend a cheap concert at one of the many gardens in the charming environs of the city, or on Brühl's Terrace, so incomparable for its lovely situation. At many of these concerts one could hear the best of music, symphonies, overtures, etc., very well played, though Dresden can boast of no orchestra like Liebig's, with the exception, of course, of the royal chapel. The choir of the Catholic church, too, though so celebrated, cannot, in my opinion, be compared to the Domchor in Berlin; the masses performed are seldom of any musical worth, and they are sung in a careless, hurried, mechanical manner, the voices often being overpowered by the organ and orchestra, so that the earnest music-lover can really derive but little pleasure and satisfaction from hearing them. But I must close; my next will, if nothing unforeseen occurs, be from Italy, when I shall have a flood of new impressions to record, in music as in everything else. X.

NEW YORK, NOV. 21.—The first Philharmonic concert of this season took place on the fourth of November. Here is the programme:

Symphony, No. 4, Op. 120, in D Minor.... R. Schumann.
Romance, from Euryanthe, "Unter blühenden Mandelbäumen,"..... C. M. Von Weber.
Concerto posth., in C, for Piano and Orchestra (first time)..... Signor Lotti.
Allegro. 3 Adagio. 8 Rondo.
(Cadenza by Kalkbrenner).
Mazepa, Poème Symphonique, (first time),..... F. Liszt.
Romance from Don Sebastian, "Deserto in terra,"..... Donizetti.
Etude in C sharp minor..... Chopin.
Tarentelle, No. 2..... B. B. Mills.
Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, in C..... Beethoven.

Schumann's lovely Symphony in D minor was received by the public with enthusiasm. It is gratifying to see how Schumann's genius has gradually made its way here; and every year adds new admirers to the large circle that already appreciates his works.

There are many opinions regarding Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazepa." While some place it above a Beethoven Symphony, others would gladly banish it from our concert programmes. We do not regard this work as a composition which it is worth while to fight for or against; it is a gathering together of those material means which our time so abundantly presents, often artistically and intelligently used by the composer. But take it all together, it is a coarse tone-picture, and we are rejoiced, when, having rushed with Mazepa on the wild horse over hill and valley and wood and steppe, we find ourselves at home among the Tartars, and follow lustily along to the interesting march.

Beethoven's Leonore overture, we need hardly say, never fails to create a deep impression.

We were a little surprised to find MILLS, who has grown up among the most tremendous difficulties of modern piano-forte technique, appearing as an interpreter of a Mozart Concerto. And he had to bear not a few reproaches from those who are greedy for novelty, and who possess short memories in artistic affairs. We were delighted with the choice, the performance, and work, especially the very beautiful Adagio. The Mozartian euphony has its own difficulty; it is decorated with passages and ornament that must be given freely, purely, with finish and clearness; it is filled up with harmonic details, which must be brought out without pretention. The orchestral accompaniment sounded finely, and under BERGMANN'S careful direction all its beauties had full justice done them. Herr LOTTI was hoarse, and did not appear; so the vocal part of the programme was null and void.

On the eleventh of November, THEODORE THOMAS'S first Symphony Soirée took place. Here is the programme:

Symphony, No. 4, Op. 60 B flat major. . . . . Beethoven.
Scena, Cavatina and Aria, "O prete di Dalm," (Prophet).
Meyerbeer.

Mme. Fleury-Urban.
Allegro de Concert, Op. 46. . . . . Chopin.
Mr. Wm. Mason.

Mazepa (Symphonic Poem) . . . . . Liszt.
Aria, "Il malme," Les Dragons de Villars, . . . . . Maillart.
Mme. Fleury-Urban.

Invitation to the Dance. . . . . Weber.
Arranged for Orchestra by Berlioz.

Beethoven's Symphony was very finely played by the orchestra (60 performers) on this occasion, and greatly enjoyed by the public, as also was the case with Berlioz's genial instrumentation of Weber's "Invitation to the dance." Mme. FLEURY-URBAN, the songstress of the occasion, has a good voice, but not much school. Her means were insufficient for the first air she executed, but the second was a less ambitious choice. Mr. MASON played a seldom heard work of Chopin, which deserves greater popularity in the concert room. This interesting soirée gave general satisfaction.

A new violin player, JEHIN PRUME, nephew of the distinguished virtuoso and composer for the violin, Francois Prume, gave a concert here on the eighteenth. Mr. Prume's playing in a great measure belongs to De Beriot's school. He unites great technical dexterity to a pure and elegant tone in cantabile movements, which swells to a fine breadth when necessary. We were especially pleased with his execution of Ernst's "Elegy" and Prume's "Melancolie," in both of which he displayed fine phrasing, and broad, intelligent expression, while we admired the ease of his bowing; and his uncommon facility had full opportunity for display in the inevitable virtuoso show pieces, a fantastic Scherzo of Bazzini, a Fantaisie by Leonard on the "Austrian Hymn," and the "Carnival of Venice." Would that the artist had a little æsthetic repose of personal manner! If we look at him while he plays, we imagine that the simplest passage must cost him immense pains to produce, and when real difficulties are in question, it seems as if his whole body was continually on the point of flying away with his bow. At the same time we do not doubt but that Mr. Prume is moved by genuine feeling when enticing such artistic tones from his violin, and such is the impression he makes on all who hear him; he deserves to meet with remarkable success here. This artist was assisted by the pianist, MILLS, who, in Liszt's fine "Racoczy March," played with great fire and execution, and in a Faust fantasia of his own—somewhat tedious, and thankless for an audience, although cleverly put together—displayed his eminent technical ability. Miss ZELDA HARRISON, élève of Mrs. Seguin, (said the bills) and Mr. WEEKS, pupil of Mr. Rivardo (ditto), also assisted. Whether élève or pupil was the more distingué we will not decide.

LANCELOT.

A NEW OPERA HOUSE.

DAYTON, O., Nov. 3.—It will, no doubt, be interesting to many of your readers—as an evidence of musical progress—to know that Dayton is soon to have a new opera house, and one, too, equal in all respects to anything of the same extent in the country.

The size of the building is 100 x 126 feet, fronting on Main and First Streets, with a height of 100 feet. The audience room is about 90 feet square, with a ceiling 42 feet to the base of the dome. The stage is 36 by 84 feet, with the usual proscenium boxes, lobbies, &c. It will have seats for 1800 in balcony, parquette and dress circle. The usual gallery has been dispensed with, to the great beauty of the house, and the comfort of the audience. The lobbies, aisles, &c., are large and spacious, and there will be no difficulty in finding room for 2500 persons on grand occasions.

Opening out from the main entrance hall, is a large waiting, or promenade room, where conversation and flirting can be carried on without disturbing the audience. This is a feature that must prove very attractive, especially to that large class who frequent the opera for any other reason than their fondness for music.

The green room and dressing rooms are ample and conveniently located, with private entrances to each. Indeed, it would be difficult to find anywhere a better arranged opera house than this.

The foot lights of the stage are sunk below the floor and covered with glass—so that those pleasant little affairs of burning up ballet girls will probably never be witnessed in our opera house. The main body of the house is lighted by some 32 large ground glass globes inserted in the ceiling, above which, and of course out of sight, are placed parabolic reflectors, like the head-lights of locomotive engines, flooding the whole apartment with a soft and beautiful light. This is a great improvement on the old bracket, or side light arrangement—as no gas flames are visible, though the whole will be as light as day. The effect on the audience will be very beautiful.

The ceiling, dome, &c., are exquisitely frescoed by that excellent artist, Signor Pedretti of Cincinnati, who has acquitted himself with great credit, and shown himself, what his friends long knew him to be, not only a thorough master of his art, but a designer of much skill and taste.

For all this temple of beauty and art, the citizens of Dayton, and the musical world at large, are indebted to the liberality and public spirit of one firm—Messrs. J. M. Turner & Bro.—who have built it of their own free will and accord, and as an investment, which it is to be hoped may prove amply remunerative. Its cost will be about a quarter of a million of dollars.

The exterior of the building is very harmonious. Its general style is Romanesque, with a mansard roof, with cornice of very handsome proportions. The principal front, on Main Street, is of Ohio river sandstone, the most beautiful building material, all things considered, in the United States. The front on 1st St. is of brick, with Ohio river stone dressing. The entrance is on this side through a fine Moorish arch and doorway.

The first story is devoted to Mercury, being divided into five spacious and elegant store rooms, which, no doubt, will prove the best paying part of the investment. But all above belongs to the muses.

No definite arrangements have been made for the inauguration of this house. It will be completed about the middle of next month, and it is not unlikely that Forrest may play a short engagement about the holidays. It is said that he has expressed a desire to do so, as he made his "first appearance on any stage," in an old two story brick, erected in 1832, in the opposite corner from the Opera House. Musical people would regret this. So beautiful a specimen of art, should be first introduced to the public with music and song.

Lest some of your readers might not know where DAYTON is, it may be well to add, that it is the county seat of Montgomery Co., 60 miles north of Cincinnati at the confluence of the Great Miami and Mad rivers. Standing as it does in the midst of the Miami valley—the best agricultural region for its extent in the world, it is not strange, that it is one of the finest inland cities in the West. It has about 30,000 inhabitants, the majority of whom are "well to do," and all, with scarce an exception, comfortable, good livers. It is no exaggeration to say that there are fewer needy people in Dayton than in any city of its size on the continent. Such a thing as a beggar is seldom seen in her streets.

Though in the midst of so fine an agricultural district, the principal business of Dayton is manufacturing. Her establishments of that kind are equal to any in the West except those of Pittsburgh and Cincinnati.

A. Q. Z.

CHICAGO, Nov. 17.—The event of the last ten days has been the debut of Grau's Opera Company—a company, with but two or three exceptions, made up entirely of singers new to America—and we are glad to say that it has achieved in most respects a complete success.

We confess to have been somewhat disappointed as regards chorus and orchestra, after reading Mr. Grau's announcement, but they have both improved since the first night.

As regards the principal artists, they have already created a very favorable impression, almost, if not quite, equal to that made by Maretzek's Company last Spring.

The opera selected for the opening night was, of course (!), Il Trovatore. It had a strong cast, but was sung with little spirit, owing probably to it being the first appearance of the company. Since then the following operas have been given in their order: Faust, Ernani, Lucia, Traviata, Favorita and Martha.

NOEL-GUIDI made her debut in Trovatore and has since appeared in Ernani and Lucia. She makes a fine appearance on the stage, possessing a good figure and striking features. Her voice is a pure, rich soprano of good register. Her lower and upper notes are especially rich, her mezzo voice not being as good. Her delivery is easy and artistic, and she evinces also great dramatic power. Her reception here has been most favorable and we predict for her a gratifying success in this country.

Mrs. BOSCHETTI has appeared in Faust, Traviata, and Martha. She has a clear and sympathetic voice, her lower notes being her best. In the delivery of her upper notes, the effect of straining her voice is produced. Boschetti gives us the German conception of Marguerite, she having studied the part under Gounod; but, while rendering due praise both to her singing and acting, we cannot forget the charming Miss Kellogg in this, her greatest part. Boschetti appeared to better advantage in Traviata and Martha, in both of which she sang and acted with much taste and feeling. She has already proved herself a superior artist.

Mme. GAZZANIGA made her debut before a crowded house in La Traviata. We can see but little difference in the singer of to-day and of eight years ago. Except that she has grown fuller and more embonpoint, she is the same great artist. At the first she was rather cold, but in the last act she warmed up and displayed fully her great dramatic and artistic power. We hope that Mr. Grau will let us hear her often.

The two contraltos of the troupe are Signoras CASH-POLLINI and OLGA OLGINI. The former, though she has only sung once, in the Trovatore, showed herself a great artist both in dramatic and vocal power. Her voice is a rich contralto of great power and expression. Olga Olginini has a petite figure and face of much beauty. She possesses a sweet and very musical voice. Her delivery is easy and graceful. She gives promise of becoming a great singer, being quite young.

Signor MUSIANI, the leading tenor, has fully sustained the reputation which preceded him. He is the best tenore robusto we have had for a long time, superior, we think, in many respects to Massolenti. His voice is a powerful one and of very good tone. In the Trovatore he produced a great sensation by the introduction of the high chest C or ut de poitrine, which was brilliantly given. He made the best impression however by his Ernani and Edgardo in Lucia, which were superb, absolutely the best we have ever had. He will prove a formidable rival to Mazzoleni in New York in the Spring.

Signor ANASTASI, tenore di grazia, is a very acceptable artist. He has a sweet though not full voice. His delivery is good and his dramatic power considerable.

Herr LOTTI, who is already a favorite here, achieved a complete triumph on Friday night in Martha. He has improved wonderfully both in strength of voice and dramatic power. We doubt if there is a sweeter tenor voice on the stage. If he continues to improve as he has done he will become a first-class artist.

Signors FELLINI and ORLANDINI are the baritone. Fellini is a fine singer, having a powerful and rich voice. Orlandini has sung in Trovatore, Ernani and Favorita, but in all these his singing has been marred by hoarseness, so that he has not appeared at his best. His voice is a very good one, though rather guttural at times. Neither of the baritone is quite equal to Bellini.

The Bassi are Signors MILLERI, POLLINI and BRANDINI.

The first has appeared in Ernani, Lucia, and Favorita. With the exception of Formes in his best days, and Hermanns, he is the best basso we have had. He has a powerful and very pleasing voice and sings with great energy and has complete control over his voice. He is entitled to a first rank also as a dramatic artist, his Don Silva being the best we have ever seen. Brandini and Pollini have appeared only once; the former as Mephistopheles, the latter as Plunkett. Both have cultivated voices, but we should think hardly powerful enough. We hope, however, that they may improve on acquaintance.

On the whole, Mr. Grau has given us a first-class troupe, though it might be improved in some respects, especially in the female chorus which is poor. The orchestra also needs toning down. However, we must not complain, but thank Mr. Grau for fulfilling his promises as he has.

Next week Gazzaniga appears in Lucrezia Borgia and Saffo, L'Elisir d'Amore in which Miss SIMONS will appear, is also announced. CHICAGO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 25, 1865.

Oratorio—Judas Maccabæus.

The revival by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY of this noble Oratorio, once so popular here, and still more often sung in Germany and England than any of Handel's works except Israel and the Messiah, was a happy thought. We had almost said a timely thought: but it would have been more so at almost any period of our four years of war,—especially during the earlier phases of the great life-struggle of the nation, when we could all have sung quite earnestly that chorus:

And grant a leader bold and brave,
If not to conquer, born to save!

But the memories of the war are still so near to us, its patriotic fears and hopes and resolutions, its deeds of heroism and its triumphs, that no texts to which great music could be set could more ensure its appeal to all our hearts than these, to which Handel wrote his patriotic, his heroic Oratorio par excellence. This was the very music which we wanted to "fire the Northern heart," to keep up hope and courage and the nobler inspirations through the war. But even now it speaks to sympathies and memories exceedingly well prepared; it passes in review before us, in great forms of Art, in a resounding dialect of immortality, all the tremendous experience of those years. Music generalizes whatever historical theme it touches, and so brings home to our times and to us its comment, or rather its spiritual inside history of a heroic, liberty-defending period away back among the Maccabæes.

We often wondered during the war, and often hinted thereof in these columns, that the Handel and Haydn Society, so active in keeping up our spirits and not letting the great ideals fade from us, if great music could do anything—and verily it could—did not revive Judas Maccabæus. Well, we are thankful to have it now. We think it is at any time one of the most interesting of the oratorios—musically, we mean. It is so now particularly. There is a freshness about this music which tells with what whole-heartedness it was composed. It is full of happy inspirations. The choruses, all illustrating a few great simple texts: national grief and shame under defeat and oppression, heroic resolution to reconquer liberty, then victory and rejoicing, all of course tempered with religious fervor, succeed each other with a marked, surprising individuality, all of them beautiful or inspiring, several of them truly great. There are few lovelier or sublimer choruses anywhere than "Tune your harps," which comes in so richly on the dominant seventh chord, taking the word out of the mouth of the solo singer, and flooding all with its great, broad, swelling and melodious flow of harmony. It seems very simple, but it is a masterpiece of art, and its climaxes, especially the last and greatest, where the trebles grow up to the high A and hold it out, are irresistible. Then for a chorus of lamentation what more deeply impressive than the very opening, after the instrumental overture, "Mourn, ye afflicted children?" It is much in the same great mood, though altogether another thing in art, as Beethoven's funeral march. And the next one (which we were sorry to find omitted): "For Sion lamentation make, with words that weep," &c. We can hardly help comparing it too with something very different, the Lacrymosa in Mozart's Requiem, which certainly is greater; but this has some similar climaxes, and has by a kindred instinct chosen the same broad 12-8 measure. The spirited, emphatic Fugue "And grant a leader," follows the prayer with a re-assuring energy of purpose, like "Aide toi, et le Ciel t'aidera!" And then the trumpet-like "We come in bright array," simple and short, has the very flash of helmets and the ring of martial order, and willing, valiant hearts leap out in every phrase; musically it is not very much, but it is just enough, so timely! "Hear us, O Lord," with its thick-set imitations ("resolved on conquest or a glorious fall") is a grand chorus, the most difficult perhaps of any, which lost much of its force in this performance by being very much abridged. Grandest of all is the chorus opening the second part: "Fall'n is the foe;" the vigorous figures of the instrumental introduction are most graphic, painting the battle with a few bold strokes, which seem, however, all-pervading. The opening vocal phrases are startling in the energy of their announcement; two more marked and characteristic musical phrases than those on "Fallen is the foe" and "So fall thy foes," could not have been invented for their purpose. The first tones of the second of these phrases, which contain the pith thereof, are then expanded into a figurative fugue theme ("Where warlike Judas wields his righteous sword"), which is worked up so as to complicate the harmonious confusion, and still make the exciting scene more vivid, now mingling with the two original phrases ("Fallen is the foe," &c.), and now pausing to listen, while the word fall'n is whispered in low tones widely separated, the accompaniments measuring the time with pulsing chords;—if perfectly done, it must be heard with breathless interest.

Another very striking chorus, in which the word seems eagerly caught up and passed all along the line, is: "We never, never will bow down," the vocal masses being all consolidated after a while upon a Choral, which still sings on in one part of the harmony, while the others clothe it with figurative counterpoint. Also the Solo and Chorus: "Sing unto God." "See the conquering hero comes" is too familiar to require remark: how many heroes, and would-be heroes, successful candidates, &c., it has ushered in! But it has just that familiarity, always fresh too, of a spontaneous, obvious thought that only comes to genius, and yet it seems as if it might come to all. And then it is served up so skilfully, being first sung in two-part chorus of fresh virgin voices, then taken up in full force by the whole, then borne away, an imitative echo of it, by the instruments in a march. Equally obvious and simple, but rather homely withal, and lacking dignity, (or is it because its phrases have been plagiarized in so many Yankee psalm-book anthems?) is "Hail Judea, happy land!" We have named more choruses than we intended, and yet not all that really deserve mention. Few if any of the choruses in Judas are so elaborate, so vast in their conception as the great ones of Israel and the Messiah; they are mostly short; but they are singularly felicitous, effective, individual; they have the charm of happy hits; each tells the story; it was genial, large-hearted, human Handel reading the history by quick imaginative flashes, and telling it off-hand in that lofty, learned, yet palpable and graphic language which had become the easiest vernacular to him.

But you are waiting to hear how these choruses were sung on Saturday night. We may say, on the whole, quite successfully, considering the short preparation (for it is twelve years since it was last sung here, and the singers came to a task practically new). There is room for improvement, but it was sung with a will, some of the choruses very effectively, as "Tune your harps," the "Conquering Hero," &c. The numbers were large, we should think about 400 voices; but the Contraltos seemed comparatively weak. Mr. ZERRAHLN had certainly conducted the rehearsal: as good purpose as the time allowed. The orchestra was effective, too, (sometimes too heavy), and had, (yes, Advertiser!) had "bassoons!" What would Handel think of the necessity of so mentioning the presence of an instrument which he could use by the dozen in his day? The Great Organ, played by Mr. LANG, made some of the great choruses loom like distant mountains in rare states of atmosphere; but after all we wonder if it would not be better to use it more sparingly, allowing something more of distance and horizon, and not marching all the grandeur right up to our very feet; let the larger length of the blue chain lie off, in undulating diminuendo, so that we can look at it and feel the beauty of the outline softened and enriched by shadows and by atmospheric influence.

We come now to the solo parts. Here lay the weak side of the performance, although it was not all weak by any means. But the most important part, that of the hero Judas, demands a great tenor; one who has heard Sims Reeves ring out "Sound an alarm," will hardly be so unreasonable as to expect the like of that very often, but a nearer approach to it than seems to lie within the power of Mr. JOHN FARLEY may fairly enough be asked for. It is true, allowance must be made for the strange accident of his copy, from which he studied his part, not happening to contain this song. But his treatment of the music altogether, though he gave us some sweet passages and showed artistic feeling, was inadequate. Especially had his rendering of recitative, accenting, dividing, timing every phrase in the same uniform, stilted, dragging way, that took the life out of it; and depend upon it, Handel's recitative here is good. Nor could he "call forth powers" to cope with such a task as the air, full of roulades, which has those words for its theme. The gentleman to whom the secondary tenor pieces were intrusted has a pleasant, clear voice in the main, but we could not hear at all his lower notes; his style was creditable. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, the basso, was the most complete and satisfying of the soloists. His music, as usual, was well studied and conceived, his voice still gains in musical substance and in flexibility, and he has learned the art of rendering the long roulade passages more agreeably, reconciling our modern feeling to them, than almost any singer we have had for years. "The Lord worketh wonders" was a fine instance; while, in another style, "Arm, arm, ye brave," with its preceding recitative: "I feel the Deity within," was well up to the mark.

Miss HOUSTON does not seem to us to have improved for some time in her general singing. She is earnest and has inspirations, that set now and then a passage in a fine bright light; her voice is clear, musical and flexible, but without that reassuring firmness which the hearer would fain feel at every point. Moreover, at times the rhythmical sense, or what we may call the mental metronome, appears bewildered, as in some of the phrases of the most important and original of the soprano airs, "From Mighty Kings," which in the main, however, was rendered quite acceptably. We did not quite recognize the spirit of the quaintly beautiful air, "Pious orgies." A more beautiful one, "Wise men flattering" was omitted. It was a pleasure to hear again the rich contralto of Miss ANNIE CARY, which, blended with Miss Houston's, has left the lovely duets about "Liberty" and "Peace" among the pleasantest memories of the evening.

We are glad to learn that the Society design to perform Judas again (on the Saturday evening before Christmas) with Mme. PERABO in the principal soprano parts, and if possible, with a more efficient hero. The Messiah will be given, also, on the Sunday evening, under the same rare auspices.

MESSRS. KREISSMANN and LEONHARD repeated the programme of their first Soirée on the evening of the 11th inst., with a much larger audience, and the occasion was even more delightful than before. The only change made in the list of pieces, was the substitution by the singer of Schubert's "Am Meer" and "Aufenthalt" for the two songs by that composer which he sang the first time. The third concert had to be postponed on account of the illness of Mr. Kreissmann, and unfortunately must stand postponed for yet another week,—we hope not longer.

THE GREAT ORGAN will be played this noon by Mr. WHITING; and to-morrow (Sunday) evening offers the rare opportunity of hearing Mr. J. K. PAINE, and getting more acquainted with old Bach.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul," which was begun in our last number, and will go on by similar instalments until our subscribers have it complete. The "Creation" came to an end in the number before the last, leaving a few pages to be otherwise filled. We owe an apology for the mutilated form (without the prelude,) in which the little Song by Franz got in without the Editor's knowledge.

"PIANO-FORTE MEDALS" AGAIN.—We print to-day in full the Report of the Committee on Musical Instruments, at the late Exhibition of the Massachusetts Mechanic Association. It has attached to it a supplementary Report, signed by the same Committee, which is somewhat at variance with the first. Read by the light of Mr. Underwood's undisputed history of the two Reports, and of the unfortunate way in which both main Report and Supplement were allowed to modify the impartial and impersonal (unanimous) result of the trial of the Pianos instituted by the judges, it sets at rest a question about which parties have waxed warm.

Mme. LOUISE ABEL, a pianist of refined taste and an excellent interpreter of classical music, has returned to this country after several years spent abroad, partly in her old home at Stuttgart, and partly in concert tours, in which she has won the approbation of the highest German and French critics. She gave a concert last week in New York, in which she played works of Chopin, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and others, in a style that greatly pleased the better class of music-lovers. The admirable concerts which Mme. Abel gave some years ago in Boston are not forgotten by the few (unfortunately) who chanced to hear her, and we trust she will not forget Boston in her artistic ministrations now that she has chosen the New World after another trial of the Old.

ERNST PERABO. This gifted young pianist and musician, who left this country some six years ago, a boy of extraordinary promise, to seek both his general and his musical education in Germany, is now probably on his way home, if he has not already arrived. We have read what honors he has borne off at the Conservatory in Leipzig, both as performer and composer.

It will interest a large circle of our readers, and particularly those gentlemen of Boston and New York, who have subscribed the means of keeping him so long abroad, to read a portion of a letter addressed (quite unsolicited) to Mr. Scharfenberg of New York, under whose earnest and wise management that fund has been expended. Its receipt must have been particularly gratifying to that gentleman. The writer is a sort of centre of the best musical society in Leipzig, and what he writes is doubtless a true reflection of the Leipzig feeling about Perabo. We take the liberty to translate a few sentences;

"The selection of just this young man does all honor to your artistic instinct and your heart, and I cannot help expressing my joyful recognition and assuring you that you will see your expectations satisfied and rewarded in every respect. We are exceedingly sorry to part with him. He is a singularly gifted young man, who, far from all arrogance, an enemy to all humbug, is enthusiastic only for his Art; in this, though, he achieves something sterling and distinguished. He is a musician through and through, and it is not so easy for another to achieve the like or venture into competition with him. I only fear lest, with his honesty and modesty with the sacred fire that glows in him for true Art, the muck-flies of mediocrity and musical low life, which can sting in America even more than here, may embitter his life and hinder his onward striving. . . . With the support of a true sympathy he will develop himself powerfully and become the joy and pride of America."

WORCESTER, MASS.—The "Musical Convention," under the direction of Messrs. WILDER & DAVENPORT, occupied most of the last week in October. "Of course," (as the Palladium well says), "there was a new collection of Psalmody in the back-ground"—that being the distinctive feature of a "convention." The day sessions were given to vocal gymnastics, choral practice and rehearsals, &c., and the evenings to concerts. On the whole, the standard of these things seems to have risen. One was an Organ concert Mr. Willcox, with vocal miscellany. Among other things, Handel's "Waft me, Angela," sung by Mr. Frost. One was a Concert of Choruses from operas, hymn tunes, anthems, &c., (400 voices), varied by organ pieces played by Messrs. Davenport, Allen and Sumner, Handel's "Total Eclipse," and smaller songs. The third was Oratorio: the Creation, Mrs. Mozart and Dr. Guilmette assisting, who also sang "Let the bright Seraphim" and "It is enough," from Elijah. We think such musical examples must do good among the fresher audiences (and learners, too,) of the country. There were "social hours," too, (of mutual musical refreshment, and we dare say "mutual admiration,") not without interest. Finally, this "Worcester County Musical Convention" elected a very long list of officers for the coming year, who met and voted to adopt Judas Maccabaeus as the Oratorio to be practiced for the next annual session; (Ditson did well to publish it).

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.—Another "Convention," that of "Western Massachusetts," was held here on Nov. 6th—10th inclusive. Conductors: Carl Zerrahn and W. O. Perkins of Boston, and H. S. Perkins of Springfield. Soloists: Mrs. H. M. Smith, Dr. Guilmette and Mr. James Whiting, all of Boston. Pianist, J. E. Perkins; orchestra made up from the Germanians and Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Here, too, the Creation was sung; and there were miscellaneous concerts, and the same sort of studies and exercises as at Worcester. All went off with great spirit and interest, we hear.

ST. LOUIS, MO.—The first concert (sixth series) of the Philharmonic Society, conducted by E. Sobolewski, took place Oct. 19. The pieces performed, in their order, were: Overture to Masaniello, Auber; Soprano Solo and Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives;" Larghetto and Scherzo from Schumann's B-flat Symphony; Solo and Chorus from Kreutzer's "Night in Granada;" Overture to Diogenes; Rec. and Cavatina (Come per me) from Sonnambula; Trio (of Anabaptist preachers) and chorus from Le Prophète.

CHICAGO, ILL.—Here, too, there is a Philharmonic Society, which gave the first concert of the season on the 30th ult. The orchestral pieces were Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and "Meeresstille" Overture, and Auber's overture to Masaniello. They were given with spirit, we are told, but the audience reserved most of its loud approbation for the tenore, Mr. Castle, who sang an aria from La Traviata and an English ballad.—Of the new Italian Opera company our correspondent writes in another column.

LEIPZIG. A letter from this place, dated Oct. 12, appears in the Transcript, evidently from the pen of the Rev. Mr. Gage, who translated the Life of Mendelssohn. He gossips pleasantly of musical, as well as other people, thus:

I went from Mr. Wilson's to Mr. Lampadius, the author of the Life of Mendelssohn, who gave me, as the translator of his work, an exceedingly cordial reception. He is the pastor of one of the great churches of Leipzig, that of St. Nicholas, and is a man of extremely cordial and agreeable manners. His labors are now so arduous that he has little leisure to prosecute his musical studies, but his love for the science is not lessened, while his reverence for the character of Mendelssohn remains unchanged. I was glad to tell him that the American edition has been published in its beautiful shape, and that our people have a thorough appreciation of the character of that great and excellent man. In Germany, Mendelssohn's music is now not so much liked as that of Schumann, whose star is in the ascendant. Still the Germans are not unmindful of his great merit, though they leave to England the full appreciation of his genius. In Leipzig he is gratefully remembered. I made a pilgrimage to the house, No. 21 Königstrasse, a large and handsome mansion in which Mendelssohn lived and died.

In the afternoon I called on Mr. and Mrs. Moscheles. I must not tell the readers of the Transcript who they are, for all the world knows that Moscheles is the biographer of Beethoven and the friend of Mendelssohn from the cradle to the grave. They are neither of them old, only about sixty, and it indeed seemed singular to be conversing with those who had directed the opening of Mendelssohn's musical studies, followed every step of his bright, beautiful career, stood by him at the death-bed, and now, almost twenty years after he has lain in the grave, are still hale and young, and full of labors. Mr. Moscheles is somewhat stooping, but his eye is full of fire, his step firm and young, his mind vivacious and active. He must ten years ago have been a man of noble presence. Mrs. Moscheles is gracious in manner, yet dignified and composed.

She assented most willingly to my proposition that she should prepare a volume of recollections of Mendelssohn, illustrated and accompanied by the numerous letters which she and her husband received from him, many, many score in number. These never have been seen by the brother Paul, and will be all new and fresh. She criticizes the selection which has been published, and thinks it a great pity that some trace of his delightful married life was not preserved in it. Mrs. Moscheles hopes to begin this volume in December and to spend the winter in its preparation. It will be read with the greatest interest by all musical people in England and America. It will be written in our own language by Mrs. Moscheles, who speaks English with the utmost ease and propriety.

In addition to this work, Mrs. Klingemann, her daughter-in-law, and the widow of Carl Klingemann the poet, Mendelssohn's dear friend, has partly promised an article for the "Atlantic," containing her recollections of Mendelssohn in England. In addition to this, Carl Mendelssohn, the son, who is a private docent in Heidelberg University, has begun to write a full biography of his father, but that will be a work not executed in a single winter, owing to the immediate demands made upon him in the preparation of his University Lectures. So out of the publication of the letters from Switzerland and Italy, a fine literature is already growing. I have never thought for a moment that my little work, based on Lampadius, would be more than a stepping stone to something more full and complete; and the American people must take it for just what it pretends to be, the only existing life of the great composer, and therefore amenable to none of those laws by which Mrs. Moscheles or Carl Mendelssohn's work will be tested.

Those who have read Lampadius's Life of Mendelssohn Bartholdy, may be glad to learn that efforts are now making to discover the letters which he wrote from Rome to Goethe. They are supposed to be at Vienna, and if discovered will be found to be superior, it would seem, probably to any others that he ever wrote.

Some may have noticed the allusion in the last pages of Lampadius's Life to a lady who was the finest interpreter of Mendelssohn's songs while he lived, and one of the chief mourners. It is stated in such a way as to pique the curiosity, and to create the suspicion that she was attached to him with an unwarrantable affection. Such, however, was not the case. This lady is now living in Leipzig; her name is Madame Freye, and she is the wife of a professor of law in the University. Her career has not only been a spotless one but a beautiful one. Not a particle of jealousy ever came between her and the wife of Mendelssohn, but she was recognized as a warm friend and unequalled interpreter of his songs. He used to say that no song was perfect till she had sung it. In her old age she is no less respected and honored, than she was admired and loved in her youth.

AGINDOS.

"Agindos" is in error in one or two particulars. The seventieth birthday of Moscheles was celebrated in May or June of last year; nor is he any more "at the head of music in Leipzig" than Reinecke or one or two others perhaps. We trust that Madame Frege (whose name is misprinted above) will live to a green "old age," but she has a grody period to traverse first, unless her appearance much belied her four or five years since.

ORGAN OPENING. A new organ of remarkable power and beauty, built by the Messrs. Hook, was exhibited on the evening of the 3d inst., in the Church of the New Jerusalem. The specifications were prepared under the direction of Mr. George J. Webb, organist of the Church, and Mr. J. H. Willcox, and it is a very complete, thoroughly finished and effective instrument, having 41 speaking stops, 6 of them of 16 feet, six in the pedal, many of them of rare beauty and individuality. In many respects it seemed to us the finest organ which the Messrs. Hook have yet produced, and certainly of great power for its size. It was tested to the satisfaction of the church full of visitors by Messrs. Paine and Willcox; the former playing a grand Prelude in E flat by Bach, the Sonata in E minor by Ritter, and (of his own composition) a Caprice in D, and a "Religious Offering"; the latter an Andante by Mozart, a couple of "improvisations" for showing the stops, the "Zanetta" overture and the Hallelujah Chorus. From the description of the Organ furnished by the builders, we learn:

The scales of all the pipes are drawn according to strictly mathematical proportions, not only in each individual "register" but throughout the whole Organ. The unusual number of "mechanical registers," operated by the feet (sometimes called "Composition Pedals"), is another marked and important feature in this instrument. They are seven in number, of great utility, and are singularly perfect and silent in their operation.

The metal of which the pipes are made is such as would ensure the most desirable quality of tone from the various "stops," some of which are of "pure tin," others of 75 and 50, while none are less than "33 per cent tin," except the largest pipes, which are of zinc.

"Every" stop extends throughout the entire compass of the "key board"; there is not one incomplete "register" in the Organ—a fact worthy of mention, and one which has not received heretofore sufficient consideration from either American or English builders. Among the "stops" of recent introduction into this country may be mentioned the "Violone," 16 ft. "Viola da Gamba," "Vox Humana," "Flauto Traverso," "Salicional," "Dolce," "Doppel Flöte," and "Hohlpfeife." There is, with one single exception, no quality of tone known in organ-building which is not represented in this instrument.

LIST OF STOPS AND PIPES. GREAT MANUAL.

1. Open Diapason,	16 feet.	58 pipes.
2. Open Diapason,	8 "	58 "
3. Viola da Gamba,	8 "	58 "
4. Doppel Flöte,	8 "	58 "
5. Melodia,	8 "	58 "
6. Hohlpfeife,	4 "	58 "
7. Octave,	4 "	58 "
8. Twelfth,	2 2-3 "	58 "
9. Fifteenth,	2 ft.	58 "
10. Cornet,	5 1-3 "	216 "
11. Mixture,	13 5 "	174 "
12. Arpa,	13 3 "	116 "
13. Trumpet,	8 "	58 "
14. Clarion,	4 "	58 "

SWELL MANUAL.

15. Bourdon Bass,	16 feet	58 pipes.
16. Bourdon Treble,	16 "	58 "
17. Open Diapason,	8 "	58 "
18. Salicional,	8 "	58 "
19. Viol D'Amour,	4 "	58 "
20. Stopped Diapason,	8 "	58 "
21. Flute Harmonique,	4 "	58 "
22. Octave,	4 "	58 "
23. Fifteenth,	2 "	58 "
24. Mixture,	11-3 "	174 "
25. Cornoposan,	8 "	58 "
26. Cboe,	8 "	58 "
27. Vox Humana,	8 "	58 "

CHOIR MANUAL.

28. Open Diapason,	8 feet.	58 pipes.
29. Kersulophon,	8 "	58 "
30. Stopped Diapason,	8 "	58 "
31. Dolce,	8 "	58 "
32. Flauto Traverso,	4 "	58 "
33. Octave,	4 "	58 "
34. Piccolo,	2 "	58 "
35. Clarinet,	8 "	58 "

PEDALE.

36. Open Diapason,	16 feet.	27 pipes.
37. Violone,	16 "	27 "
38. Bourdon,	16 "	27 "
39. Octave,	8 "	27 "
40. Violoncello,	8 "	27 "
41. Posauue,	16 "	27 "

MECHANICAL REGISTERS.

42. "Swell" to "Great" Coupler.
43. "Choir" to "Great" "
44. "Swell" to "Choir" "
45. "Great" to "Pedale" "
46. "Choir" to "Pedale" "
47. "Swell" to "Pedale" "
48. Tremulant (Swell).
49. Bellows Signal.
50. Pedal Check.

COMPOSITION PEDALS.

1. Brings out all the Stops of the Great Manual.
2. Brings out Stops from Nos. 1 to 9 inclusive, and takes in all others.
3. Brings out Stops Nos. 2, 4, and 5, and takes in all others.
4. Forte "Swell."
5. Piano "Swell."
6. Piano and Forte, "Pedale" (double-acting).
7. Pedal operating "Great to Pedale" Coupler.

The Organ is situated in the Gallery at the west end of the Church, showing stained windows at each side and in the centre, between the two main divisions, which combine with the pointed pediments, spires, Gothic tracery, and richly ornamented pipes, to give a beautiful, picturesque, and unique appearance.

The total height of the Organ is nearly 40 feet; width, 21 feet; and depth, 12 1-2 feet.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Autumn. (Herbstlied.) Song. Mendelssohn. 50

A noble song, expressing the sombre influences of the days of the fall of the leaf upon the imagination and heart, with a vein of consolation, like bright autumn sunshine, running through the whole.

Acushla gal mochree. Song in "Arrah na Pogue." C. Koppitz. 30

A pretty ballad, somewhat above the average of Irish songs, so many of which are good. "Acushla gal mochree," means "O bright pulse of my heart."

Melville Castle. Old Scotch Ballad.

Mrs. Campbell. 30

These things are sung in one generation, laid aside, and then come out, bright as ever, in the next quarter century. How many readers of this ever sang Melville Castle? Well, here it is, as full of music and dry Scotch fun as ever.

Hark, how still. (Stiller Sicherheit.) R. Franz. 30

Still security, which is the literal translation of the German title, does not sound as well as in the original. But the piece is very sweet and quiet. As in other pieces, Franz makes out a simple, almost child-like idea, with masterly skill in his harmony, yet not forgetting the simplicity.

Trust in God. Quartet. L. H. Southard. 40

One more of Mr. S's excellent series. Others have been already noticed.

Instrumental.

Reconnaissance. Waltz for Piano. W. F. Spicer. 30

A very graceful and original production, by a gallant officer in the navy.

Grand Air. Paraphrase No. 3. "L' Africaine." A. Jaell. 50

In these Paraphrases, Jaell adds considerably to the effect of the original, by his brilliant arrangement. Difficult, but not extremely so.

Lord Dundreary Polka. D. Spillane. 30

Nothing at all dreary about the polka, whatever there might have been about his lordship. Easy and pretty.

Polonaise in Ab major. Op. 53. Chopin. 1.25

A wild and strange affair, pervaded with the gifted Pole's extraordinary genius and invention.

Mary Bell Waltz. J. W. Turner. 30

Patchwork. A medley quadrille. W. A. Field. 30

Pretty, and not difficult pieces. For persons who cannot execute the more difficult compositions for piano, these fresh and sprightly pieces, which do not tax one's powers greatly, are just the thing.

Sul Mare. (On the Sea.) Barcarolls. W. Kuhe. 40

La Belle Blondine. C. F. Shuster. 40

Pieces of medium difficulty, by good composers.

Farewell. (Scheidegrüsse.) Romance for Piano. A. Jungman. 40

Of the character of a "Song without words," and should be played with strict regard to expression. Quite easy, but with a rich melody.

Books.

CHORUSES OF ELI. $1.00

" " JUDAS MACCABEUS. 1.00

Musical societies and large choirs should bear in mind, that the choruses of these, and of all the other Oratorios in general use, are published separately, and will do excellently well for practice, even for those who do not wish to give a public performance.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 644.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 9, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 19

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Minstrel.

From the German of EMANUEL GRUBER.

He slept in the airy and moonlighted glade,
Beside him a fairy a violin laid;
When moonlight was waning, the wild rocks among,
His young lips unchaining, a Nix woke to song.

Now plays he while singing, then sings and then plays,

All hearts to him clinging, all spirits he sways;
In cot or in palace, where'er he may rest,
For joy and for solace all cherish the guest.

His bow once in motion, the lucid tones flow
Like free waves of ocean that come and that go,
Like storm gusts now sweeping, then softly they sound,

Rejoicing and weeping together inwound.

With strains that were single, his voice's fine spell
Begins he to mingle in musical swell,
Now tenderly breathing, then forth gushing strong,
The might of words wreathing with magic of song.

Why smileth the hoary old sire, as in dreams?
Youth's sunshine warm glory sheds round him, he deems!

What visions embolden yon soldier's proud brow?
His battle wounds olden again hotly glow!

What new-born confusion awakes the youth's dread?
Why deepen the hues on the cheek of the maid?
With young hearts awaking to rapture and woe,
Love's dawn o'er them breaking—love's witchcraft they know!

Round huntsmen loud ringeth the silvery horn;
Near reapers clear singeth the quail in the corn;
The land-weary sailor is touched as with pain,
He hears the loud breaker, the long-rolling main.

Souls worn with affliction but list to the lay,
And calm benediction their grief melts away;
So living, so glowing, the rich measures run,
Hope's balsam soft-flowing from fields of the sun!

On eagle wings flying, now swells the full strain,
Then sinks, faintly dying, like showers of spring rain;

It rolls in dread splendor, a loud tramp of doom;
It sighs, a hymn tender, low breathes o'er a tomb.

Now falling, now falling, now hushed is each tone.
With joyful outcalling, they proffer the crown;
But he, proudly bending, oppressed by their praise,
Turns, silent, then wending through night-shadowed ways.

While stars coldly glisten, when winds roughly moan,

Where no man can listen, he wanders alone;
Heart throbbing, tears burning, he plays to the night,
Lost, passionate yearning! long-buried delight!

FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

The Present State of Music.

(Concluded from page 187.)

(Translated for this Journal from Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

PIANO-FORTE MUSIC.

The majority of those who spend their time and means on music are so far from any right perception of its value, that they mistake the means for the end. This is everywhere noticeable, but nowhere so clearly as in the most widely diffused branch of musical practice, piano-playing. Here, above all, we may recognize a progress beyond Beethoven and the earlier writers in the manner of presenting their ideas,—at least an industrious building out upon what Beethoven in his later works (and, before him, Dussek, Louis Ferdinand and A. E. Müller, in their way) had already striven to realize. I mean, what Liszt has shrewdly designated by the term "Orchestration of the Piano." The piano-forte inwardly (in resonance, in color of sound, blending of tones and holding out of tone) is the poorest, but outwardly (for masses of tone, harmony, polyphony) next to the organ the richest instrument. Bach and all the composers down to the time of Beethoven had to make up for this meagreness of the single tone by fullness of parts; and Beethoven already in a measure overcame the same difficulty by broad handfulls of chords and doublings or octave passages; this may be observed in the great B-flat Sonata (Op. 106), and elsewhere in many ways. But fullness of intellectual life, constantly and necessarily urging him toward dramatic (polyphonic) form, was of more account with the composer. than outward, sensuous fullness, which with him goes farther than with his intellectually and sensuously poorer predecessors, but never could become the main thing.

But now the life of Humanity is so rich and broadly founded, that every thought can and must live itself out in its consequences; so too in Art. It is the charm of sensuous fullness in piano-playing that has called forth the "new treatment" or manner of playing the piano. The Arpeggio, in all its variety of forms, from that in single tones to that in several tones struck at once, the Arpeggio, by itself alone or as foundation for the melody above, or as an airy, flickering gauze spread over the melody played in the lower or middle part of the instrument—and whatever else may be derived from this—has become the fundamental material of this new school; with it are coupled the bold doublings of melody, and all sorts of filled-out ingenious and effective passages. Certainly by these means the piano-forte has been raised to a before unheard of fullness of tone and color. It was Liszt in his "transcriptions" of the works of Schubert and others, and then again in his own works, for instance his Harmonies poetiques et religieuses, who opened this path and who has won from it the most peculiar, the finest and mightiest effects.

But there are two evils in this treatment which it is hard to avoid. The Arpeggio, however you may shape it, however you may group or double or disperse the tones in it, is ever the same, ever the one chord which stands out cold and abstract through all these veils and accessories. The greatest talent, the united ingenuity of ever so many gifted composers cannot overcome or hide what lies in the nature of the case. And so the "New School," from inward necessity, has piled up mountains of Etudes, Fantasias, Songs without Words, compositions of all sorts, of which the inevitable substance is this overlasting monotonous Arpeggio; other figures appear only as interludes as it were; the melodies, in choice and shaping, must show themselves favorable for the Arpeggio, that is to say, they must spread themselves out broadly and quietly, so that the Arpeggio may find room. That is one trouble. The other is, the impossibility of uniting with this style the dramatic nature of polyphony [music in "real parts," or parts, each of which is carried along like an individual melody. Tr.] Alongside of the Arpeggio only one voice or part can avail at a time (even though it be put now in the treble, now in the tenor or the bass); hence that peculiar many-souled wealth of music has to be renounced; Art withdraws itself from the multifarious dramatic fullness of life back into the subjectivity of the one artist, who has sucked all into himself and in succulent plasticity exercises that virtus—that valor of the present age, which holds up only the dear glorious I upon its shield and sees in itself the beginning and the end of all being and all working.

But just this material, this purely personal and egoistic quality, mere nothingness to the higher man, is the most readily comprehensible and most enticing for the great majority of one's contemporaries, who never get beyond their own Self, to whom their own person is the focus and the end of all existence; whereas the true artist is surrounded and determined only by thoughts of the universal, by the primal forms, ideals of the eternal, super-personal; his personality is but the smelting-furnace in which those thoughts, permeated by the quick flame of inspiration, gain living form, just as, according to the old myth, only a virgin, humble and devout, free from all selfish desires, could become the mother of God.

Quite otherwise is it at the piano-forte. There the virtu-ose and sensuous principle of Self has been seized upon with an intense and desperate eagerness. That which Liszt at first made use of as an ingenious means subservient to a meaning, and which others occasionally employed still further, became an end. And now all the pianos roar with the storm of arpeggios; now no sacrifice of time or nerves is too great, if thereby one may "also" ride in on this storm. And this very emulation has served to limit the virtuoso concerts and crowd them into the background; for where everybody can work miracles, there is an end at last of the gaping wonder which so far has filled the concert rooms. But the vain and empty prosecution of this virtuoso trade did not retire to give place to a better; rather had it diffused itself atmospherically over amateur-dom, crowding out the spiritual, soul-quickenings part of Art. With this tendency to the technical-virtuoso, sensuous element, the susceptibility, the understanding and the courage for that better direction were incompatible, and by a logical fatality were lost. Perhaps there is no more striking expression for this turn of things than the judgment of one of the most distinguished piano teachers, who, when a young lady offered herself to him as a scholar, in order to find out her qualifications, set her to playing some works of Beethoven and of Bach, and then said to her: "You make too serious and important a matter of it, we take it easier in these days." And, oddly enough, he is right; if we cannot lift ourselves up to the heights any longer, at least we drag them down to us.

CONCLUSION.

Such is the aspect, which in the great and general features, as a whole, the Present State of our Art affords:—unexampled diffusion—unlimited participation in the people—retreat into the background of the spiritual, the full of character, the true, before the sensual, the hollow and hypocritical—accumulation of material means, and all-consuming devotion to the outward and the shallow, with indecision and cowardice for genuine artistic progress—great material capital and indefatigable labor, without the courage to risk either of them in the pursuit of a high and clearly discerned goal.

Perhaps, on the whole, To-day is no worse off than Yesterday. On the part of many there is more of study and of labor, and of a more earnest kind. Great, eminent talents have manifested themselves in a variety of achievements; new paths have been boldly tried and paved. Moreover, the errors and false ways, which shame us to-day, have already existed before us. Particularly this tendency toward the technical and sensual is not altogether exclusively peculiar to our time as something new and never before heard of: much rather is it naturally founded in the life-course of Art, like the ebb and flow of the sea. Upon every period of creative genius there must follow a period of diffusion; the new idea must win over men's minds and fill them with itself. And here come forward the imitative talents,—not seldom with greater and more rapid success than the genial creators of the new time, who have awakened the power in them and opened the understanding of the people. With these and after these appear those whose calling it is to make what is created generally known by readier renderings. In their eyes necessarily the means of interpretation, or technical skill, acquires an exaggerated consequence—and so the period begins to distinguish itself as one of virtuosity; the technics of the art overstep their proper goal in their zeal to reach it. But it is precisely here that the idea, which first awakened all this striving, may be said to have lived itself out, and now we stand unexpectedly before the question: Whether the end of things has yet come, or whether a new revelation of the eternally creative spirit is yet to be witnessed. Such an intermediate period prevailed after Handel, Bach and Gluck,—and such an one we now experience after Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

We must not, on the one hand, hide from ourselves the errors and deficiencies of the Present; nor, on the other hand, must we forget that the same have made themselves felt before now, and that now, as formerly, much that is good and hopeful has appeared along with them.

Why then can we not content ourselves with the old habitual equilibrium of the better and the worse, as they could do and had to do in former times?

The very question shows, that beneath the superficial similarity of the times essentially different relations exist; for such a question, now loudly or silently stirring in the minds of all thinkers, was never raised before. Only once did it stir at all, but with less energy and less widely, when at the beginning of the seventeenth century men became aware that the music up to that time (the Middle Age counterpoint) was not fitted to satisfy the newly awakened longing—the expression of the poem, definite meaning, dramatic representation.

Beethoven's Letters.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

(Concluded from page 128).

The first half of the Master's life in Vienna may, as far as external circumstances are concerned, be termed a comparatively happy one. As is evident, by the way, throughout his letters, he found sincere admirers, warm friends, and energetic patrons. The publishers disputed with each other for his compositions, which the artists about him zealously exerted themselves to execute in an appropriate manner. It is true, however, that the great mass of the public were rather lukewarm, and that the receipts of his "Academies" (concerts) sometimes scarcely covered the expenses. Count Wilhouski, one of the greatest musical amateurs of Russia, described to me, not long ago, how solitary he sat in the stalls, at the first performance of the Pastoral Symphony, and how, on being called for, Beethoven made him personally, so to speak, a bow, half friendly and half ironical. Beethoven drew, however, a tolerably respectable pension from several noblemen (by the State he was neither assisted nor distinguished*), and was enabled to devote himself to his art as his works of that period prove. Worthy of remark is the offer he made the Viennese management to write every year, for a fixed salary, a grand opera, and several smaller dramatic works. The offer was naturally not accepted—Beethoven had composed only Fidelio for the stage! He made, also, a fruitless attempt to "enter the actual Imperial service," and said: "meanwhile the title of Imperial Capellmeister would make him very happy; if this could be procured for him it would render his residence there much more pleasant." But nothing came of the matter. A brilliant offer from the King of Westphalia for him to go and settle at Cassel induced his patrons to give him the pension already mentioned; the pension was afterwards considerably diminished, in order to secure him for Vienna (?) The Master was meditating, likewise, during—we might almost say—the whole of his life, a grand professional tour, and yet, if we leave out of consideration short trips to watering places, he never quitted Vienna. His unhappy deafness may, with or without his knowledge, have been the obstacle which prevented him from undertaking anything of this kind. One's heart bleeds on reading, in a letter of the 2nd May, 1810, to Wegeler: "Yet I should be happy, perhaps one of the happiest of men, had not the Demon fixed his abode in my ears. Had I not read somewhere that a man must not voluntarily give up this life as long as he can perform a good action, I should long since have been no more—and by my own hand. O, life is so beautiful, but for me it is for ever poisoned!"

Friend Breuning was right enough in advising Beethoven not to adopt his nephew. This unfortunate step, taken with the most noble motives, occasioned Beethoven perhaps more sorrow than all his illness and deafness, and, at any rate, dragged him into a labyrinth of wretched troubles. He confided the boy to various teachers and institutions, in which, at one time, he had confidence, and, at another, not; he desired that his charge should honor his mother (whom the Master himself despised), but that he should see her as little as possible, and never alone; he endeavored to subject his own mode of life to all kinds of restraint for his nephew's sake, the only result generally being to derange the youth; and, to the very end of his existence, he imposed upon himself duties evidently beyond his strength. To all this must be added dealings with lawyers, actions-at-law, and annoyances of every description. Yet we instinctively perceive from all this that it was grateful to feel like a father—to be able to call a human being his; to name that being son. To a man of such profound sentiments it must, after a time, be a fearful deprivation, to have with one's fellow creatures no stronger relations than the light, superficial ones which result from the absence of any family. Beethoven was justified in complaining, and we ought to take part in his sorrow. But, had he been the father of a family, would he have preserved all his powers for such unceasing artistic productivity as that which he displayed? We have a right to doubt it.

* "—for Austria occasions me annoyance and gives me nothing towards a livelihood." p. 238.

† We trust the Editor will pardon us for remarking that it was certainly unnecessary to defile a collection of Beethoven's Letters with the dirty stories at page 253.

How ready Beethoven was to aid and assist others is evident from very many of the present letters. He seizes, with absolutely fiery zeal, on certain opportunities for doing so, and was certainly as sincere as it is possible to be when he wrote to Herr Varena, Kammer-Procureur (Attorney of the Exchequer) at Gratz: "Never, from my earliest childhood, did my zeal for assisting with my art, whenever I could, poor, suffering humanity, yield to aught else, and nothing more is requisite than the inward satisfaction which always accompanies what is good." It often strikes us that we perceive a desire on his part, despite the art which so completely engrossed him, of finding extra occupation in the active life of the world. But to so colossal an organization as his, I hardly know what would not appear restricted and pitiful, and he could feel well only when, raised above everything earthly, he roamed in that world which is the sole one really free.

While, however, the mighty Master willingly extended a helping hand to every one far and near, and displayed a friendly and obliging nature, his violence and distrust produced really volcanic convulsions in his intercourse with his best friends. Of this fact, also, there is ample proof in his letters—on every one of his most intimate friends is the death-sentence at some time or other pronounced—as the sentence is, however, not intended to be carried out, a pardon arrives sooner or later, but always early enough.

These letters grow sadder and sadder as they approach the end. We find continual bother caused by the nephew, and in addition, pecuniary questions compelling Beethoven to diplomatize with publishers; to look up heroes for dedications; to sacrifice his works to inefficient Musical Societies; nay more, even to publish for too trifling productions; indeed, we should begin to feel quite nervous did we not know with whom we had to deal. Then, too, his domestic life, if we may so designate it, was of such a kind that he felt impelled or obliged on one occasion to shy "half-a-dozen books at his housekeeper's head," and, on another, to hurl "his heavy bedroom footstool at her body," as in order to obtain a day's repose. Good Frau Streicher, to whom the sorrowful effusions concerning his household differences were addressed, must, at times, have had some difficulty in suppressing a smile, when the great Beethoven writes: "She has, in addition to her 12 Kreutzers bread money, a roll in the morning; is this the case with the kitchen-maid also? A roll makes 18 florins a year." But she interested herself, with sisterly love and care, for the poor, tormented man—and thus her old age is connected with reminiscences of Beethoven, just as her husband's youth was connected with reminiscences of Schiller.

It was at this wretched time, that the Ninth Symphony and the Missa Solemnis were written! A Victory of the mind over the most wretched and contemptible combination of worldly things, which for energy and grandeur is not inferior to any of the most renowned battles ever fought!

No opinions of Beethoven respecting contemporary composers appear in this correspondence, if we except a letter to Cherubini which is, it is true, of a business nature, but breathes a spirit of the highest esteem for the Parisian master. Beethoven, however, troubled himself probably very little about his contemporaries. What cares such a leviathan for all the small fry that swim around, without ever being able to disturb him in his course?

Of the 399 Letters in the collection only about ten date from the last century. Concerning the period when the mightiest development of this wonderful man's mind was going on, we find in this book nothing new, though in his later years there is very much that needs explanation, and very much that is completely unknown. How greatly it is to be desired that Otto Jahn would no longer defer fulfilling the promise he made the world of music to write Beethoven's Biography! He is particularly adapted for the task. It is to his archaeological sagacity, to his love for collecting, to his acute judgment, and to his artistic penetration that we are indebted for the fact of having obtained a true notion of Mozart's life and nature, and who does not most fervently wish to do the same in the case of his beloved Beethoven?

We might compare the Titanic Master to our magnificent river, the Rhine, that makes itself a way through rocks and hills, becoming more and more powerful as it flows along, and spreading happiness and blessings around. How insignificant do the blocks of stone become, which, here and there, cause it to be covered with foam, and the sandbanks that appear at intervals, if we look down into its depths and give ourselves up with our whole soul to the contemplation of its pure grandeur! How many future generations will feel themselves refreshed, strengthened and elevated by its waters!

Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst.

[From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.]

The great violinist Ernst was, on the 8th of October, at Nice, released from the sufferings to which he had so long been subject. As a practical virtuoso he had long been lost to art, but not as an artist, for in the latter years of his life he devoted himself to composition, especially the composition of violin-quartets. Of these we will speak presently.

Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst was born at Brünn, Moravia, in the year 1814. His talent was soon manifested, and so rapidly developed that he played in public when only a boy of ten. After 1825, he pursued his artistic education in Vienna, principally under Joseph Böhm, subsequently also Joachim's master; he profited by the example and advice of Mayseder; and in the theory of harmony and composition enjoyed the lessons of Seyfried. Four years later, he set out upon his first professional tour, exciting, especially at Munich, and afterwards at Frankfurt and Stuttgart, great interest by the early maturity of his talent. On his return to Vienna, an unhappy passion, it is said, occasioned even then those fits of melancholy to which he was subsequently often liable. In the year 1831 or 1832, he went to Paris, where he played first at the Theatre des Italiens. He remained in Paris for several years. He studied the violinists of the French school, and, above all, became De Beriot's most zealous pupil, the result being that his style, even then distinguished for perfect artistic intelligence and execution, gained also in elegance.

After his sojourn in Paris he first travelled through Holland, giving, at the commencement of 1839, several concerts in Paris, and achieving one success after the other on his continued professional travels, in the course of which he went through almost every country in Europe. The first place he visited was Southern Germany, especially Vienna (1840), where he excited incredible enthusiasm; he then went to the principal towns in North Germany, returning several times to Berlin, as well as to Leipzig, Dresden, &c.; travelled through Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, and, subsequently to 1844, passed several seasons in London; indeed, during the years which immediately preceded his stay at Nice, he found, so to say, a second home in England.

Some fifteen years ago, Ernst married a young lady who was studying for the stage at the Paris Conservatory. Madlle. Siona Levy excited at that time great expectations by her decided histrionic talent, and people saw in her a future successor of Rachel. After her marriage with Ernst, she sometimes gave dramatic recitations at his concerts, and fully realized by these recitations the expectations she had raised; but, very soon after she had achieved this success, she was compelled to renounce art, and could do nothing but devote herself to the care of her husband, whose state continued to get worse and worse.

The last time of Ernst's being in England was in the spring of 1863. The reason of his going there was a faint hope of recovery. Edward Bulwer-Lytton, one of the staunchest of his many friends in England, had prevailed upon him to put himself under hydropathic treatment at Malvern. Dr. Wilson, the celebrated principal of the hydropathic establishment there, came himself to London, on purpose to fetch Ernst, and, with the latter and Madame Ernst, set off for Malvern at the end of April. The warmest wishes of all artists and of all his friends accompanied the virtuoso whom the English rightly called "the most poetic" of all violinists; but the realization of their wishes was not destined to become a fact; Ernst's apparent recovery of strength did not last long, and he returned, probably with very faint hopes in his own breast, to Nice.

The manager of the London Monday Popular Concerts, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, wishing to pay a mark of respect to the invalid traveller, included his quartet in B flat major in the programme of the concert given on the 27th of April. The work had already been very well received at the same concerts the previous summer, and was now rehearsed by MM. Vieuxtemps, Wiener, Webb, and Piatti, at the house of a Mr. Benson, where Ernst resided. The composer, who had previously heard it played only by amateurs, was very much delighted, and thanked the performers most warmly.*

The Quartet was one of the three (the other two are in A and C) in the composition of which the artist sought consolation for his bodily sufferings, from which he was scarcely ever free during the last nine or ten years of his life. In October, 1864, he was once more in Paris, where MM. Holmes (the admirable artistic brothers), Jacquard and Ney played him two of the above Quartets. Stephen Heller wrote of these compositions, at the time, in the following terms:—

"We will not attempt, by a dry analysis, to give an idea of these works, so important from their scope as well as their inward worth. We must not expect to find in them the amiable composer of the Otello and Pirata Fantasias, but we recognize in them the creator, become greater and more clear, of the 'Elegie' and of the Violin Concerto in F sharp major. All that those two works promised is here fulfilled, and we behold an artist of noble nature who has attained the summit of his powers. These Quartets can have been written only by an artist who has continuously studied and himself performed a hundred times the works of the great masters in this branch of composition. From beginning to end, the style is invariably noble, and nowhere do we find aught like cowardly complaisance for inartistic or frivolous ears. The beauty of these works is sprightly and severe, and of the kind which alone secures for a work a future. It must not, however, be supposed, on this account, that they are deficient in melody; the slow movements especially contain expressive, taking, and frequently passionate song. The Scherzos are genuinely humorous; the first is distinguished for, we might almost say, epigrammatic brevity; the other, on the contrary, is well worked out and contains instances of harmonic and rhythmical daring; neither of the two movements, however, reminds the hearer in the least of former creations of the kind, and that is a great merit. In one word: These Quartets announce the complete change of the great virtuoso into the composer and deserve the deepest attention on the part of all musicians and connoisseurs."†

One of these Quartets was, also, performed in June, 1864, at the "Ernst Concert" given in St. James's Hall, London, the proceeds being devoted to the benefit of the sufferer. At this concert, moreover, Joachim played Ernst's "Elegie," and Wieniawski, the Transcription of Schubert's

* The Musical World, No. 17, 1863.

† Revue et Gazette Musicale, No. 45, 1864.

"Erlkönig," while Mad. Dustmann and Sims Reeves were the singers.

As most persons are aware, Ernst published, during his career as a virtuoso, many compositions intended principally to exhibit his play in all its brilliancy. How could he, when his time was taken up by his never-ending professional tours throughout Europe, find leisure for the creation of large serious works? A horrible doom procured him this leisure, though in so fearful a manner. But even among his virtuoso compositions there are a few, some of which in parts, and others throughout (as is the case with the celebrated "Elegie") display a feeling for, and appreciation of, what is elevated and beautiful in Art. His Concerto in F sharp major, too, is a work of this class.

It was, however, as an executant that he was greatest. He was the first since the days of Spohr to combine a truly poetic rendering of the melody with grandeur of tone, for grandeur of tone merely does not by any means constitute soulful song upon the violin. To this, as we are all aware, was added eminent technical skill, thanks to which the greatest difficulties, which he himself was often the first to create (Otello-Fantasia, "Carnival of Venice") were executed with ease and grace, for elegance was among the most prominent qualities of his play. If the latter was not always equal during the latter years of his career as a virtuoso—not the same day for day and hour for hour, this was not exactly a matter for astonishment, if we take into consideration his peculiarity, common to all original artists, of being able to give himself up completely to the full swing of his inspiration only in those happy moments when his natural instinct burst forth, and hence he was reproached for this defect even in his very best years. At a subsequent period, this difference in the excellence of his playing was a natural consequence of his bodily condition, which, with want of strength, naturally produced a paralyzing languor of the mind. Thus as recently as the year 1854, we heard him at a morning concert (that is according to the London fashion a concert given between three and five o'clock in the afternoon) in the Hanover Square Rooms, play his Otello-Fantasia admirably, and the same evening we could scarcely recognize the same artist performing the same piece in Exeter Hall.

For seven or eight years, he resided at Nice, where, on the 8th October at two o'clock, death released him from an existence that was at last simply a burden. As a man, Ernst was respected and beloved, on account of his noble character and practical sympathy for human misfortune and misery, as well as on account of his wit and agreeable manners in the social intercourse of life. In addition to the leading inhabitants of Nice, a long line of poor, who did no less honor to the deceased, followed the corpse. Yet Ernst was anything but rich; it was not from his superfluity that he gave; he denied himself a great deal in order not to withdraw from the needy whom he had once assisted the gift to which they were accustomed. The corpse has been temporarily deposited in a vault, but there can be no doubt that his friends and companions in art will take care that he has a resting place worthy of him.

L. B.

ON ENCORES.—Not long since, while reading a notice of a concert, we were struck by the following sentence: "Not the least pleasant feature of the evening's performance was the fact that not a single encore was even asked for." Here's a writer after our own heart! Here's a text upon which one can expatiate to advantage!

The next day, in reading another paper, we were delighted to observe the following: "A vocalist was recently singing at a private concert, in Paris, when the company were so delighted that they clamored for an encore. The singer looked at her agent to see what she was to do, and he turned to the proprietor of the house with the remark, 'If it is to be an encore, it must be one for me also.' 'Tres bien,' was the reply. The young lady sang again, and the next day double the sum agreed upon was received." This was an agent to have indeed!

Let us look at it. Is not the whole system of encores a nuisance? What is more annoying than the persistent efforts of a few persons clapping their hands stamping their feet, or beating the floor with a cane, insisting on a performer repeating a morceau, either vocal or instrumental, even when it is plain to be seen that it is disagreeable and almost impossible for them to do so, already having nearly exhausted themselves in their efforts? And when they are obliged to acquiesce, what do they but begin in the middle of the piece and get through with it as soon as possible? The effect is gone and the beauty of the music destroyed, almost always.

Again, how absurd in the progress of an opera to interrupt the movement of the work and destroy the illusion by insisting on a singer, or singers, repeating the scene; you might as well ask a dramatic artist to do his dagger or dying scene over again—because you were pleased with it forsooth.

A certain amount of applause is proper, and is expected by all concert givers and operatic artists, but the whole encore business is, rest assured, a bore to the sensible portion of them.

When Gottschalk or Welli play, they seem to expect to be encored; there is always the inevitable first refusal, by a bow and retiring, and on the audience renewing their noise, they always come the second time with alacrity and play something else, which, as they themselves established the precedent, the audience always expect and now demand.

To amateurs especially is applause agreeable, and in the case of a debutant, an encore must be flattering, but if the St. Cecilia, or any other amateur society, will take good advice well meant, they will always put on their programmes, "Encores not permitted."

—Buffalo Comm. Adv.

SEVILLE. Seville is still the city of the guitar, the fan, the song, and the fandango, the ne plus ultra ana zeyya mia of the majo and bull-fighter, of the gipay and contrabandist; the rendezvous of the most picturesque blackguards in the south of Spain, whose beds are on the steps of churches, who lounge and hang about the suburban tabernas, breakfast on a glass of water, and dine on an air on the guitar, argue among each other with the navaja and other such arguments of point; make love to their neighbor's pocket, and know of heaven what they see of it through the golden juice of an orange, as they lie on their backs in the cool shade, a picture of contentment and sweet nothing-to-do. The town has preserved more of the character of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries than of the Moorish period, of which, however, many vestiges remain. This is evinced in the style of the private houses of the nobility, the general appearance of the edifices, &c., which all denote the influence of Italian taste, and its happy combination with the Moorish style. The people themselves seem to have lost that grave, solemn stern and melancholy mood of the Spaniard of the fifteenth century, which he inherited from the Moors, and to retain only that gay, brilliant capa y espada, devil-may-care humor of the seventeenth century in Spain, coupled with the more sombre types of the inquisitorial and inquisitioned, somewhat suspicious, jealous, and haughty spirit of Lope de Rueda, Calderon's and Vega's dramas. Seville is still in many points the city of pleasure and love of Beaumarchais-Rossini's Barbier. And look, there goes Almaviva, on his prancing horse, gay and dashing, now dressed in velvets and flageolet buttons, all sunshine and moonshine, invincible and enamorado, sending kisses to Rosina, who peeps at him behind her mirador. He is always that personification of youth, love and summer; and Rosina is always as pretty under her black mantilla, though she now reads French novels, and knows the names of Lor Biron y Saxpir; and Figaro is not the jeu qui, and Figaro là, laughing, joking, running to and fro, all fuss and intrigue, all gossip and mirth, for his being raised to sangrador y comadron, and other high offices within his calling; nay, Bartolo himself is not dead, only now he dresses like an undertaker, is a man dil uno doce, wears a diamond pin in his shirt, and a wide gold ring on the forefinger, and looks as sharp as ever, whether Rosina is dropping a bouquet or picking up a scented caquelita. Basilio is also alive, and there we may see him sneaking through the crowd, with his long barco, tile-shaped greasy hat, his worn-out satana, his bilious skin, his hypocritical eyes: vade retrò! and would that thou wert but a spectre of bygone times, and not a sad reality of the present! The other types, may they always remain, natural and charming offsprings of a land of sun and love; and all members of the immortal family of Mozart's and Byron's Don Juan, a pure Sevillano, of Don Miguel de Mañara, of Don Bustos Tavera, of La Estrella de Seville. The houses are superior to those of the rest of Andalusian cities, in style and appearance; they are generally of two or three stories, gaily painted outside, with lofty rooms, numerous rejas, charming patios, or inner courts, which, during the summer, are covered with an awning, and furnished with pianos, sofas, &c., for the evening tertulia, when the whole town is converted into a vast drawing room. They are, moreover, decorated with brightly painted and gilt miradores, which, with their glass and flowers, look like conservatories suspended. A lengthened residence will be found more pleasant here than anywhere else in Spain.—A Guide to Spain; by H. O'Shea.

Musical Education in Prussia.

The following report was drawn up in the Ministry of Public Education in Prussia, and has been received through Earl Russell, from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin:

The study of music in Prussia enjoys a considerable range, in consequence of the numerous private establishments, whose founders and managers do that which in many other states is done by public Academies (conservatoires) at the expense of the State. Of such private establishments there are, for example, the Conservatoire of Music of Dr. Stern, the new Musical Academy of Professor Kullack, the Singing Academy, under the direction of Professor Grell, in Berlin, as well as the Conservatoire of music in Cologne, founded by a company (Verein) of friends of music, which is under the Director of Music, Herr Hiller. There is no want of similar private institutions in other larger provincial towns. No official reports are made upon them. Occasional reports are made in the programme of the Stern and Kullack establishments. Till now there has been no State Conservatoire for music in Prussia, and State money has only been exceptionally applied to such musical educational establishments, and more frequently for the support of extraordinary talents. With reference to the government provision for musical students, the Senate of the Berlin Academy of Arts has a section whose members, Messieurs Bach, Grell, and Taubert, conduct the musical division of the Academy. The annual cost of this division, in which instruction is given in the theory of music and the art of composition, amounts to about 1,800 thalers. The number of pupils is not fixed.

In the Royal Institute of Church Music at Berlin, under the direction of Professor Baeh, with four teachers, instruction is given to twenty pupils in organ playing, pianoforte playing, violin and singing gratis, as well as in the theory and the history of music. The annual expenses of this institution amount to 2,807 thalers.

One academical musical institute exists at the Royal University at Breslau, having one director and two teachers, with salaries amounting to 450 dollars, and a similar one at Königsberg, with two teachers. Other universities have likewise offices of teachers of music.

Singing forms an element of education at gymnasia schools and other educational establishments. Instruction in music, that is, in organ playing, pianoforte playing, violin playing, and singing, is given in the school-teachers' seminaries, at which the organists and chorists are educated, theoretically and practically, in music. Besides the above-named teaching schools of this character, there is a formation school for singing for the persons belonging to the cathedral choir (Dom-chor), and one for singing and instrumental music at the Royal Opera.

Berlin, the 5th July, 1865.

Musical Correspondence.

"L'Africaine" in New York.

NEW YORK, DEC. 4.—The principal musical event of the past two weeks has been the production of Meyerbeer's "Africaine" at the Academy of Music. So many accounts and analyses of this work, copied from European papers, have already reached the musical reading public of America, that a description of the plan, plot, and character of the opera is entirely unnecessary and uncalled for at this late date. And yet, among the mæss of French, German and English criticisms upon the "Africaine," it is astonishing how very few we have met with, reliable, and bearing upon them the stamp of good faith. Aside from interested or mercenary motives, we have had the unconditional Meyerbeer worshipper, from incorrect M. Blaze de Bury down; his antipode, who goes to hear the Meyerbeer opera pre-determined to find nothing in it but good instrumentation and "effect-hashery;" and the countless herd of smart writers, who cover their superficial opinions and want of sound musical knowledge, by unwitty witticisms, and covert sneers at what they do not more than half understand. In this barren desert of verbiage,—as our flowery old friend Saadi would probably remark,—how seldom do we find repose beneath the cooling palms of reflection, or listen to the reviving murmurs of the fountains of the oases of truth! One good effect of the want of weight in most of what we have read on the subject, is, that we go to a first hearing of the work with a mind almost fresh to receive impressions, and as much uninfluenced as it is possible to be.

After a careful study of the score, and an attentive public hearing, we find ourselves ranking "L'Africaine" as, if not wholly the first, at least among the best of Meyerbeer's operas. There is no occasion to repeat that it is finely instrumented, well calculated for scenic effect and for the singers, provided they possess natural and acquired powers beyond the common; these qualities we naturally expect, and usually find, in Meyerbeer's works. But what especially pleases us in this, is its remarkable spontaneity of melody, and of impassioned feeling, in the salient points of the action. The introduction, "Adieu, mon doux rivage" to the romance: "Pour celle qui m'est chère," sung by Inez, is very charming, although it failed of effect here, the difficult intervals not having been sung with perfect purity of intonation by Mlle. ORTOLANI. The romance itself is of an ordinary cast, though not unpleasant. The prayer: "Dieu que le monde revère" has been compared to the "Bénédiction des pagnards" in the Huguenots, but the comparison results vastly to the advantage of the latter, we think; this prayer is neither noble nor original in motivo, and obtains its effect principally from the sonority of bass voices in unison. The finale to this act is one of the finest things of the kind we know. The "Air du Sommeil," with which Selika opens the second act is agreeable, but not as original as it has been said to be (so any one who takes the trouble to compare its first motivo with Schubert's little known song, "Der Leyermann," will find). There are many dramatic moments in the duet between Selika and Vasco, the air sung by Nelusko, and the ensemble that concludes this act, but nothing of high significance.

The third act, on board ship, is, from a musical point of view, the weakest in the opera. The female chorus: "Le rapide et léger navire," with which it opens, and one of the best numbers, was entirely omitted here. The ballad: "Adamastor roi des vagues," sung by Nelusko, although effective, resembles many sea songs of a similar character. The whole of this act was very much "cut."

The fourth act is the finest of the opera; rich in melodies of no common order, filled with tone-pictures of the warmest and most sensuous coloring, it delights the ear, while at the same time it satisfies the intellect by its vivid illustration of what our imagination accepts as a semi-civilized ideal of tropical life. The passage sung by Nelusko: "L'avoir tant adorée," the long duo for soprano and tenor, the female chorus: "Remparts de gaze" (although this latter recalls to us the episode: "Jetso zurück in die Rosenlauben" in Schumann's houri chorus, a little more than is necessary) are all morceaux of marked beauty. Another comparison has been often made between the love duet of this act and that of Raoul and Valentine in the Huguenots; it is hardly well founded, as they are so different in coloring; but at the same time neither loses by the comparison. After a duo between Inez and Selika, not very remarkable in contents or effect, we are led to the foot of the manneel tree. The scena sung by Selika is of the highest order of dramatic expression. This is preceded by some sixteen bars, Andante cantabile, played in unison by the strings. This passage, although a large and noble phrase, seems hardly equal to the excessive laudation it has received, and we cannot but think that a great portion of its effect is due to the peculiar tone produced by the violins on the fourth string, the momentary absence of harmony, the impression produced by the scene, and especially by the return of harmony at the conclusion of the period. Still, this calculation of effect, even, is the merit of the composer. The finale was almost entirely cut out at this performance. Indeed, so much was omitted throughout the opera, that its representation did not last above four hours (!), including "waits" between the acts.

The best interpretations of the several characters were those of Vasco da Gama, and Nelusko, by Signori MAZZOLENI and BELLINI. The former appeared to better advantage than he has probably ever done before here, and the metallic quality of his voice admirably suited the music he had to sing. We only wished that Signor Mazzoleni could make a more effective and frequent use of the mezza voce. Signor Bellini, always a careful, as well as a gifted artist, increased his artistic reputation by his energetic representation of the semi-savage Nelusko. Mme. ZUCCHI looked a picturesque and glowing African, her voice was not always equal to the great requirements of the part, but her acting was undeniably dramatic. Mme. ORTOLANI was an agreeable and gently feminine Inez, but her vocal powers were hardly adequate.

Don Pedro found a weak (vocally speaking) representative in ANTONUCCI; the minor parts were inefficiently filled, and the chorus was insufficient and imperfect. A large number of persons appeared on the stage in the spectacular scenes, but how awkward and badly drilled were their evolutions! An amusing anachronism occurred in the "ship" act; this opens, in the original score (as we have mentioned above) with a chorus, sung by the ladies of Inez's suite, in her cabin; as this was omitted, some of the ladies, to beguile time while the sailors on deck were singing their chorus, unfolded and read the papers. Rather remarkable, when we remember that Gutenberg's invention only occurred a few years before the expeditions of Vasco da Gama. The scenes of the fourth and fifth acts reflect great credit on the painter CALYO, and are not devoid of truly artistic merit. The orchestra, considering the few rehearsals that were had, and the difficulties of a Meyerbeer score, did remarkably well, under Mr. CARL BERGMANN'S attentive conductorship.

A great deal of wit, good and bad, has been expended on the plot of this opera, but we cannot see that it is more improbable than that of a hundred others. On the contrary, we find it less so, if we except two or three slight, but saliently unlikely incidents, such as the map scene, which we are astonished to find unmarked by so clear-sighted a mind as that of Meyerbeer, and in a man so sensitive to ridicule as he was. But the subject must have been highly attractive to a composer, presenting, as it does an idea—the struggle of adventurous genius against bigotry and envy—besides dramatic incident in abundance, and variety of coloring.

We have quoted above from Mr. Scribes' original libretto; it is perhaps unnecessary to add that the opera was sung in Italian by Maretzek's company.

***

Music Abroad.

Musical Notes from Vienna.

The Imperial city is progressing in the right direction, and bids fair soon to beat Berlin in the matter of really good, sterling music. It now possesses two Quartet Societies; Berlin at present does not know what a quartet means; at any rate, it never gets the chance of hearing one played in public. As a sort of standard by which our readers may form a notion of the state of musical matters, we give the following list, taken from the Vienna Recensionen, of the programmes recently issued by the various Societies here:—Society of the Friends of Music, Six Concerts, under the direction of Herr Herbeck, on the 12th Nov., 3rd, 17th Dec., 1865, 25th Feb., 11th and 27th March, 1866. Among the larger compositions to be performed are "Gottes Zeit," Cantata for Solo, Chorus and Orchestra, Bach; all the music to König Stephan; Ninth Symphony, Beethoven;—Symphony in D, Cherubini;—"Erlkönigs Töchterlein," Ballad for Solo, Chorus and Orchestra, Gade;—"Suite for Orchestra" (new) Lachner;—Legende von der heiligen Elizabeth, for Solo, Chorus, and Orchestra, Liszt;—Elijah, Mendelssohn;—Symphony in B-minor, Schubert;—"Concertstück für Piano-forte und Orchestra," Weber.—Philharmonic. Eight Concerts, 5th, 19th, Nov., 10th, 26th, Dec., 1865, 14th, Jan., 18th Feb., 4th, 18th March, under Herr Dessoff, in the Opera-house. Among the larger compositions are included: Columbus, a Symphony, Abert;—"Passacaglia," (scored by Esser); Concerto for stringed instruments, Bach;—Symphonies, Nos 2, 3, 4; overture to Coriolan; and Op. 124, Piano-forte Concerto in G major, Beethoven;—"Marche Solennelle," Cherubini;—overture to Iphigenia, Gluck;—"Suite in canonischer Form," Grimm;—overture to Sacrotula, Goldmark;—"Water Music," Handel; Symphony in G, Haydn;—"Concert Overture," Hiller; overture to Uthal, Méhul; overture to Ruy Blas; Piano-forte Concerto in G minor, Mendelssohn; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Symphony in A, Reinecke; Duet, Op. 140, arranged by Joachim for grand Orchestra; overture to Fierabras; interlude to Rosamunde, Schubert; Symphony in D minor, Schumann; overture to Samor, Vogler; Violin Concerto in A minor, Viotti.—Helmberger's Quartet-Evenings, 12th, 26th Nov., 3rd and 7th Dec., 1865, 14th, 21st, 28th January, 4th February: Concerto for Piano-forte, Flute, Violin, and Accompaniment; Concerto in C major for two Pianos, with Accompaniment, Bach; Quartets, Op. 18, F major; Op. 59, C major; Op. 74, E flat major; Op. 127, E flat major; Op. 130, B flat major; Op. 135, F major; Quintet in C major; Piano-forte Trio in D major, Beethoven; Quintet, Hager; Quartets in B flat major, G minor, Haydn; Quartet in E minor, Mendelssohn; Quartet in A major, Mozart; Quartet (MS.) Preyer; Piano-forte Quartet, Rubinstein; Quintet in C major; Piano-forte Trio flat in B major, Schubert; Quartet in F major; Piano-forte trio in F major, Schumann; Quartet in G major, Spohr. Laub's Quartet-Evenings, 9th, 16th, 30th November, 7th, 14th, 28th December, 1865, 4th, 11th January, 1866. Piano-forte-Violin Sonata, Bach; Sonata in A for Piano-forte and Violin; Quartets, Op. 18, B flat major; and Op. 135; Quintet in E flat major; Septet in E flat major, Beethoven; four Quartets, Haydn; Quartet in D major, Mendelssohn; Stringed Trio; Quintet in C major, Mozart; Quartet, Richter; Sonata for Piano-forte and Violin in A minor, Rubinstein; Quartet in E minor; Double Quartet in D minor, Spohr; Quartet in E minor, Volkmann. In reference to the above, the Recensionen makes the following observations:—"The concert programmes for the season about to commence have not disappointed the belief we expressed, some short time since, that the managers of the various concert-enterprises would endeavor this year to present the public with something especially interesting. These gentlemen appear to be at length convinced that they can no longer get on with old compositions alone, however beautiful and however classical those compositions may be. The apathy, the indifference, manifested by the public last season, was, probably, the cause which induced them to come to this conviction. On the present occasion, we find novelty much more copiously represented than formerly. The Society of the Friends of Music give us two grand modern works, a 'Suite' by Lachner, and Liszt's Heilige Elizabeth, with two grand old works, also new for Vienna: the Symphonies by Cherubini and Schubert; if, in addition to this, we reflect that Beethoven's complete music to König Stephan may almost be reckoned a novelty, and that the execution of the 'great Ninth,' with the admirable chorus of the Society, is something exceedingly interesting, we see—especially as, according to report, this year the reed instruments, hitherto the weak side of the Society's orchestra, will be in admirable force—that everything possible will be done to render the Society's concerts attractive. The Philharmonics, too, step forth, this year, from out their ultra Conservatism, and present us with five new modern works, three considerable ones (a 'Suite' by Grimm, and Symphonies by Abert and Reinecke, and two shorter ones (overtures by Goldmark and Hiller). To these they add two old works, new here; Handel's 'Water Music' and Joachim's Orchestral Arrangement of Schubert's Duet, Op. 140.—It is with pleasure, too, that we see Helmberger's Quartet (in which Herr Hofmann takes the second, in the place of Herr Durt, who has retired) return to its former practice of introducing novelties; we find in the programme three new works (in eight concerts there would, by the bye, have been room for a fourth, we should say), by Rubinstein, Preyer, and Hager. We have more than ordinary pleasure in greeting the last name, after it has been so long absent from our concert bills. That, at his eight Quartet Concerts, Herr Laub should give us only two new works by Richter and Volkmann, is a course of which, with our principles, we cannot by any possibility approve."

LEIPZIG. The Orchestra's correspondent writes (Nov. 7):

The long winter evenings have already begun to make their appearance, and the Gewandhaus concerts, the chief attraction for the musical public at Leipzig, have recommenced.

In the first concert of the 5th ult., the instrumental pieces comprised Beethoven's Overture, Op. 124; Schubert's C major Symphony; and a Violin Concerto (No. 5, D minor) composed and performed by Herr Ferd. David. The vocal pieces—air from "Elias," "Höre, Israel, höre des Herren Stimme" (Mendelssohn), and a recitative and cavatina from Glinka's new opera, "Russlan und Ludmila," were well given by Frau von Kotschetoff, from St. Petersburg, who was, however, heard to most advantage in Schubert's charming song, "Wohin?" in the second concert of the 12th ult. She is quite a new appearance in Germany. Her voice (mezzo-soprano) is pleasing and of good school, but she does not possess that command over it which is necessary in the air from Weber's "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschmäh'n," which she sang in the last-named concert. Warmth of expression and pathetic feeling were quite missing. Frä. Agnes Zimmermann, from London, gave Mendelssohn's G minor concerto, for which she obtained well-earned applause, although the tempo taken was altogether scampering.

In commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Goethe's being enrolled as a Leipzig student on Oct. 19, 1765, Beethoven's music to "Egmont" was performed in the third concert, the two soli being sung by Frau von Kotschetoff. Schumann's D minor symphony and two divertissements for the harp by Herr Franz Points, formed rest of the programme. The instrumental pieces in this as well as in the other concerts that have as yet taken place, are so familiar to the habitués, and in fact to the musical world at large, that a comment on them would be needless.

The first concert for chamber-music was held on the 21st ult. The selection on this occasion was as follows:—Quartet, D major—Allegro di molto, Adagio affettuoso, Allegretto alla Zingaresse, Presto scherzando—Haydn; Grand Quartet, B major, Op. 130—Beethoven; Quintet, G minor—Mozart. All these numbers were nobly represented by Concertmeister David and Röntgen (violin), Herrmann and Hunger (viola), and Lübeck (violoncello). The second and fifth movements—presto and cavatina—in Beethoven's Quartet were remarkably well led by David, and repented by general desire.

Frau von Szarvady (Wilhelmine Clauss), the celebrated pianist from Paris, is to give two or three recitals here, towards the latter end of the month.

Ullmann, the impresario, who has been lately grazing in Berlin with his troupe, gives his unwiderruflich letzte Concerte—positively last concerts—in January. They will probably take place, as before, in the Central Hall. His net profits here last winter are said to have amounted to 4,684 thaler, 15 groschen (£700). Not bad!

And again, Nov. 9:

The second concert of the Euterpe-Verein, which took place yesterday, can without doubt be regarded as an important event in the musical life of this town. Since these concerts, now so firmly established in public favor, were first instituted, indefatigable research and industry on the part of the director and the members of the orchestra have never been wanting, and it is to this that their present prosperous issue may be traced.

Gluck's imperishable work, "Orpheus and Eurydice," formed the programme of last evening's concert. The room was literally thronged, and certainly every lover of music left at the conclusion with feelings of gratitude to the direction who have so well succeeded in constructing the cycles of concerts hitherto given. Who can fail to be moved by the piercing cries of anguish with which Orpheus interrupts the sweet sensitive song of the weeping nymphs, or at the grace of Eurydice; the charming melody with which he touches the hearts of the demons who refuse him admittance into the realm of shades; the majestic chorus of these dismal beings who, in different gradations, express now their anger, then their emotion; the masterly duet of Orpheus and Eurydice, now restored to life; the whole scene of the dangers encountered, which he pictures with such poetic fire; the weakness of Eurydice, and the final step of despair! All these numbers are gems of harmony and musical expression.

Hector Berlioz describes the first scene in the second act as one of the highest aspirations of Gluck, where it says:—

Tödlicher Schrecken, Entsetzen ergreife ihn,
Wenn ihm mit schrecklichem Drohen
Den Eingang der Cerberus wehrt.

This passage was most brilliantly rendered by the orchestra, as, indeed, the whole work was. The "Eurydice" and "Amor" were given by Frau Julienne Hirsch (the wife of a wealthy citizen) with consummate mastery and overpowering expression. Frä. Baer, from Berlin, as Orpheus, made a favorable impression by her fine voice, but false intonation in the high notes and a rather monotonous delivery frequently impaired the effect of the part. The Paris edition of the score was made use of in this performance, but the arrangements for piano (of which the one edited by Peters, of Leipzig, deserves attention) had also been compared. The whole performance reflected great credit both on the director and members of the Euterpe-Verein.

The Schiller-Verein of Leipzig celebrates to-morrow the anniversary of the poet's natal day. The programme of the festivities is as follows:—Friday, 16th November.—Anniversary of Schiller's Birthday, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon. Procession from the Oberschenke Tavern at Gohlis* to the Schillerhaus; decoration of the tablet in the parish school-room and distribution of books to industrious children. At 7 o'clock in the evening, in the Saloons of the Hotel de Pologne, Concert. Overture to "Turandot," Franz Lachner; Address on dramatic poetry, by Professor O. Marbach; Overture, "Wilhelm Tell," Rossini. Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Air from "Fidelio," Frä. Karg; Recital, Frä. Goetz; (a) "The Fisher" (Goethe), song, with accompaniment, M. Hauptmann; (b) "The Maiden's Lament" (Schiller), Franz Schubert—Frä. Clara Schmidt; Symphony, F major, No. 8, Beethoven.

The theatre direction announces for Saturday, Schiller's "Maria Stuart" in Italian (translated by Maffei), with the renowned Adelaide Ristori del Grillo as the heroine (her only appearance). Although the prices of admission are doubled, I hear just now that the house is already sold out.

In the fourth Gewandhaus Concert (we translate from the Revue et Gazette Musicale) M. Saint-Saëns, of Paris, appeared in a piano-forte Concerto of his own composition and in several pieces of J. S. Bach. If not as a composer, yet as an executant in every case, especially as an interpreter of the works of Bach, his reception was flattering at Leipzig, as it had been a few days before at Frankfurt. The manner in which Bach's instrumental music has been arranged by M. Saint-Saëns for the piano, denotes a consummate musician, one profoundly initiated into the style of the great John Sebastian. The other pieces in the concert were Gade's Overture "In the Highlands," the Ballet airs of Gluck's Orpheus, and Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

BERLIN. The Weekly Review (New York), says:

The German papers abound with criticisms on Carlotta Patti and her sister Adelina, who visit every city in Europe with the same rapidity as the cholera, but seem to be less endemic than epidemic. It must be noticed, however, that the critics speak more about the gentlemen who accompany Carlotta Patti than about that lady herself. Thus Mr. Gumprecht, the blind critic of the Berlin National Zeitung (undoubtedly the best critic in Germany and perhaps in Europe) speaks with great delight of the performances of Chamber music by Messrs. F. David, Vieuxtemps, and Patti, and thinks that a more perfect execution of the classical masters never has been heard before. He animadverts, however, pretty severely upon Mr. Alfred Jaell's piano playing in the trio which he played with David and Patti. Mr. Gumprecht thinks that Jaell tried too much to show by his "bravura," and that he split the last movement of Schumann's trio into atoms. The scherzo was, as Mr. G. says, "entirely smothered by the leaden weight of the accents."

The violoncellist referred to above as Patti and as Pitti, is doubtless Piatti, of London. And is the said Herr Gumprecht a better critic than Ferdinand Hiller for instance?

* A little village close to Leipzig.

† The house in Gohlis where Schiller lived and wrote his "Lied an die Freude," to which Beethoven set music in his 9th Symphony.

PARIS. The season for the Concerts of Popular Classical Music was inaugurated in Paris at the old locality, the Cirque Napoleon, again under the direction of M. Pasdeloup. The programme comprised the overture to Oberon, Haydn's Symphony, No. 4 Beethoven's Symphony in A major, and the Canzonetta Movement from Mendelssohn's Quartet, Op. 12. The Canzonetta was re-demanded with acclamations. At the second concert the following pieces were given:—March by Meyerbeer, Symphony in G minor by Mozart, Allegretto un poco Agitato (Op. 50), by Mendelssohn, Overture to Fidelio, No. 3, Beethoven, and Fragments from the Septuor of Beethoven. The programme of the third concert on Sunday last, included the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven; the overtures to Geneviève de Brabant (Schumann) and Loreley (Wallace); the Grand "Morceau d'Unisson," from the Africaine; and Mozart's Quintet in A, for clarinet and strings. The larghetto of the Quintet was re-demanded. In addition, a Belgian violinist, M. Jacques Duprez, professor at the Conservatoire of Liège, played Mendelssohn's Concerto, had a good success, and was warmly applauded.

The correspondent of the London Musical World attended the representation of Duprez's opera Jeanne d'Arc, and was not very favorably impressed; he says:

M. Duprez is not wanting in a certain tunefulness, but it is tune of a very common kind, and I find no one bar in the new opera either original or refined. His instrumentation is feeble and lacks color and character, but still it indicates some knowledge of harmony, and, if not striking, is certainly not botch-work. The execution was far from excellent, nor, indeed, was everything done that possibly could be done to accomplish a success. As, however, every Frenchman present was anxious about the first work of their quondam superlative tenor, a certain success was inevitable, and so Jeanne d'Arc has been chronicled as having made a great hit and as likely to influence the future art-inspirations of the composer. I have not the least objection that M. Duprez should enjoy his triumph—he has done his best to earn it,—and has been a glorious artist in his day; but, between ourselves, when next he writes an opera, I hope I may not be present to hear it.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 9, 1865.

Symphony Concerts.

At last we are to have again some Orchestral Concerts here in Boston; such concerts as the lovers of the highest kind of music have for several years sadly felt the want of,—a want not supplied by the Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union, which, attractive as they are in their way, never have pretended to take the place of the old evening ("Philharmonic") concerts, but only to serve as accessory to them, studying amusement rather more than Art, addressing themselves in a great measure to the children, and, if they have given us a good many Symphonies, for which we may be thankful, yet outlining them, as it were, with much too small an orchestra. In a word they have been cheap, popular concerts, with rich things always in their programmes, but not with any earnest and artistic unity of programme. Even our larger concerts have commonly been faulty in the programmes, for the reason that they have been speculative enterprises, in which it was necessary to cater to incongruous varieties of taste to fill the hall. This, and the want of any permanent organization, any thing established and sure to come round without need of a painful and hazardous experiment de novo every winter, at last sapped the confidence of the very class of people who have classical music (to use a worn-out term for want of a better) the most at heart; the hard-pressed subscription barely brought more than half-performance of the good things promised, and this before audiences in which one missed the really musical persons. Then came distractions, like the War, the overshadowing Great Organ (while that was a novelty), and finally the monopoly of the musicians by the theatres, so that it has been impossible on any evening to unite even such moderate orchestra as Boston can at best afford for a fair rendering of a Symphony.

Meanwhile, to be sure, we have not suffered musical starvation. We have had other good things, in other forms, oratorios, chamber music, visitations of German opera, &c. Still none of these could quite make good our loss; a fountain, by many remembered as sweeter than all these, was closed. The truth is, a city is below character, musically, so long as it is unprovided with sure and regular supplies of great orchestral music. Boston without its concerts answering to those of the "Philharmonic Societies" of other cities, of the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, the Conservatoire in Paris, &c., must not boast itself a musical city. If we could spend sixty thousand dollars on an Organ, we should count six times sixty cheap for this. At all events, the most conscious musical want of our community for a long time has been that of orchestral concerts worthy of our character as a people of taste.

At last a hope has sprung up, and from a new quarter. As will be seen by the advertisement on our first page, the Harvard Musical Association, a society of gentlemen interested in music simply on grounds of higher culture, wishing to have it take its equal rank among the "humanities" not only of the University at Cambridge, but of the University of American life, announce a series of Six "Symphony Concerts." The plan has some hopeful features, which entitle it to peculiar consideration.

1. It is not a money-making speculation. There is no possible motive for undertaking it except the desire of good music, and the hope of doing a good thing for Art in Boston. Every dollar received will be spent in making the concerts more perfect. The musicians of course must be paid for their labor, as must the printer and the doorkeeper; but the organizers and sponsors of the concerts have only their labor (with some risk) for their pains.

2. It is no issuing of proposals for an uncertain enterprise. There is no if about it; no contingency of filling a subscription paper; the announcement is positive; the concerts will be given. The members of the Association among themselves are pledged for a sufficient number of season tickets to make the thing financially sure before inviting the co-operation of the public. A goodly audience, of the best character that could be assembled, is already made up; now they open the subscription list to all.

3. The concerts are so well guaranteed as to have no motive for catering to any interests but the higher one of Art. They have no need to sink their character to make them pay.

4. The determination is to make them as good in matter and in execution as the orchestral means of Boston (too limited indeed!) will allow. But if we cannot have a great orchestra, we can make out a very respectable one of fifty instruments or more and one point we can at least secure, that of pure programmes, which one excellence, persisted in, will be a greater gain than we have yet had opportunity to realize except in small chamber-concert circles. By pure programmes is meant those into which nothing enters which is not in good taste, artistic, genial, such as outlives fashion; nothing which is coarse, hacknied, shallow, "sonational" in a poorer sense; nothing which does not harmonize by contrast or affinity with all the other pieces, and serve a general unity of design; nothing which tends to make a senseless medley of a concert, and to rudely turn us out from the charmed sphere in which a Beethoven has held us into a maudlin or a vulgar element. For us Americans, in our comparatively infantile and unsettled stage of musical taste, such purity of programme may reasonably exclude many things, especially new things, which would be perfectly safe for audiences in Germany. We need at least one set of concerts in which we may hear only composers of unquestioned excellence. When we are so well acquainted with these, that we can afford to be curious about novelties, and in hearing such know how to judge them from a real standard of the best, then we too, like the Europeans, may do well sometimes to vary the old story by seeking if there be any good in Wagner, Liszt, Raff and others of the so-called "Future." But now we had better be learning the taste of wholesomer and pleasanter and better food. When we really know the good wine, we shall not be deceived by the bad; but if we begin with promiscuous mingling of all kinds, we never shall know the good. It is therefore designed to keep these concerts, this one set of concerts, in this sense pure. There are plenty of opportunities to hear the other things, the "effect" pieces, the hacknied things, the questionable things, the things which set the hands and feet of the crowd going, but which bore the man of musical taste and feeling, in all the other concerts more or less. Will you not allow us to have one place, where a certain unity of tone and purpose reigns, sacred to the immortal and unquestioned master spirits of our Art, one place for culture? Must every experiment be vitiated and made neutral by the admission of incongruous elements? It will at least be something to hear a Symphony in right connections.

5. But programmes may be pure, even in a more exclusive sense than is here proposed, and yet not be dull or heavy. Charming variety, freedom from on-nut, and constant renewal of delight are perfectly possible in a concert where everything is artistic and by unquestioned masters. All depends on the selection, grouping, proportioning, contrasting of the materials. This will be matter of careful study in the preparation of these six concerts. Each will contain a Symphony, in which form Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, at least, will be represented, and preference to some extent will be given to the less familiar; all being of unquestioned excellence, we can afford to let some of the greatest which we have heard so often yield their turn for once to others which are also great. One of the greater Overtures, too, will each time be chosen on the same principle; and perhaps also one lighter one. There will be Concertos by Mr. Dresel, Mr. Lang, and others, and perhaps sometimes a Violin Concerto, with smaller solos of the nicer kind.

The engagement of distinguished artists, however, will depend on the sale of tickets; but in no case will singer or player be introduced to the injury of the general unity and spirit of the programme. A really good singer who will sing good things, or else none at all! But various resources are at the command of the Committee for giving variety and fresh charm to these concerts. A male chorus of members of the Harvard Musical Association and others will probably sing in one or more concerts, with orchestra, some of the Antigone choruses of Mendelssohn, and things from Weber, Cherubini, &c., seldom if ever heard here. The entire "Midsummer Night's Dream" music with female chorus may form the second part of a concert; selections from Gluck's Orpheus may serve a similar purpose. Hummel's Septet will be sure to please. None of these (and more things) can yet be absolutely promised; we name them only as a hint of the kind of variety aimed at.

6. The concerts will be given on Thursday afternoons, from 4 to 6 o'clock, when it is late enough to light up, but not too late for suburban to get home to tea or a late dinner. It is thought that this time will prove convenient and pleasant to the largest number of concert-goers. Of course the evening is the natural time for such things, but the theatre engagements of the musicians make it impossible to collect a sufficient orchestra on any evening in the week.

Thursday afternoon will have at least the charm of novelty. We shall see how the experiment will work. The first concert will be given on the 28th inst.

7. Finally, it is the belief of those who have undertaken this enterprise, that a fair measure of success in this experimental series will "pave the way to a permanent organization of Orchestral Concerts, whose certain periodical recurrence and high, unpromising character may be always counted on in future by the friends of good music in Boston." It is in fact the first step in a plan for bringing together the many lovers and longers for this kind of music who never yet have been united by any concerts on the old plans. It seeks to organize the audience for Symphony and other kindred music; so that in fact the more musical audience gives the concerts, and thus controls them and keeps the programmes up to a truer standard than they are ever likely to keep in the hands of those who give concerts only to make money.

CONCERTS AT HAND. The announcements for the month to come are many and of much interest.

This evening, at Chickering's, the third of the delightful Soirées of Messrs. KREISSMANN and LEONHARD.

Monday and Wednesday evenings, Master RICHARD COKER, the boy soprano with the wonderful voice, gives concerts at the Music Hall, assisted by Mrs. J. S. Cary, contralto, Mr. Weeks, tenor (from New York), Mr. Lang, pianist, and Henri Mollenhauer, violoncellist.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB make a strong beginning next Tuesday evening of their 17th Season of four Chamber Concerts. Programme very rich: Quintet for piano and wind instruments, op. 16, by Beethoven, with aid of J. C. D. Parker, pianist, Hamann, horn, Ribas, oboe, and Eltz, bassoon; (first time);—Mozart's E-flat Quintet, No. 5;—Quintet No. 15, in A-minor, Op. 132, Beethoven (first time). Important additions to the repertoire for the following concerts are named in the advertisement.

Thanksgiving evening, a miscellaneous concert in Tremont Temple (Miss Adams, soprano, Miss Ryan, contralto, Mr. J. Whitney, tenor, Mr. Ryder, basso).

Saturday, 16th, Kreissmann and Leonhard again.

During the following week we may look for the return of Mme. PAREPA and the other members of the Batemann troupe, minus Mr. Dannreuther, whom we shall miss. Some half a dozen concerts will be given; and then:

Mme. PAREPA, on the Saturday evening before Christmas will lend her admirable aid to the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY in giving a more perfect performance of Judas Maccabeus, with probably a new tenor,—an opportunity which no one will wish to lose. On the next evening, Sunday 24th, the Messiah, also with Parepa. And there are hints too of yet a third oratorio (perhaps Elijah) under the same good auspices.

Dec. 28th, the first of the "SYMPHONY CONCERTS" more fully explained above.

In the second week of January we understand we are to have MARETZKE's Opera troupe, after brief visits to Baltimore and Philadelphia.

The GREAT ORGAN is still heard every Wednesday and Saturday noon, and Sunday evenings, when the Hall is not otherwise occupied. Mr. Lang, Mr. Whiting, Mr. Willecox, Dr. Tuckerman and Mrs. Frohock continue to please really large audiences for what has become so old a story, but one whose interest is not exhausted in a day or in a few years. Mr. Paine, by some change of programme not explained to us, did not play the other evening.

We are happy to notice that Mr. S. P. Prentiss, whose card appears in another column has established himself in Boston. We trust he may receive that success, which as a teacher he merits.

NEW MUSIC.—We have only room to hint at few of the choice things lately published which will make desirable Christmas presents to musical friends. For instance, the Songs by Franz, now publishing, with German and English words, by Ditson; some eight or ten of these already out, and of the very choicest, most poetical of song creations. Also similar series of the Songs of Schumann and of Mendelssohn.—Then there are all the Nightingales and the Polonaises of Chopin, invaluable to the pianist. Again, the handsome and convenient octavo vocal and piano scores of Oratorios which the same house have just issued: Judas Maccabeus, St. Paul, Eli, &c., &c.

We must thankfully acknowledge the receipt (from Mr. Walter, organist of Trinity Chapel in New York) of the elegant edition which he has published, by subscription, of one of the finest of the English Church Te Deums, namely "Hodges in E," or Consecration Service, composed A.D. 1846, by EDWARD HODGES, Mus. Doc., so long organist of Trinity Church. A finely engraved portrait of Dr. Hodges accompanies the work, of which we hope soon to have time to say more.

FRENCH THEATRE. Nothing more artistic and graceful in all its parts has ever been offered here in the way of acting, than the little comedies, vaudevilles, &c., with which Messrs. Juignet and Drivet's company have been regaling the most refined and cultivated of Boston audiences in the Tremont Theatre during the past month. We are happy to learn that their success encourages them to prolong their stay another fortnight. Such lady-like and charming actresses as Mme. Larmot and Mlle. Hinry are rarely found on the same stage. Mme. Bergeon is capital as ever in the older characters. Chol is the same versatile, droll fellow, an admirable comedian,—you should see him as the old ballet-master, that "ancien zephyr"! Rousseau is good still in his way; Juignet himself delightful, if he would only act oftener. Of the new men, all valuable, we can only mention Chamonin, very accomplished in a great variety of roles, and the most charmingly impudent and entertaining of all garçons, M. Deligne. But it is the ease, the truth to character, the unity of all and grace and elegance in each detail that make the charm, and make their renderings of these little pieces, light, extravagant and trifling as some of them are, a study of good acting and good manners. It is the best way to familiarize the ear with the French language; and even those who know no French cannot but catch the natural language, the play of feature, gesture, tone, which is a better music than that which they so often undertake in these vaudevilles to sing.

At a Special meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Handel and Haydn Society held on the 26th ult., the following resolutions were offered by the President and passed unanimously.

Whereas: The Trustees of the Handel and Haydn Society have learned of the decease of their esteemed friend and brother, Mr. John Dodd, whose long life of activity and usefulness is now, at the ripe age of eighty-five years, brought to its close:

Therefore Resolved, That while we recognize in this event the dealings of an all-wise and merciful God, we cannot but mourn with unfeigned sorrow, the loss of one who has been always identified with the interests of this Society, whose name is upon the honored roll of its original founders, and afterwards and for many years prominently connected with its government, an earnest, zealous and faithful worker in the ranks; a pattern of punctuality and promptness; a worthy example to the young and old; and also for half a century has never ceased to feel and to manifest a deep interest in the Society's welfare and success.

Resolved, That we cherish with gratitude the thought of the many virtues, the kindly sympathies, the honor, honesty and integrity of life which show forth so conspicuously in the character of our beloved associate, and while we sympathize most earnestly with the bereaved family in their great loss, at the same time we rejoice with them in the possession of that unspeakable gift, the memory of a just and good man, which is BLESSED.

Resolved, That as a tribute of our esteem, and a lasting memorial of our love and affection for our associate, these resolutions be placed upon our records, and a copy of them be presented to the family of the deceased.

LORING B. BARNES,
Sect'y Handel and Haydn Society.

PHILADELPHIA. A very brave and very laudable undertaking is that of Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN, well known as one of the most earnest piano-playing artists of the country. It is no less than the performing, in a series of ten Matinées, of all the Piano-Forte Sonatas of Beethoven, thirty in number. The only precedent that we have known for such an enterprise was the "Beethoven Recitals" of Mr. Charles Halle in London, whom it was our own good fortune to hear a few years since throughout the latter half of his course, including half of the Sonatas. There the audience, in St. James's Hall, was of the most fashionable character, some 700 listeners, mostly ladies, and remarkably attentive, indeed a large proportion of them following the interpreter with copies of the music in their hands. Mr. Halle took the Sonatas in chronological order, or rather in the order of the opus numbers. Mr. Wolfsohn, it seems to us, adopts a wiser and more artistic course, in that he groups the Sonatas by certain affinities and contrasts of key and character, giving three each time. He has been aided in the classification by one of the most judicious musicians in the country, Mr. KARL KLAUSER, of Farmington, Conn.

Mr. Wolfsohn will have his Sonata readings varied also by vocal pieces from such artists as Mme. Raymond Ritter of New York, Mr. Kreissmann of Boston, and Mr. Habelmann. We wish him true success, and wish we might be in Philadelphia. Students of the Sonatas will be curious to see Mr. Wolfsohn's grouping of them, which is as follows:

- I. Matinée,
Tuesday, December 5.
Sonatas: F minor, op. 2, No. 1. A flat, major, op. 26. F minor, op. 67.
- II. Matinée.
Sonatas: A major, op. 2, No. 2. D major, op. 23. D minor, op. 81, No. 2.
- III. Matinée.
Sonatas: C major, op. 2, No. 3. C minor, op. 10, No. 1. E flat, major, op. 21, No. 3.
- IV. Matinée.
Sonatas: F major, op. 14, No. 1. G major, op. 81, No. 1. E minor, op. 90.
- V. Matinée.
Sonatas: G major, op. 14, No. 2. D major, op. 10, No. 3. C major, op. 68.
- VI. Matinée.
Sonatas: C minor, op. 13. E flat, major, op. 7. A flat, major, op. 110.
- VII. Matinée.
Sonatas: F sharp, major, op. 78. C sharp, minor, op. 27, No. 1. E major, op. 109.
- VIII. Matinée.
Sonatas: F major, op. 54. A major, op. 101. 28 Variations, op. 120.
- IX. Matinée.
Sonatas: B flat, major, op. 23. E flat, major, op. 27, No. 2. C minor, op. 111.
- X. Matinée.
Sonatas: F major, op. 10, No. 2. E flat, major, op. 87. B flat, major, op. 106.

The Evening Bulletin has some good remarks on these concerts, from which we copy the following;

If we think of the many excellent artists who consider a repertory containing the Sonata Pathétique, the Moonlight Sonata, and some two or three others of the most celebrated works of the great master, all-sufficient, we cannot but admire the ambition of one who is willing to place himself before the public as an exponent of the entire series of tone-poems in which Beethoven has, as it were, poured forth some of the brightest, as well as the most subtle efforts of his genius. To pianists, familiar with the immense difficulties, both of execution and expression, that lie in wait for the performer in almost every line of his later works, there needs no assurance that the task of Mr. Wolfsohn has imposed upon himself is one necessitating the highest artistic attainments. In this connection, it is pleasant that we know Mr. Wolfsohn as a conscientious artist, thoroughly alive to the responsibilities, as well as the advantages of his position; for if it be accorded that he is among the leading pianists of these times, it is equally true that such an eminence brings with it duties as well as laurels, and that the reward is only due to him who has achieved that which is worthy of himself, and the trust placed in him by an appreciative public. In other words, those who have so potent an influence in shaping the taste of our audiences, both in their public performances and as preceptors, should see to it that they in no wise pander to a materialistic, levelling standard of artistic achievements: but should, on the contrary, employ every opportunity of elevating the character of the musical wants of those who surround them. That Mr. Wolfsohn has fully endeavored to do this, a history of his soirées of the past seven or eight years fully proves. Glancing over the programmes of some of the earlier ones, a day or two ago, we found that productions of Reissiger and Fesca formed the pièces de résistance, while Do Beriot or Gutmann served as the entremets. From year to year, a steady improvement was observable in the character of the selections, until at last we found programmes vying in musical worth with those of the most renowned chamber concerts of Munich or Leipzig.

Other signs of musical activity in Philadelphia are: the recommencement of the Germania Orchestra "Rehearsals" (programme. Overture to Le Masson; Beethoven's Adelaide; a Lanner Waltz; first part of Schubert's Symphony in C; Oberon Overture; Duetto from Spohr's Zemire und Azor; and Finalo from Martha. 2. A performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater by the Handel and Haydn Society on Thanksgiving evening. Maretzek's Opera expected first week in January.

NEW HAVEN. Mr. Dudley Buck, Jr., gave an Organ matinée on the 2nd inst., when he played Bach's "St. Ann's" Fugue; Allegretto from Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Scenes from Tannhäuser; Offertoire by Batiste; "Who is like unto thee?" from "Israel in Egypt"; and Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata, No. 2. The Ave Maria of Franz was sung by Mrs. Strickland, and a bass air from the "Magic Flute" by Mr. W. H. Hunt.

CINCINNATI.—The Parepa troupe had great success here in the middle of November. The Ghioni-Susini Opera company was to follow. To lovers of classical music, the first Concert de Salon of Messrs Kunkel and Hahn was more interesting. They played (assisted by Mr. Brand, 'Cellist) Hummel's Trio in E flat and Rubinstein's Trio in F. There was a Mozart Sonata (E flat, No. 5) for piano and violin; a Waltz and the second Impromptu by Chopin, and Thalberg's Don Juan Fantasia. Of Mr. Charles Kunkel a correspondent writes us:

"His superiority as a true exponent of the works of Chopin, Thalberg, Rubenstein, Liszt, Schumann, &c., has at last established itself. And he now stands the first pianist of the West, and, saving all due modesty, we think him second to none in the East. Cincinnati owes him much for his untiring energy in introducing classical music to a public before considered incompetent to appreciate it. The success in obtaining a subscription list, almost two-thirds larger than that of last season, proves at once the improvement of our taste and the benefit of his efforts. Being a conscientious artist, he will lose no opportunity for improvement, and I hope you may hear him before the coming summer, as I understand he contemplates an Eastern visit this season, and will probably play in New York and Boston." G.

ST. LOUIS.—The second Philharmonic Concert, (Nov. 23) had for programme: Chorus: "Rise up and shine," and "Sleepers, awake!" from St. Paul; Beethoven's C-minor Symphony; Duet (two tenors) from Spontini's Vestale: Chorus and Solos: "Evenings in Greece," words by Moore, music by Sobolewski, conductor of the Society; Mendelssohn's Overture: "Becalmed at sea, and Prosperous Voyage"; Cavatina from I Martiri, Donizetti; Sextet and chorus from Rossini's Tell.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Nightingale's trill. (Madame Parepa's Song.)

Ganz. 40

Come, sing to me again. Song and Chorus.

J. W. Turner. 30

Excellent music, and very good words, by one who "thought he heard an angel sing."

Bradley Clay. Ballad. J. C. J. 30

A poem of great beauty, narrating, with a most skilful use of military terms, the spiritual progress of a brave soldier after death, who, when the moon "gained the zenith," attained a higher zenith.

"In a uniform of white, Marched he up the streets of light,"

Until he arrived where he heard the tattoo, blown "by the bugles round the throne." The melody and accompaniment simply illustrate the words.

O say, my little birdie bright. (Sag'an, O lieber vogel mein.) Op. 27, No. 1. R. Schumann. 30

A very sweet and simple song, with clear harmony, and its lesson of faith and trust, in the reply of the passage bird.

I sought the Lord, and he heard me. Duet.

"Naaman." 50

I dreamt I was in heaven. Song. " 30

Two good sacred pieces from Costa's new oratorio. The duet, between Elsha and the woman, whose supply of oil had been miraculously increased, is a very pleasing one, and the song of the child of the Shumanite, after his restoration to life, is one that will, no doubt, gain applause from many audiences.

One look, one word. (Nur ein lächelnder Blick.)

Song. Op. 27, No. 5. R. Schumann.

The rhapsody of a German lover, whose whole being is illumined by a ray from the loved lady's eye. The music is peculiar in construction, and quite melodious.

Lay him to rest. Ballad. J. W. Turner. 30

They buried him in a watery grave. " 30

Two new songs by Mr. T., who is almost always fortunate in the titles to his pieces, and also understands very well what the taste of the public requires.

When you and I were soldier boys. Arranged for Guitar, by Hayden. 30

A new arrangement of Clarke's fine song, which is destined to be widely known.

Come, ye weary. Sacred quartet. Irving Emerson. 30

A good thing for quartet choirs, and quartets in choirs. A few dollars per year, appropriated to the purchase of these things as they appear, will add materially to the interest of rehearsals, as well as of Sunday performances.

Instrumental.

The Whirlwind Polka. J. Levy. 40

My Rod and Gun Polka. W. A. Field. 30

A very spirited and quite easy polka.

Maltese polka. Four hands. Wallerstein. 40

Arranged very neatly by Hewitt, is bright and effective, and just hard enough for pupils in their second quarter.

Nocturne. Op. 48, No. 1. C minor. Chopin.

Bad, of course, and brings the shades of night closely around you, but it is impressed with the genius of the master.

Three o'clock galop. H. Hagemeyer. 30

A roystering galop, with words occasionally introduced, showing the "galop"-ers to be having a famous time in their way, and, at three o'clock, are firmly resolved "not to go home till morning."

Deuxieme Tarentello. Op. 21. Sydney Smith. 80

The tempo is "Allegro ma non troppo," which hardly comes up to our idea of the mad speed of a true Tarentello; still the piece is a Tarentello in character, and possesses the characteristic sweet brilliancy of the composer's works.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 645.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 23, 1865.

VOL. XXV. No. 20.

Songs by Heine.

[The following translations of several of the little songs from Heine's "Buch der Lieder" were made to be sung to Schumann's music. They are selected from the "Cycle of Songs" composed by Schumann under the title "Dichterliebe" (Poet's Love), and were sung by Mr. Kreissmann at the fourth Musical Soirée at Chickering's rooms last Saturday evening. These songs have just been published by Messrs. Ditson & Co., by whose permission the English words are here printed.—J. S. D.]

I.

O WONDROUS LOVELY MONTH OF MAY!

("Im wunderschönen Monat Mai.")

O wondrous lovely month of May,
When all the buds were blowing,
And when within my bosom
The dawn of Love was glowing!

That wondrous lovely month of May Sang all the birds returning,
And then it was I told her
My longing and my yearning.

III.

"THE ROSE, OR THE LILY," &c.

("Die Rose, die Lilie," &c.)

The rose, or the lily, the sun, or the dove, or Whatever was once very dear to the lover,
I love now but One, and she'll never weary,
My airy, my fairy, my chary, my Dearie!
O, more than all, than sun, or dove, or
The beautiful rose, or the lily, I love her!
And she'll never weary,
My airy, my fairy, my chary, my Dearie!

IV.

"WHENE'ER INTO THINE EYES I SEE."

("Wenn ich in deine Augen seh'!")

Whene'er into thine eyes I see,
Then all my woes and sorrows flee;
But if thy rosy lips I kiss,
I am all well and full of bliss!

When I do lean upon thy breast,
Comes over me a heavenly rest;
But if thou say'st: I love but Thee,
Then must I weep, ah! bitterly.

VII.

"I'LL NOT COMPLAIN."

("Ich grolle nicht.")

I'll not complain, tho' break my heart in twain.
O love forever lost! I ne'er complain.
Howe'er thou shin'st in diamond splendor bright,
There falls no ray into thy heart's deep night.

Ah! well-a-day! In dreams I saw thee waning,
And saw the night within thy bosom reigning,
And saw the snake that on thy heart doth gnaw;—
How all forlorn thou art, my love, I saw!

VIII.

"THE DEAR LITTLE FLOWERS, IF THEY KNEW IT."

("Und wüßten's die Blumen, die kleinen.")

The dear little flowers, if they knew it,
How deep the wound of my heart,
Would weep and with me rue it,
And try to heal the smart.

The nightingales yonder singing,
If they but knew of my grief,
With songs more cheerily ringing
Would bring my soul relief.

The golden stars at even,
If they only knew my woe,
Would surely come down from heaven
To comfort me below.

They ne'er can know it, no wonder,
There's one only knows my smart,
And she hath rent asunder,
Asunder rent my heart!

Goethe as a Manager.*

We have seen Goethe in many lights; the work before us presents him as a theatrical manager. This was not the least active, nor the least significant part of his career. From his disquisitions on the art of acting in "Wilhelm Meister" we might fairly conclude, as we do from the celebrated directions in Hamlet, that their author had the theory at his fingers' ends, and could instruct others even if he did not attempt to vie with them. There was always such regularity, such a love of order, in Goethe's whole composition, that he might be safely counted on for the business part. He would never fail, as so many great men have failed, by neglecting minor details unworthy of his genius. If he had shown any tendency to do so, he would have been quite out of place in Weimar. Larger theatres may succeed in wealthier towns without an incessant care for the pence; but Weimar itself was a place of limited incomes, and its Prince was little better off than his subjects. Some of the chief difficulties that beset Goethe's management resulted from the rigid economy that was necessary; and the marvel is that he did so much in such a place and with such resources.

The author of this work has one qualification for writing on the Weimar theatre; it and its manager seem to take the first place in his heart. A native of Weimar, he frequented the theatre from the earliest age, and made Goethe's acquaintance from sitting on the ledge of his box as a child. He tells us, amusingly enough, that his mother took him to see a fairy burlesque, and perched him up on the front of a box, which he was astonished to find empty during such an attractive performance. One evening, however, the door opened, and a majestic figure entered. The boy was on the point of springing down, when a hand stopped him, and a full, calm voice breathed in his ear, "Don't move, my child, there is room for both of us." It was thus that Herr Gotthardi became acquainted with Goethe. He seems after that time to have been a regular visitor in Goethe's box, which was not only a great honor, but entailed some material advantages. The great poet would always question his little friend about his progress at school, and would regale him with cakes and wine, of which a small store was always kept in the box. Goethe had the Italian habit of receiving guests at the theatre, and this store of cake and wine served both for himself and visitors. Nor was he the only entertainer in the theatre, for we read that, on the first performance of Wallenstein, Schiller went on to the stage after the third act, with some bottles of champagne under his cloak, and shared them with the actors.

Beginning his knowledge of Goethe at the theatre, Herr Gotthardi did well to confine himself so exclusively to that one place. He has collected much valuable material and many good anecdotes about Goethe as a manager; and the effect of these might have been spoilt if he had followed the poet into his other avocations. As it is, the whole book has a singleness of character, and everything in it is reducible to one head. Herr Gotthardi's love of the theatre was such that he did not scruple to break through the rule against strangers being present at the rehearsals; and in the interests of his readers it was well that he was not restrained by any such scruple. His picture of Goethe presiding at a rehearsal is of itself enough to recommend his volumes.

To Goethe the first reading of a play was as important as the full-dress rehearsal. He was always present when a play was read, prefacing the reading by some words of explanation, and pointed out to the actors the meaning of the whole piece, and the relations of the various parts. He would sometimes read over whole passages of the play, or even declaim them, to make the meaning clear to all the actors. Herr Gotthardi compares him to his own Serlo, in Wilhelm Meister, who could raise the most mediocre talents to wonderful ability by the exact insight that he imparted to them imperceptibly. His way of judging new players was marked by the same care and thoroughness. He looked first at the person of the novice, to see if there was anything engaging about it, and if there was nothing engaging, whether the actor could put on any attractions; for, as he remarked, the life of an actor is a perpetual denial of his own personality—a perpetual assumption of a strange mask; and an actor who cannot put on the mask of attractiveness when he wishes to be favorably judged by a stranger can have very little talent. When this question of the exterior was settled, Goethe turned to the voice. He made the actor read to him; gave him some grand passage to estimate his power of feeling—something passionate to test his power of expression. In this way he gradually put him through the whole range of characters, noticing all the while the parts in which he excelled, the weaknesses which he betrayed. If he had any provincial dialect, the expressions of it were noted, and a means recommended him for their cure. If he could not fence and dance, he was handed over to the fencing and the dancing-masters; and if he came out satisfactorily from all these trials, Goethe chose parts for him calculated to supply his deficiencies. If he was too fiery, he was put in phlegmatic parts; if he was tame, he was given impetuous characters; so that he might put off himself and become a new person.

In his "Conversations with Eckermann," Goethe says that his interest in the theatre was entirely practical. His delight was to raise the theatre to a higher rank, and he only attended the performances to see that the actors played their parts rightly. If he noticed any faults, he sent a line the next morning to the régisseur, and the fault was sure to be avoided the next evening. At the rehearsals, on the other hand, Goethe acted, not as a critic, but as an animated spirit. He was extremely punctual, though, in this respect, he was eclipsed by Herr Gotthardi, who slipped into the house by a side entrance, and took his place in a dark corner an hour before the time appointed.

Till Goethe came, the stage was generally in commotion; the actors were walking up and down, the régisseur was making his arrangements; there were a thousand little things to be done, and everybody was doing them. But the moment Goethe came in there was a sudden silence. The strictest order was observed; there was no gabbling through parts with hands in pockets, hats on and cloaks, to give an excuse for the absence of gesticulation. Nor did the slightest fault pass unnoticed. If a sentence was delivered too quickly, the actor was stopped, and made to repeat it slower. At the rehearsal of Romeo and Juliet, which Herr Gotthardi witnessed, there were several of these interruptions. Goethe told the Nurse not to move her hands about so much, and not to wear such a constant simper. He paid particular attention to the ball-scene, which had to be practiced several times before he was satisfied. He would not allow too many of the guests to enter at once by the same door, or to follow each other too quickly; he would not have the masks too far forward or too close together. The fight between Mercutio and Tybalt had to be repeated till the combatants were cunning in fence, for Goethe had already declared in Wilhelm Meister that in such scenes it was not enough to thrust about awkwardly, as was mostly done on the stage.

* Pictures of the Weimar Theatre under Goethe—[Weimarische Theaterbilder aus Goethe's Zeit, von W. G. Gotthardi.] 2 vols. (Jena, Costenoble).

However, all these censures were delivered with the utmost calmness and the classical repose of the Phidian Zeus. It was but seldom that Goethe was excited, even by the greatest blunders. Once, indeed, when he was present at a rehearsal of Egmont, the actor who presented Orange spoke in such low tones as to be inaudible on the further side of the theatre. Goethe bore it for some time, but at last his patience failed him, and quietly, though loudly enough to be heard throughout the building, he said, "I should be glad to hear the piece which I wrote thirty years ago." But another time he was not contented with such a remark. In the performance of Schiller's Turandot, a march followed close on a pathetic speech of the heroine, and the musician charged with this interlude broke in upon the speech several times, and at last reduced the heroine to despairing silence. Goethe, who was in the ducal box, and was furious at the interruption, thundered out at last, "Out of my sight with the pig-dog!"

Such was the respect felt by all the actors for their distinguished ruler that neither his habitual rigor nor his occasional expressions were at all resented. One thing he imposed on them, to which players in some other countries would never have consented: the greatest actors in Weimar had to take the smallest parts. Thus the role of two insignificant senators in Mozart's opera of Titus was confided to Graff and Malkolmi, of whom Weimar was justly proud; and the first of these actors had to appear as one of Sarastro's dancing slaves after Papageno's carillon, in the Zauberflöte. Some actors would resent this mandate as an indignity; but it was forced upon the Weimar corps partly by the desire of perfection, partly by economical necessities. On this account, the personnel of the stage was reduced to the lowest possible limits, and the pinching and paring which marked the theatrical wardrobe would have done credit to a frugal housewife. When the play of Count Essex was to be given Goethe sanctioned the purchase of a new mantle, if it was absolutely necessary, but could not allow a new dress as well. Could not the lady wear Mary Stuart's white satin dress, part of which had done for Queen Elizabeth? Similar economy confined the representative of Wallenstein to an old cloak which had been patched and mended till it was scarcely presentable. The ducal family did its best to aid the theatre by the gift of cast-off clothes; otherwise we should think the players would have been reduced to the state of those new Parisian pieces, where no clothing is required.

Fines, and even arrests in the guard-house for obstinate men, in their own chamber for disobedient ladies, were not unfrequent punishments in the Weimar Theatre. The list of fines is given by Herr Gotthardi. Any one who has to be called at a rehearsal pays eight groschen, and, if outside the theatre at the time, a thaler. Any one coming in too late at a performance pays a thaler. Any one refusing to play a super, either by pleading uncertified illness, or by stating that he has had a part in the play or opera, a thaler. Every member is required to dress in accordance with the character and costume of his part, and not to appear either more gorgeous or younger than the part allows; any one offending against this rule pays two thalers.

In like manner, the actors were forbidden to rehearse in shawls or cloaks, or with sticks in their hands; to make any motions during the rehearsal of a scene, except those prescribed by their part; to make any noise during rehearsals, or performances, or to applaud at either; to play any pranks while acting as super, so as to disconcert the other actors. Some players were fond of making extempore remarks, and a further clause was added imposing a fine of ten groschen on all such additions. One of the actors most given to this crime, who had often been mulcted for it, made a comical allusion to the rule in some burlesque. The horse of Rochus Pumpnickel had not adhered exactly to its role when it brought its master on the stage, and the master shook his finger at it, exclaiming, "Take care!—extemporizing is forbidden under a fine of ten groschen."

It is related of the actor who thus told the secrets of his prison-house, and no doubt incurred the fine with which he had threatened his horse, that his powers of persuasion were equal to Sheridan's. He had been long in debt with his washerwoman, and at last paid the money. The poor woman had looked forward for years to this payment, as gamblers in lotteries look forward to their big prize; and as gamblers in lotteries decide how they will employ their fortune when it comes, she had disposed, in imagination, of every farthing. It may be imagined that her delight at getting the money was excessive; but scarcely half-an-hour had elapsed before the actor came back, and persuaded her to lend him the whole sum, to which she had looked forward with such longings, and which she had got from him with such difficulty. On her relating the story to one of his brother actors, who had probably met with the same experience, he sighed deeply, and said, "Aye, aye, who can resist him?" Perhaps the story of Sheridan getting himself bailed by the sheriff's officer who arrested him, occurs most naturally as a parallel instance.

The moral of Herr Gotthardi's book is contained in the story he tells us of a servant girl in Weimar who clapped her hands with joy when it was announced that Egmont would be given the next evening. If the result of Goethe's management was to raise the lower classes to such a height of intelligence that they could appreciate his tragedies, we must admit that his theatrical career was eminently successful. But from the account Herr Gotthardi gives us of the dog which drove Goethe from his post, we should fear that this maidservant was an exception, or that the effect even upon her was transitory.

The Harvard "Memorial" Building.

The following is a description of the plan of the edifice submitted by the architects and adopted by the committee:

DESCRIPTION.

This design embraces three principal parts:—

- I. The Alumni Hall.
- II. The Sanders Theatre.
- III. The Monument to the memory of those students and graduates who have fallen in defence of their country during the late civil war.

These three divisions are distinct from each other, but are so combined as to form a single composition.

I. The Hall includes an area of sixty feet by a hundred and thirty-four. It is thirty-seven feet from the floor to the top of the walls within, and eighty feet to the ridge of the roof in the centre. The roof is framed with open timber work, in what are known as hammer-beam trusses, and bears a general resemblance to the famous roof of Westminster Hall and to the roofs of many of the collegiate halls at Oxford and Cambridge. The outward thrust of these trusses is met by external buttresses. The upper part of the side walls between these buttresses is occupied by windows, beneath which, on the inside, is a heating or continuous wainscoting of hard wood, against which are to be hung the pictures belonging to the college, and in front of which may be placed the busts, statues, or other academic memorials that may from time to time accumulate. Portraits or busts of men who have served in the field will doubtless in time form an important and most interesting feature of this collection, but this portion of the building will not belong to them in any distinctive and exclusive sense, and will have only that general memorial character which the honors paid to those who have distinguished themselves in various departments of the public service necessarily give it. It may suitably be used for any purpose to which a room of this size is adapted, and is capable of accommodating comfortably at table as many as a thousand guests.

There is at either end of the Hall a gallery for music or for spectators, fifteen or twenty feet deep and fifty or sixty feet long. The walls on either side below the pictures are richly panelled to the height of six feet from the floor.

At the end of the Hall toward the Theatre is a platform or dais raised a few steps from the floor for the use of presiding officers and distinguished guests. Immediately adjoining, and separated from it only by a partition wall, is the stage of the Theatre, which is in like manner set apart for the Corporation, the Overseers, the immediate government, and distinguished persons. Over this central portion of the building rises a tower, thirty-three feet by seventy, and a hundred and fifty-six feet in height up to the ridge of the roof, which forms the central and dominant feature of the whole composition, and marks upon the outside the importance and dignity of the place beneath it. The walls of this tower are supported upon arches, of which the one towards the Hall, fifty feet wide, incloses the dais and the singing gallery mentioned above; there is a similar but larger arch on the side towards the Theatre, covering the stage, and also containing a gallery for music. These arches are abutted by the walls of the staircase halls.

In these staircase halls upon either side are the main entrances to the building. These entrances communicate directly with the Hall, by doors opening upon the dais, and with the Theatre by stairs which start under an arcade of three arches, one division descending to an ambulatory, or corridor, which runs round the Theatre at the level of the ground, and the other two ascending to the passages above it, behind the first and second grade of seats. Three rows of windows mark upon the outside the position of these three floors. This ambulatory, which besides bringing the opposite sides of the house into easy communication enables persons to collect and talk without disturbing the audience in the Theatre, affords entrance to the floor of the house or pit, by ample passages or vomitoria on either side, and with the lower tier of stairs by little stairways in the rear. At the foot of these stairways there is also an outer door opening to the rear of the building.

Opening from one of the staircase halls is a Withdrawing room for the officers of the Alumni or of the college, thirty-two feet by twenty-five, large enough for the meetings of the Overseers. In the basement beneath are accommodations for the caterer, which have separate communication with the Hall.

II. The Theatre, with its ambulatory, vomitoria and proscenium or stage, is not unlike those of classic antiquity, the arrangement of seats also being semi-circular, and all sloping towards the speakers, whom all the spectators have an equal opportunity of seeing and hearing. There is, however, a gallery about two-thirds as deep as the range of seats beneath it, supported on columns. It is proposed to have no seats in the pit. In this the example of the famous Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford has been followed, a building, which, as a successful solution of a problem almost identical with this, has been made a particular object of study in the preparation of this design. It is said to exhibit an audience to better advantage than any room in England, and the means by which this is effected have been carefully preserved. This design exhibits accommodation for about sixteen hundred persons seated, and half as many more standing or sitting in the passages. This is about half as many again as the church will contain in which the literary exercises are now held.

The Theatre is covered by an open timber roof of peculiar construction, without supports from the floor, and with the whole interior height unobstructed by ties.

In entering by either principal entrance, a procession would ascend the broad flight of steps, and passing through the door at the end of the first landing, descend upon the stage with great dignity and effect in full sight of the audience assembled. But when the Hall was not occupied at the same time for other purposes it would itself become a magnificent vestibule, and a procession passing first through the monumental cloister at the other end of the building would traverse the whole length of the Hall, and passing across the dais, enter at once upon the centre of the stage. In either case the after part of the procession, for whom there is no place on the stage, would find their way to their own place through the side passages, very much as they do at present.

III.—The Monumental or Memorial division of this building is an independent structure at the end of the Hall. The whole end of the building is treated as an external mural monument, upon an unprecedented scale, the great height and breadth of the wall giving by its mere mass a commanding dignity otherwise unattainable. To increase the monumental effect all features of mere utility, such as doors and windows, are avoided. Above the level of the cornice the wall surface rises into a decorated tablet, about thirty feet in width and height, projected and defined against the background of the roof. On this is sculptured the ancient arm of the college with the motto "Veritas," and the emblems of the laurel and the palm, and below an inscription, which in these drawings is set down as follows:

IN MEMORIAM
EORUM. QUI. HAC. IN UNIVERSITATE. INSTITUTI
IN. BELLO. CIVILI
SUPT. DECORE. PRO. PATRIA
MORTUI,
ALUMNI. SUPERSTITES,
UT. HIS. IN. SEDIBUS. SEMPER
PIAE. VIRTUTIS. VIGENT. EXEMPLUM,
HANC. MONUMENTA
SACRIS. NOMINIBUS. INSCRIPTIS
FACIENDA. CURAVERUNT.

Below the inscription are three flat niches, covered with a canopy of foliated arches, and containing the names of the ninety-three graduates and students who have fallen. A space three feet long and eight inches in height is given to each name. On the face of the wall on either side are cut passages from Scripture or the poets. Beneath is an arcade of seven pointed arches supported by shafts of polished red Gloucester granite, with richly carved capitals. This arcade, which is unglazed, opens upon the monumental cloister mentioned above, which occupies the interior of this structure. It is sixteen feet wide and, if we include the porches at the ends, a hundred feet long, affording upon its walls ample space for such tablets or other more private and personal memorials as classmates or friends may erect in further commemoration of those whose names are written upon the tablet outside, or for inscriptions, or for bas-reliefs, according as may hereafter be determined. These especial memorials will be visible through the arcade from without, and will thus serve to enhance the general sentiment of the external monument, without interfering with its unity and simplicity of line and mass.

An ample doorway opens from the centre of this cloister into the Hall, with access to the gallery above on each side.

The building is designed to be erected in brick and freestone, or in freestone altogether, as may prove best. The best site for it seems to be in the eastern part of the college yard, so that the back of the theatre could come upon Quincy street, and the Monumental Façade look down into the yard.

Detailed estimates which have been prepared with the assistance of some of our best mechanics exhibit a sum total of from $180,000 to $200,000. The building could not probably be built at the present moment for less than the latter sum. The substitution of freestone for brick on the outer walls would make an addition of about $15,000. But in any case it is proposed to have the monumental portion entirely of stone and thus to distinguish it by its material as well as by its form from the rest of the building. About half the expense estimated is for the freestone, an item for which the present rates are exceptionally high.

The cost of the Theatre and tower is probably about half the whole amount, being equal to that of the Hall and Monument. But this point is not very exactly shown by our figures.

All of which is respectfully submitted by WILLIAM R. WARE,
HENRY VAN BRUNT.
Boston, December 5, 1865. Architects.

A Discourse on Pianos.

BY REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Behold our Grand Piano! Chickering's Grand! It must have been about the year 1820, in old Litchfield, Connecticut, upon waking one fine morning, that we heard music in the parlor; and hastening down, beheld an upright-piano, the first we ever saw, or heard of! Nothing can describe the amazement of silence that filled us. It rose almost to superstitious reverence; and all that day was a dream and marvel. This was our first experience—and the instrument was one of Clementi's, of English make.

All the pianos of the country were then made abroad. One or two men had essayed, without marked result, the making of these then foreign wonders; but it was not till 1823 that Jonas Chickering led the way and laid the foundation of a school of American Manufacturers of Musical Instruments, which seems destined to equal the best reputation of London or Paris.

We went to school; to college; to the theological seminary; and to the new fields of the West, never dreaming for thirty years that we should ever attain to the beatitude of owning a piano. But one day, after we had been several years in Brooklyn, we found ourselves the master of a Bacon & Raven piano. A thoroughly sound and good instrument it was, and is, in its now distant home; no one need go amiss in selecting from this manufacturer. After this was spirited off, came a pause, and then, upon a lucky day, a square Steinway stood in our parlor. For power, fullness, richness, and evenness of tone, it was admirable; nor do we believe that we could better our choice. In our summer home it stands yet a musical angel.

We never dreamed of going higher. To own a Chickering Grand seemed always like a dream. But dreams do come to pass sometimes! There stands one of the noblest of all Pianos—a Chickering Grand—in our parlor, and there is but one thing more that fortune can do for us, viz., breathe upon us some night the power of playing upon it! We walk up and down before it, proud and happy, knowing that in it sleep Handels and Mozarts, Beethovens and Meyerbeers, Webers and Wagners, Palestrinas, Spon-tinias, and Rossinis, longing to be aroused; but to us is given no incantation by which to call them forth! It is awkward to have to borrow your players. Like bird-singing, the best music is that which comes spontaneously, and, as it were, in twilight from under the leaves!

Had all Europe offered us a choice of instruments, we should still have chosen a Chickering.

For common pianos, scores of honored names compete, in Philadelphia, in Albany, in Boston, in New York, and even in Norwich, Chenango Co., N. Y., where we were surprised to find a large and flourishing manufactory.

Perhaps three or four houses contest pre-eminence in Grand Pianos. We shall not compare or determine. We have chosen, and do not wish to rechoose. It may be there is a little "Boston" feeling inspiring our choice? Why not? We were once a Boston boy, and played in all her streets. Perhaps there is a little National feeling! Why not? Old Jonas Chickering was the patriarch of piano-makers, and has probably been the cause of more musical noise than any American man that ever lived; his establishment, first and last, having sent out 29,000 instruments. Imagine good Old Jonas asleep, and this vast army of instruments making a procession before him, from his first meagre piano of 1823 to his last and matchless grand piano (music, of course!) each one with its practitioner or player. What a roar—pur-gatorial or paradisaical—it would be! But as to the National feeling. Is not Italy proud of her Cremone? Are not Amati violins one of Italy's boasts?

Three generations (Nicholas & Andrew, then Jerome & Antony, and then Nicholas again) of Amatis there were. The Chickerings are already in the second generation, and we hope that they may "increase and multiply," and that for five generations to come every Chickering may inherit an irresistible genius of Pianos, and all America be musically blessed in the name.

Except the Organ, no instrument can be compared to the Piano-forte. The Organ is the only instrument that, with any success, imitates the peculiar qualities of all the various separate musical instruments, and combines them into a vast orchestra. In its own place, it is with easy majesty peerless among instruments, and in grandeur, power and scope nothing else even approaches it. It is pre-eminently Religious. It knows how to inspire and express the profoundest moral emotions. When the Psalmist commands winds and storms, mountains and seas, every living creature, men and angels, to praise God, the Organ alone is able to take up so grand a theme, and roll toward heaven a choral strain, sweet as all the birds, soft as murmuring leaves, or impetuous as storms, and solemn as the sounding sea.

But the instrument is bulky, complex, expensive, and laborious. It belongs to the Cathedral and the Church.

Above all others, the Piano is a household instrument. Its size, cheapness, and manageableness fit it for the parlor and the boudoir. It seldom excels in a concert-room. Undoubtedly, the effort to produce instruments with a tone voluminous and sonorous enough for large halls has led to great improvements in the instrument. But, after all, there are few pianos that can be heard to advantage by five hundred people—unless it be the mere gymnastics of a musical athlete that satisfies curiosity. The instrument is essentially domestic. It belongs to our daily life. It is social, tender, devout; or rises to gayety, e-j-y, and almost to sublimity.

What a genius whose life has been devoted to this instrument can effect is not a fair measure of its adaptations to common wants. Under the hands of a master the piano is almost transmuted into an orchestra. Long and liquid sounds are gained from hammering a string. It feigns the trumpet, it rolls like a drum, sighs like the violin, roars like distant artillery, and even storms in mimic grandeur, like the elements. The rapidity of its utterance defies analysis. The eye cannot follow the hand. The mind cannot analyze or keep up with the process by which the left hand rolls up black storms of sound, while the right showers brilliant notes, like showers of fiery sparks shot forth from a forge into the night!

We do not undervalue such performances. Every advance in executive power tends to raise the average of skill in the community. These excessive executants inspire the young with ideals which rebuke their tame performance, and spur them to attainments which, but for such models, they could seldom reach.

It is only when all the offices of the Piano in the family are considered, that its true value may be estimated. It gives ennobling amusement. It fills up those dreary vacancies which too often tempt the young to dangerous excitements. It soothes irritation, aids devotion, inspires taste, allays many a fret and pain, and, bringing a whole circle under one influence, tends to harmonize them. When the long day has wearied you, and its sharp attritions have edged every nerve, and you are dull but sleepless, half despondent and more than half irritable, and evil spirits are rising around you, darkening all things with sad forebodings, then, if some one unbidden hand sounds forth from the piano a deep strain of Beethoven, or the overture to Der Freyschütz, or some simple, majestic movement from Handel, you feel a change coming over you, as if David stood again before Saul, and with his harp vanquished all his troubles.

Some king expressed his idea of prosperity among the common-people when any man should have a joint of meat upon his table every day. That must be a wretched peasantry to whom this daily bit of meat would seem so signal a prosperity! Millions of day-laborers in America have that, without dreaming it a marvel. The Hebrew predicted the day when every man should sit under his own vine and fig-tree. He evidently had a glimpse of our American Homestead Law. But we are getting far beyond that. Our people have land, and houses, and comfortable food, and furniture, and are going forward to knowledge, and taste, and moral refinement. And our wish is, that the day may soon come when every working-man in America may have a good Steinway piano, or a Chickering Grand, which we account the grandest instrument, next to the organ, in the world!

We know that some people regard a piano as a mere luxury. We should as soon call a school-house, or a cradle, or household prayer a luxury! It is scornfully said our mothers' spinning wheels were their pianos. Very good they were, too. Their droning hum, in a summer's day, was not unmusical, especially in an afternoon, when bees out of doors ran a rival concert of soft humming among leaves and flowers. We used to love the dull clink of the loom, too, from some out-room, where the linen was woven that was to furnish the daughter's outfit when the blushing day should come. But what is the use of repining? Is society going back to household manufactures? Because we cannot have a spinning wheel in the parlor, and a loom in the shed, may we not have a piano? Few fabrics that our mothers wove ever did better service to the body than do those garments of praise which their daughters' canning hands now weave in numbers for the soul!

Next to books, there is no inanimate thing in the house that can produce so much profitable pleasure as a Piano. A Library and a Piano are symbols of high civilization. These two spread that nobler banquet where the soul is fed, without fear of gluttony or dissipation. As books bring into our daily circle as familiar companions the noblest spirits that ever wrought upon earth, and permit us to rear our children under the influence of the noblest natures, so the piano, with simple incantations, brings up from their sleep the noble brotherhood of Song, and persuades them to dwell among us.

But for the Piano forte, the best musical thought of the world would be lost to the family. Only a few could support an orchestra. But every prosperous family can own a piano. The flute, the violin, the harp, the guitar, and various wind-instruments may yield melodies in the hands of single performers. Only the Piano can breathe into the family the harmonies of Handel, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Weber, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Schubert, and Wagner.

Bols speak for Thought Music speaks for Feeling. And can the world afford to lose such sublime expressions of the deepest, noblest, most rapturous, most sorrowful feelings of the human soul as have been given by the great masters of song? And is it nothing that our children may find all those vague aspirations, and inexplicable, passionate yearnings, met and expressed in a language that cannot corrupt and that may soothe and satisfy the soul?

Every Christian household, as soon as industry and economy shall enable it, should have a library of books and a good Piano. One should not wait for a new house, nor for a fortune; these are needed on the way towards riches; these are instruments of education which are required while the children are growing up. Fewer luxuries of the table, if need be, but a Piano! Less costly clothes, but a Piano! The road to the soul through the ear is short and direct, and through the eye, but through the mouth it is long and full of dangerous places that quite stop the sound!

The Piano-forte is not only destined to be, but has already become, the common people's instrument. It is found in the farmhouse, and in the modest dwelling of the mechanic. Lay-laborers in this generous land of work have their daughters taught on the piano. It is found in all schools for woman's education, and should be found, even more, in schools for boys. A love for the piano has saved many a lad.

We have seen families suddenly reduced to Poverty. It is affecting to witness the order in which they advance towards the pawnbroker. Last of all, the cradle and crib, from which the dead child was taken. Next to that the Piano. And sometimes a poor worker with the needle will be found (all gone from the happy circle but her) pushed up into a single room, poorly furnished, poorly lighted, and yet more poorly fed, with no memorial of better days, except flowers in a broken cup, and a piano, every note of which calls back the days of youth and love, seldom sounded, save on the Sabbath it binds up those tender wounds of memory that itself makes, and helps to lift the poor, tired soul over all its troubles, and on the wings of sound bring down melodious aid from heavenly realms!—Independent.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG. (From Correspondence of London Orchestra, Nov. 23).

In the sixth Abonnement-Concert, on the 9th inst., two novelties were produced: 1, Concert Overture by Fr. Grützmacher, formerly member of the Gewandhaus orchestra; and 2, "Der Jäger Heimkehr," chorus for male voices with horn and trombone accompaniment. The overture met with a very cold reception, although the baton was wielded by the composer himself. One is kept in a constant state of restlessness from beginning to end, being hunted through a formal surge of modulations. All the difficulties of this overture, rich in figurative counterpoint, had not been successfully overcome by the orchestra, and the performance was consequently faulty. Reinerke's chorus, well given by the Pauliner Gossang-Verein, is one of the most pleasing of this composer's late productions. There are, however, unmistakable traces of Mendelssohn throughout. Spohr's "Gesangs-scene" for the violin, which formed the second number of the programme, was played by Herr Andreas Peterson from Stockholm, a pupil of Concertmeister David. His rendering of this dramatic composition left much to be desired. The fire and passion which should be infused into the whole were quite wanting, and the applause with which he was greeted was due more to the technic and clearness of tone which he displayed.

In the second part of the concert Herr Louis Lübeck gave a "Concertstück" (E minor) by Servais for the violoncello, a very trivial composition, which one would sooner expect to hear at Ullmann's monster-concerts than in the Gewandhaus. He overcame the mechanical difficulties of the piece with the most absolute ease, and was received with great applause. One of Haydn's quaintest symphonies (No. 33, D major) opened the concert.

The second soirée for chamber music took place on Sunday, the 5th inst. The selection was as follows: Quartet, E minor, op. 45, Spohr; trio, piano-forte, violin, violoncello, B major, op. 99, Schubert; Quartet, E flat, op. 44, Mendelssohn. The quartets for stringed instruments were led this time by Concertmeister Dreychock. The many false intonations which he made throughout seriously impaired the effect of the first number, which was scarcely fairly given. The pianoforte part in Schubert's very difficult trio (which, by the bye, had not been heard here in public for some time) was deliciously executed by Capellmeister Reinerke, who is undoubtedly one of the first interpreters of classical music.

Gustavo Schmidt's new opera "La Réole" was produced here for the benefit of the Theatre Pension Fund, on the 4th inst. The composer, on entering the orchestra, had a most enthusiastic reception, and was recalled at the conclusion. The libretto, by Charlotte Birch-Pfeiffer, is very poor. Catherine de Médicis pilfers the fort La Réole (in Normandy) from her son-in-law, Henri de Navarre, and the latter in return captures the fort Fleurance. The manner in which the subject is treated abounds in improbabilities, and the many intrigues which unravel themselves and cross one in the course of the opera, produce a fatiguing effect on the senses. A stiffness and platitudinous pervade the score, which in Schmidt's former work, "Prinz Eugen," are nowhere to be met with. The only tribute which can be paid him is his thorough knowledge of the different ranges of voices, and the skill he displays in the instrumentation. The singers of the different parts, Frau Günther Bachmann (Catherine de Médicis), Herr Rehling (Henri de Navarre), Frä. Suvanny (Margaret de Valois), and Frä. Karg (Armande de Courtenay), acquitted themselves very creditably, as did also chorus and orchestra.

I have lastly to mention the appearance of Adelaide Ristori at the theatre on the 11th inst. in the part of Maria Stuart. It is difficult to express in words the effect this far-famed tragedian produced. It seemed as if one lay under a charm during her presence on the stage; it was the magic of genius. What power of expression, what warmth of feeling these regular but by no means fair features were capable of producing! What mimic and gestures followed each other, each more perfect than the other! She was really demoniacal in the first act, where she gains over the young Mortimer; like a goddess in the garden scene after having fought the battle between resignation and revenge; and like a saint in the parting scene of the last act, which formed the culminating point of her performance. The audience greeted her with bursts of applause, which only subsided after her third or fourth appearance. The other members of her company were very inferior, and consequently ignored.

COLOGNE. (From the same, Nov. 25.)

We can afford to be very proud of the success achieved by our prima donna Teresa Tietjens at the last Gürzenich Concert. She sang three solos, and was in all highly successful. First came the "Fidelio" aria, giving ample scope to her great dramatic power. Secondly, an aria from "Il Ratto del Seraglio," by Mozart, being a very difficult pezzo di bravura, exhibited the facility and precision of execution acquired by Mlle. Tietjens during the last few years. The excited public called for an encore at the end of this air, and the kind Diva consented to repeat it amid general enthusiasm. Last but not least came the finale from the Opera "Loreley" by Mendelssohn, (Solo soprano and chorus). In this Teresa surpassed herself—indeed for many years I have not heard her sing with so powerful and pure a voice, and such finesse and pathos. Her success was immense, and at the end a flourish was thrice given by the orchestra, amid the plaudits and bravo's of the audience. An overture "Im Hochland" by N. W. Gade began the concert. The symphony No. 4 in B flat by Beethoven was capitally executed by the orchestra under the magic baton of F. Hiller, who contributed a very fine and effective Concert Overture to the programme. Herr A. Schmidt, professor at our Conservatoire, played capably on the violoncello a very commonplace fantasia by Servais.

Tietjens the Great, before leaving Cologne, has signed an agreement with the manager of the opera-house here for six performances, which she is to give in March next. The happy news has spread rapidly through the whole town, and has met with the greatest enthusiasm. According to the journals Mlle. Tietjens is creating quite a furore at the opera in Hamburg at this moment. On the 16th of next month she is announced to sing at a concert in Düsseldorf. On dit that on her coming back to Cologne Mlle. Tietjens is going to hear the successful new opera of a young German composer, Max Bruch, pupil of Hiller, with the intention of adopting it for Her Majesty's theatre. The name of this opera, which is making its way very rapidly through Germany, is "Loreley," with the same libretto written by the same poet for Mendelssohn. Having heard the opera here, I find it a first-rate work. With all the faults peculiar to a beginner, Bruch is no doubt a man of genius. Adapted to the exigencies of an English audience, and intrusted to Mlle. Tietjens, Loreley would certainly do well in London. The mise-en-scène is beautiful, and on a larger scale at Her Majesty's theatre would not fail to produce a wonderful effect.

We had a very interesting Quartet Soirée on the 16th instant, by the Société de Quatuor de Paris pour les derniers œuvres de Beethoven, 1st violin P. Maurin, 2nd violin J. A. Sabatier, alto W. Mas, violoncello A. Chevillard. After the playing of the brothers Müller, public curiosity was raised to the highest pitch, and the room was literally crammed. The performance included the quartet in F, No. 1, op. 59 by Beethoven, and the quartet in B flat, op. 130 by the same composer. On the same occasion Ferdinand Hiller played a new sonata of his own for pianoforte. The sonata is composed of three movements, 1, Gavotte, 2, Sarabande, 3, Courante. These three parts are as original in the melody, form, and modulation, as they are well written in a mechanical point of view. To my taste the French quartet is far inferior to the German one; and it is also the general opinion. The Messieurs do not play with the same purity and unity as the Herren, besides which the French first violin is too weak, and the second very poor.

BREMEN. On a trip to Bremen the other day I had the opportunity of visiting a very interesting concert given by the Philharmonic Society there, called the Privat-Concert-Gesellschaft. It was the second of the series they give every winter. A capital orchestra played under a very clever leader, Carl Reintaler (very favorably known as composer), a symphony of Gade, the overture to "Coriolan" by Beethoven, and the overture to "Oberon" by Weber. I found the execution spirited, but wanting in delicacy and shade. Highly interesting for the audience was a Divertimento in D flat for 2nd violin, viola, violoncello, contrabasso and two horns by Mozart, recently published under the arrangement of Concertmeister F. David, by B. Senff in Leipzig and Ewer & Co. in London. This rare gem, taken out of an old and incorrect edition of Three Divertimentos by Mozart, has been edited and accurately pointed by F. David, who has also arranged it for violin and piano. David, one of the greatest living fiddlers himself, played it in the most exquisite manner—indeed I know no violinist among all the celebrities of the day who can combine such effects of sound, expression, and execution, as David; and this without the smallest affectation. He deserves double praise for producing this beautiful work of Mozart, which was altogether forgotten or unknown, and for having played it so well. The vocal part of the concert was supported by an old acquaintance of ours, Signor Marchesi, who first sang the masterly aria "Revenge" from "Alexander's Feast" by Handel, in his usual pure and elevated style, and secondly the fine aria "Aprite un po'" from the "Nozze di Figaro," which being encored the Signor gave "Non più andrai" from the same opera. Signor Marchesi, who is a great favorite in Germany, was in excellent voice.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 18. The second Philharmonic Concert took place on Saturday evening, Dec. 16. Here is the programme:

Symphony, No. 8, in F, Op. 93 ..... Beethoven.
Concerto for the Violin ..... Mendelssohn.
Monsieur Jehin Prume.
Overture to Prometheus, (first time) ..... Bargiel.
Fantasie Brillante, for Violin ..... Jehin Prume.
Monsieur Jehin Prume.
Selections from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Mendelssohn.

Overture.
a. Scherzo. b. Intermzzo.
c. Notturmo. d. Wedding March.
Carl Bergmann, Conductor.

The charming 8th Symphony was on the whole rendered finely. Bargiel's overture did not make so good an impression on us as that to "Medea," which we heard last year. It opens grandly and nobly, and reminds us of Gluck, but it does not come to any decided climax. It is monotonous in its coloring; the motives lack originality; the work is spun out rather too much, and its effect on the hearer grows somewhat fatiguing.

The music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," which has not been heard here for some time, was welcome to every listener, and excellently played by the orchestra. Mendelssohn, more refined than profound, rather a great contrapuntal combiner than an inventor of original ideas, if heard too often fatigues and satiates us at length. His works have been played too much for the good of our young students, who, neglecting a deep study of what is really great in him, have become superficial imitators of his mere style and manner. A little reaction will be only beneficial to a true appreciation of the master himself.

M. PRUMS, whom we were glad to hear again, especially in a fine Concerto, made quite an impression on the public by his performance.

A very interesting Concert took place at Dodworth's Hall on the 12th, given by a number of amateur singers for the benefit of Mr. JAMES JOHNSON. The principal feature of this concert was the refined, tasteful, in every respect highly creditable rendering of some Madrigals and Glees by such composers as Morley, Feeta, Ford. When we consider that there is so little attention paid here to the rich and in every way original and highly artistic vocal works of the masters of our earlier epochs of musical writing, in the 16th and 17th centuries, and, if considered in the right light, the only real vocal compositions, instrumental music being then at a low standard, it is gratifying to see men endeavoring with true enthusiasm to devote time to the practice of these charming, although not easy works. That is the real love for art, the real appreciation of it, when people do not cling one-sidedly to this or that species of works, to this or that composer, to the present or the past. We like to see every composition of true art cultivated and brought forward, no matter who is the author of it, no matter what time produced it.

LANCELOT.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 11.—Of classical music we have a pleasant prospect of being favored with a bountiful supply during the winter. The season was happily inaugurated by Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN, last Tuesday afternoon, at the Foyer of the Academy of Music. Mr. Wolfsohn proposes to entertain us with a series of ten Beethoven Sonata Matinées at various dates, from that of the first concert to May 1st 1866; and, judging from the large and appreciative audience that greeted him on this occasion, we hazard nothing in predicting for him a most satisfactory success. The Programme for the 1st Matinée was the following:

Sonatas (Piano): F minor, op. 2, No. 1; A-flat major, op. 26; and F minor, op. 57.

Mr. Wolfsohn's rendering of Beethoven's piano-forte works is as satisfactory as that of any of our artists, and the respective items of his programme received full justice at his hands. Actuated by an eminently sincere desire for the advancement of true art, he has, apparently, made a zealous study of these compositions, claimed by many as embodying the master's most majestic conceptions, preparatory to a public performance of them. His playing of the third number, the magnificent Sonata Appassionata,—not so entitled, indeed, by the composer, but so happily named, perhaps, for once, by the publisher Crazz of Hamburg,—was distinguished by a rare attention to the details of expression, and indeed left little to be desired by the most fastidious Beethoven enthusiast. It was indeed an admirable performance, and the spirit that seemed to animate the pianist, naturally found a cordial response in the feelings of his audience. At the next Matinée, December 19th, the following programme will be presented:

Sonatas: A major, op. 2, No. 2; D major, op. 28; and D minor, op. 31, No. 2.

We are promised the occasional presence at these concerts of Mme. Raymond Ritter, of New York, and Messrs. Kreissmann and Habelmann. Mr. Kreissmann we would, indeed, be glad to hear once again, and revive our pleasant recollections of his singing of the songs of Mendelssohn, Franz and Schubert.

Since resigning the Conductorship of the "Germania," Mr. SENTZ has undertaken the musical management of the Handel and Haydn Society, and under him the Society has made a creditable advance. On Thanksgiving night, the "Stabat Mater" (Rossini's) was produced. The Chorus was almost perfect, (I might spare the adverb, had the sopranos been more numerous), being most efficiently trained, and added greatly to the general effect. The solos were by Miss Richings, who would be a fair soprano, were she more successful in her musical enunciation, which is often painfully defective and indistinct, and could she but infuse more life and passion into the music; Mrs. Schimpf, a mezzo-soprano, with a medium quality of voice, evidently, but superficially educated; Mr. A. R. Taylor, who has a grand organ for sacred singing, but who, I fear, is not always prompted by a proper conception of the music that it falls to him to interpret; witness, the very unsatisfactory manner in which he rendered the "Pro Peccatis;" and, finally, Mr. Simpson, the tenor, from Trinity Choir, N. Y., a singer after one's heart and mind. The orchestra, composed of some 30 performers, opened the concert with the Overture to "Ruy Blas," and the full society sang with marked effect the sublime chorus: "Thanks be to God, he laveth the thirsty land," from the "Elijah," at the conclusion of the first part. It is in contemplation by Mr. Sentz to produce the last named work, early in the ensuing year.

The "Germania," now under the leadership of Mr. CHARLES SCHMITZ, gets along admirably, considering the diminished force of violins. With these, and the other instruments out of all proportion, they manage to do the most classical compositions, sometimes with an approach to the proper effect, and, oftener not even with that. Why there is not an increase in the number of strings, when it can without difficulty be commanded, I am not informed. As it is, the popular taste becomes corrupted by listening to this discreditable apology for a good orchestra.

Not the least important item I have to communicate, is, that our other eminent pianist, Mr. JARVIS, begins a series of classical matinées on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 21, at the Foyer of the Academy. It is noteworthy that Mr. Jarvis ventures on Schumann this year. The concerts given by this gentleman exert not a little influence in behalf of Art, as they are attended by a class of our society who never go to any similar entertainments, but who are drawn thither by a personal acquaintance with Mr. Jarvis, and by a knowledge of his extensive and merited success as a teacher.

MERCURIUS.

NEW HAVEN, DEC. 15.—The Mendelssohn Society, of this place, gave us the "Messiah" last Wednesday evening, under the direction of "Wm. Anderson, M.D." The fact that the soloists were amateurs, who filled their parts conscientiously, renders criticism unadvisable, and the performance may, perhaps, be called a successful one—though it is not pleasant to hear such solos as "Behold and see," and "Rejoice greatly," attempted by voices which are, physically, unable to sustain them properly.

There exists, here, this season, the usual dearth of all things musical, the people being left, as hitherto, upon the tender mercies of such concert troupes as may see fit to visit us. This state of musical (or unmusical) stagnation is, in part, owing to a want of the wholesome stimulus afforded only by impartial, unbought criticism. All are, doubtless, aware of the extraordinary flights of fancy which the unbounded limit of that word, "criticism," is made to include; but our "critics" soar an eagle's flight above the highest. I cannot refrain from quoting, for the edification of your readers, a specimen of the art as practiced in this city. The "critique," which I give in full, is taken from the Daily Palladium, the only paper in the city which makes any approach to literary pretension. Parepa has given her first and only concert here; our "critic" has attended; and, through his quill, New Haven passes judgment upon the renowned prima donna, thus:

The Parepa Concert, at Music Hall last evening, was brilliant—superb—unsurpassable. Mlle. Parepa swept everything before her. Round after round of applause greeted her every effort. Now her modulations were soft as the nightingale's in wooing-time, and now her majestic voice rolled forth torrents of melody. The audience was entranced, overwhelmed, ecstatic; Parepa, queenly, self-poised, graceful, enchanting. Her vocal resources seemed boundless. Wave after wave of clearest harmony rose one above the other, until the whole audience seemed lifted from their feet in one grand attempt to offer a libation. It is impossible to criticize. All that one could do was to sit still and enjoy. Her Il Bacio was enchanting, and called forth a whirlwind of applause. Impossible to satisfy by appearance and acknowledgments, at last the ballad of "Five O'clock in the Morning" was bestowed, and exquisitely was it rendered. Not a soul with an ember of music on its altar, who sat at the grand feast last evening, but will forever remember Parepa. And the other artists were fit jewels to deck the tiara of this unapproachable cantatrice. Herr Carl Rosa, on his violin, thrilled every bosom. Under his magic touch, that dumb instrument seemed a living creature of harmony. Levy was grand. Never was such cornet playing. His execution of passages of difficulty extraordinary, was unapproachable. Goldbeck at his piano, was indispensable. Taken as a whole, the concert was one which lovers of music are but rarely offered but once in a lifetime.

On the whole, we think we would rather not attend such a concert, the re-action would be too great, and the effect upon the nerves similar to that experienced after taking hashish.

That Mlle. Parepa is worthy of the highest praise, we would not dispute; but, remembering that every concert which takes place calls forth only such effusions as the above—which might be written, like the Chinese novels, by the mile, and cut off in lengths to suit the purchaser—we are inclined to look with favor upon the "Little Peddlington" (alias "Round Table") style of "pitching into things generally." Until some reform in this matter is instituted, our musical perspective must be sadly unpromising.

MERCURIUS.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., DEC. 12. On the evening of the 1st inst. Mr. PENFIELD gave his second Organ concert with good success. The programme contained numerous strata of the "legitimate," including one Bach fugue (in D minor), just the number a Leipsic graduate said the other day he wanted to hear in one programme. It is a matter of gratulation that here and there over the country is springing up a class of organists earnestly devoted to the higher ranges of the art. Your publication from time to time of the list of works performed upon the Music Hall Organ, enables such as otherwise have access only to the catalogues of the ephemera of the day, to find suitable studies for themselves.

Corinthian Hall, which has been closed during some months past for alterations and repairs, was reopened on the 4th inst., Mr. BLACK giving his sixth annual concert. With the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Gustave Blessner, and Mr. O. S. Adams, the performers belong in Rochester, making it essentially a home concert. The house was quite well filled at a dollar for admission. The programme was quite miscellaneous and too lengthy to admit of detailed notice, even had it more than local importance. Mr. Blessner performed his violin Variations Fantastiques; Mrs. B., with Mr. Tracy, Herz's Concertante, Op. 79, for two Piano-Fortes, and with her husband a Polonaise for Piano and Cabinet Organ. The Orpheus sang two pieces; an amateur club of instrumentalists played two overtures in a manner causing Mr. Blessner to say in his peculiar, nervous style, "very well! very well indeed." Mr. Kalbfleisch is their conductor.

That the scenic additions to the new stage might be displayed, the chapel scene from Favorita was introduced, with Mr. Black in the principal part. On the 7th and 8th, we had PAREPA at Washington Hall, the Corinthian having been previously engaged for another purpose. On the first evening the attendance was not large, owing to two causes: the evening of Thanksgiving, and the prevailing feeling that nothing is first-class, that does not appear in Corinthian Hall. But the enthusiasm of those who were there seemed to know no bounds. As you said of her first programme in Boston, so of this, it was made up to exhibit her execution, and the exhibition was unstinted. Her encore ballads, given so naively and with such perfect enunciation, created as great excitement as the staples. I trust the young lady who sang "Ernani, involami," at Mr. Black's concert, as well as the "local" who wrote up her execution and her trill the next day, were present. She might pray: "Deliver me from my friends, by whose request I attempted to sing it." By the manner in which you sometimes quote local notices, I know you regard them as "doubtful" often. Good things only are too often said in the "local column" about a performance, which to most present appear palpably untrue. This is unjust to the public and injurious to the performer, especially to young aspirants, as it represses exertion and study. So too the friends of the "child artist," who put her forth to sing the Nightingale's Trill, when Parepa was already announced to sing it herself. But pardon this digression, while I say that Rosa and Levy both came in for their full share of applause. Instead of a "Grand Orchestra" led by Mr. Anschütz, a Steinway Piano was used by him for the accompaniments. On Friday evening I was not present, but learn that the audience was much larger than on the first occasion. T. E. A.

CHICAGO, DEC. 16.—Two weeks ago Mr. Grau's Opera season closed with Lucrezia Borgia.—During the last week the following operas were given: Saffo, Norma, Un Ballo, Polito, Elixir d'Amore and Lucrezia. Saffo, which was given for the first time in this city, was quite well received. It gave Madame Gazzaniga an opportunity to display her great dramatic power. The concerted pieces were finely done and the whole opera was given in a very complete manner.

Miss Lucy Simons made her first appearance in the "Elixir of Love," and created a very favorable impression. Her voice, though not powerful, is sweet and well trained, her execution being very good. Orlandini sang and acted Dr. Dulcamara to perfection.

On the whole the season was a successful one, and the next one will undoubtedly be still more so, as the troupe by that time will have become accustomed to each other. The next season will commence some time in January.

The second Philharmonic Concert was given a week ago next Monday. The orchestral pieces were Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Overture to "William Tell," "Invitation to the Waltz" by Weber, and Overture to L'Étoile du Nord; which were all given in a superior manner. The soloists of the evening were Mr. Sofge, a violinist of Milwaukee, who performed Op. 7 of De Beriot and Ernst's Elegy, and Herr Lotti, who sang "Deserto in terra," from Don Sebastian and M'appari from "Martha." Mr. Sofge played both pieces in a smooth and correct manner, though lacking in spirit. Most of the approbation was reserved for Herr Lotti, whose sweet and pure voice was never heard to better advantage.

On Monday evening the ever welcome German Opera opens for a season of six nights only. The following are the principal artists: Mmes. Rotter, Johanssen and Rosa Cook, Soprani; Mlle. De Gebele and Djuiba, Contralti; Habelmann and Tamaro, Tenors; Steinecke and Dnschütz, Barytone; and Joseph Hermanns and Weinlich, Basso.

The following Operas are promised. Faust, Der Freischütz, Don Giovanni, Fidelio, Fra Diavolo, and Roberto il Diavolo. Short and sweet truly!

CHICAGO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 23, 1865.

The Christmas Holidays—Another Musical Festival.

The next eight days are fraught with such large musical expectation, that we may fairly call it a Festival, hardly second in importance to that of the Handel and Haydn Society last May. Three great Oratorios and the opening of the series of Symphony Concerts all fall within the holidays, ending the brave old year, the jubilee year of 1865, the year of Union and Peace restored and of Emancipation, with something like a fitting Gloria in Excelsis!

This evening the cycle of great harmonies begins, and fitly with the patriotic and heroic Oratorio, Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The Music Hall will be thronged. The Handel and Haydn chorus is increased to about five hundred voices; and since their recent performance they have rehearsed it critically and thoroughly, picking up the lame passages in the choruses, and getting so at home in the music, as well as more and more in love with it, that it will no doubt go finely. One very hopeful symptom, promising in time a complete renovation of the Handel and Haydn chorus, is the example set by ladies of the first families and culture of going into the ranks of soprani and contralti. The ice was broken by a few of them in the May festival, and so delighted were they with the experience that they have enlisted in the regular army and have induced many of their singing friends to join them. This class of singers will be conscientious and earnest about it, not slighting rehearsals, not heedless of the conductor, not letting him remain hopeless about pianissimos and light and shade, but rather exacting of him that he be exacting.—As for the solos, whatever may have been wanting before, this time "they come, they come in bright array" of names. Madame PAREPA, one of England's first of Oratorio singers, heads the list. Mr. CASTLE, of New York, is probably the best choice that could have been made in the country for the part of Judas. Miss ANNIE CAREY and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN were in nothing wanting before and do not need to be replaced. The orchestra also has been increased.

To-morrow evening, Christmas Eve, being Sunday also, of course brings with it the annual performance of Handel's Messiah. Every seat in the Hall was sold several days ago! In this, to Mme. Parepa and Mr. Castle is added the promise of ADELAIDE PHILLIPS's glorious contralto and of Mr. WHITNEY's bass. The advertisement also makes a point of the fact that Mr. LEVY will play in "The trumpet shall sound."

A week later, night before New Year, Elijah looms again in prospect; and again Parepa, and Addie Phillips, and Castle, besides Miss HOUSTON, and the excellent baritone, Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York.

The first SYMPHONY CONCERT, under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association, takes place next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The arrangements are all complete, and the programme will be found among the advertisements. The response has been even heartier and more general than was expected to this project for putting concerts of orchestral music upon a sound basis, with a guaranty that all shall be genuine, all for Art, and not for private interest, with perfect liberty therefore to indulge in pure programmes and not spoil the effect of good things by jumbling them together with the bad. The effect of bringing forward the present plan has been to restore confidence among the real lovers of the best kind of orchestral music, those who once formed the nucleus of every audience for symphony concerts, but who long since lost their confidence in all subscription papers and announcements, never knowing that they would get such music and such only as they were always ready to subscribe for. The way in which the music-lovers have met the invitation of the Harvard Musical Association justifies the faith, in which the plan was started, that the moment a good guaranty is given that the right thing will be done in the right way, the right people will be sure to rally to its support. The actual guaranty with which these "Symphony Concerts" now come into the field is two-fold: first, the guaranty of unexceptionable programmes and of unalloyed artistic spirit and purpose, with determination to realize as far as means will go; and secondly, the guaranty of an audience of the right tone and character, strong enough in numbers and in influence to give tone to the rest and not be at the mercy of a miscellaneous "Five o'clock in the morning" crowd.—Of course it is but an experiment, and it is not best to cluck before our chickens are hatched.

The scheme of the first concert, and the care given to rehearsal, certainly deserve success. Every item of the programme is sure to interest persons of any taste, and there is unity and contrast in the whole. Mozart's G-minor Symphony is a perfect model of that form, thoroughly genial and delightful; many might prefer to start at once with Beethoven, but the plan is to give a series representative (so far as six concerts will allow) of the great Symphonic masters; Beethoven will have the lion's share; but Schubert and Schumann must not be neglected; and if Haydn and Mendelssohn should be omitted for the present, it will be only on the principle of leaving out for once some very familiar friend where invitations must be limited. The Euryanthe overture is comparatively seldom heard here, and, if we mistake not, will prove an appetizing introduction. Under the mighty spell of Beethoven, in the most exciting of all overtures, (and most significant, in this national jubilee of ours, if we choose so to look at it) we shall go home from the concert. To add especial éclat to the occasion, entering with a warm artist sympathy into the spirit of the plan, the gifted young violinist, CARL ROSA, a true representative of the great Joachim school, and full of genius, has volunteered to play two of the greatest works ever composed for the violin: Mendelssohn's Concerto (with orchestra of course), and Bach's Chaconne (than which no piece is better suited to reveal all the glories of the violin), Mr. DRESEL contributing the admirable piano accompaniment put to it by Mendelssohn. And this full measure of his contribution will furthermore gracefully overflow in three short characteristic violin pieces by the most genial of the modern German masters (making it seem almost like a Leipzig concert), Joachim and David.

Concert Review.

The coming week has so absorbed us that we must very briefly recall a fortnight almost too thickly strewn with musical entertainments. Amid all the medley some rare and important things have been brought to hearing, which it would be presumption to attempt to weigh in such a hurried, overcrowded time. What shall we say, for instance, of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB's opening Chamber Concert, on Tuesday evening, the 12th inst., when it had nothing less than this for a programme?

1. Quintet for Strings, in E flat, No. 5. . . . . Mozart
2. Fifteenth Quartet in A minor. Op. 132. . . . . Beethoven
  - a. Assai sostenuto and Allegro.
  - b. Allegro, ma non tanto.
  - c. Canzona di ringraziamento in modo Lidico, offerta alla divinità da un guardito.
  - d. Finale—Marcia assai vivace, ed Allegro appassionato.
- (Posthumous work. First time in Boston).
3. Grand Quintet in E flat. Op. 16. For Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn and Bassoon.
- (Grave and Allegro, ma non troppo—Andante cantabile. . . . . Beethoven)

Of that posthumous Quartet all we yet dare to say is two words: wonder and delight. The Chickering hall was crowded, yet we never knew a great work on first hearing so to take hold of a whole audience. It was followed with breathless interest; each movement heartily applauded; and the great broad deep religious Adagio (in modo Lidico), with its mystical, aerial figures floating heavenward at the close, and the most impassioned Finale created a fine excitement. The players had studied the thing with unusual eagerness and care, and succeeded in rendering it more clearly than is sometimes the fate with more familiar things. We understand it will be repeated in the next concert, as it ought to be.

The Mozart Quintet was very much enjoyed, and made us (so far as it went) favorably acquainted with the new member of the Club, Mr. EDWARD BEYER, who replaces Mr. Goering as tenor and (on occasion) flutist. The early Beethoven Quintet, given here for the first time in its original form (piano, J. C. D. PARKER; horn, HAMANN; oboe, RIBAS; bassoon, ELTZ; and clarinet, RYAN) charmed by the novelty, richness and freshness of such coloring, as well as by its intrinsic musical invention. Mr. Parker played most admirably, with a fineness of conception and nicety of touch very seldom surpassed; the wind instruments blended beautifully, though we could have wished the bright clarinet and oboe tones to stand out less sharply against the softer horn and bassoon.

It was one of the best concerts ever given by the Quintette Club, opening a season full of promise.—The second concert will take place on the 9th of January, and not on the 2nd, as was wrongly printed on the bills.

MESSRS. KREISSMANN and LEONHARD have given two more of their Soirées since our last. Choice in selection, fine in execution, as before, with not a loophole anywhere for tediousness or commonplace to creep in. The third programme, Dec. 9, was this:

1. Allegro from "Suite Anglaise" . . . . . Bach.
2. Songs: "An die ferne Geliebte" . . . . . Beethoven.
3. Sonate, op. 27, No. 2. . . . . Beethoven.
4. Songs: "Der Nussbaum," "Waldmung" . . . . . Schumann.
5. Ballade, op. 62. . . . . Chopin.
6. Songs: "Für Musik," "Frühlingsgedränge," "Willkommen im Wald" . . . . . R. Franz.
- a. Caprice, op. 16, No. 1. . . . . Mendelssohn.
- b. Etude, op. 25, No. 1. . . . . Chopin.

Mr. Leonhard unfortunately was so ill that it seemed at first impossible for him to play. But the resolution to overcome the obstacle seemed to add inspiration to his readings and tinge them with a more poetic fineness. It is often so with a musical temperament; the finest imaginative conditions often go with a state of nerves intensely painful and on the verge of utter prostration, when the soul seems to keep the body up; the creative artist, and so too the genial interpreter, in his finest moment, is literally in labor with his thought. The serene, wholesome, happy little piece of Bach was elegantly rendered; and it was the hearer's fault if he did not feel all the poetry of the Moonlight Sonata and the Chopin Ballade.

At this point Mr. Leonhard had to give up, and Mr. Kreissmann, who on the other hand had just recovered from some weeks of illness, closed the concert most acceptably by singing four more Franz songs in addition to the rich store he had already brought out. Mr. DRESSEL, ever ready for such good service, played the accompaniments, which made the conditions about perfect. Mr. K. has rarely seemed to us in such good voice, and there was a delicacy, a chaste, rich coloring of sentiment in his rendering of Beethoven's cycle of songs "To the distant Loved one," that touched the finest chords. The airiness of Schumann's "Nut Tree," the passionate fervor of the "Dedication"; Du meine Seele, &c., and the contrasted Franz songs gave full play to his finer and his larger tones.

Here is the fourth programme:

1. First movement from Concerto, (D minor), . . . . . Bach (String-Quartet accompaniments, arranged for a second piano).
2. Air from "Die Entführung" . . . . . Mozart (Orchestral accompaniments, arranged for two Pianos).
3. Scherzo, op. 54. (E major), . . . . . Chopin.
4. Songs: "Dichterliebe" . . . . . Schumann.
1. { A. Caprice, op. 16. . . . . Mendelssohn.
2. { B. Etude, from op. 25. . . . . Chopin.
3. Songs: A. Er ist's. — B. Ständchen. — C. Die Harrende.
3. Trio, Piano, Violin and Cello, op. 100. . . . . Schubert (Allegro—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Finale).

Mr. Dresel played the accompaniments, which he had himself arranged for the piano. We would fain speak of every piece, not omitting the little songs by Franz, and Schumann's string of pearls (or little breaths of melody) from Heine's poems, of some of which we give a translation on our first page. We have only room to mention the wonderful impression made by the Schubert Trio (which may we not hear again?); and the charming manner in which Mr. Kreissmann sang that loveliest of tenor airs from Mozart's Seraglio, as well as the consummate skill with which Mr. Dresel had transplanted fresh from the orchestral score to the two pianos its whole garden of beauties.

But one Soirée remains, and that, to find a clear field, has wisely jumped the holidays, promising itself on the 6th of January.

BATEMAN CONCERTS. Madame PAREPA, with Herr CARL ROSA and Mr. LEVY, after a successful tour in the West, returned to this city about ten days ago and began a new series of triumphs in the Music Hall on the 14th. Our own excellent pianist, Mr. LANG, replaces Mr. Dannreuther, who left the troupe a few days after their departure from Boston, prompted by a strong desire to return to his pupils and his flattering artistic calls in London. (If in mentioning this before we seemed to intimate that Mr. Bateman was all too willing to exchange the classical pianist for the cornet-player, it was a carelessness of language, wholly unintentional; glad to gain the one, we have no doubt he gave the other up reluctantly.)

Six concerts have been already fired off in rapid succession, and a seventh remains. The first three drew great crowds; since then the audience has dwindled, for the simple reason, we suppose, that people cannot go to concerts all the time, that many are saving up money and fresh capacity of pleasure for the Oratorios, &c., &c. The programmes have been very miscellaneous, full of things good, bad and indifferent; but if we consider the concerts as given to the end of attracting and pleasing the greatest number, we must admit that they were all good for that. The best was that of Sunday evening, when Parepa sang some of her noblest pieces. "Let the bright Seraphim," with Levy's cornet obligato, was altogether splendid and sent a thrill through all the audience. It was in the singer's best vein. Almost equally so was the recitative and air from Susannah: "If with guiltless blood," making the same impression that it did when she once sang it here before; it was a large, noble, honest style of singing; the only slight drawback was the feeling once or twice that those low contralto tones were not quite homogeneous with the rest of the voice. An air "Sweet Spirit" by Wallace gave a good deal of pleasure; and Gounod's Ave Maria, with organ, piano and violin accompaniment, carried all away as usual and had to be repeated. This made three Ave Marias in succession, for the cornet, being recalled after singing in its own remarkable way the preceding number of the programme, Cujus animam, played Schubert's Ave Maria; we should all have been good Catholics by the time all that was over! Rosa played an Adagio by Spohr, Schubert's Serenade and the Hungroise by David, with all that wealth of tone and purity of style and feeling with which he always plays, and better still, with Mr. Lang, the Adagio and Rondo from a Sonata in B flat by Mozart,—a nice performance on both parts. Mr. Lang played Mendelssohn's fiery and earnest Prelude in E minor, a pretty Slumber Song by Heller, and (more questionable) an Agitato movement by Schulhoff. Mr. WILLCOX, at the Organ, opened the concert with an Offertoire in C by Wely (one of the strongest we have heard), and closed it with a clear, firm rendering of Beethoven's Hallelujah.

Some of the concerts have been with a small orchestra, under the able conductorship of CARL ANSCHÜTZ; in others Mr. Willcox has done duty at the organ, Mr. Anschütz accompanying voice or violin at the piano in a right musician-like manner. Mr. Levy's marvellous facility upon the cornet, with the telling tone thereof, of course reaps a harvest of encores every night. And Mme. Parepa is invariably encored in the hope of getting the "Five o'clock" and other ballads, which she bestows with an almost too generous good nature. The best things that she has sung (leaving aside "Nightingale trills," Il Bacio, Alpenhorns, &c.,) are: "Costa Diva," "En vain j'espère" from Robert, and above all, "Non mi dir" from Don Giovanni, besides the "bright Seraphim" again. There is no end to her variety, and whatever class of music she undertakes to sing, it seems done with equal ease, and to be of the best kind of singing we have heard here since the days of Lind and Sonntag.

Mr. Rosa's selections mostly, we are sure, have not been after his own heart, but rather compromises with the popular spirit of the programmes. His most important piece was the Gesangscene, or Scena cantante, of Spohr, which he plays with great dramatic expression. The Elegie of Ernst derives new interest from the recent death of that remarkable singer on the violin. For the rest, he has played the oft-repeated things of Vieuxtemps and De Beriot (always charming by the manner of his doing it), and in one instance he has even been set to stringing together airs from Trovatore, which was putting Pegasus in harness.

Mr. Lang has played more good things than any one, thereby, as well as by his rendering of them, going very far toward making good the place of Dannreuther. He has given some of the best things of Mendelssohn, Chopin and Hummel.

We must leave the last word upon the Parepa concerts till next time.

MASTER RICHARD COKER, the boy soprano, singing better than ever, and more natural and pleasing and graceful than ever in manner and appearance, gave a couple of concerts in the Music Hall on Monday and Wednesday evenings of last week. He had various assistants, but the chief interest centred in himself. It is no longer merely the charm of a wonderful voice, but of a really high degree of artistic skill and feeling, certainly for one so young. There is a marked improvement in his execution, in the musical conception that he shows, while that fresh, clear, sweet, subtly penetrating voice has lost nothing of its bloom. We trust the precious organ may be spared to him for some years yet, and it is a comfort to know that when it changes he has some solid musical culture that will survive the change, and leave him still perhaps a charming singer with another voice.

His assistants were Mr. WEEKS, a tenor from New York, who is rather over-tender in expression; Mr. HENRY SUCK, who played violin solo, rather lengthy, in the absence of Mollenhauer's violoncello; Mr. LANG, pianist; Mrs. CART, whose ever welcome contralto had hardly as much life as usual in Beethoven's "Per pietà"; and, most interesting of all, eight choir boys from the Church of the Advent, under the direction of Mr. HENRY CARTER, who sang Rossini's La Carità with very good effect, Master Coker standing in the middle of the group and taking the solo part. We see, by the way, that Mr. Carter in his card invites "boys having good, clear, reliable voices extending to upper G, soprano," to join the Advent choir, where they may obtain "a good knowledge of church and other music," and even attain to the dignity of a salary. We should think some fine voices and talents might be drawn out of obscure corners by this means.

"VOICE BUILDING" is the suggestive heading of the Card upon our first page, of Mrs. S. E. PAINÉ, who returns to this city to teach singing, after a period of diligent study with one of the best of masters, Signor Bassini, in New York, who recommends her without reservation, and is certainly a competent authority.

"SONGS OF SEVEN." Our thanks are due to the publishers, Messrs. Roberts Brothers, for a copy of their very beautiful illustrated edition of this exquisite little string of poems. Jean Ingelow is one of the sweetest, freshest, most sincere and thoughtful singers of the time, a born poet in her way. You catch the poetic thrill in the very rhythm of her verses; the words and images are all at first hand from nature and from live experience; the thought is often deep, the fancy free and quite original, and a right womanly tone pervades all. Among her most charmingly characteristic things are these seven little songs, which sing of seven stages in the history of woman. They are good themes for the illustrator's pencil.

Here the larger illustrations, filling each a whole page, the English ones, by North, are really fine in conception and in execution; they are poetic and imaginative. The smaller cuts, on the same page with the text, were evidently made here, and, though graceful and tender for the most part, they are rather tame and commonplace, as if done in the routine of over-much work of this sort, albeit, we dare say, ly an artist of genius. The little tail-pieces, white on a black ground, have a classical, Pompeian character, very pretty, plainly by still a third hand. But most interesting of all is the finely engraved portrait of Miss Ingelow, a face full of feeling, thoughtful and refined.

The work is printed on very firm and beautifully finished paper, the pages surrounded by a plain red border, and the typography is in the best style of our Cambridge University press. It certainly is one of the most tempting of the many illustrated books now soliciting the honor of being sent as Christmas presents.

SIGNOR ROVERE, the buffo-basso of Maretzek's opera troupe, has just died in New York. His conception of the cobbler in the new opera "Crispino e Comare," was pleasant and vigorous, and his loss will be especially regretted. The illness which preceded his death came from a throat distemper contracted a few nights since, from exposure while looking for his carriage after a concert. He first came to this country from Italy in 1852, with Alboni. The rôle of the Sergeant in Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento" was written for him. He was sixty-five years old.

This is indeed a loss. Italian Opera contains no element so genial and spontaneous, so charmingly original and peculiar to itself, as the rapid, humorous parlando; the Italian buffo is a character. But its finest representatives are fast dying out. What an unction there was about De Begnis, and Sanquirico, and is still about Ronconi! Rovere, too, had the genius of it in him, and we had hoped for a refreshing instance of it in Crispino, but in vain!

Another of our old operatic heroes, BADIALI, the ever fresh and glorious baritone, died a short time since in Bologna, Italy, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

Another death, which occurred last week in New York, saddens our memory of the good old days of the "Germania" Orchestra. It is that of Mr. FREDERICK B. HELMSMUELLER, the whilome agent of the Germanians, and for some years since the leader of a popular band in New York.

Amen! say we to this "brief jotting" of the Transcript (only we take the liberty of restoring the definite article):

The re-occupation of (the) Music Hall for its legitimate uses, is hailed with pleasure by concert-goers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS. Please do not say "rendition;" there may be dictionary authority for making it synonymous with the manner of rendering a piece or a character; but we cannot get over the feeling that it is a vulgarism; it is too suggestive of extrudition of criminals.

Please refrain from such pompous phrases as "the season was inaugurated," when you speak of some chance opera or penny-whistle concert that happened to come early in the season.

Please cultivate simplicity and modesty of expression. Can we not speak of a solo on the jewsharp without calling it a "grand" solo? A "Symphony by Beethoven" means quite as much as a "grand Symphony." And suppose that we agree (we too, who have also fallen into the vice conventional) to talk no more about the "Great Organ," and simply call it the Music Hall Organ, which is much more dignified. This is only the first batch of similar hints.

Grau has completed his much praised and much abused opera season at Chicago, and has gone to St. Louis.—Grover's German opera troupe are playing at Cincinnati.—Gottschalk gave concerts in Panama early in October, and soon after left for South America. He is very naturally anxious to keep ahead of his California reputation.—George F. Bristow produced an overture entitled Columbus at Brooklyn, Saturday evening. It aims to picture all the main incidents of the great discoverer's life. The three brothers Formes, now in this country, contemplate importing singers for another German opera company.

The amusing absurdity of unmusical persons writing about music is well illustrated by an editorial rhapsody in the Boston Recorder about the negro boy-pianist, Blind Tom. The writer never loses sight of the idea that he is writing for a religious journal, and mixes piety and rapture in equal parts. After hearing Tom play, he says: "Never were we more impressed with amazement and awe at the manifestations of divine handiwork. Our first sight of Niagara did not bring us so boldly into the presence of God. We thought we saw the supernatural revealed with something of the effect which the burning bush produced on Moses!"—Springfield Republican.

MARETZEK'S Italian Opera season in New York came to a close last Saturday, and now the company, under Grover's guidance, visit Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Boston. The Tribune says;

During the season the following operas were given. Faust, four times; Polauto, twice; Lucrezia Borgia, three times; Ione, four times; Ernani, five times; Un Ballo in Maschera, twice; Trovatore, three times; I Puritani, twice; Martha, three times; Traviata, once; Lucia di Lammermoor, once; Norma, three times; Robert le Diable, three times; Rigoletto, once; Fra Diavolo, four times; Don Giovanni, once; La Sonnambula, once; Crispino e la Comare, twelve times, and L'Africaine, nine times. During the whole of the season there has not been one disappointment, except the closing of the Opera House on the night of Rovere's death; none of the singers have been or have pretended to be sick, and every promise has been fulfilled, both in the spirit and the letter. Every work has been produced in good style, with competent artists and proper regard to details, and the season closed with the best possible feeling between the public, the artists, and the manager, as was evidenced by the superb basket of flowers presented to Zucchi on the last night, and the costly plate presented to Max Maretzek, together with a letter fully indorsing his managerial course and expressive of the utmost confidence and respect from a majority of the influential and wealthy habitues of the opera.

The season of 1865 was the most successful ever known in America; the houses must have averaged nearly $3,000 per night; the receipts of one matinee alone amounted to $4,300! It may be calculated that the music-loving people of New York have expended upon admission to the opera alone, during the past three months, very close upon $200,000.

The Spring season of the Italian opera will commence early in February, 1866.

THE WALLACE MEMORIAL CONCERT in New York, on the 17th, appears to have been an occasion of much interest, and netted the sum of about $2,500 to the fund for the composer's widow and children. The principal artists and musical societies of the city took part, and the audience, though it did not fill the Academy, was large and influential. Beethoven's Marcia funebre was played, and Wallace's overture to "Lurline" and "Maritana." The vocal selections, by Miss Kellogg, Miss Phillips, Mr. Castle, Campbell, &c., were from the works of the lamented composer, including choruses from "Lurline," sung by the Mendelssohn Union. One feature of the concert was singular, revealing the cloven foot of business somewhat; we copy from the Tribune, not at all surprised at the result of the comparison, and only wondering how any one of taste could ever have yielded to an opposite persuasion:

The reputation of the two pianists, Mr. Richard Hoffmann and Mr. S. B. Mills, is too high and too well known to need any further comment than to say that they played as finely as usual. The appearance of a Chickering and a Steinway Grand upon the stage excited much attention. They were played upon by performers of equal excellence, but the comparison was in some respects unfavorable to the Steinway piano, the tone of which, though powerful, and in some respects beautiful, lacks very much in refinement, and when forced is quite overpowered, and becomes wiry and harsh. The Chickering tone on the contrary, has the true grand quality, is exquisite in refinement and sentiment, and will bear enforcement without breaking the tone. There are grand points in the Steinway piano, but, lacking those we have mentioned, they do not fully meet the needs of a concert player.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Harvest Field. (Das Aehrenfeld.) Duet. Mendelssohn. 40

Perhaps one of his earlier compositions. It is quite simple in construction, and pretty for all, while even a child would understand it.

Sarah's Young Man. Comic Song. C. W. Hunt. 30

Jolly Cats. " " " 30

Polly Perkins. " " H. Clifton. 30

Three "unkimmon" amusing songs. The last is very popular where known, and the second is a parody on "Jolly dogs."

Nightingale's trill. (Parepa's song.) W. Ganz. 40

A delicious tit-bit of melody, composed expressly for the lady mentioned. Nothing difficult in it except the trill.

Say once again I love thee. Duet for Soprano and tenor. "Don Pasquale." 30

Well known to those who have heard the opera, as a favorite duet.

Traced in snow. Song. J. B. C. Murray. 30

Antony and Cleopatra. Ballad. J. W. Porter. 30

Effe May. Song and Chorus. R. R. French. 30

I have no joy but in thy smile. M. Keller. 30

I'm as happy as the day is long. C. White. 30

Good pieces by talented composers.

Stars with little golden feetlet. (Sterne mit den goldnen Füßchen.) Song. R. Franz. 30

In Franz's peculiarly clear, sweet style. English words are by J. S. Dwight.

Young Love's Fled. (Das macht das dunkelgrüne laub.) Song. R. Franz. 30

The Last Rose. (Die letzte Rose.) Song. R. Franz. 30

The "Last Rose" is a somewhat sad strain, occasioned by the sudden death of a beautiful flower at the window, "the last Rose," in the piercing winds of advancing winter. The poet moralizes a little on the occurrence, and Franz has exquisitely interpreted his sweetly sombre thought. "Young Love's fled," has a somewhat similar beauty.

Instrumental.

Wanderer's Nachtlid. (Night Song of the Wanderer.) Op. 150. D. Krug. 40

A dreamy and pleasing song without words, constituting a Romance for Piano.

Jolly Dogs, or Skip Bang Polka. C. Marriott. 30

"Here they are again," the jolly curst, but in the form of a sparkling dance.

Polka de Concert, for Piano. J. M. Wehli. 1.00

Marche des Amazones, for Piano. " 1.00

Romance nouvelle. " 1.00

We have here three concert pieces of a high order, by an accomplished musician. Amateurs who can play them, should not fail to try them.

Premier Nocturne for piano. J. Leybach. 50

Leybach has an excellent reputation, which each new piece tends to make more enduring.

Whirlwind polka. J. Levy. 40

Ocean breeze. Redowa. J. B. C. Murray. 35

Sparkling Moselle galop. C. Godfrey. 30

Windmill Polka. A. Birgfeld. 35

La Belle du Nord. Galop. W. J. Lemon. 35

It would be a pleasure to notice all these particularly, but the column is not long enough. They are all pieces worthy of careful trial.

Jolly dogs Quadrille. Illustrated title. R. Coote. 75

Very bright, sufficiently noisy, and, if anything, more taking than the music of the song.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 646.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 6, 1866.

VOL. XXV. No. 21.

Songs from the German.

Translated * and adapted to the music of ROBERT FRANZ by J. S. D.

I.

"AUS MEINER GROSSEN SCHMERZEN."—H. Heine.

Out of my soul's great sadness
My little songs go drifting,
Their wings full of melody lifting,
Away to Her heart with gladness.

They found her, and round her they hovered;
—Now back flutter all, complaining,
Complaining, yet ever disdaining
To say what her heart discovered.

II.

SLUMBER SONG.

("Schlummerlied"—L. Tieck.)

Rest thee, my Sweet, in the shadow
Of the greenly glimmering grove;
Soft sighest the grass on the meadow,
Thou'rt fann'd and art cooled in the shadow,
And watched by faithful love.
Sleep then, sleep on
'Neath the whispering pine,
Dearest darling mine,
Ever I'll be thine!

Hush ye! invisible chorus,
Disturb not her dainty repose!
The birds all, hovering o'er us,
Suspend their bewildering chorus:
Sleep, darling, thine eyelids close!
Softly, O sleep!
No noise near thee creep!
Faithfullest watch I'll keep.

Murmur, melodies Elysian!
Whisper low, thou purling stream!
Charmed by some enchanting vision,
Full of all delights Elysian,
She is smiling,
Smiling in her happy dream!
Through the whispering trees
Little swarms of golden bees
Keep
Humming to lull thee asleep.

III.

"WIE DES MONDES ABBILD ZITTERT." (H. Heine.)

As the Moon's pale image quivers
In the water wav'ring wildly,
She the while, serene and silent,
Walks the sky so queenly mildly!

So too walkest thou, Belovèd,
Sure and silent; and what quivers
In my heart is but thine image:
'Tis my own poor heart that shivers.

IV.

EXPECTATION.

("Die Harrende."—W. Osterwald.)

Gaily a birdling singeth,
And softly too sing I.
Away and away it wingeth:
O! had I wings to fly!

True, he hath sent no greeting,
No promise he'll appear:
It is my heart's quick beating
That tells me he is near.

Blooming and brightly shining
Is all the world without;
And now there'll be no more pining,
Away with ev'ry doubt!

My heart's with joy bells pealing,
And Hope enters in thereby:
To-day—O the blissful feeling!—
Into mine arms he'll fly!

V.

DARLING IS HERE!

("Liebehen ist da!"—J. Schroer.)

Look! little flow'rets,
Look, and be glad!
Stand not so speechless,
Stand not so sad.
O wist what I saw, so clear:
Darling is here, is here!

They shiver'd and shook,
Looked shyly about,
With silvery tinkle
They set up a shout,
Went thrilling far and near:
Darling is here! is here!

VI.

HIS COMING.

("Er ist gekommen."—Rückert.)

Wild was the day when He came with greeting,
Wildly toward him
My heart was beating.
Ah! blissful morning!
Strange, only warning
Of our two ways
Divinely meeting!

Wild was the day, and
The rain was beating,
He won my heart by
His look and greeting.
Nay, 'twas no wooing,
'Twas Fate's own doing:
'E're eyes had met,
Our souls were meeting!

Dark was the day of
His coming and greeting!
Days may be dark and
The roses fleeting;
No longer he's near me!
Yet faith shall cheer me,
His heart to mine
Still truly beating.

VII.

"STERNEN MIT DEN GOLDENEN FUSSSOHNEN."

(H. Heine.)

Stars with little golden feetlet
Softly move and dim their light,
Lest the sleeping Earth they waken
In the downy lap of Night.

List'ning stand the woods around me,
Ev'ry leaflet owns the charm,
And the mountain, dreaming yonder,
Stretches out his shadowy arm.

Ah! what music!—Tuneful echoes
Linger all along the vale.
'Tis the voice of my Belovèd!
—Or was that the nightingale!

Mozart's Letters.*

From the London Athenæum.

The writer to come of "Lives of the Musicians" stands in a better case than the biographer of a past generation. It seems to have been taken for granted that composers, instrumental players, and singers, led lives without incident, that they were coarse, illiterate, incapable of anything beyond sensual enjoyments,—unfit for commerce with the intelligent, the gifted and the good; only fit, in brief, to be made a show of, and to tumble for the delectation of the rich and vacant. The documents, however, which have here come to light during the last thirty years, tend to establish another story, and to rectify a misunderstanding,—ascribable in part to calumny, in part to bigotry, but in part, also, to ignorance. During some years of research—undertaken without the slightest pretext or desire of maintaining a theory, a conviction has grown upon us, that, as men of intellect, accomplishment, and society, the great musicians have been very much underrated. Their lives, which of late years have issued from the press, and in which, for the first time, something of collection of facts has been attempted, are all calculated, more or less, to ratify the experience of some intercourse with the best of the class, here and elsewhere. For instance, when we came into the world of Music, the theory of "inspired idiotcy" was still in force in England. This Mozart, whose letters are under notice, was pitied as a sort of wonderful helpless baby in all the affairs of life, "who could not cut his own meat." Such a false notion is not yet altogether exploded. The time and the circumstances of his death, the temporary apathy into which these seem to have thrown his survivors (who, in their bewilderment, could not point out the grave which held the remains of so great a genius,) the disorder of his affairs enormously magnified,—may have favored the growth of such an opinion, and have prevented that early accumulation of facts and materials, which, if once postponed, can never be compensated for. But every subsequent disinterment of information and relic has brightened the picture, by bringing us nearer the truth. We fancy the subject not yet exhausted, because we do not conceive this collection of letters to be complete, and imagine that from the books of Nissen, Dr. Jahn's four most oppressive volumes, and Dr. von Köchel's thematic catalogue, a biography might still be produced by one familiar with the anecdotal tales of life in Vienna and Paris at the close of the last century, which would set before us the traveller, the son, the lover and the husband, more distinctly and advantageously than he has yet figured. How is it that when composing a picture out of scattered traits, indicia, or recollections, our Germans are so far behind their neighbors?—that while they can accumulate, with a patience we should do well to emulate, any amount of facts, they seem so much wanting in that life and spirit which are indispensable to the writers of memoirs?

* The Letters of Wolfgang Mozart, 1760-1792. Translated from the collection of Ludwig Nohl, by Lady Wallace. With a portrait and fac-simile. 3 vols. Longmans & Co. Announced in New York, by Harpers, and by Hurd & Houghton.

* These translations were made for Ditson's edition of the Franz songs and are copy-right.

It has long been clear that Mozart's father was a man far superior in understanding and conduct to many of the grasping parents to whom wonderful children are born; and this in spite of the pressure of circumstances. Nothing, it is obvious, could be worse calculated to inspire probity and the cultivation of good morals than the average position of the German musician who had anything to do with German courts and nobles at the close of the eighteenth century. Advancement was only to be gained by ante-chamber work, solicitation and intrigue. The best places of trust and profit were mostly in the hands of foreigners. The amount of jealousy and complaint current could hardly be over-stated. Manners and morals were alike gross. The slavery so much anathematized by sentimental persons, which the Mozarts had to endure as household musicians to the Prince Archbishop of Salzburg, does not appear to have been so much the exception as the rule. Take a picture of manners showing how the art of music could be patronized by German persons professing liberality of taste and some distinction of position:

OCT. 17, 1777.

"I will now (writes Mozart to his father) relate to you as briefly as possible the Augsburg history to which I have already alluded. Herr von Finglerle, who sent his compliments to you, was also at Herr Graf's. The people were very civil, and discussed the concert I proposed to give, all saying, 'It will be one of the most brilliant concerts ever given in Augsburg. You have a great advantage in having made the acquaintance of our Stadtpfleger Langenmantl; besides, the name of Mozart has much influence here.' So we separated mutually pleased. I must now tell you that Herr von Langenmantl, Jr., when at Herr Stein's, said that he would arrange a concert in the Stube (as something very select and complimentary to me), for the nobility alone. You can't think with what zeal he spoke, and promised to undertake. We agreed that I should call on him the next morning for the answer; accordingly I went; this was on the 13th. He was very polite, but said that as yet he could not say anything decided. I played there again for an hour, and he invited me the next day, the 14th, to dinner. In the forenoon he sent to beg that I would come to him at eleven o'clock, and bring some pieces with me, as he had asked some of the professional musicians, and they intended to have some music. I immediately sent some music, and went myself at eleven, when, with many lame excuses, he coolly said, 'By-the-bye, I could do nothing about the concert; O! I was in such a rage yesterday on your account. The patrician members of the Casino said that their cashbox was at a very low ebb, and that you were not the kind of virtuoso who could expect a souverain d'or.' I merely smiled, and said, 'I quite agree with them.' N.B.—he is Intendent of Music in the Casino, and the old father a magistrate! but I cared very little about it. We sat down to dinner; the old gentleman also dined up-stairs with us, and was very civil, but did not say a word about the concert. After dinner I played two concertos, something out of my head, and then a trio of Hafeneder's on the violin. I would gladly have played more, but I was so badly accompanied that it gave me the colic. He said to me, good-naturedly, 'Don't let us part company to-day; go to the play with us, and return here to supper. We were all very merry. When we came back from the theatre, I played again till we went to supper. Young Langenmantl had already questioned me in the forenoon about my cross (Mozart, by his father's desire, wore the 'Order of the Golden Spur,' conferred on him by the Pope), and I told him exactly how I got it, and what it was.

"He and his brother-in-law said over and over again, 'Let us order a cross, too, that we may be on a par with Herr Mozart.' I took no notice of this. They also repeatedly said, 'Hallo! you sir! Knight of the Spur!' I said not a word; but during supper it became really too bad. 'What may it have cost? three ducats? must you have permission to wear it? Do you pay extra for leave to do so? We really must get one just like it.' An officer there, of the name of Bach, said, 'For shame! what would you do with the cross?' That young ass, Kurzen Mantl winked at him, but I saw him, and he knew that I did. A pause ensued, and then he offered me snuff, saying, 'There, show that you don't care a pinch of snuff for it. I still said nothing. At length he began once more in a sneering tone: 'I may then send to you to-morrow, and you will be so good as to lend me the cross for a few minutes, and I will return it immediately after I have spoken to the goldsmith about it. I know that when I ask him its value, (for he is a queer kind of a man) he will say a Bavarian thaler; it can't be worth more, for it is not gold, only copper, ha! ha!' I said, 'By no means—it is lead, ha! ha!' I was burning with anger and rage. 'I say,' rejoined he, 'I suppose I may, if need be, leave out the spur?' 'Oh, yes,' said I, 'for you have one already in your head; I, too, have one in mine, but of a very different kind, and I should be sorry to exchange mine for yours; so there, take a pinch of snuff on that!' and I offered him snuff. He became pale with rage, but began again: 'Just now that order looked so well on that grand waistcoat of yours.' I made no reply, so he called the servant and said, 'Hallo! you must have greater respect for my brother-in-law and myself when we wear the same cross as Herr Mozart; take a pinch of snuff on that!' I started up; all did the same, and showed great embarrassment. I took my hat and my sword, and said, 'I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you to-morrow.' 'To-morrow I shall not be here.' 'Well, then, the next morning, when I shall still be here.' 'Ho, ho!' you surely don't mean to —' 'I mean nothing; you are a set of bores, so good night,' and off I went.

"Next day I told the whole story to Herr Stein, Herr Geniaulx, and to Herr Director Graf—I don't mean about the cross, but how highly disgusted I was at their having bragged so much about a concert, and now it had come to nothing. 'I call this making a fool of a person and leaving him in the lurch. I am very sorry that I ever came here. I could not possibly have believed that in Augsburg, my papa's native town, such insult could have been offered to his son.' You cannot imagine, dear papa, how angry and indignant these three gentlemen were, saying: 'Oh, you must positively give a concert here; we don't stand in need of the patricians.' I, however, adhered to my resolution and said, 'I am willing to give a small farewell-concert at Herr Stein's, for my few kind friends here who are connoisseurs.' The Director was quite distressed, and exclaimed: 'It is abominable—shameful; who could have believed such a thing of Langenmantl! Par Dieu! if he really wished it, no doubt it would have been carried through.' We then separated. The Director went down stairs with me in his dressing-gown as far as the door, and Herr Stein and Geniaulx walked home with me. They urged us to make up our mind to stay here for a time, but we remained firm. I must not forget to say that, when young Langenmantl lisped out to me, in his usual cool, indifferent way, the pleasant news as to my concert, he added that the patricians invited me to their concert next Thursday. I said, 'I will come as one of the audience.' 'Oh, we hope you will give us the pleasure of hearing you play also.' 'Well, perhaps I may; why not?' But having received so grievous an insult the next evening, I resolved not to go near him again, to steer clear of the whole set of patricians, and to leave Augsburg.

"During dinner, on the 16th, I was called out by a servant-maid of Langenmantl's, who wished to know whether he might expect me to go with him to the concert? and he begged I would come to him immediately after dinner. I sent my compliments in return, that I had no intention of going to the concert; nor could I come to him, as I was already engaged (which was quite true); but that I would call next morning to take leave of him, as on Saturday next, at furthest, I was to leave Augsburg. In the mean time Herr Stein had been to see the other patricians of the Evangelical party, and spoke so strongly to them that these gentlemen were quite excited. 'What!

said they, 'shall we permit a man who does us so much honor to leave this place without even hearing him? Herr von Langenmantl, having already heard him, thinks that is enough.' At last they became so excited that Herr Kurzenmantl, the excellent youth, was obliged to go to Herr Stein himself to entreat him, in the name of the patricians, to do all in his power to persuade me to attend the concert, but to say that I must not expect great things. At last I went with him, though with considerable reluctance.

"The principal gentlemen were very polite, particularly Baron Belling, who is a director or some such animal; he opened my music portfolio himself. I brought a symphony with me, which they played, and I took a violin part. The orchestra is enough to throw any one into fits. That young puppy Langenmantl was all courtesy, but his face looked as impertinent as ever; he said, 'I was rather afraid you might have escaped us, or been offended by our jokes the other evening.' 'By no means,' said I, coolly; 'you are still very young; but I advise you to be more cautious in future, for I am not accustomed to such jokes. The subject on which you were so facetious did you no credit, nor did it answer your purpose, for you see I still wear the order; you had better have chosen some other topic for your wit.' 'I assure you,' said he, 'it was only my brother-in-law who —' 'Let us say no more about it,' said I. 'We had nearly been deprived of the pleasure of seeing you altogether,' he rejoined. 'Yes; had it not been for Herr Stein, I certainly should not have come; and, to tell you the truth, I am only here now to prevent you Augsburg gentlemen being the laughing-stock of other countries, which would have been the case if I had told them that I was eight days in the city where my father was born, without any one there taking the trouble to hear me! I played a concerto, and all went off well, except the accompaniment; and as a finale I played a sonata. At the close, Baron Belling thanked me in the warmest manner in the name of all the company; and, begging me to consider only their good will, presented me with two ducats."

In a subsequent letter it appears that Leopold Mozart disapproved of the moderate amount of spirit shown to this insolent young puppy by his son. Throughout the correspondence, from the tone of remonstrance again and again employed by the genius, it is evident that the father was prudent, but somewhat formal and timid; his eyes ever affectionately and proudly fixed on his son's fame and honor. Owing to the weight of his counsels, Wolfgang was rescued from a disastrous marriage, or what must have been more disastrous still, a liaison with Aloysia Weber. He was tardy in according his consent to the step which subsequently united Mozart to her younger sister, and we cannot help suspecting, not without some grounds.

The Webers, beside musical genius, had wild blood in their veins. The husband of Stanerl (the wife's familiar Vienna name) was anything, if all tales are true, but immaculate;—given to roving and dissipation, though (as the mass of labor he accomplished would alone have sufficed to attest) anything but a shiftless libertine. But even Wolfgang had occasion to reprove his betrothed for some coarseness of behavior which had made her lightly spoken of. There may have been more than we have been told which came to the ears of the anxious father. The household of the married pair has been described as Arcadian in its happiness; but the strange, forlorn deathbed of the man of genius, and his hurried burial in a nameless grave, suggest that the wife, however gay as a companion, had few of the qualities which wear well in the hour of adversity. Nor, in juxtaposition with the apocryphal story of her having shared his vigil when the overture to "Don Giovanni" was dashed down on paper, can we avoid pointing out a fact which implies imperfect sympathy as well as imperfect knowledge, in what most concerned the artist's well-being. The confusion in which Mozart's manuscripts were found may doubtless be ascribed to the dismay of so fearful and sudden a catastrophe as his death; but had his widow been the partner of his joys and sorrows we have been invited to believe her, when the time of emerging from her bitter distress came, she must have been able to throw the light of authentication on many points never now to be wholly cleared up. The "Requiem" controversy, for instance, could hardly have happened save by Constance Mozart's connivance or indifference.

One thing in these letters of Mozart, as in those of Mendelssohn, must strike every reader as excellent and endearing;—not so much his keen, as his loving, appreciation of all that had been well done in Art by others than himself. When Mendelssohn was the worst beset in Berlin by the pestilential gossip of the Prussian capital, with its backbitings, and imputations of meanness, he had truth and manhood in him to recommend the conducting of Spontini, who was represented as his substantial enemy, as a thing by itself in its fire and brilliancy, which must be heard. And so it was with Mozart. He adored Handel; he could learn from Bach; he could praise, honestly, music by Holzbauer, now defunct. The exception which proves the rule occurs with him when dealing with as great a pianoforte-composer as himself,—Clementi. That Italian master never, so far as we are aware, wrote Concerto music; but Clementi's Sonatas stand among Sonatas where Cherubini's overtures do among overtures. The best have a truth, a science, and a grandeur which are "of all time." They are the only works of their kind which can be heard with—we dare even say after—Beethoven's. Can one say as much of Mozart's? And it is curious—his contempt for the man being such as he expressed—that one of these very contemned Sonatas should have furnished the theme of that very "Zauberflöte" overture, before which, we were the other day told, that the organ-fugues of Bach "pale" as with so much "ineffectual fire."

This book is welcome; and (without having collated it with the original German) Lady Wallace is to be praised as having rendered it into readable English.

The Theatres and the Opera.

(From the Springfield Republican.)

NEW YORK, December 23, 1865.

THE THEATRES VS. THE HERALD.

New York has waked up to find itself without an opera, and this abhorred musical vacuum will continue for six weeks, good Bostonians comforting themselves with as many melodious crumbs as can be thrown at them in the space of a fortnight. The success of the late operatic season has been unparalleled in the history of Maretzek's management, who, according to Mr. On Dit, has cleared $40,000! This, too, independently of that moral support from the Herald, without which no place of amusement, six months ago, was supposed to live, or move, or in any way have its being. It required a gigantic rebellion and a stupendous national debt to prove that cotton was not king. It required a no less gigantic rebellion among managers, led by the clever and indefatigable Max, to prove that the Herald is no longer king. "From the New York Herald, good Lord deliver us!" was the managerial litany chanted honestly and triumphantly. Very glad are we that theatres are emancipating themselves from the galling and demoralizing yoke heretofore imposed upon them by newspapers, and very encouraging is it to see that the public, up to a certain point, are able to think for themselves. To believe in a musical or theatrical criticism, nowadays, is a remnant of superstition visible only among the very young or the very confiding. Very edifying is it to take up playbill after playbill and read the affecting announcement that "this place of amusement does not advertise in the New York Herald;" very suggestive, too, of a moral is it to look at the Herald's amusement column and gaze upon a beggarly account of empty benches. Of course "The Play Bill," a very clever protégé of the Herald, widely circulated in the theatres, no longer exists. It has been supplanted by "The Stage," which in no way compares with its predecessor.

CRISPINO E LA COMARE.

Looking back upon the recent opera season recalls the late lamented buffo, Rovere, to whom we owe the introduction of a new comic opera, "Crispino e la Comare," (the cobbler and the fairy) by the brothers

Ricci. It was astonishing to see the gray-haired Rovere, of sixty-five, singing and acting with all the vivacity and agility of thirty, when thirty is very clever! Poor fellow! In amusing the public he dug his own grave. Not being able to find his carriage at the conclusion of the last representation of Crispino e la Comare, he walked home in an overheated condition and died of diphtheria two days after. It is the province of the superstitious to record coincidences; yet, without being superstitious, there is that about Rovere's death which, taken in connection with Crispino, has struck me as being singular, to say the least. In the last act the fairy conducts Crispino to her abode, supposed to be a department of the infernal regions; there the cobbler sees a number of crystal vases, in each of which a flame is burning with various degrees of brightness, one being nearly extinguished. "Is this an illumination?" asks Crispino. "No," replies the fairy, "these are my registers; each flame represents a human life." At this Crispino becomes curious, and inquires into the personality of each flame. Finally he comes to one which he is told represents his wife. "How beautiful it burns!" he exclaims; "but where's mine?"

Fairy—"Tis this one."

Crispino—"Oh dear! Oh dear! it's nearly out."

Fairy—"Thy vices have led thee to a premature end."

Crispino—"Let's take a little oil from my wife's lamp. Methinks she has too much."

The cobbler is about to perform this little act of selfishness, when the lights are extinguished by the fairy. Two nights later, Rovere's light was extinguished by a fate more unrelenting than the fairy of the opera.

A FUNERAL MASS.

Rovere died poor, and, with that generosity which is a peculiar characteristic of the dramatic profession a subscription was immediately taken up among the artists for the benefit of his widow. A grand mass for the repose of his soul was also celebrated, last Sunday, at Father Cumming's church in Twenty-eighth street. We went in all seriousness of spirit, and came away feeling that we had assisted at a very bad theatrical performance. Yes, it was particularly bad; rather more heartless than any funeral spectacle we had ever seen in Italy. A bon vivant droned through the service, and the music, for the most part out of time and tune, was of the earthiest description. Several artists assisted in selections from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mazzoleni singing the grand tenor aria of "Cujus Animam" and Antonucci delivering the "Pro Peccatis;" and though their rendering of each was tolerable, yet the character of the music is so intensely operatic that one instinctively smells the foot-lights, whereby all religious feeling is destroyed. It is certainly true that Italians generally do not understand sacred music; and it is also certainly true that one rarely hears anything but jigs in the Catholic churches of New York. There is no particular necessity to praise the musical abominations one has to endure in Protestant churches, but at all events they attempt to be devotional, and if singers have any feeling, which occasionally happens, the religious element may be brought out. The modern mass is merely bastard opera, and not long since we were "played out of the house" to a lively air from "Martha." Surely we pitied poor Rovere's soul that it required such mumbling and such singing to get to heaven! Requiescat in pace.

L'AFRICAIN.

Of "L'Africaine," Meyerbeer's posthumous opera, the least said the better, although a great deal has been and can still be said on this subject. There are people who actually enjoy bad music played on an old tin pan, or its equivalent. There are persons who enjoy what they do not understand; therefore there are those who honestly like "L'Africaine." Some, overpowered by the name of Meyerbeer, say they like it. They are such as always praise whatever has a reputation. Then there are affected men and women, in and out of fashion (but generally in) who indulge in a spasmodic enthusiasm whenever "L'Africaine" is mentioned. "Oh, it is superb," exclaimed a would-be musical exquisite the other day. "There never was anything like it." This at least is true; there never was anything like it. "But," interposed a listener who had not yet heard the opera, "there are people who hold quite a different opinion." "Indeed," replied the exquisite, "then they are dunderheads. None but dunderheads can fail to appreciate L'Africaine." "Then behold a dunderhead," retorted a very fine musician, stepping forward. The exquisite retired in disorder before the well-aimed fire of the enemy. Ask musicians what they think of "L'Africaine," and shaking of heads and shrugging of shoulders will be the response of the majority. Of course there are fine passages in it, and some noble concerted pieces; nothing of Meyerbeer's can be entirely devoid of merit. Tennyson, the poet laureate, could afford to write "Enoch Arden." Meyerbeer, the composer of "The Huguenots," could afford to compose "L'Africaine;" but Tennyson would never have obtained his laurels had he only written his last poem. Meyerbeer would never have had the entrée of the Grand Opera at Paris had "L'Africaine" been without predecessors. With all the magnificence of dresses and scenery, with all the support of first-class artists, and with all the melancholy interest surrounding the unfinished work of a great man just dead, Paris has exhibited no enthusiasm. The circumstances of its production merely disarmed criticism for the time being.

HOW MEYERBEER COMPOSED.

There is to be said, and it is saying a great deal, that Meyerbeer had not declared "L'Africaine" to be ready for the stage, and no one that has any knowledge of Meyerbeer's method of composing can believe that he would have produced it in its present condition. There was no end to his revisions. He often revised so elaborately as to leave nothing of the original intention remaining. Nor did he ever take any one into his confidence. Seated on a high stool before a high desk, he wrote, and wrote, and wrote, never going to the piano, so a friend of his tells me. After his day's work, the manuscript was put back into the desk and carefully locked up. Nor until an opera was completed to his own satisfaction, would Meyerbeer show it. Is it then just to regard "L'Africaine" as a work after its composer's own heart? Probably the poor man's ghost is suffering the torments of numberless purgatories at this most unwarrantable liberty taken with his undeveloped ideas. If Meyerbeer has any enemies, it is a sweet revenge they are now enjoying at seeing him for the first time in dishabille. The mysteries of the toilet do wonders for some people.

"L'Africaine," as brought out in this country, is but a suggestion of its possibilities. Neither artists nor mise en scene do justice to the opera, although Maretzek has taken as much pains with its production as could be expected. In America there is no power behind the manager to supply the deficiencies of an exhausted treasury. Still, Maretzek could procure better singers than we are treated to in "L'Africaine," and in another year they should be forthcoming. The plot of the opera is the worst that ever was conceived. In this case Scribe has become a Pharisee!

STRAWES, JR.

(From the London Orchestra.)

My Experiences of England and the English.

BY MYSELF.

No. VI.—MY OPERA.

It was come to pass, during that I a waif and wanderer on the hospitable shore of England wandered, that I should an opera write. In this proceeding am I a by-a-no-means-exceptionwise instance of profession-fertility in music-writing. How many times many of your musicians have operas written! I speak not from your great composers—from your Balf, your Vallis, your Benedict (he is of us Germans), your Schmart, your Henryleslie, your Mackfarn, and so wider: these same have naturally-wise many great works achieved. But I speak from your littler artists—what you would call your Smallfry. The Smallfry of the profession are thereto throughout addicted, that they operas compose. In no case do I know a friend-musician, without from him the experience to have made, that he somewhere or other a manuscript opera in the pocket hidden has.

So it was quite and perfect a natural circumstance that I also should do my opera. I had myself shamed before the face of the musical world, if I, as German, had not done so much for art than you, who are ignorant English stupid-heads, boast yourselves to achieve. I resolved to myself that I would no longer consent to place myself in the stand described by Shakespeare—would no longer remain

"A flour borne to blush obscene
And waist its weakness on the dessert here."

No, I cried, I will to the work! I will prove that Germany is not doom to defeat from English barbarism. Never shall its eclecticismus yield to soleicismus: never its idealismus be constrained by vandalismus. This will I do, with enthusiasmus, and despite of rheumatismus.

I set to the work—or, as you English would say, I pegged away. The labor at which away I first pegged, was to get a Textbook—or, as you with Italian word-borrowing uninvention-wise call it, a Libretto. And first to find the Boot. The same was soon found, though I did not take the first that came to the hand. Not your Temysohn, nor your Braunig, nor your Amerikanisch Longpellow, nor your Schweinborn, nor yet the Boet Lorette, namely Tupper. None of these would I. Rather chose I a Boet which I knew, and which drove a profitless business in selling foreign newspapers and copying law-papers, handwritten dramas, and music-scores, in Princea-street, Leicester Square.

He was not a foreigner, though he sold foreign journals and polyglot dictionaries. He could speak no language but his own, which was Soho. But in that he had for many years lived there, and that therefore was himself with foreign elements mixed up, so had he a warm regard for the Square-surrounding nationalities; and with the Germans was particularly with sympathetic inlyfeelingfulness bound up.

He had likewise a sympathy for the oriental poetry of the Morningland, owing to the vicinity of the Alhambra. To him therefore, as to a the-other-comprehending participator in art-longing, I went.

The subject of our opera, as we soon settled, must be German, and thus mytisch and mysteriös. So much have I seen of your commonplace of English materialism, that I would nothing of that. What is your "Helwellyn," your "Rose of Castle," your "Robbing Wood," your "Maritana?" They are commonplace. What is your last debutant as English tenor? He is Cummings-place. True your "Zig-eunerin" (or Bohemian girl) is at least more to proper taste; and your "Lurline" would be at least German but is spoilt—ach, how she is spoilt! Yet am I tired of ordinary subjects: I would invent one for me myself.

So with my Boet, whose name was Robinasohn, we hit upon an interesting textbook. This was the Blot of opera: "The two families of Bangenschreckenstein and Wilderkaterfels have been at war since A.D. 772, at which time the Landmarkgraf von Wilderkaterfels caused the Erblicher Stiefelknecht of the Roman Empire, who was a Bangenschreckenstein, to be flayed alive and then sent home in a dog-cart, for having offered the Landmarkgraf mustard with matton—an indignity which the haughty noble could not brook. Hence arose a feud between the two houses, which lasted for several centuries. At the opening of our story the house of Wilderkaterfels has come under the protection of the Yellow Pussy of the Riesengebirge—a wild and weirdlike being, who changes at will from an old woman to a Demon Cat, and divides her time equally between Whist in one character and Mice in the other. In the eyes of this feline witch all cats are sacred. Pleased with the conduct of a young scion of the house of Wilderkaterfels, who in a moment of infant compassion rescued from a watery grave a family of blind and helpless kittens, she has conformed on him and his the especial presence and guardianship of the Cats, with the promise that his castle shall be renowned and feared throughout Germany for the number of these animals within its walls. The prophecy has been fulfilled, and the castle swarms with cats. The young Landmarkgraf has grown up and died, leaving a son, an impetuous youth, who secretly and against the injunction of the Pope has sent his carte to the eldest daughter of the Bangenschreckenstein. A mutually acknowledged love is the result of this indiscretion, but the Fräulein von Bangenschreckenstein steadily refuses to consent to a marriage, owing to her antipathy to the faithful guardians of her lover's house, asserting that not only are they as a race noisy at night, but they support animal life extraneous to their own. All her lover can urge fails to combat her objections, and a quarrel between the lovers ensues, and terminates in her boxing the Landmarkgraf's ears and entering a convent.

"The distracted Landmarkgraf now appeals to the Pope for a dispensation to do something, but the Pope won't. Driven to madness by the refusal, and worried by the persistent row of the oldest Tortoiseshell of the family, who has occupied a turret rampart for several nights running and can't be driven away, the furious Landmarkgraf, forgetting his responsibilities, loads a culverin and deliberately shoots THE CAT!

"Instant and all but overwhelming ruin follows. The wrathful guardians of the Wilderkaterfels betake themselves, wildly crying for vengeance, to their patron—the Yellow Pussy of the Riesengebirge. The witch swears ample revenge; and at the moment of her volcanic descent in a storm of thunder and snow, the adherents of the inimical Bangenschreckenstein are seen winding their way along the chartered banks of the Rhine to attack the Castle of Wilderkaterfels, with the intention of burning it to the ground. The Landmarkgraf is unarmed and an orphan, and his agony is aggravated by the reflection that he is not insured. But at the moment of destruction means of safety are at hand. A faithful Tabby, who has remained constant to the house in which she has passed many happy hours, and has refused to follow the exodus of her tribe, is discovered with kittens in the meat-safe. Round the neck of one of the new-born innocents an ancient retainer finds a medallion attached, and this when exposed to a solution of Ferrocyanide of Potassium discovers a SECRET CYPHER, warranting the deposition of the Pope, the abolition of convents throughout Germany, and an auto da fe against the Yellow Pussy. Joy is once more established, and while the lovers are united by special license, the Cats return placidly to their former home, and are greeted with an universal Invocation to the Mews."

This was my Blot in the language of the Boet who wrote it; this also was the argument which it was by us intended should go before the text in the textbook of the opera. Need I to add how much in character-voice with the in-every-way-idiosyncratic story was the music which was by me composed? Scarcely need I so to add; yet will I give one assurance. The musical handling of the opera was worth-full.

In a certain while it was all accomplished. My opera was full-ended. I took him to a publisher, an over-generous man, and the over-generous man bought him out of hand. I am not in a stand to open-bare to you the name of that goodliest friend of me, who bought the property-right of my "Patron Cats," for so was the opera named. Why can I not open-bare to you his name? Because when he had accepted my offer he said to me with quivering quavers in the voice, "Blechhausen, my dear boy, don't mention that I have bought this of you; it might damage my reputation. The remark was kurios, but perhaps it was a commerce-instinct, and commerce-instincts are not in the sphere of artistic belongings, and I understand them not. Therefore without to enquire, I promise him the promise not to mention his name. Shall I break my blighted word? Never will I diverge so secret a sacred!

The next thing was to get the "Patron Cats" performed, and with this object-fulfilment in the mind I directed myself to a certain Gompany, which was a Gompany for opera. I will not say it was the English Opera Gompany Limited, but only that it was a Gompany for opera. I wrote to the Manager of this institution a fine greeting, and might I be so free, myself to him in a personal interview to recommend? To this came a reply that the Manager sent compliments and would be glad to see me call.

He saw me call, since I went. He was a very polite gentleman with easy manners and easy chairs. He was engaged in a great deal of writing—perhaps scores of unperformed works; but he received me with urban dissimilitude.

In my best knowledge of English Idiotisms I told him my business which he should mind. I said I wished him to produce my opera.

"Ah," said the manager, "the old story I see." "Not so," replied I with indignation, "the story is quite new and original, and peculiar fits for the lyric stage." (This last was a phrase I had learnt from newspapers, which say each text-book is peculiar fits for the lyric stage).

"You want your work brought out shortly, I suppose?" said the manager. "You see we are a good deal hampered just now."

I looked for the hampers, but they were not in the office; so I thought. "Perhaps he means they are for picnics outside."

"If I were to submit your proposal to the Board—"

"Pardon," I interrupted; "what are Board?"

"The word, M. Blechhausen, has two significations in the operative world. In the plural number it means the dramatic substratum on which a great work is produced; in the singular number the power which produces it."

"Then," said I, "I will all the both."

"If, as I was about to observe, I submitted the matter to our Board, they would doubtless be influenced by the amount of pecuniary support you would be prepared to extend to the venture."

